V. 13—35. This appearance of Christ to two disciples going to Emmaus, just mentioned before, (Mark 16: 12.) is here largely related. It happened the same day Christ rose. One of these two disciples was Cleopas, or Alpheus, said by the ancients to be the brother of Joseph, Christ's supposed father; the other, some think, was Peter; it should seem, indeed, Christ did appear particularly to Peter that day, v. 34. and 1 Cor. 15: 5. But Peter could not be one of the two, for he was one of the eleven to whom the two returned; and besides, had he been one of the two, he and not Cleopas would have been the chief speaker. It was one of those associated with the eleven, v. 9.

Now observe here,

I. The walk and talk of those two disciples. Emmaus is reckoned about two hours' walk, or seven measured miles, (v. 13.) from Jerusalem. Why they went thither, does not appear. I suspect they were going home to Galilee, with an intention not to inquire more after this Jesus and without asking or taking leave of their company; for the accounts brought them that morning of their Master's resurrection, seemed to them as idle tales; and if so, no wonder they began to think of making the best of their way home.

But, as they travelled, they talked together of all these things which had happened, v. 14. They had not courage to confer, and consult what was to be done at Jerusalem; but when out of the hearing of the Jews, they could, and did talk with more freedom; reasoning with themselves concerning the probabilities of Christ's resurrection; for, according as these appeared, they would either go forward, or return. Note, It well becomes Christ's disciples, when together, to talk of his death and resurrection; thus they may improve their knowledge, refresh their memory, and stir up each other's devout affections.

II. The good company they met with on the road, when Jesus Himself came, and joined Himself to them, v. 15. Perhaps they were warm in argument, one hoping their Master was risen, and would set up his kingdom, the other despairing. Jesus drew near, as a stranger, who seeing them travel the same way He went, told them He should be glad of their company.

We may observe it, for our encouragement to keep up Christian discourse, that where but two together do so, Christ will come to them, and make a third. When they that fear the Lord, speak one to another, the Lord hearkens and hears, and is with them of a truth; so that two, thus united in faith and love, become a

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—12. The Lord 'loveth those who love Him, and they who seek Him early shall find Him.'—All our mistakes in religion spring from ignorance or forgetfulness of the Word of God: and our judgments will be rectified, when we call to remembrance, and are enabled to understand, what He has revealed and promised.—Even where a measure of faith and grace are found, how unbelieving are men! not only in those things which are contrary to their prejudices, but in those also that are above their experience, or expectation. Yet a diligent spirit of inquiry will gradually lead to a more clear perceptor of spiritual things. (P. O. Matt. 28: 1—10. Mark 16: 1—11.)

Verses 10—12.

Luke gives no intimation that these women saw Jesus Himself, in the way to the city; as the women mentioned by Matthew did. (Marg. Ref.—Note, Matt. 28: 9, 10.) This confirms the supposition, that the women did not go to the sepulchre all in one company; that they returned at several times, and by different ways; and that some of them were at the sepulchre more than once. Peter, who is supposed to have been with John at the sepulchre before this, (Note, John 20: 1—10.) fearing that the women had seen angels, who declared that Jesus was alive, went again to the sepulchre, probably expecting to see the angels, and perhaps with some feeble hope of seeing Jesus also; yet he departed, 'wondering in himself at these things, and saying nothing of them to others.

(10.) Joanna.] 'Griesbach thinks it was from this person Luke derived his information of these circumstances, which he also records. She is not mentioned except by Luke here, and in ch. 8: 3, whence one may conjecture she was known to him.'

Verses 13—24.

Cleopas is supposed to be the same with Alpheus, the father of two apostles, and also nearly related to our Lord Himself. (13. Mark 2: 14, 3: 18. John 19: 25.) Many conjecture that Luke himself was the other; but of this there is no intimation, nor indeed probability. (Preface to Luke.) This account seems to imply, that these disciples came away before the women 'who had seen Jesus' returned to the apostles; though some think the contrary is intimated in the expression, 'Him they saw not;' which may signify, that the women and reasoned, Jesus himself drew near, and went with them;

16 But their eyes were hidden, that they should not know him.

17 And he said unto them, What manner of communications are these, that ye have one to another, as ye walk, and are sad?

18 And the one of them, whose name was Cleopas, answering said unto him, Art thou only a stranger in Jerusalem, and hast not known the things which are come to pass there in these days?

19 And he said unto them, What things? And they said unto him, Concerning Jesus of Nazareth, which was a prophet mighty in deed and word, before God and all the people:

20 And how the chief priests and our rulers delivered him to be condemned to death, and have crucified him.

Note, 1st. It becomes Christians to talk of Christ. Were our hearts as full of Him, and of what He has done and suffered for us, as they should be, out of the abundance of the heart the mouth would speak, not only of God and his providence, but of Christ, and his grace and love. 2dly. Good company, and good converse, are an excellent antidote against prevailing melancholy. When Christ's disciples were sad, they did not each one get by himself, but continued as He sent them out, two and two, for two are better than one, especially in times of sorrow. Giving vent to the grief, may perhaps give ease to the grieved; and, by talking it over, we may talk ourselves, or our friends may talk us, into a better frame. Joint-mourners should be mutual comforters; comforts sometimes come best from such.

(2.) Christ came up, and inquired into the matter of their talk, and the cause of their grief, v. 17. Though now entered into his state of exaltation, yet He continued tender of his disciples. He speaks as one troubled to see their melancholy; Wherefore look ye so sadly to-day? Gen. 40:7. Note, Our Lord notices the sorrow and sadness of his disciples, and is afflicted in their afflictions. Christ hereby taught us to be conversable. He here fell in to discourse with two grave, serious persons, and though a stranger to them, and they knew Him not, they readily embraced Him. It does not become Christians to be morose and shy, but to take pleasure in good society. We are hereby taught to be compassionate. When we see our friends in sorrow and sadness, we should give them the best counsel and comfort we can; Weep with them that weep.

2. In answer, they put a question to Him concerning his strangeness; v. 18. Observe,

(1.) Cleopas gave Him a civil answer. Note, We ought to be civil to those who are civil to us, and to conduct ourselves obligingly to all, both in word and deed. It was a dangerous time now with Christ's disciples; yet Cleopas was not jealous of this Stranger, that He had any design to inform against them, or bring them into trouble. Charity is not forward to think evil, no, not of strangers.

(2.) He is full of Christ himself, of his death and sufferings, and wonders very body else is not so too. Note, Those are strangers indeed in Jerusalem, that know not of the death and sufferings of Christ. What! are they threefold cord, not easily broken, Eccl. 4:12. They, in their communings and reasonings, were searching for Christ, and now Christ comes to them. Note, They who seek Christ shall find Him: He will give knowledge to those who use the helps for knowledge which they have. When the spouse inquired of the watchmen concerning her Beloved, it was but a little that she passed from them, but she found Him. Cant. 3:4.

But though they had Christ with them, they were not at first aware of it, v. 16. It should seem, there were both an alteration of the object, (for it is said in Mark, that now He appeared in another form,) and a restraint on the organ; for here it is said, their eyes were held by a divine power; or, as some think, there was a confusion in the medium; the air was so disposed, they could not discern who it was. No matter how, but so it was, they did not know Him; Christ so ordering it, that they might the more freely discourse with Him, and He with them; and that it might appear that his Word, and the influence of it, did not depend on his bodily presence, which the disciples had too much doted on, and must be weaned from; but He could teach them, and warm their hearts, by others, who should have his spiritual presence with them, and his grace going along with them unseen.

III. The conference between Christ and them, when He knew them, and they knew not Him.

1. Christ's first question is concerning their present sadness, which plainly appeared in their countenances, v. 17. It is a very kind and friendly inquiry. Observe, daughters of Jerusalem, and yet so little acquainted with Christ, as to ask, What is He Beloved more than another beloved?

(1.) They were sad; it appeared to a stranger they were so. [1.] They had lost their dear Master, and were, in their own apprehensions, quite disappointed in their expectations from Him. They had given up the cause, and knew not what course to take to retrieve it. Note, Christ's disciples have reason to be sad when He withdraws from them; to fast when the Bridegroom is taken from them. [2.] Though He was risen from the dead, yet either they did not know it, or did not believe it, and so were still in sorrow. Note, Christ's disciples are often sad and sorrowful, even when they have reason to rejoice; through the weakness of their faith they cannot take the comfort offered them. [3.] Being sad, they had communications one with another concerning Christ.

(3.) He is very willing to inform this stranger concerning Christ, and to draw on further discourse with him on this subject. He would not have any one, that had the face of a man, to be ignorant of Christ. Note, Those who have themselves the knowledge of Christ crucified, should do what they can to spread that knowledge, and lead others into an acquaintance with Him. And it is observable, These Disciples, that were so forward to instruct the Stranger, were instructed by Him; for to him that has, and uses what he has, shall be given.

(4.) It appears, by what Cleopas says, that the death of Christ made a great noise in Jerusalem, so that it could not be imagined that any man should be such a stranger in the city, as not to know of it; it was discoursed of in all companies. Thus the matter of fact came to be universally known, which, after the pouring out of the Spirit, was to be explained.

3. Christ, by way of reply, asked concerning their knowledge; (v. 19.) thus making Himself yet more a stranger. Observe,

(1.) Christ made light of his own sufferings, in comparison with the joy set before Him, which was the recompense of it. Now that He was entering on his glory, see with what unconcern He looks back on his sufferings; What things? He had reason to know what things; for to Him they were bitter things, and heavy things, and yet He asks, What things? The sorrow was forgotten; He took pleasure in infirmities for our sakes, to teach us to do so for his sake.

(2.) Those whom Christ will teach, He will first examine; they must tell Him what things they know, and then He will tell them the meaning, and lead them into the mystery of them.

4. Observe the story they tell, v. 19, &c. They give,

(1.) A summary of Christ's life and character. They are full of the things concerning Jesus of Nazareth, (so He was commonly called,) who was a Prophet, a Teacher come from God. He preached a true and excellent doctrine, which had manifestly its rise from, and a tendency toward heaven; He confirmed it by many glorious miracles of mercy, so that He was mighty in deed and word before God and all the people; that is, He was both a great favorite of heaven, and a great blessing to men. Many, as the scribes and Pharisees, are great before all the people, and caressed by them, who are not so before God; but Christ was, before both, mighty in doctrine and doings. Those were strangers in Jerusalem, that did not know this.

(2.) A modest narrative of his sufferings and death, v. 20. It is strange that they did not aggravate the matter more, and lay more load on those that had been guilty of crucifying Christ; but perhaps because they spake to one that was a stranger, they thought it prudence to avoid all reflection on the chief priests and their rulers, how just soever.

(3.) An intimation of their disappointment, as the reason of their sadness, v. 21. 'We are of those who not only looked upon Him to be a Prophet, like Moses, but, like him, a Redeemer too; He was depended on, and great things expected from Him, by them that looked for redemption, and the consolation of Israel.' Now, if hope deferred makes the heart sick, hope disappointed, especially such a hope, kills the heart. But see how they made that the ground of their despair, which, if they had understood it aright, was the surest ground of their hope—the dying of the Lord Jesus, v. 21. And is it not He that doth redeem Israel? Nay, is He not by his death paying the price of their redemption? Was it not necessary, in order to his saving Israel from their sins, that He should suffer? So that, now that most difficult part of his undertaking was got over, they had more reported that they had seen Him; but that the disciples thought it was only the appearance of an angel in his form. (Acts 12:15.) 'But why would not Christ be as yet known by them? That they might more unreservedly express their sentiments; and that they might now rest on the bare authority of a Teacher, but on the arguments which He was about to produce.' Beza.

Scott.

21 But we trusted that it had been he which should have redeemed Israel: and, beside all this, to-day is the third day since these things were done.

22 Yea, and certain women also of our company made us astonished, which were early at the sepulchre:

23 And when they found not his body, they came, saying, That they had also seen a vision of angels, which said that he was alive.

24 And certain of them which were with us, went to the sepulchre, and found it even so as the women had said: but him they saw not.

25 Then he said unto them, O fools, and slow of heart to believe all that the prophets have spoken!

26 Ought not Christ to have suffered these things, and to enter into his glory?

27 And, beginning at Moses and all the prophets, he expounded unto them in all the scriptures the things concerning himself.

read the fifty-third of Isaiah, speak so very plainly of the sufferings of Christ, and the glory that should follow? 1 Pet. 11. The cross of Christ was what they could not reconcile themselves to; now here He shows them two things, which take off its offence; 1st. That the Messiah ought to suffer these things; and therefore his sufferings were not only no objection against his being the Messiah, but really a proof of it, as the afflictions of the saints are an evidence of their sonship. Christ's undertaking of our salvation was voluntary; but, having undertaken it, it was necessary He should suffer and die. 2dly. That, when He had suffered these things, He should enter into his glory; which He did at his resurrection, that was his first step upward. Observe, It is called his glory; because He was duly entitled to it; and had it before the world was; He ought to enter into it, for in that, as in his sufferings, the Scripture must be fulfilled. He ought to suffer first, and then to enter into his glory; and thus the reproach of the cross is forever rolled away; and we are directed to expect the crown of thorns, and then that of glory.

Verses 25-31.

What a sermon this! where all the prophecies relative to the incarnation, birth, teaching, miracles, sufferings, death, and resurrection of the blessed Jesus were adduced, illustrated, and applied to Himself, by an appeal to the well known facts of his life! We are almost irresistibly impelled to exclaim, What a pity this discourse had not been preserved! Dr. A. Clarke. (25.) Fools, &c. (Rom. 1:14. Gal. 3:1, 3.) The word thus translated, (Matt. 5:22.) is a term of great indignation, and sometimes of attempt; that employed here, a reason than ever to trust, that this is He that shall deliver Israel; yet they are ready to give up the cause.

(4.) An account of their present amazement, with reference to his resurrection. [1.] 'This is the third day since He was crucified and died, and that was the day, when it was expected, if ever, that He should rise again, and rise in glory and outward pomp, and show Himself as publicly in honor as He had been shown three days before in disgrace; but we see no sign of it; nothing appears as we expected, but all is silent.' [2.] They own that there was a report among them, that He was risen, but they seem to speak of it very slightly, and as what they gave no credit at all to, v. 22, 23. [3.] They acknowledge some of the apostles had made a visit to the sepulchre, and found it empty, (v. 24.) 'But Him they saw not, and therefore we have reason to fear He is not risen, for if He were, surely He would have showed Himself to them; so, on the whole, we have no great reason to think He is risen, and therefore have no expectations from Him now.'

[1.] He reproves their incognitancy, and the weakness of their faith in the Old Testament, v. 25. Christ called them fools, not as it signifies wicked men, in which sense He forbade it us, but as it signifies weak men. He might call them fools, for He knows our foolishness. They are fools, that act against their own interest; so they did, who would not admit the comforting evidence that their Master was risen. Their foolishness is, 1st. Their slowness to believe. Believers are branded as fools by atheists and infidels, and their most holy faith is censured as a fond credulity; but Christ tells us those are fools, who are kept from believing by prejudices never impartially examined. 2dly. Their slowness to believe the writings of the prophets. He does not so much blame them for their slowness to believe the testimony of the women and of the angels, but for that which was the cause thereof—their slowness to believe the prophets; for if they had given the prophets of the Old Testament their due weight and consideration, they would have been as sure of Christ's rising from the dead that morning, (being the third day after his death,) as they were of the rising of the sun; for the series and succession of events as settled by prophecy, are no less certain and inviolable than as settled by Providence; were we but more conversant with the Scripture, and the divine counsels as there made known, we should not be subject to such perplexities as we often entangle ourselves in.

[2.] He shows them that the sufferings of Christ, which were such a stumbling-block to them, were really the only appointed way to his glory, v. 26. 'Was it not decreed, and the decree declared, that the promised Messiah must first suffer, and then reign? that He must go by his cross to his crown?' Had they never seen the ninth of Daniel, where the prophets

[3.] He expounded to them the Scriptures of the Old Testament, which spoke of the Messiah, and showed them how they were fulfilled in Jesus of Nazareth, and now can tell them more concerning Him than they could before tell Him; (v. 27.) showing that the sufferings He had now gone through, were so far from defeating the prophecies of the Scripture concerning Him, that they were the accomplishment of them. He began at Moses, who recorded the first promise, in which it was plainly foretold that the Messiah should have his heel bruised, but that by it the serpent's head should be incurably broken. Note, 1st. There are things dispersed throughout all the Scriptures concerning Christ, which it is of great advantage to have collected and put together. You cannot go far in any part of Scripture, but you meet with something that has reference to Christ, some prophecy, promise, prayer, some type or other; He is the true Treasure hid in that field. A golden thread of gospel-grace runs through the whole web of the Old Testament. 2dly. The things concerning Christ need to be expounded. The enunch, though a scholar, would not pretend to understand them, except some man should guide him; (Acts 8:31.) for they were delivered darkly, according to that dispensation; but now the veil is taken away, the New Testament expounds the Old. 3dly. Jesus Christ is Himself the best Expositor of Scripture, particularly the Scriptures concerning Himself; and even after his resurrection, it was in this way He led people into the knowledge of the mystery concerning Himself; not by advancing new notions independent of the Scriptures, but by showing how the Scriptures were fulfilled, and turning them over to the study of them. Even the Apocalypse itself, is but a second part of the Old Testament prophecies, and has continually an eye to them. If men believe not Moses and the prophets, they are incurable. 4thly. In studying the Scriptures, it is good to be methodical, and to take them in order; the Old Testament light shone gradually to the perfect day. Some begin their Bible at the wrong end, who study the Revelation first; Christ has here taught us to begin at Moses. Thus far the conference between them.

IV. The discovery Christ at length made of Himself to them, v. 28-31. If a stranger he shy, every one knows the meaning of it, he will not thrust himself rudely on your house or company; but if you make it appear that you are freely desirous of him for your guest or companion, he knows not but he may accept your invitation; and this was all that Christ did, when He made as though He would have gone further, and would have, if they had not courted his stay.

And now,

1. They courted his stay with them, v. 28. Note, Those that would have Christ dwell with them, must invite Him, and be importunate with Him; though often found of those that seek Him not, yet those only that seek, can be sure to find Him; and if He seem to draw off from us, it is but to draw out our importunity; as here, Abide with us. Note, Those that have experienced the pleasure and profit of communion with Christ, cannot but covet more of his company, and beg of Him, not only to walk with them all day, but to abide with them at night. When the day is far spent, and it is towards evening, we begin to think of retiring for our repose, and then it is proper to have our eye to Christ, and beg of Him to abide with us; to manifest Himself to us, and to fill our minds with good thoughts of Him, and good affections to Him. Christ yielded to their importunity; He went in, to tarry with them. Thus ready is Christ to give further instruction, and comforts

28 And they drew nigh unto the village whither they went: and he made as though he would have gone further.

29 But they constrained him, saying, Abide with us; for it is toward evening and the day is far spent. And he went in to tarry with them.

30 And it came to pass, as he sat at meat with them, he took bread, and blessed it, and brake, and gave to them.

31 And their eyes were opened, and they knew him; and he vanished out of their sight.

32 And they said one to another, Did not our heart burn within us, while he talked with us by the way, and while he opened to us the scriptures?

33 And they rose up the same hour, and returned to Jerusalem, and found the eleven gathered together, and them that were with them, 34 Saying, The Lord is risen indeed, and hath appeared to Simon.

35 And they told what things were done in the way, and how to those who improve what they have received. He has promised, that, if any man open the door, to bid Him welcome, He will come in to him, Rev. 3: 20.

2. He manifested Himself to them, v. 30, 31. We may suppose He continued his discourse, which He began on the road; for thou must talk of the things of God when thou sittest in the house, as well as when thou walkest by the way; while supper was getting ready, it is probable He entertained them with such communications as were good, and to the use of edifying; and so likewise as they sat at meat, his lips fed them. But still they little thought it was Jesus Himself that was all this while talking with them: till at length He was pleased to throw off his disguise, and then to withdraw.

(1.) They began to suspect it was He, when, as they sat down to meat, He undertook the office of the Master of the feast; He performed it so like Himself, and like what He used to do among his disciples. Not that this was a miraculous meal, like that of the five loaves, or a sacramental meal, like that of the eucharist; it was a common meal; yet Christ here did the same as He did in those; to teach us to keep up our communion with God through Christ in common providences, as well as in special ordinances, and to crave a blessing, and give thanks at every meal, and to see our daily bread provided for us, and broken to us, by the hand of Jesus Christ, the Master, not only of the great family, but of all our families. Wherever we sit down to eat, let us set Christ at the head of the table, take our meat as blessed to us by Him, eat and drink to his glory; and receive contentedly and thankfully what He is pleased to carve out to us, be the fare ever so coarse and mean; we may well receive it cheerfully, if we can by faith see it coming to us from Christ's hand, and with his blessing.

(2.) Presently their eyes were opened, and then they saw who it was, and knew Him well enough; whatever it was which had hitherto concealed Him from them, it was now taken out of the way, the mists were scattered, the veil taken off, and they made no question but it was their Master; He might for wise and holy ends put on the shape of another, but no other could put on his; and therefore it must be He. See how Christ, by his Spirit and grace, makes Himself known to the souls of his people. He opens the Scriptures to them, for these are they which testify of Him to those who search them, and search for Him in them. He meets them at his table, in the ordinance of the Lord's supper, and commonly there makes further discoveries of Himself to them; is known to them in breaking of bread. And the work is completed by the opening of the eyes of their mind, and causing the scales to fall off from them, as from Paul's in his conversion. If He that gives the revelation, do not give the understanding, we are in the dark still.

3. He immediately disappeared; withdrew Himself; slipped away of a sudden, and went out of sight. Or, He became not visible by them.

It should seem that though Christ's body, after his resurrection, was the very same body in which He suffered and died, as appeared by the marks in it, yet it was so far changed, as to become either visible or not visible, as He thought fit to make it, which was a step towards its being made a glorious body. As soon as He had given his disciples one glimpse of Him, He was gone presently. Such short and transient views have we of Christ in this world; we see Him, but in a little while lose the sight of Him again; when we come to heaven, the vision of Him will have, no interruptions.

V. The reflection of these disciples on this conference, and the report they made of it to their brethren at Jerusalem.

1. The reflection each made on the influence Christ's discourse had on them, v. 32. They found the preaching powerful, even when they knew not the Preacher; it made things very plain and clear; and, which was more, brought a divine heat with a divine light into their souls, such as put their hearts into a glow, and kindled a holy fire of pious and devout affections in them. Now this they take notice of, to confirm their belief, that it was indeed, as at last they saw, Jesus Himself, that had been talking with them all along. What fools were we, that we were not sooner aware who it was; no word but his, could make our hearts burn within us as they did; it must be He that has the key of the heart, it could be no other." See here (1.) What preaching is likely to do good—such as Christ's was; plain teaching, familiar and level to our capacity—He talked with us by the way; and scriptural preaching—He opened to us the Scriptures, the Scriptures relating to Himself. Ministers should show people their religion in their Bibles, and that they preach no other doctrine to them than what is there; they must show that they make that the fountain of their knowledge, and the foundation of their faith. Note, The expounding of those Scriptures which speak of Christ, has a direct tendency to warm the hearts of his disciples, both to quicken them, and to comfort them. (2.) What hearing is likely to do good—that which makes the heart burn; when we are much affected with the things of God, especially with the love of Christ in dying for us, and have our hearts thereby drawn out in love to Him, and drawn up in holy desires and devotions, then our hearts burn within us: when our hearts are raised and elevated, and are as the sparks which fly upward toward God, and when they are kindled and carried out with a holy zeal and indignation against sin, both in others and in ourselves, and we are in some measure refined and purified from it by the spirit of judgment and the spirit of burning, then we may say, 'Through grace our hearts are thus inflamed.'

2. Their report to their brethren at Jerusalem, v. 33. So transported were they with joy at the discovery Christ had made of Himself to them, that they could not stay to end their supper, but returned with all speed to Jerusalem, though it was towards evening. If they had had any thoughts of forsaking Christ, this soon banished them all; and now that they had seen Christ, they could not rest till they had brought the good news to the disciples, both to confirm their trembling faith, and to comfort their sorrowful spirits, with the same comforts whereunto they were comforted of God. Note It is the duty of those to whom Christ hath manifested Himself, to let others know what He has done for their souls. When thou art converted, instructed, comforted, strengthen thy brethren. Observe,

(1.) How they found them; just when they came in among them, discoursing on the same subject, and relating another proof of the resurrection of Christ. They found the eleven, and their usual companions, gathered together late in the night, to pray together, it may be, and consider what was to be done in this juncture; and they found them saying among themselves, (it is the saying of the eleven, not of the two, as is plain by the original,) and when these two came in, they repeated to them will, joy and triumph, The Lord is risen indeed, and hath appeared to Simon, v. 34. That Peter had a sight of Him before the rest of the disciples had, appears 1 Cor. 15: 5. where it is said, He was seen of Cephas, then of the twelve. The angel having ordered the women to tell Peter of it particularly, (Mark 16: 7.) for his comfort, it is highly probable that our Lord Jesus did Himself presently the same day appear to Peter, though we have no particular narrative of it. This he had related to his brethren; but observe, Peter does not here proclaim it, and boast of it himself, (he thought that did not become a penitent,) but the other disciples speak of it with exultation, The Lord is risen indeed, really: no room is left to doubt or dispute it, for He has appeared not only to the women, but to Simon.

(2.) How they seconded their evidence with an account of what they had seen, v. 35. The words spoken by Christ, are not an empty sound, but they are spirit, and life, and wondrous things are done by them. They told also how He was at length known to them in the breaking of bread; then when He was carving out blessings to them, God opened their eyes to discern who it was. Note, It would be of great use for the discovery and confirmation of truth,

(B.) Took bread, and blessed it, and brake, &c.] 'This was contained, except when the host, out of respect, chose to resign it to the clergy to the custom of guests; since that office belonged to the enter-guest.'

he was known of them in breaking of bread.

[Practical Observations.]

36 ¶ And as they thus spake, Jesus himself stood in the midst of them, and saith unto them, "Peace be unto you."

37 But they were terrified and affrighted, and supposed that they had seen a spirit.

38 And he said unto them, Why are ye troubled? and why do thoughts arise in your hearts?

ing them together; for He deals not with us as we deserve. They did not credit those who had seen Him; therefore He comes Himself, that they might not continue in their disconsolate incredulity. He had promised to see them after his resurrection in Galilee; but so desirous was He to see and satisfy them, that He anticipated the appointment, and sees them at Jerusalem. Note, Christ is often better than his word, never worse. Peace be to you, was a common form of salutation among the Jews, and Christ would thus express his usual familiarity with them, though He was now entered into his state of exaltation. Christ would at the first word intimate to them that He did not come to quarrel with Peter for denying Him, and the rest for running away from Him; but peaceably to signify to them that He had forgiven them, and was reconciled to them. 2. Their fright thereupon, v. 37. They were terrified, supposing they had seen a spirit, because He came in among them without any noise, and was in the midst of them ere they were aware. The word if the disciples of Christ would compare their observations and experiences, and communicate to each other what they know and have felt in themselves.

V. 36—49. Five times Christ was seen the same day that He rose; by Mary Magdalene alone in the garden; (John 20:14.) by the women, as they were going to tell the disciples; (Matt. 28:9.) by Peter alone; by the two disciples going to Emmaus; and now at night by the eleven; which we have an account of in these verses, as also John 20:19. Observe,

I. Their great surprise at his appearing. He came very seasonably, as they were conferring concerning the proofs of his resurrection; ready perhaps to put it to the question, whether the proofs produced amounted to evidence sufficient or no, and how they should proceed; Jesus Himself stood in the midst of them, and put it out of question. Note, Those who make the best use they can of their evidences for their comfort, may expect further assurances, and that the Spirit of Christ will witness with their spirits, that they are the children of God, and risen with Christ. Observe, 1. The comfort Christ spake to them; Peace be unto you. This intimates in general that Christ now made them a visit of love and friendship. Though they had very unkindly deserted Him in his sufferings, yet He takes the first opportunity of seeing them together; for He deals not with us as we deserve. They did not credit those who had seen Him; therefore He comes Himself, that they might not continue in their disconsolate incredulity. He had promised to see them after his resurrection in Galilee; but so desirous was He to see and satisfy them, that He anticipated the appointment, and sees them at Jerusalem. Note, Christ is often better than his word, never worse. Peace be to you, was a common form of salutation among the Jews, and Christ would thus express his usual familiarity with them, though He was now entered into his state of exaltation. Christ would at the first word intimate to them that He did not come to quarrel with Peter for denying Him, and the rest for running away from Him; but peaceably to signify to them that He had forgiven them, and was reconciled to them. 2. Their fright thereupon, v. 37. They were terrified, supposing they had seen a spirit, because He came in among them without any noise, and was in the midst of them ere they were aware. The word used, (Matt. 14:26.) when they said, It is a spirit, signifies a spectre, an apparition; but the word here used properly signifies a spirit; they supposed it a spirit not clothed with a real body. Though we have an alliance and correspondence with the world of spirits, and are hastening to it; yet, while here in this world of sense and matter, it is a terror to us to have a spirit so far change its own nature as to become visible to us, and conversable with us; for it is something, and bodes something, very extraordinary.

II. Their great satisfaction in his discourse; wherein we have,

1. Reproofs for their causeless fears, v. 38. Observe here,

(1.) When we are troubled, thoughts are apt to rise in our hearts, that do us hurt. Sometimes the trouble is the effect of the thoughts, our griefs and fears take rise from those things that are the creatures of our own fancy: sometimes the thoughts are the effect of the trouble; without are fightings, and then within are fears. Those that are melancholy and troubled in mind, have thoughts arising in their hearts, which reflect dishonor on God, and create disquiet to themselves. I am cut off from thy sight. The Lord has forsaken and forgotten Me.

(2.) Many of the troublesome, disquieting thoughts, arise from our mistakes concerning Christ. They here thought they had seen a spirit, when they saw Christ, and that put them into this fright. We forget that Christ is our elder Brother, and look upon Him to be at as great a distance from us as the world of spirits is from this world, and therewith terribly ourselves. When Christ is by his Spirit convincing and humbling us, when He is by his providence trying and converting us, we mistake Him, as if He designed our hurt, and that troubles us.

(3.) All our troublesome thoughts, are known to the Lord Jesus, even at their first rise, and are displeasing to Him. He chide his disciples for such thoughts, to teach us to chide ourselves

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 13—35. When Christians travel, or are in any way employed, in company with each other, they should commune of those things, which relate to their gracious Lord; and open their difficulties to each other for mutual edification. Thus, they may expect that Jesus Himself will be invisibly present. (Mat. 3:13—18, v. 16, 17.) When we have carefully investigated the causes of our sorrow and dejections, we shall find perhaps that our fears and troubles arose from unbelief alone, and not from want of evidence, security, or information.—Our gracious Lord will reprove his disciples for their folly and ignorance, and we should keep in mind continually, that every part of Scripture testifies of Christ, in some way or other; this we shall perceive, in proportion as we spiritually understand the Word of God. (Note, Rev. 19:9, 10.)—When we earnestly desire and intreat his presence with us, He will come and abide with us, and render our conversation, our worship, and even our meals, blessed. Our more rejoicing seasons of communion with Him, are commonly of short duration; yet it may afterwards be exhilarating to remember them.—We should hasten to make known, to our sorrowing brethren, those discoveries and communications, which have gladdened our hearts; that we may thus mutually strengthen each other's faith, and hope, and assurance "that the Lord is risen indeed," as our experience of his power, truth, and love has abundantly proved. (2 Pet. 1:19. 1 John 5:9, 10.)

SCOTT.

There are either three or four instances recorded, of the risen Savior's delivering to his disciples the substance of his last great command. (Matt. 28:19, 20.) If the instance recorded by Mark, 16:14—16, is the same as that at Luke 24:33—48, and John 20:19—25, there are, but three; if not, there are four. If but three, in all the instances, if four, in all the instances but one, He addressed it to his other disciples, as well as to the eleven apostles, and to all alike. The first instance is that recorded by Luke and John, (and perhaps by Mark also,) when He appeared to his assembled disciples on the evening after his resurrection, when, Luke says, (24:33,) "the eleven were gathered together, and them that were with them," i. e. the other disciples then at Jerusalem; and, as they were listening with wonder to the account of the two who had just returned from Emmaus, "Jesus Himself stood in the midst of them." And as He said to them all alike, "Peace be unto you," so also He said to them all alike, "Repentance and remission of sins must be preached in my name among all nations; and ye are my witnesses of these things." The second instance is that recorded by Matthew, 28:16—20 and referred to by Paul, (1 Cor. 15:5.) when, according to an appointment made before his crucifixion, (Matt. 26:32; Mark 14:28.) and renewed after his resurrection, (Matt. 28:7. Mark 16:7.) He met the whole company of his followers then on earth, above five hundred brethren; doubtless, to make to them some important communication, in which they and those who should come after them, were deeply interested. "And He came and spake unto them," addressing all alike, "As power is given unto Me in heaven and in earth. Go ye, therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost: teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you: and, lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world." The third instance was when He "led them out as far as Bethany;" and to the whole company who witnessed his ascension, which, there is reason to think, included the greater part of the hundred and twenty disciples then at Jerusalem, (Acts 1:6—15.) He said, to them all alike, "Ye shall be witnesses unto Me, both in Jerusalem, and in all Judea, and in Samaria, and unto the uttermost part of the earth." We are not, then, from the Savior's last great command, to derive, by inference merely, the duty of private Christians, as well as ministers, to be engaged in the work of evangelizing the world, arguing that ministers must be sent, and aided and supported in the work, by the church. That command imposes the duty on private Christians, as well as ministers; on all Christ's disciples, in the same direct and impressive manner. Not that all are to go forth to the unevangelized nations, and preach and baptize; but that all, in their appropriate spheres, are to labor, efficiently and constantly, making it a governing aim in all their pursuits, for the conversion of the world. The command, however, from the very nature of the duty enjoined, has a special application to ministers. And if the instance of its delivery recorded in Mark is distinct from that recorded by Luke and John, it was, in one instance at least, addressed, and with peculiar emphasis, to the eleven apostles. Ministers, then, wherever stationed, should make it the grand object of their labors and efforts, that the influence of the Gospel may be extended over the earth as speedily as possible. And in reference to the question, where they shall be stationed, how did the divinely guided apostles understand and execute their commission? As directing them first to evangelize thoroughly Judea, and then the next contiguous countries, and then the next, and so on, till the whole world should be brought under the influence of the Gospel? Just the reverse. To begin, indeed, at Jerusalem; but to go forth, as speedily as possible, into every country, and kindle up, in stations scattered among all nations and tribes the light of the world. And this commission, thus correctly interpreted, is the commission of ministers in all ages. It is not, then, as is commonly done, to be taken for granted, by those who come into the ministry, that they are to remain in their own Christian land unless a case of duty can be made out for them to go to some unevangelized people; but it is to be taken for granted, that they are to be employed in conveying the Gospel to some destitute people, unless a case of duty can be made out for them to remain in their own, already Christian country.

39 Behold 'my hands and my feet, that it is I myself. Handle me, and see: "for a spirit hath not flesh and bones, as ye see me have.

40 And when he had thus spoken, he shewed them his hands and his feet.

41 And while they yet believed not for joy, wondered, he said unto them, 'Have ye here any meat?'

42 And they gave him a piece of a broiled fish, and of an honey-comb.

43 And he took it, and did eat before them.

that they might be proofs that it was He Himself; and He was willing that they should be seen; He afterward showed them to Thomas, for He is not ashamed of his sufferings for us; little reason then have we to be ashamed of them, or of ours for Him. As He showed his wounds here to his disciples, to enforce his instructions to them, so He showed them to his Father, to enforce his intercessions with Him. He appears in heaven as a Lamb that had been slain; (Rev. 5: 6.) his blood speaks, Heb. 12: 24. Zech. 13: 6, 7.

He appeals to their touch! Handle Me, and see. He would not let Mary Magdalene touch Him at that time, John 20: 17. But the disciples here are intrusted to do it, that they who were to preach his resurrection, and to suffer for doing so, might be themselves abundantly satisfied concerning it. He bid them handle Him, that they might be convinced that He was not a spirit. If there were really no spirits, nor apparitions of spirits, (as by this and other instances it is plain the disciples believed there were,) this had been a proper time for Christ to undeceive them; but He seems to take it for granted that there have been, and may be, apparitions of spirits, else what need of so much pains to prove that He was not one? There were many heretics in the primitive times, atheists I rather think they were, who said Christ had never any substantial body, but that it was a mere phantasm, which neither really was born, nor did truly suffer; such, we are told, were the Valentinians and Manichees, and the followers of Simon Magus. Blessed be God, these heresies were long since buried; and we know and are sure that Jesus Christ was no spirit or apparition, but had a true and real body, even after his resurrection.

(2.) He eats with them to show it, and was willing to converse freely and familiarly with his disciples, as one friend with another. Peter lays great stress on this, (Acts 10: 41.) We did eat and drink with Him, after He rose from the dead.

[1.] When they saw his hands and his feet, yet they knew not what to say, p. 41. It was their infirmity that yet they believed not. This very much corroborates the truth of Christ's resurrection, that the disciples were so slow to believe it. Instead of stealing away his body, and saying, He is risen, when He is not, as the chief priests suggested they would do, they are ready to say again and again, He is not risen, when He is. Their being incredulous of it at first, and insisting on the utmost proofs of it, shows that when afterward they did believe it, and venture their all on it, it was not but upon the fullest demonstration of the thing that could be.

But their infirmity was excusable; it was not from any contempt of the evidence, but they believed not for joy, as Jacob, when told that Joseph was alive; they thought it too good news to be true. When faith and hope are weak, because love and desire are strong, faith shall be helped, and not rejected. They wondered; they thought it not only too good, but too great, to be true, forgetting both the Scriptures and the power of God.

[2.] For their further conviction and encouragement, He called for some meat. He sat down to meat with the two disciples at Emmaus, but it is not said that He ate with them; now lest that should be made an objection, He here actually ate with them and the rest, to show how his body was really returned to life; though He did not eat and drink, and converse constantly with them, as He had done, (and as Lazarus did after his resurrection, who returned not only to life, but to his former state of life, and to die again,) because it was not agreeable to the economy of the state He was risen to.

They gave Him a piece of a broiled fish, and of a honey-comb, p. 42. The Master will fare as the disciples, because in the kingdom of our Father they shall fare as He does.

3. The insight He gave them into the Word of God.

(1.) He refers them to the word they had heard from Him, while with them, p. 44. We should better understand what Christ doth, if we did but better remember what He hath said, and had but the art of comparing them together.

(2.) He refers them to the word they had read in the Old Testament; All things must be fulfilled which were written. Christ had given them this general hint to regulate their expectations—that, whatever they found written concerning the Messiah, in the Old Testament, must be fulfilled in Him; whether concerning his sufferings, or his kingdom; those God had joined together in the prediction, and they could not be put asunder in the event. All things must be fulfilled, the hardest, and the heaviest; even the vinegar, He could not die till He had that, because He could not till then say, It is finished. The several parts of the Old Testament are here mentioned, as containing each of them things concerning Christ: The law of Moses, that is, the Pentateuch, or the first books written by Moses; the prophets, containing not only the books that are purely prophetic, but those historical books that were written by prophetic men; the Psalms, containing the other writings, which they called the Hagiographa. See in what various ways of writing God did of old reveal his will; but all proceeded from one and the self-same Spirit, who by them gave notice of the coming and kingdom of the Messiah; for to Him bare all the prophets witness.

(3.) By an immediate, present work on their minds, of which they could not but be sensible. He gave them to apprehend the true intent and meaning of the Old-Testament prophecies of Christ, and to see them all fulfilled in Him, p. 45. Observe here, [1.] Jesus Christ by his Spirit operates on the minds of men. on the minds of all that are his. He has access to our spirits, and can immediately influence them. It is observable, how He now, after his resurrection, gave a specimen of those two great operations of his Spirit on the spirits of men; his enlightening the intellectual faculties with a divine light, and his invigorating the active powers with a divine heat. [2.] Even good men need to have their understandings opened; for though not darkness, as they were by nature, yet in many things they are in the dark. David prays, Open mine eyes. Give me understanding. And Paul, who knows so much of Christ, sees his need to learn more. [3.] Christ's way of working faith in the soul, and gaining the throne there, is, by opening the understanding to discern the evidence of things to be believed.

[4.] The design of opening the understanding is, not that we may be wise above what is written, but wiser in what is written, and be made wise to salvation by it. The Spirit in the Word, and the Spirit in the heart, say the same thing. That we may have right thoughts of Christ, and our mistakes concerning Him be rectified, there needs no more than to be made to understand the Scriptures.

4. The instructions He gave them as apostles, who were to be employed in setting up his kingdom in the world, p. 48. 'You are to carry the notice of them to all the world; not only to report them as matter of news but to assert them as evidence. Fully assured of these things yourselves, go and assure the world of them; and the same Spirit that has enlightened you, able, in the highest degree, to require men to believe in direct opposition to them. It is likewise manifest from our Lord's words, that disembodied spirits, even the spirits of deceased men, do exist; whether they ever become visible or not.

(42.) Broiled fish, and an honey-comb.] Some think a kind of cake, or bread, in use among them. Eating might consist with, though were not needful to, that kind of life to which He was risen. It is evident from the appeal of our Lord to the senses of the apostles, that a greater certainty can in this world be had of any thing than the testimony of our eyes, ears, and other senses; and that it is unreasonable.

Honey-comb.] A frequent food with the ancients, nearly akin to that of John the Baptist. This was also used by Pythagoras. See

SCOTT.

44 And he said unto them, 'These are the words which I spake unto you,' while I was yet with you, 'that all things must be fulfilled which were written in the law of Moses, and in the prophets, and in the psalms, concerning me.'

45 Then he opened he their understanding, that they might understand the scriptures,

46 And said unto them, 'Thus it is written, and thus it behoved Christ to suffer, and to rise from the dead the third day;

47 And that repentance and remission of sins should be preached in his name, among all nations, beginning at Jerusalem.

48 And ye are witnesses of these things.

49 And, behold, I send the promise of my Father upon you: but tarry ye in the city of Jerusalem, until ye be endued with power from on high.

50 ¶ And he led shall go along with you to enlighten others.' Now here they are told,

(1.) What they must preach; they must preach the Gospel, the New Testament as the full accomplishment of the Old, as the continuation and conclusion of divine revelation. They must take their Bibles with them, (especially when they preached to the Jews; nay, and Peter, in his first sermon to the Gentiles, directed them to consult the prophets, Acts 10: 43.) and must show people how it was written of old concerning the Messiah, and the glories and graces of his kingdom, and then must tell them how, on their certain knowledge, all this was fulfilled in the Lord Jesus.

[1.] The great gospel-truth concerning the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ, must be published to all men. 'Go, and tell the world,' 1st. 'That Christ suffered, as was written of Him. Go, preach Christ crucified, be not ashamed of his cross. Tell them what, and why He suffered, and now all the Scriptures of the Old Testament were fulfilled in his sufferings. Tell them it behoved Him to suffer, that it was necessary to the taking away of the sin of the world, and the deliverance of mankind from death and ruin; nay, that it became Him to be perfected through sufferings,' Heb. 2: 10. 2dly, 'That He rose from the dead on the third day, by which not only all the offence of the cross was rolled away, but He was declared to be the Son of God with power, and in this also the Scriptures were fulfilled; (see I Cor. 15: 3, 4.) go, tell the world how often you saw Him after He rose from the dead, and how intimately you conversed with Him. Your eyes see; (as Joseph said to his brethren,) 'that it is my mouth that speaketh unto you, Gen. 45: 12. Go, and tell them, then, that He that was dead, is alive, and lives for evermore, and has the keys of death and the grave.'

[2.] The great gospel-duty of repentance must be pressed upon all men. Repentance for sin must be preached in Christ's name, and by his authority. All men everywhere must be called and commanded to repent, Acts 17: 30. 'Go, and tell people that the God that made them, and the Lord that bought them, expects and requires that, immediately on this notice given, they turn from the worship of the gods that they have made, to the worship of the God that made them; and not only so, but from serving the interests of the world and the flesh; they must turn to the service of God in Christ, mortify all sinful habits, and forsake all sinful practices. Their hearts and lives must be changed, and they must be universally renewed and reformed.'

[3.] The great gospel-privilege of the remission of sins must be proposed to all, and assured to all that repent, and believe the Gospel. 'Go, tell a guilty world, that stands convicted and condemned at God's bar, that an act of indemnity has passed the royal assent, of which all that repent and believe shall have the benefit, and not only be pardoned, but preferred. Tell them that there is hope concerning them.'

(2.) To whom they must preach.

[1.] Among all nations. They must disperse themselves, like the sons of Noah after the flood, some one way and some another, and carry with them this light wherever they go. The prophets had preached repentance and remission to the Jews, but the apostles must preach them to all the world. None are exempted from the obligations the Gospel lays on men to repent, nor are any excluded from those inestimable benefits which are included in the remission of sins, but those that debar themselves by their unbelief and impenitency.

[2.] They must begin at Jerusalem; then they must preach their first gospel-sermon; there the gospel-church must be first formed, and the gospel-day dawn, and thence that light shall go forth, which must take hold on the ends of the earth. And whither again there? 1st, Because thus it was written. The word of the Lord must go forth from Jerusalem, Isa. 2: 3. And see Joel 2: 32. 3: 16. Obad. 21. Zech. 14: 8. 2dly, Because there the matters of fact, or which the Gospel was founded, were transacted; for where they were first attested, there, if there had been any just cause for it, they might be best contested and disproved. 'Begin at Jerusalem, that the chief priests may try to crush the Gospel, and see themselves disappointed.' 3dly, Because He would give us a further example of forgiving enemies. Jerusalem had put the greatest affronts imaginable on Him, (both the rulers and the multitude,) for which that city might justly have been excepted by name out of the act of indemnity; but no, so far from that, the first offer of gospel-grace is made to Jerusalem, and thousands there are in a little time brought to partake of that grace.

(3.) What assistance they should have in preaching. They are here called to a vast undertaking, a very large and difficult province, especially considering the opposition this service would meet with, and the sufferings it would be attended with; if therefore they ask, Who is sufficient for these things? here is an answer ready, (v. 49.) Behold, I send the promise of my Father upon you, and ye shall be endued with power from on high. He here assures them that in a little time the Spirit should be poured out on them in greater measure than ever, and they should thereby be furnished with all those gifts and graces necessary to discharge this great trust: therefore they must tarry at Jerusalem, and not enter upon it till this be done. Note, [1.] Those who receive the Holy Ghost, are thereby endued with a power from on high, a supernatural power: it is from on high, and therefore draws the soul upward, and makes it aim high. [2.] Christ's apostles could never have planted his Gospel, and set up his kingdom in the world, as they did, if they had not been endued with such a power; and their admirable achievements prove that there was an excellency of power going along with them. [3.] This power from on high was the promise of the Father, the great promise of the New Testament, as the promise of the coming of Christ was of the Old Testament. And if it be the promise of the Father, we may be sure the promise is inviolable, and the thing promised invaluable. [4.] Christ would not leave his disciples, till the time was just at hand to perform this promise. It was but ten days after the ascension of Christ, that there came the descent of the Spirit. [5.] Christ's ambassadors must stay till they have their powers, and not venture on their embassy till they have received full instructions and credentials; though, one would think, never was such haste as now for the preaching of the Gospel, yet the preachers must tarry till they be endued with power from on high, and tarry at Jerusalem, though a place of danger, because there this promise of the Father was to find them, Joel 2: 28.

V. 50-53. This evangelist omits the solemn meeting between Christ and his disciples in Galilee; but what He said to them there, and at other interviews, He subjoins to what He said to them at the first visit He made them on the evening of the day He rose; and has now nothing more to account for but his ascension were still z, for He showed witnesses. The disciples did not see Him rise out of the grave, because his resurrection was capable of being proved by their seeing Him alive afterward; but they saw Him ascend into heaven, because they could not otherwise have an ocular demonstration of his ascension.

3. His farewell to them; He lifted up his hands, and blessed them, as the high priest when he blessed the people; see Lev. 9:22. He blessed as one having authority, commanded by the blessings which He had purchased; He blessed them as Jacob his sons. The apostles were now as the representatives of the twelve tribes, so that, in blessing them, He blessed all his spiritual Israel, and put his Father's name on them. He blessed them as Jacob his sons, and Moses the tribes, at parting, to show that, having loved his own which were in the world, He loved them to the end.

4. How He left them; While He was blessing them; not as if taken away before He had said all He had to say, but to intimate that his being parted from them did not put an end to his blessing them, for the intercession which He went to heaven to make for all his, is a continuation of that blessing. Christ was now sending his apostles to preach his Gospel to the world, and He gives them his blessing, not for themselves only, but to be conferred in his name on all that should believe on Him through their word, for in Him all the families of the earth were to be blessed.

5. How his ascension is described. (1.) He was parted from them, taken from their head, as Elijah from Elisha's. Note, The dearest friends must part. Those that love us, and pray for us, and instruct us, must be parted from us. Those that knew Christ after the flesh, must now henceforth know Him so no more. (2.) As He arose, so He ascended, by his own power, yet attended by angels. There needed no chariot of fire, or horses of fire. He ascended in a cloud, as the angel in the smoke of Manoa's sacrifice, Judg. 13:20.

II. How cheerfully his disciples continued their attendance on Him, and

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 36-53. When we meet together in the name of the gracious Savior, He will again and again 'manifest Himself unto us, as He doth not unto the world,' (John 14:21-24.) speak pardon and peace to our souls, dispel our terrors and troubles, assure us of his love, and 'open our understanding to understand the Scriptures.' Then we shall see, with increasing clearness, that 'thus it was written,' that redemption is completed, and that 'repentance and remission of sins by faith in his name' should freely 'be preached to all nations.' Blessed be God, that ever they were preached in this nation!

Verse 50.

As far as to Bethany.] The boundaries of Bethany. What is said elsewhere will not allow us to extend the sense to include the town itself; for that was fifteen furlongs from Jerusalem, (John 11:18.) whereas mount Olivet, from which our Lord ascended, was but about half that distance, Acts 1:12.

GOSPEL ACCORDING TO ST. JOHN,

WITH AN EXPOSITION AND PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS

The Scripture records, concerning the inspired writer of this gospel, may be seen and compared by consulting the annexed references. (13: 23—26. 19: 25—27, 35. 20: 2—10. 21: 2—7, 20—25. Matt. 4: 21, 22. 11: 2. 20: 26—23. Mark 1: 19, 20. 5: 37. 9: 2, 38—40. 14: 33. Luke 9: 49—56. 22: 8. Acts 3: 1—11. 4: 13—20. 5: 14. Gal. 2: 9. Rev. 1: 1, 9. 10: 9—11.) 'In all the controversies maintained with Celsus, with Porphyry, and with the emperor Julian, who strained every nerve to undermine the authority of the gospels, they never thought of controverting, that they were written by those whose names they bear. So clear was this point accounted, for ages, even by the most acute adversaries of the Christian name.' Campbell.

The general current of ancient writers declare that the apostle wrote this gospel, at an advanced time of life yet many learned moderns are of a different opinion. The question is perhaps more difficult than important: but appears to me, that several passages become far more interesting, by supposing that it was written long after the destruction of Jerusalem, and the martyrdom of the other apostles. This evangelist alone mentions Peter as the apostle who smote the high priest's servant, and Malchus as the name of that servant. (Note, 18: 10—14.) Now it is obvious to conclude, that he disclosed what the others had purposely concealed; because Peter was, at the time when he wrote, out of the reach of all his enemies.—He alone records the resurrection of Lazarus; a miracle so stupendous and notorious, that one can hardly conceive how the other evangelists could pass it over in silence. But the Jews had consulted to put Lazarus also to death. (Notes, 11: 12: 9—11.) While Lazarus lived, the memory of the miracle could not be lost in Judea; in other countries, it might be published by word of mouth: but the public recording of it by the evangelists, while the Jewish priests and rulers possessed authority, might needlessly have exasperated them, and exposed Lazarus and his sisters to much hatred, and even to imminent danger.

While this Gospel, published long after, by the only surviving apostle, was suited to establish the authority of those which preceded, it is almost entirely an original narrative, and far more than an appendix to them, as some have very improperly called it. From about the twenty-sixth verse of the sixth chapter, to the end of the eleventh, the whole is entirely new; and even the events, which preceded and made way for our Lord's crucifixion, resurrection, and ascension, though for substance the same, are enriched with a variety of new and interesting information, exceedingly suited to fix the attention and impress the mind of the reader, especially the discourse of our Lord with his disciples just before his crucifixion, and his prayer for them, and for his church to the end of time. Various circumstances respecting his crucifixion, are recorded in this gospel alone, especially his committing his afflicted mother to the care of the beloved John, when about to expire on the cross, in the most affecting manner imaginable.—Our Lord's repeatedly meeting his assembled disciples, 'on the first day of the week;' with the instructive account of Thomas's absence the first time; his obstinate incredulity; our Savior's condescension to him, and Thomas's conviction and confession of Him as 'his Lord and his God,' are not mentioned elsewhere. The beautiful account also of Jesus' meeting the disciples at the lake of Tiberias; his threefold rebuke of Peter, (who had thrice denied Him,) by thrice questioning his love to Him, and thrice requiring him to show his love, by feeding his sheep and his lambs; with the prediction of the manner, in which this apostle should at length glorify God; the tacit readiness of John to follow in the same path; and the obscure intimation, that perhaps this might not be the case, is added by this evangelist, in the most artless and affecting language. (Notes, 21: 15—25.)—St. John's style is always plain, simple, and unaffected, and generally perspicuous: and when it appears not so, this will commonly be found to arise from the sublimity of his subject, to which no human language is adequate, rather than from any want of exactness in selecting and arranging his words and expressions.—Learned men have noted several particulars in which the language of this gospel differs from that of the others.—The phrase, 'And it came to pass,' so common in the other gospels, never occurs in this. 'The Word,' and 'the Only-begotten,' as applied to Christ, and the word, rendered 'the Comforter,' as a title given to the Holy Spirit, are peculiar to this gospel. SCOTT.

John was the brother of James, one of the twelve, and the disciple whom Jesus loved; one of the three whom He took to be the witnesses of his transfiguration and agony. John lived longest of all the twelve apostles, and was the only one of them that did not suffer martyrdom; and some say that he wrote this gospel at Ephesus, at the request of the ministers of the churches of Asia, in opposition to the heresy of Cerinthus and the Ebionites, who held that our Lord was a mere man. It is most probable he wrote it before his banishment to Patmos, for there he wrote his Apocalypse, the close of which seems designed for the closing up of the canon of Scripture; and if so, this gospel was not written after. I cannot therefore credit those fathers, who say that he wrote it in banishment, or after his return from it, many years after the destruction of Jerusalem, when he was ninety or a hundred years old. However, it is clear that he wrote last of the evangelists, and, comparing his gospel with theirs, we may observe, 1 That he relates what they had omitted; his gospel is as the rearward or gathering-host, it gleams up what they had passed by. Thus there was a later collection of Solomon's wise sayings, (Prov. 25: 1.) and yet far short of what he delivered, 1 Kings 4: 32. 2 He gives us more of the mystery of that which the other evangelists give us only the history of. It was necessary that the matters of fact should be first settled, which was done in their declarations of those things which Jesus began both to do and teach, Luke 1: 1. Acts 1: 1. But that being done out of the mouth of two or three witnesses, John goes on to perfection, (Heb. 6: 1.) not laying again the foundation, but building upon it; leading us more within the veil. Some of the ancients observe, that the other evangelists wrote more of the bodily things of Christ; but John writes of the spiritual things of the Gospel, its life and soul; therefore some have called this gospel the key of the evangelists. Here it is that a door is opened in heaven, and the first voice we hear, is, 'Come up higher.' Some of the ancients, that supposed the four living creatures in John's vision to represent the four evangelists, make John the flying-eagle, so high doth he soar, and so clearly doth he see into heavenly things.

CHAP. I.

The Word who was in the beginning with God, and was God, is the Creator of all things, his life in himself, and is the Light of men, 1-5. John a witness to that true and only Light, which was unknown to the world which He made, and not received by his own, except by such as were born of God, and these were adopted as "sons of God." The Word became flesh, and displayed his glory, as the only-begotten of the Father, 14. John testifies to his superior dignity, and fulfills whence all receive; for grace and truth came by Him, 17-18. He declares the invisible God to men, 18. Various testimonies of John to the Pharisees, concerning himself and Jesus, 19-28. John points Him out as the "Lamb of God," and the "Son of God," who "baptizeth with the Holy Ghost," 29-34. Two of John's disciples follow him, 35-39. Andrew, one of them, brings Peter to him, whom He surnames Cephas, 40-42. Philip is called, who brings Nathanael, 43-45. Jesus declares himself to be "an Israelite," and by confesses Jesus as the Son of God and the King of Israel, 46-49. Jesus promises that he shall see still greater things, 50, 51.

In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God.

2 The same was in the beginning with God.

CHAP. I. v. 1-5. A Platonic philosopher saith, that these verses were worthy to be written in gold. The learned Francis Junius says, that he was in youth infected with loose notions in religion, and by the grace of God was recovered, on reading these verses in a Bible which his father laid in his way. He observed such divinity in the argument, such authority and majesty in the style, that his flesh trembled, and he was in amazement for a day; and from thence he dates the beginning of his being religious. The evangelist lays down the great truth he is to prove, that Jesus Christ is God.

1. The Word. This is an idiom peculiar to John's writings. See 1 John 1:1. ch. 5:7. Rev. 19:13. Yet some think that Christ is meant by the Word, in Acts 20: 32. Heb. 4:12. Luke 1: 2.

The Chaldee paraphrase very frequently calls the Messiah the Word of Jehovah, and speaks of many things in the Old Testament said to be done by the Lord, as done by that Word of the Lord; even the vulgar Jews were taught that the Word of God was the same with God. The evangelist, in the close of his discourse (v. 18.) plainly tells us why he calls Christ the Word—because He is the only-begotten Son which is in the bosom of the Father, and has declared Him. Word is twofold: word conceived; and word uttered.

1. There is the word conceived; that is, thought, which is the only immediate product of the soul, (all the operations of which are performed by thought;) and it is one with the soul. Thus the second person in the Trinity is fully called the Word; for He is the first-begotten of the Father; that eternal Wisdom which the Lord possessed, as the soul doth its thought, in the beginning of his way, Prov. 8: 23. There is nothing we are more sure of than that we think, yet nothing we are more in the dark about than how we think; who can declare the generation of thought in the soul? Surely then the generations and births of the eternal mind may well be allowed to be great mysteries of godliness, which we cannot fathom, while yet we adore the depth.

NOTES.

CHAP. I. v. 1-3 Critics have shown, that there is an important difference between 'in the beginning,' and 'from the beginning': the context, however, generally fixes the meaning. 'The devil was a murderer' or man-slayer, 'from the beginning'; but this he could not be, ere man existed. 8: 44.—Some imagine that the evangelist referred to the speculations of Plato and his disciples, in the term 'THE WORD,' or the LOGOS, which that philosopher used: but it is not likely that he would at all countenance such speculations, as those of that philosopher, which seem originally to have been borrowed from Revelation, though they were at length so distorted and darkened, as to be little better than atheism.—The Jews were constantly taught in their synagogues, that "the Word of God" was the same as God; and that by "the Word all things were made," which undoubtedly was the cause, why St. John delivered so great a mystery in so few words, as "speaking unto them, who at the first apprehension understood him. 'Only that which I knew not was, that this "Word was made flesh," and that this Word made flesh was Jesus Christ.' Bp. Pearson. The same learned divine shows that this way of speaking was in use, before Platonism was at all introduced among the Jews. What can we understand by this testimony, 'The Word was God,' but that He was possessed of the same divine nature and perfections with the Father; participated the same glory and felicity; and was in every respect as fully entitled to the adoration of all rational creatures which should ever exist, as that God with whom He was? 'All things were made by Him.' In what language can the divine power and operation of the great Creator be more emphatically described? Or what could have been said, better suited to lead every one to adore 'the Word,' as his Father and Saviour, Lord? To suppose, that this "Word was made," to suppose infinite power and perfection communicable to a creature; and the whole universe standing in the same relation to a creature, as they do to the infinite and eternal God: and to assert that 'the Word' was only an instrument or subordinate agent in creation, beside the absurdity of the notion, expressly contradicts the Scripture, which says, that 'JEHOVAH stretcheth forth the heavens alone, and spreadeth abroad the earth by Himself;' and that 'He will not give his glory to another.' (Notes, Is. 42: 8, 9. 44: 6-8. 24.) Indeed it is self-evident, that 'He who built all things is God.' In the strictest and fullest meaning of the word. This doctrine, however, is not grounded on any single expression, but on a combination of very many; and it will therefore appear more and more incontrovertible as we proceed.

SCOTT.

In the beginning. 'That is, before any thing was formed—ere God began the work of creation. This is the meaning of the word in Gen. 1: 1 to which the evangelist evidently alludes. This phrase fully proves, in the mouth of an inspired writer, that Jesus Christ was no part of the creation, as He existed when no part of that existed; and that consequently He is no creature, as all created nature was formed by Him, for without Him was not any thing made that was true, v. 3. Now as what was before creation was made to eternal;

2. There is the word uttered, and that is speech. Thus Christ is the Word, for by Him God has in these last days spoken to us; (Heb. 1: 2.) and has directed us to hear Him, Matt. 17: 5. He has made known God's mind to us, as a man's word or speech makes known his thoughts, as far as he pleases, and no farther. Christ is called that wonderful Speaker, (Dan. 8: 13.) the Speaker of things hidden and strange. He is the Word speaking from God to us, and to God for us. John Baptist was the voice; but Christ the Word: being the Word, He is the Truth, the Amen, the faithful Witness, of the mind of God.

II. What he saith of Him is enough to prove beyond contradiction that He is God. He asserts,

1. His existence in the beginning; 'In the beginning was the Word.' This speaks his existence, not only before his incarnation, but before all time. The beginning of time, in which all creatures were produced and brought into being, found this eternal Word in being. The world was from the beginning, but the Word was in the beginning. Eternity is usually expressed by being before the foundation of the world. The eternity of God is so described: (Ps. 90: 2.) Before the mountains were brought forth. So Prov. 8: 23. The Word had a being before the world had a beginning. He that was in the beginning never began, and therefore was without beginning of time.

2. His co-existence with the Father; The Word was with God, and the Word was God. Let none say that when we invite them to Christ, we would draw them from God, for Christ is with God, and is God; it is repeated again, (v. 2.) the same was in the beginning with God, that is, He was so from eternity. In the beginning, the world was from God, as it was created by Him; but the Word was with God, as ever with Him. In respect of essence and substance, the Word was a distinct Person or Substance, for He was with God; and yet the same in substance, for He was God; and, v. 3. There was a glory and happiness which Christ had with God before the world was, ch.

and as what gave being to all things could not have borrowed or derived its being from any thing, therefore, Jesus, who was before all things, and who made all things, must necessarily be the ETERNAL God.

Dr. CLARKE.

The Word was with God. 'The apostle here affirms that the Word was God, and yet was with God; viz. that He was truly divine, but still divine in such a manner, that there did exist a distinction between Him and the Father. I take the word God in one case, to mean, as in a great number of cases it does mean, God as Father; in the other case; I regard it as a description of divine being, of the Divinity, without reference to the distinction of Father, a use which is very common.'

Prof. STUART.

The Word was God. 'Many have contended that the word God is used here in an inferior sense, the necessary consequence of which is, that this clause should be rendered, The Word was a God, that is, a kind of inferior deity, as governors are called gods. 1 Cor. 8: 5. But it is impossible He should here be so called merely as a governor, because He is spoken of as existing before the production of any creatures whom He could govern. And it is to me most incredible that, when the Jews were so exceeding averse to idolatry, and the Gentiles so unhappily prone to it, such a plain writer as this apostle should lay so dangerous a stumbling-block on the very threshold of his work, and represent it as the Christian doctrine that in the beginning of all things there were two Gods, one supreme and the other subordinate.'

DODDRIE.

'Here is a passage in which, beyond all reasonable doubt, Christ is called God, and where the context, instead of furnishing us with reasons for understanding the word God in an inferior sense, as is usual, when it is applied to inferior beings, being a governor, and unequivocally taught us, that this God, who was the Word, created the universe, v. 3. The question then is reduced to this simple state; is He who created the universe truly and properly divine? If the act of creation does not prove the being, who performs it, to be omniscient, omnipotent, and independent, then is it possible to conceive of any thing which does or can prove the existence of such a being? If to bring this world into existence from nothing, and to establish such perfect harmony and design through all the operations of nature do not designate the absolute, supreme, omnipotent, and omniscient Being; then no proof that such a Being exists can possibly be adduced. It is in vain to say that the creation of the universe can be performed by delegation; by an inferior and subordinate Being. What can be delegated by omnipotence, omniscience, and infinite wisdom, (all of which must belong to a Creator,) being delegated? Can God delegate his perfections?

Prof. STUART.

'In Gen. 1: 1. God is said to have created all things; and here Christ is said to have created all things; the same unerring Spirit spoke in Moses, and in the evangelist; therefore Christ and the Father are One. To say that Christ made all things by a delegated power from God, is absurd, because the thing is impossible. Creation means causing that to exist that had no previous being; this is evidently a word made by him; and without him was not any thing made that was made.

5 And the Light shineth in darkness, and the darkness comprehended it not.

not any thing made, that was made, from the highest angel to the meanest worm. God the Father did nothing without Him in that work. Now, [1.] This proves that He is God; for He that built all things is God; Heb. 3:4. The God of Israel often proved Himself to be God, with this, that He made all things; Isa. 40:12, 28. 41:4. and see Jer 10:11, 12. [2.] This proves the excellency of the Christian religion; the Author and Founder of it is the same that was the Author and Founder of the world. How excellent must that constitution needs be, which derives its institution from Him who is the Fountain of all excellency! When we worship Christ, we worship Him to whom the patriarchs gave honor as the Creator, and on whom all creatures depend. [3.] This shows how well qualified He was for the work 17:5. Prov. 8:30. The mystery of man's redemption by this Word incarnate, was had in God, before all worlds, Eph. 3:9. He that undertook to bring us to God, (1 Pet. 3:18.) was Himself from eternity with God; so that man's reconciliation to God was concerted between the Father and Son from eternity, Zech. 6:13. Matt. 11:27. He was by Him as one brought up with Him for this service, Prov. 30. He was with God, and therefore is said to come forth from the Father.

3. His agency in making the world, &c. This is here, (1.) Expressly asserted; All things were made by Him. He was with God; not only acquainted with the divine counsels, but active in the divine operations in the beginning of time. Then was I by Him, Prov. 8:30. God made the world by a word; (Ps. 33:6.) and Christ was that Word. By Him, not as a subordinate, but a co-ordinate Agent, God made the world; (Heb. 1:2-) not as a workman cuts by his axe, but as the body sees by the eye. (2.) The contrary is denied: Without Him was of our salvation; help was laid upon One that was mighty, for He made all things; and He is the Author of our bliss, who was the Author of our being.

4. The original of life and light is in Him; (v. 4.) In Him was life. This further proves that He is God, and every way qualified for his undertaking; for, (1.) He has life in Himself; not only the true God, but the living God. God is life; He swears by Himself, when He saith, As I live. (2.) All living creatures have their life in Him; not only was all the matter of the creation made by Him, but all the life that is in the creation, is derived from Him, and supported by Him. It was the word of God that produced the creatures that had life, Gen. 1:20. Acts 17:25. He is that Word by which man lives, more than by bread, Matt. 4:4. (3.) Reasonable creatures have their light from Him; that life which is the light of men. Life in man is nobler than in other creatures; it is rational, and not merely animal; when man became a living soul, his life was light, his capacities such as distinguished him from, and dignified him above, the beasts that perish. The spirit of a man is the candle of the Lord, and it was the eternal Word that lighted it. The light of reason, as well as the life of sense, is derived from Him, and depends upon Him. This proves Him fit to undertake our salvation; for spiritual and eternal life and light, are the two great things that fallen man, who lies so much under the power of death and darkness, needs. From whom may we better expect the light of

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-5. While we carefully avoid the error of those, who seem to place the whole of religion in an orthodox creed, and sacrifice every Christian temper, and violate plain precepts of Scripture, in vehement contention for doctrinal sentiments and expressions; we should beware of the opposite extreme of treating the doctrines of Scripture, as speculative points of comparatively little consequence. 'All the apostles and prophets witness,' yea, God Himself has testified, 'that He sent his Son to be the Savior of the world.' Beware of those, who degrade Him whom the Spirit of truth and holiness delights to glorify; and while we allow 'the mystery to be, without controversy, great,' that 'God was manifest in the flesh;' let us still glory in it, as 'the great mystery of godliness,' with which all true piety, in the heart and life, is inseparably connected. Let us never think of 'The Word of God,' as any other than 'God over all, blessed forevermore;' as before all worlds 'with God, and equal with, yet distinct from, the Father. Without indulging vain reasonings or requiring curious explanations, let us avoid with equal caution, those who allow indeed the distinct personality, but deny or interpret away the proper Deity, of 'the Word;' and those who zealously assert his Deity, but seem to lose sight of his distinct personality, and thus unwarily verge to the sentiments which they seem to oppose. It is not for us to comprehend such exalted subjects, or to resolve all questions about them: but we can prove by arguments, which no infidel ever yet was, or ever will be, able to answer, that the Scripture is a divine revelation: and we can fully show these mysterious doctrines to be contained in the express language of revelation. By faith we receive this testimony, and by grace derive nourishment from it to our souls. But it is the most unreasonable thing in the world, to reject the testimony of the infinite God, concerning his own mysterious existence; when every process of nature baffles our feeble powers; and when the best philosophers allow, that we can only know that things are so, but cannot comprehend the manner how, or the reason why. He who knows the worth of his soul, the evil of sin, and other things pertaining to our present fallen condition, can see no ground of hope, but in Him who made all things, and without whom was not any thing made that was made.' This will be his encouragement 'to hope and not be afraid, because God has become his Salvation;' and 'the Life' is become 'the Light of life' to 'men.' Nothing can be more evident than these truths, as they are revealed in Scripture, by which the personal Word of God speaks to us; but this 'Light still shineth in darkness, and the darkness apprehendeth it not.' Every absurd system, detached imagination, and conjecture of soothing error, is preferred to it, as more congenial to the pride and lusts of men: thus 'they walk on still in darkness,' and neither understand nor value 'the Light of the world!' May we then pray without ceasing, that our eyes may be opened to behold this Light, that we may walk in it, and be 'made wise unto eternal salvation by faith in Jesus Christ.'

which can be effected only by omnipotence. Now God cannot delegate his omnipotence to another; were this possible, he to whom this omnipotence was delegated would, in consequence, become God, and He from whom it was delegated would cease to be such, for it is impossible that there should be two omnipotent beings.' Dr. A. Clarke.

'According to this reasoning, the Bible every where appeals to creative power as the peculiar and distinguishing prerogative of the supreme God, and attributes it solely to Jehovah. Read Gen. 2:2, 3. Ex. 20:11. Is. 44:24. Jer. 10:12. Ps. 8:3, 4. 102:25. and other passages of the same tenor. Read Isaiah 40, and onward, where God, by his prophet, makes a most solemn challenge to all polytheists to bring the objects of their worship into competition with Him, and declares Himself to be distinguished from them all by his being "the Creator of the ends of the earth." (v. 28.); and by his having formed and arranged the heavens. v. 26. Can it be made plainer than these passages make it, that creative power was regarded by the Hebrew prophets, as the appropriate and peculiar attribute of the supreme God? The Old Testament is filled with passages which ascribe the work of creation to Jehovah alone. Who does not find them every where intermixed, in the most delightful and affecting manner, with all the instructions of the sacred Hebrew writers? The apostle, then, having decided the question that Christ did create the world, has decided consequently, that He must be truly divine.'

Prof. Stuart.

The expression, in Him was life, is not to be understood of life natural, but of life eternal, which He revealed to the world, (2 Tim. 1:10.) to which He taught the way, (ch. 14:6.) which He promised to beavers, (ch. 10:28.) which He purchased for them, (ch. 3:1, 53, 54,) which He is appointed to give them, (ch. 17:2.) and to raise them up, (v. 23.) because He hath the life in Himself, v. 26. All this may be proved, 1. From the like expressions, 1 John 5:11. This is the promise that God hath given unto us eternal life, and this life is in his Son: whence He is styled, the true God and eternal life, (v. 20.) the resurrection and the life, (ch. 11:25.) the way, the truth, and the life, ch. 14:6. 2. From v. 7. John came to bear witness of this light, that all might believe through Him, viz. to eternal life, (1 Tim. 1:76.) for so John witnesseth, ch. 3:15, 31. And hence it follows, that this life must be the light of men, by giving them the knowledge of this life, and of the way leading to it.

The evangelist's language is very remarkable, and has been considered as the mere effect of inattention to the common rules of grammar. The first verb is present, 'shineth;' the second is the past, 'comprehended,' or 'apprehended.' But may he not have intended to state that the light of divine truth still shone, when he wrote, in the midst of a dark world; yet, that during the ages preceding Christ, viz. during his personal ministry, this light had been less apprehended and made use of in the world, than it was after his ascension, and the pouring out of the Spirit, and the preaching of the Gospel to the Gentiles? Before, it shone dimly among the Jews; but then it shone far more clearly both on Jews and Gentiles. (Note, Is. 60:1, 2.)

SCOTT.

'And the light long shone in the heathen world, and under the dispensation of Moses, and it still shineth in darkness, even upon the most ignorant and prejudiced part of mankind, and yet the darkness was so gross that it opposed its passage, and such was the prevailing ignorance of their hearts, that they did not apprehend it, or regard its dictates in such a manner, as to secure the blessings to which it would have led them.'

Dr. Dodridge.

6 ¶ There was 'a man sent from God, whose name was John.

7 The same came for 'a witness, to bear witness of the Light, that all men through him might believe.

8 He was not that Light, but was sent to bear witness of that Light.

9 That was the true Light, which lighteth every man that cometh into the world.

(2.) The degenerate world comprehended it not; most men received the grace of God in these discoveries, in vain. [1.] The world of mankind comprehended not the light that was in their understandings, but became vain in their imaginations concerning God and the eternal Word, Rom. 1:21, 27. The darkness of error and sin overpowered this light. God spake once, yea, twice, but man perceived it not, Job 33:14. [2.] The Jews, who had the Old Testament, comprehended not Christ in it. As there was a veil upon Moses' face, so upon the people's hearts. In the darkness of the types and the shadows, the light shone; but such was the darkness of their understandings, that they could not see it. Therefore, Christ came both to rectify the errors of the Gentile world, and to improve the truths of the Jewish church.

V. 6-14. The evangelist designs to bring in John Baptist bearing testimony to Christ.

1. John signifies gracious; his conversation was austere, but he was not less gracious. Now,

1. He was a man sent of God. The evangelist had said concerning Christ, that He was with God, and that He was God; but John was a mere man; God is pleased to speak to us by men like ourselves. John was a great man, but he was a man; he was God's messenger, Mal. 3:1. God gave him both his mission and his message, his credentials and his instructions. John wrought no miracle, nor had he revelations; but the strictness and purity of his life and doctrine, and their tendency to reform the world, and to revive the interests of God's kingdom among men, were indications that he was sent of God.

2. We are here told what his office and business were; (v. 7.) The same came as an eye-witness. He came for a testimony. The legal institutions had been long a testimony for God in the Jewish church; by them, revealed religion was kept up; hence we read of the tabernacle of the testimony, the ark of the testimony, the law and the testimony; but now divine revelation is to be turned into another channel; now the testimony of Christ is the testimony of God, 1 Cor. 1:6. 2:1. Among the Gentiles, God indeed had not left Himself without witness, (Acts 14:17.) but the Redeemer had no testimonies among them. There was a profound silence concerning Him, till John Baptist came for a witness to Him. Observe,

(1.) The matter of his testimony; he came to bear witness of the light. Light witnesses for itself, and carries its own evidence with it; but to those who shut their eyes against the light, it is necessary to bear witness to it. Christ's light needs not man's testimony, but the world's darkness does. John was like the night watchman that proclaims the approach of morn to those that have closed their eyes, and are not willing to observe it; or like that watchman that was set to tell those who asked what of the night, that the morning comes inquire, inquire ye, Isa. 21:11, 12. He was sent of God to tell the world that the long-looked-for Messiah was come, a Light to lighten the Gentiles, and the glory of his people Israel; and that dispensation which would bring life and immortality to light.

(2.) The design of his testimony was, that all men through him might believe in Christ, whose way he was sent to prepare. He taught men to look through him, to Christ; through the doctrine of repentance to that of faith in Christ. He prepared men for the reception of Christ and his Gospel, by awakening them to a sight and sense of sin; that, their eyes being thereby opened, they might be ready to admit those beams of divine light, which, in the Messiah, were ready to shine in their faces. If they would but receive this witness of man, they would find that the witness of God was greater, 1 John 5:9. See ch. 10:41. Observe, It was designed that all men through him might believe, excluding none that did not exclude themselves, as multitudes did, who rejected the counsel of God against themselves, and so received the grace of God in vain.

3. We are here cautioned not to mistake him for the Light, who only came to bear witness to it; (v. 8.) He was not that Light expected and promised. He was a star, like that which guided the wise men to Christ, a morning-star; but he was not the Sun; not the Bridegroom, but a friend of the Bridegroom; not the Prince, but his harbinger. There were those who rested in John's baptism, and looked no further, as those Ephesians, Acts 19:3. To rectify this mistake, the evangelist, when he speaks very honorably of him, yet shows that he must veil to Christ. He was great as the prophet of the Highest, but not the Highest Himself. Note, We must take heed of over-valuing ministers, as well as of undervaluing them; they are not our lords, nor have they dominion over our faith; but ministers by whom we believe, stewards of our Lord's house. We must not give up ourselves by an implicit faith to their conduct, for they are not that light; but we must attend to and receive their testimony; for they are sent to bear witness of that Light; so let us esteem them. Had John pretended to be that Light, he had not been a faithful witness. Those who usurp the honor of Christ, forfeit the honor of being his servants; yet John was very serviceable as a witness to the Light, though he was not that Light. Those may be of great use to us, who shine with borrowed light.

II. Having showed in the beginning of the chapter, the glories of Christ's Godhead, the writer here returns to show his incarnation, as Mediator.

1. Christ was the true Light, (v. 9.) not as if John Baptist were a false light, but in comparison with Christ, a very small light. Christ is that great Light. Other lights are but figuratively called so: Christ is the true Light. The Fountain of all knowledge and of all comfort must needs be the true Light. He is the true Light; for proof of it he does not refer us to the beams with which He enlightens the invisible world, but to those rays of his light which are darted downwards to this dark world. But how doth Christ lighten every man that comes into the world?

(1.) By the light of reason; that life which is the light of men, is from Him; all the discoveries of reason, all the comfort it gives us, and all the beauty it puts upon us, are from Christ.

(2.) By the publication of his Gospel to all nations. He lightens every man. John Baptist was like a candle that enlightens one room; Christ is the Light to lighten the Gentiles. His everlasting Gospel is to be preached to every nation, Rev. 14:6. Like the sun which lightens every man that will receive its light, (Ps. 19:6.) to which the preaching of the Gospel is compared, Rom. 10:18. Divine revelation is not to be confined, as it had been, to one people, but diffused to all, Matt. 5:15.

(3.) By the operation of his Spirit and grace. He lightens all that are enlightened to salvation; and those that are not enlightened by Him, perish in darkness. The light of the knowledge of the glory of God is said to be in the face of Jesus Christ, and is compared with that light which was at the beginning commanded to shine out of darkness, and which lightens every man that comes into the world. Whatever light any man has, whether natural or supernatural, he is indebted to Christ for it.

2. Christ was in the world, (v. 10.) before his

Verse 9.
We can no more infer from this expression, that Christ gives every individual a measure of spiritual light; than from one just before (7.) that every man actually 'believeth in Christ' through John's testimony both inferences are alike contrary to Scripture and to facts.

Christ in this gospel once and again distinguished as the light that cometh into the world, ch. 12:46. I am come a light into the world, that whosoever believeth on me should not abide in darkness. Also ch. 3:19. To say that the Messiah, by coming into the world, lightens every man, is no more than to say that He has, by his coming, rendered the spiritual light of his Gospel accessible to all, without distinction, who chose to be guided by it.

should reconcile us to our present abode in this world, that once Christ was here. He was in the world for a while, but it is spoken of as a thing past; and so it will be said of us shortly, We were in the world. O that when we are here no more, we may be where Christ is!

Christ had reason to expect the most affectionate and respectful welcome into this world; for the world was made by Him. He came to save a lost world, because it was a world of his own making. Why should not He concern himself to revive the light that was of his own kindling, to restore a life of his own infusing, and to renew the image that was originally of his own impressing? The world was made by Him, and therefore ought to do Him homage.

But notwithstanding, the world knew Him not. The great Maker, Ruler, Redeemer of the world was in it, and few or none of the inhabitants of the world were aware of it. The ox knows his owner, but the more brutish world did not; they did not own Him, nor bid Him welcome, because they did not know Him; and they did not know Him, because He did not make himself known in external glory and majesty. His kingdom came not with observation, because it was to be a kingdom of probation. When He shall come as a Judge, the world shall know Him.

3. He came (v. 11.) not only to the world, which was his own, but to the people of Israel, that were peculiarly his own; of them He came, among them He lived, and to them was first sent. The Jews were at this time a mean, despicable people, the crown was fallen from their heads; yet in remembrance of the ancient covenant, bad and poor as they were, Christ was not ashamed to look upon them as his own. The Jews were his, as a man's house and lands and goods are his, which he uses and possesses; but believers are his, as a man's wife and children are his own, which he loves and enjoys, ch. 13:1. He came to his own, to seek and save them, because they were his own. He was sent to the lost sheep of the house of Israel, for it was He whose own the sheep were. Now observe,

(1.) The generality rejected Him; His own received Him not. He had reason to expect that those who were his own, should have bidden Him welcome, considering their obligations to Him, and how fair were the opportunities they had of coming to the knowledge of Him. They had the oracles of God, which told them beforehand when and where to expect Him, and of what tribe and family He should arise. He came among them Himself, with signs and wonders, Himself the greatest; and therefore it is not said of them, as it was of the world, (v. 10.) that they knew Him not; but his own, though they could not but know Him, yet received Him not; did not receive his doctrine, did not welcome Him as the Messiah, but fortified themselves against Him. The chief priests, that were in a particular manner his own, (for the Levites were God's tribe,) were ringleaders in this contempt put upon Him. This was very unjust, because they were his own, and therefore He might command their respect; and it was very unkind and ungrateful, because He came to seek and save them. Note, Many who profess to be Christ's own, do not receive Him, because they will not part with their sins, nor have Him to reign over them.

(2.) Yet there was a remnant who owned Him, and were faithful to Him. Though his own received Him not, yet there were those that received Him; v. 12. Though Israel were not gathered, Christ was glorious. Though the body of that nation perished, and perished in unbelief, yet there were many of them that were wrought upon to submit to Christ, and many more that were not of that fold. Observe here,

The true Christian's description and property; he receives Christ, and believes on his name; the latter explains the former. Note, First, To be a Christian indeed, is to believe on Christ's name; it is to assent to the gospel-discovery, and consent to the gospel-proposal, concerning Him. His name is the Word of God; the King of kings; the Lord our Righteousness; Jesus a Savior. Now to believe on his name, is to acknowledge that He is what these names bespeak Him to be; and to acquiesce in it, that He be so to us. Secondly, Believing in Christ's name is receiving Him as a Gift from God. We must receive his doctrine as true and good; his law as just and holy; his offers as kind, and the image of his grace, and impressions of his love, as the governing principle of our affections and actions.

The true Christian's dignity and privilege are two-fold:

First, The privilege of adoption, which takes them into the number of God's children: To them gave He power to become the sons of God. Hitherto the adoption pertained to the Jews only; (Israel is my son, my first-born; but now, by faith in Christ, Gentiles are trodden of God, Gal. 3: 26. They have power, authority; for no man taketh this power to himself, but who is authorized by the gospel-charter. To them gave He a right, a pre-eminence. This power have all the saints. Note, 1. It is the unspeakable privilege of Christians, that they become the children of God. They were by nature children of wrath; children of this world. If they be the children of God, they are made so. Persons are not born Christians, but made such. Tertull. Behold what manner of love is this, 1 John 3: 1. God calls them his children, they call Him Father, and are entitled to the privileges of children; those of the way, and those of their home. 2. The privilege of adoption is entirely owing to Christ; He gave this power to them that believe on his name. God is his Father, and so ours; and it is by virtue of our espousals to Him and union with Him, that God is our Father. It was in Christ that we were predestinated to the adoption; from Him we receive both the character and the Spirit of adoption, and He is the First-born among many brethren. The Son of God became a Son of man, that the sons and daughters of men might become the sons and daughters of God Almighty.

Secondly, The privilege of regeneration; (v. 13.) which were born. Note, All the children of God are born again; all that are adopted, are regenerated. This real change evermore attends that relative one. Wherever God confers the dignity, He creates the nature and disposition, of children. Men cannot do so, when they adopt. Here we have an account of the original of this new birth. (1.) It is not propagated by natural generation from parents. It is not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of corruptible seed, 1 Pet. 1: 23. Man is called flesh and blood, because thence he has his original; but we do not become the children of God as we become the children of our parents. Note, Grace does not run in the blood, like corruption. Man polluted begat a son in his own likeness; (Gen. 5: 3.) but man renewed does not beget a son in that likeness. The Jews gloried much in their parentage and noble blood. We are Abraham's seed, and therefore to them pertained the adoption; but this New-Testament adoption is not founded in any such relation. (2.) It is not produced by the natural power of our will. As it is not of blood, or of the will of the flesh, so neither is it of the will of man; that is impotent in determining itself to that which is good; so that the principles of the divine life are not of our own planting, it is the grace of God that makes us willing to be his. Nor can human laws or writings prevail to sanctify and regenerate a soul; if they could, the new birth would be by the will of man. But, It is of God. This new birth is owing to the Word of God as the means. (1 Pet. 1: 23.) and to the Spirit of God as the sole Author. True believers are born of God, 1 John 3: 9, and 5: 1. And this is necessary to their adoption; for we cannot expect the love of God, if we have not something of his likeness, nor claim the privileges of adoption, if we be not under the power of regeneration.

4. The Word was made Flesh, v. 14. This expresses Christ's incarnation more clearly. By his divine presence, He always was in the world, and by his prophets He came to his own. But now that the fullness of time was come, He was sent forth made of a woman, (Gal. 4: 4.) God manifested in the flesh, according to the faith and hope of holy Job, (ch. 19: 26.) Yet shall I see God in my flesh. Observe here,

(1.) The human nature of Christ with which He was veiled expressed two ways.

[1.] The Word was made Flesh. Forasmuch as the children who were to become the sons of God, were partakers of flesh and blood, He likewise took part of the same, Heb. 2: 14. The Socinians agree that Christ is God and 12 But as many as received him, to them gave he power to become the sons of God, even to them that believe on his name:

13 Which were born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God.

things, and submit to that from which He was at the greatest distance. The voice that ushered in the Gospel, cried, All flesh is grass; (Isa. 40:6.) to make the Redeemer's love the more wonderful, who, to redeem and save us, was made Flesh, and withered as grass; but the Word of the Lord, who was made Flesh, endures for ever; when made Flesh, He ceased not to be the Word of God.

[2.] He dwelt among us in this lower world. Having taken upon Him the nature of man, He put himself into the condition of men. The Word might have been made Flesh, and dwelt among the angels; but, having taken a body of the same mould with us, He came, and resided with us. He dwelt among us, worms of the earth, us that He had no need of, that He got nothing by; that were corrupt and depraved, and revolted from God. The Lord God dwelt even among the rebellious, Ps. 68:18. He that had dwelt among angels, came, and dwelt among a generation of pipers, sinners, which was worse to Him than David's dwelling in Mesech and Kedar, or Ezekiel's dwelling among scorpions, or the church of Pergamos dwelling where Satan's seat is. When we look upon the world of spirits, how mean and contemptible does this flesh appear, which we carry about with us, and this world in which our lot is cast; and how hard is it to a contemplative mind, to be reconciled to them! But that the eternal Word was clothed with a body as we are, and dwelt in this world as we do; this has put an honor upon them both, and should make us willing to abide in the flesh while God has any work for us to do, for Christ dwelt in this world, bad as it is, till He had finished what He had to do, ch. 17:4. He dwelt among the Jews, that the Scripture might be fulfilled, He shall dwell in the tents of Shem, Gen. 9:27. And see Zech. 2:10. Though the Jews were unkind to Him, yet He continued to dwell among them; though (as some of the ancient writers tell us) He was invited to better treatment by Abgarus king of Edessa, yet He removed not to any other nation.

He dwelt among us. He was in the world, not as a wayfaring man that tarries but for a night, but dwelt; made a long residence; the original word is observable, He dwelt among us as in a tabernacle, which intimates, First, That He dwelt here in very mean circumstances, as shepherds that dwell in tents. He did not dwell among us as in a palace, but as in a tent; for He had not where to lay his head, and was always upon the remove. Secondly, His state here was a military state; soldiers dwell in tents. He had long since proclaimed war with the seed of the serpent, and now He takes the field in person; sets up his standard, and pitches his tent, to prosecute this war. Thirdly, His stay among us was not perpetual. He dwelt here as in a tent, not as at home. The patriarchs, by dwelling in tabernacles, confessed that they were strangers and pilgrims on earth, and sought the better country, and so did Christ, leaving us an example, Heb. 13:13, 14. Fourthly, As of old God dwelt in the tabernacle of Moses by the Shechinah between the cherubim, so now He dwells in the human nature of Christ, the true Shechinah, the symbol of God's peculiar presence. And we are to address God through Christ, and from Him receive divine oracles.

(2.) The beams of his divine glory darted through this veil of flesh; We beheld his glory, the glory as of the Only-begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth. The sun is still the fountain of light, though eclipsed; so Christ was still the Brightness of his Father's glory, even when He dwelt among us. And how slightly soever the Jews thought of Him, there were those that saw through the veil.

The witnesses of this glory were, we, his disciples and followers, most familiar with Him, among whom He dwelt. Other men discover their weaknesses to those that are most familiar with them; those that were most intimate with Him, saw most of his glory. As the disciples knew the mysteries of his doctrine, while others had it under the veil of parables; so they saw the glory of his divinity, while others saw only the veil of his human nature. He manifested himself to them, and not unto the world. These witnesses were a competent number, twelve, a jury of witnesses; men of plain integrity, and far from intrigue.

They had not their evidence at second-hand, but were themselves eye-witnesses of those proofs, on which they built their testimony that He was the Son of the living God. We saw it. The word signifies a fixed, abiding sight, so that we gave the opportunity of making their observations. This apostle himself explains this. What we declare unto you of the Word of life, is, what we have seen with our eyes, and what we have looked upon, 1 John 1:1.

He gave us the glory as of the Only-begotten of the Father. The glory of the Word made Flesh, was such a glory as became the only-begotten Son of God, and could not be the glory of any other. Note, First, Jesus Christ is the Only-begotten of the Father. Believers are the children of God by adoption, and regeneration; they are in a sense of a like nature, (2 Pet. 1:4.) and have the image of his perfections; but Christ is of the same nature, the express Image of his person, and the Son of God by an eternal generation. Angels are sons of God, but He never said to any of them, This day have I begotten thee, Heb. 1:5. Secondly, He was evidently declared to be the

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 6-13. Many have, in different ages, been 'sent from God to bear witness to the truth,' that 'all men through them might believe;' and these have 'shone as lights in the world;' but every one of them has confessed that all his light was a reflection of the beams of 'the Sun of Righteousness;' and all the boasted illumination, set up in opposition to Him, will infallibly lead men down to everlasting darkness. But what numbers, even of his professed disciples, refuse to welcome the condescending Savior of the world! Too wise to submit to his teaching, too proud of their goodness to rely on his merits, too attached to their own will to be subject to his commands, they reject Him in each of his offices; or, like Galileo, they 'care for none of these things;' and should He come in person again on earth, He would be despised by numbers, who could see no glory in Him, and who would feel no need of Him. But there are those, who, conscious of their ignorance, guilt, pollution, and slavery to sin and Satan, gladly receive Him as their Prophet, Priest, King, Redeemer, Physician, and Savior, believe his Word, and rely on his truth and love. He is to them 'the Pearl of great price;' they would 'sell all to purchase Him;' and, having once received Him, they ever after renew and ratify that important transaction. To this chosen remnant the Savior gives the privilege of becoming the children of God, and will surely preserve and prepare them for the inheritance reserved for them in heaven. These are not found in one family or nation; they are not selected by the partiality of ministers or pious friends; they are not chosen because of previous excellency, but 'born of God.' They begin to fear God, mourn for sin, believe, hope, pray, perceive the preciousness of Christ, and gladly embrace his salvation.

Verses 12, 13.

'To as many as received Him, (even) to all of them, without any exception of even the poorest or the vilest, He granted the glorious privilege of becoming the sons of God; that is, He adopted them into God's family, so that they became entitled to the present immunities, and the future eternal inheritance of his children. And they who thus received (believed on) Him were possessed of these privileges, not in consequence of their being born of blood, of their being descended from the loins of the holy patriarchs, or sharing in circumcision, and the blood of the sacrifices; nor could they have it merely to themselves of the flesh, or to their own superior wisdom and goodness, as if by the power of corrupted nature alone, they had made themselves to differ; nor to the will of man, or to the wisest advice and most powerful exhortations which their fellow-creatures might address to them; but most humbly acknowledge, that they were born of God, and indebted to the efficacious influences of his regenerative grace for all their privileges, and for all their hopes. Compare John 3:1-8. TIME 3:3-7, and Jam. 1:18.'

struct us. He had a fulness of knowledge and of compassion. Secondly, He has a fulness of grace and truth for us. He received that He might give, and God was well pleased in Him, that He might be well pleased with us in Him; and this was the truth of the legal types.

V. 15-18. I. Here, 1. Observe how he expressed his testimony; he cried according to the prediction, that he should be the voice of one crying. The Old-Testament prophets cried aloud, to show people their sins; this New-Testament prophet cried aloud, to show people their Savior. This intimates, (1.) That it was a public testimony, that all manner of persons might take notice of it, for all are concerned in it. False teachers entice secretly, but wisdom publishes her dictates in the places of concourse. (2.) He was free and hearty in bearing this testimony. He cried as one that was both well assured of, and well affected to, the truth he witnessed of. With exultation of spirit, he welcomes the public appearance of the Savior.

2. He appeals to what he had said at the beginning of his ministry, when he had directed them to expect one that should come after him, whose forerunner he was, and never intended any other honor than to lead them to Him, and to prepare his way. This he had given them notice of from the first. Note, It is very comfortable to a minister, to have the testimony of his conscience, that he sets out in his ministry with honest principles and sincere intentions, with a single eye to the glory and honor of Christ. What he had then said, he applies to this Jesus whom he had lately baptized, and who was so remarkably owned from heaven; This was He of whom I spake. John did not tell them that there would shortly appear such an one among them, and then leave them to find Him out; but in this he went beyond all the Old-Testament prophets, that he particularly specified the person; This was He, of whom I told you, and to Him all I said is to be accommodated.¹ What was it he said?

(1.) He had given the preference to Jesus; He that comes after me, in birth and public appearance, is preferred before me; He that succeeds me in preaching and making disciples, is a more excellent Person; as the prince that comes after, is preferred before the harbinger. Note, Jesus Christ, the Son of the Highest, (Luke 1:32.) was preferred before John Baptist, who was only the prophet of the Highest, Luke 1:76. John was a minister, but Christ the Mediator of the New Testament. Though John had a great name and interest, yet he gave the preference to Him to whom it belonged. Note, Ministers of Christ must prefer Him and his interest before themselves and their own interests: they will make an ill account, that seek their own things, not the things of Christ, Phil. 2:21. He comes after me, and yet is preferred before me. Note, God recompenses his gifts according to his good pleasure, and many times crosses and, as Jacob did, preferring the younger before the elder. Paul far outstripped those that were in Christ before him.

He here gives a good reason for it; for he was before me. He was my first, or first to me; He was my first Cause. The First, is one of God's names, Isa. 44:6. [1.] In respect of seniority: for He was before Abraham, ch. 8:58. Nay, He was before all things, Col. 1:17. I am but of yesterday, He from eternity. It was but in those days that John Baptist came, (Matt. 3:1.) but the goings forth of Jesus were of old, from everlasting, Mic. 5:2. This proves two natures in Christ; Christ, as Man, came after John as to his public appearance; Christ, as God, was before him; and how could He otherwise be before him but by an eternal existence? [2.] In respect of supremacy, for He was my Prince; so some princes are called the first. 'It is He for whose sake and service I am sent: He is my Master, I his minister.'

II. He returns to speak of Christ. The 16th verse has a manifest connection with v. 14, where the incarnate Word was said to be full of grace and truth. This he makes the matter, not only of adoration, but of thankfulness, because, from that fulness we all have received. He received gifts for men, (Ps. 68:18.) that He might give gifts to men, Eph. 4:8. He was filled, that He might fill all in all, (Eph. 1:23.) might fill our treasures, Prov. 8:21. He has a fountain of fulness or flowing; We all have received. All we apostles; so some. We have received the favor of this apostleship, that is grace; and a fitness for it, that is truth; or rather, All we believers. Note, All true believers receive from Christ's fulness; the greatest saints cannot live without Him, the weakest may live by Him. This excludes boasting, that we have nothing but we have received it; and silences perplexing fears, that we want nothing but we may receive it.

We have received grace for grace. Our receivings by Christ are all summed up in this one word, grace; we have received even grace, a gift, so rich, so invaluable; we have received no less than grace; a gift to be spoken of with an emphasis. It is repeated, grace for grace: for to every stone in this building, as well as to the top-stone, we must cry, Grace, grace Observe, Grace is the good will of God towards us, and the good work of God in us. God's good will works the good work, and then the good work qualifies us for further tokens of his good will. As the cistern receives from the fulness of the fountain, the branches, from the root, and the air, from the sun; so we receive grace from the fulness of Christ.

Grace for grace: The phrase is singular, and interpreters put different senses upon it, each of which will be of use to illustrate the unsearchable riches of Christ. It speaks,

[1.] The freeness of this grace. It is grace for grace-sake. We receive grace, not for our sakes, but because it seemed good in thy sight. It is a gift according to grace, (Rom. 12:6.) for the sake of Jesus Christ. God was well pleased in Him, and is therefore well pleased with us in Him, Eph. 1:6.

[2.] Grace for grace is abundance of grace,

Verse 14.

And the Word was made flesh.] 'That very person who was in the beginning—who was with God—and who was God, (v. 1.) in the fulness of time became flesh.'

Dr. A. CLARKE.

'In the language of the synagogues the term flesh was so often employed to denote a human being, that the evangelist's expression would not sound so harshly in ears accustomed to that idiom, as the literal version of the words does in ours. I have preferred the phrase became incarnate, which, if it does not so much trace the letter of the original as the common rendering does, is closer to the sense, and sufficiently simple and intelligible. This expression, the Word became incarnate, has been thought by some, not implausibly, to have been pointed by the evangelist against the error of the Docetæ, who denied the human nature of Christ, supposing Him to have been a man only in appearance; and the expression, The Word was God, (v. 1.) to have been pointed against the error of the Ebionites, who denied his divine nature, affirming that He was no more than a man.'

CAMPBELL.

'The two expressions,—The Word was God, and the Word became flesh,—when taken together, accord precisely with other passages of Scripture in which He is denominated God, in the very same kind of connection.—Isa. 9:6. For unto us a child is born, unto us a Son is given;—and his name shall be called,—the mighty God. Compare also Matt. 1:22, 23. Rom. 9:5.'

Full of grace and truth.] 'Full of favor, kindness, and mercy to men, teaching the way to the kingdom of God, with all the simplicity, plainness, dignity and enrgy of truth.'

Dr. A. CLARKE.

When God gives grace, He saith, Take this in part; for He who hath promised, will perform.

[6.] It speaks the conformity of grace in the saints to the grace that is in Christ. Grace for grace is, grace in us answering to grace in Him, as the impression upon the wax answers the seal. The grace we receive from Christ, changes us into the same image, 2 Cor. 3:18. The image of the Son, (Rom. 8:29.) the image of the heavenly, 1 Cor. 15:49.

2. We have received grace and truth, v. 17. He had said, (v. 14.) that Christ was full of grace and truth: now here he saith, that by Him grace and truth came to us. From Christ we receive grace; this is a string he delights to harp upon. He further observes concerning this grace,

Its preference above the law of Moses. The law was given by Moses; it was a discovery of God's will concerning man, and his good will to man; but the gospel of Christ is a much clearer discovery both of duty and happiness. That which was given by Moses, was terrifying, bound with penalties, a law which could not give life, given with abundance of terror; (Heb. 12:18.) but that by Christ, is of another nature; it has all the uses of the law, but not the terror, for it is grace: grace teaching, (Tit. 2:11.) grace reigning, Rom. 5:21. It is a law, but a remedial law: the endearments of love, not the afflictments of the curse.

It is connected with truth; grace and truth. The gospel discovers truths, for the understanding, as well as grace, for the will and affections. It is a faithful saying and worthy of all acceptance; it is grace and truth. The offers of grace are sincere, we may venture our souls upon them; they are made in earnest, for it is grace and truth. It is grace and truth, with reference to the law given by Moses. For it is, [1.] The performance of all the Old Testament promises. In the Old Testament we often find mercy and truth put together, that is, mercy according to promise; so here, grace and truth denote grace according to promise. See Luke 1:72. 1 Kings 8:56. [2.] It is the substance of all the types and shadows. There was grace both in the ordinances and the providences concerning Israel; but they were only shadows of that grace that is to be brought to us by the revelation of Jesus Christ. He is the true paschal Lamb, the true Scape-goat, the true Manna. They had grace in the picture, we in a person, that is grace and truth. Grace and truth was made; the same word was was used, (v. 3.) concerning one grace upon another; as skin for skin is skin after skin, even all that a man has, Job 2:4. It is a blessing poured out; that there shall not be room to receive it; plenteous redemption: one grace a pledge of more grace. It is the fulness of God, with which we are filled. We are not straitened in the grace of Christ, if we be not straitened in our own bosoms.

[3.] Grace for grace, is grace for the promoting and advancing of grace. Grace to be exercised by ourselves, gracious habits for gracious acts; grace to be ministered to others, vouchersafements for gracious performances, a talent to be traded with. The apostles received grace, (Rom. 1:5. Eph. 3:8.) that they might communicate it, 1 Pet. 4:10.

[4.] The substitution of New-Testament grace in the stead of Old-Testament grace. And this sense is confirmed by what follows; (v. 17.) for the Old Testament had grace in type, the New Testament in truth. There was a grace under the Old Testament; the Gospel was preached then; (Gal. 3:8.) but that grace is superseded, and we have gospel-grace instead of it, a glory which excelleth, 2 Cor. 3:10. Discoveries of grace are now more clear, distributions of it far more plentiful; this is grace instead of grace.

[5.] It speaks the augmentation and continuance of grace. Grace for grace is one grace to confirm and perfect, another grace. We are changed into the divine image, from glory to glory, from one degree of grace to another, 2 Cor. 3:18. Those that have true grace, shall have more grace, Jam. 4:6. principle. It is, however, doubted by many, who steadfastly maintain the doctrine of our Lord's deity, and of a Trinity of persons in the God-head, whether the title of 'the Son of God,' relates to any thing more than his human nature, his miraculous conception, and his mediatorial character and work; and the opinion of former orthodox divines on this subject seems to be given up by them as unscriptural. Now it is allowed, that numbers have speculated, explained, and disputed too much concerning these mysteries, of which we can know no more than is expressly revealed: and it must also be remembered, that such relative terms as Father and Son, when applied to the Deity, can only be used in a figurative sense, or one not comprehensible by us, in order to help our feeble apprehensions: and therefore they must not be made the foundation of any conclusions inconsistent with the eternal self-existence and equality of 'the Word.' Yet I apprehend, that Christ is called in Scripture 'the only-begotten Son of God,' and 'the Son of the Father,' in respect of his divine nature; and that He is the Son of God, by 'a generation that none can declare.' Various expressions, concerning the love of God in giving his Son for us, seem to refer, not to his giving Him to death, when incarnate; but to his giving Him to be incarnate for that purpose. 'He spared not his own Son,' and this gift was so immense, that the apostle counted all other things to be as nothing in comparison. Indeed it does not appear why He should be called 'the only-begotten Son of God,' merely in respect of his human nature; for the formation of Adam, and of all the angels was produced equally immediately and divine, as that of the human nature of Christ; and 'the glory as of the Only-begotten of the Father,' (v. 14) evidently relates to his divine, and not to his human nature. (Notes, 3: 607.)

Christ's making all things. The law was only made known by Moses, but the being of grace and truth, as well as the discovery of it, is owing to Christ; this was made by Him, as the world at first was; and by Him this grace and truth do consist.

We also receive from Christ a clear revelation of God, (v. 18,) whom no man hath seen at any time. This was the grace and truth which came by Christ, the knowledge of, and acquaintance with God.

No man hath seen God at any time. This intimates, [1.] That the nature of God being spiritual, He is invisible to bodily eyes, a Being whom no man hath seen, or can see, 1 Tim. 6:16. We therefore need to live by faith only which we see Him that is invisible, Heb. 11:27. [2.] The revelation which God made of Himself in the Old Testament was short and imperfect, in comparison with that made by Christ; No man hath seen God at any time: that is, what was seen and known of God before the incarnation of Christ, was not seeing to that which is now seen and known; and immortality are now brought to a much clearer light. [3.] None of the Old-Testament prophets were so well qualified to make known the mind and will of God as Jesus was, for none of them had seen God at any time. Moses beheld the similitude of the Lord, (Num. 12:8.) but could not see his face, Exod. 33:20. But this recommends Christ's religion to us, that it was founded by One that had seen God, and knew more of his mind than any one else ever did, for He had seen Him.

The only-begotten Son, which is in the bosom of the Father, He has declared Him.

How fit He was to make this discovery, and every way qualified for it. He alone was worthy to take the book, and open the seals, Rev. 5:9. For He is the only-begotten Son; and who so likely to know the Father as the Son; or, in whom is the Father better known than in the Son? Matt. 11:27. He is of the same nature with the Father, so that He who hath seen Him, hath seen the Father, ch. 14:9. The servant is not supposed to know so well what his Lord does, as the Son, (ch. 15:) Moses was faithful as a servant, but Christ as a Son. He is in the bosom of the Father from eternity; when He was here upon earth, yet still as God, He was in the bosom of the Father, and thither He returned when He ascended. In the bosom of the Father, 1. In his special love, dear to Him, in whom He was well pleased. All God's saints are in his hand, but his Son was in the highest degree in his love. 2. In his secret counsels. As there was complacency, so there was a mutual consciousness, between the Father and Son; (Matt. 11:27.) none so fit as He to make known God, for none knew his mind as He did. Our most secret counsels we are said to hide in our bosom; Christ was privy to the bosom-counsels of the Father. The prophets sat down at his feet as scholars, Christ lay in his bosom as a Friend. See Eph. 3:11.

He hath declared Him. He has declared that

Verse 16. 'When the immediate connection between the 16th and the 14th verses is attended to, the meaning of the clause is equally obvious as that of any of the foregoing examples. The Word incarnate, says the apostle, resided among us, full of grace and truth, and of his fulness we all have received, even grace for his grace; that is, of every grace or celestial gift, conferred above measure upon Him, his disciples have received a portion according to their measure. If there should remain a doubt whether this were the sense of the passage, the words immediately following seem calculated to remove it. For the law was given by Moses, the grace and truth came by Jesus Christ. Here the evangelist intimates that Jesus Christ was as truly the channel of divine grace to his disciples, as Moses had been of the knowledge of God's law to the Israelites.' CAMPBELL.

We have frequently had occasion to observe, that, from the beginning, every discovery of God to man, and all the visions and displays of JAHUAH to Adam, Noah, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Moses, Joshua, Isaiah, and others, were made by the eternal Son, who afterwards became incarnate, being anticipations of that event: (Notes, Gen. 3: 8. 16: 10, 11, 13, 14. 18: 33. 22: 26-30. 43: 16. a priest of the seed of Aaron, and therefore was examined by priests. It was prophesied concerning John's ministry, that it should purify the sons of Levi, (Mal. 3:3.) and therefore they were jealous of him and his reformation. They were of the Pharisees, proud, self-justiciaries, that thought they needed no repentance, and therefore could not bear one that preached repentance.

Their errand was to inquire concerning John and his baptism. They did not send for John, probably lest the people where John was, should be provoked to rise, or lest the people where they were, should be brought acquainted with him; they thought it was good to keep him at a distance.

They inquired concerning him, 1. To satisfy their curiosity; as the Athenians inquired concerning Paul's doctrine, for the novelty of it, Acts 17:19, 20. Such conceit they had of themselves, that the doctrine of repentance was to them strange doctrine. 2. It was to show their authority. They thought that they looked great when they arraigned him at their bar whom all men counted as a prophet. 3. It was with a design to suppress and silence him if they could, for they were jealous of his growing interest; and his ministry agreed neither with the Mosaic dispensation, which they had been long under, nor with their notions of the Messiah's kingdom.

They asked him, Who art thou? John's appearance in the world was surprising; he was in the wilderness till the day of his showing unto Israel; his spirit, his converse, his doctrine, commanded and gained respect; but he did not, as seducers do, give out himself to be some great one. He was more industrious to do good than to appear great; and therefore waved saying any thing of himself till he was legally interrogated. Those speak best for Christ, that say least of themselves, whose own works praise them, not their own lips.

He answers their interrogatory,

V. 14-13. To unbelievers, there appears in Christ 'no beauty that they should desire Him'; but all who truly believe, adore the condescension of the 'Word, who became flesh to tabernacle among us.' They discern Him as 'the Only-begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth'; they value 'the unsearchable riches' and inexhaustible fullness, laid up in Him; they see that 'He is the Chief among ten thousand, and altogether lovely'; worthy to be adored and loved, far beyond all the sons of earth and heaven. They therefore consider prophets, apostles, martyrs, and saints, as so many monuments to the Redeemer's glory, and so many encouragements to apply to Him, who is able to render them also wise and happy; and to furnish them with grace, which may enable them to 'shine as lights in the world,' and live to the glory of his name. We ought highly to value every discovery of the perfections of JEHOVAH: his 'law is holy, just, and good,' was given for most important purposes; and we should endeavor to make the proper use of it. But we cannot from it derive pardon, or righteousness; it may teach us to 'adorn the doctrine of God our Savior,' but it cannot supply the place of it. No mercy comes from God to sinners, but through Christ; 'no man can come to the Father but by Him'; no man can know God, except as the only-begotten Son reveals Him. Ignorance, condemnation, and wrath, must be the portion of every man, who rejects the Son of God; the Centre of all the promises; the Life and Soul of doctrines, ordinances and precepts. SCOTT.

16 1 John 4:9-12.]—In short, it seems to denote something incomprehensible, and infinitely superior to creation, and to every thing of which we have the most remote conception, constituting an equality of nature, and a relation between the eternal Father and the Son, of which that relation among men is but a feeble shadow; yet suited to help our conceptions about it. Perhaps we should never have been informed of the distinction of persons in the Godhead, but on account of the economy of the work of redemption: or, to speak more properly, that work seems to have been planned, in order to a display of the glory of God, as well in this distinction of persons, as in the harmony of his attributes. The apprehensions of the most exalted creatures, on such a subject, must be inadequate. Ours must I present be also confused and defective. SCOTT.

In the bosom.] 'Or, upon the bosom. This formula, derived its origin from the custom of the ancients in sitting, or rather in reclining, at meals: according to which, he who reclined immediately below another at table, seemed, as it were, to lie in his bosom: and the most favored guests, (who were placed the nearest to the host,) sometimes literally did so. (See the note on Luke 16: 22.) And as the same words of reclining subsisted among the Greeks and Romans, so they had themselves the same expression: and sometimes used it as here, in a metaphorical sense. The sense is therefore this, "who is nearest to [608]

Negatively. He was not that great one whom some took him to be. God's faithful witnesses guard against undue respect more than against unjust contempts. Paul writes as warmly against those that overvalued him, and said I am of Paul, as against those that undervalued him, and said that his 'bodily presence was weak; and he rent his clothes when he was called a god.

John disowns himself to be the Christ, (20.) He said, I am not the Christ. Note, The ministers of Christ must remember that they are not Christ, and therefore must not usurp his powers and prerogatives, nor assume the praises due to Him only. They are not Christ, and therefore must not lord it over God's heritage, nor pretend to a dominion over the faith of Christians. They cannot create grace and peace, they cannot enlighten; convert, quicken, comfort, for they are not Christ. Observe, how emphatic! He confessed, and denied not, but confessed; it denotes his vehemence and constancy in making this protestation. Note, Temptations to pride, and assuming honor which doth not belong to us, ought to be resisted with great vigor and earnestness. When John was taken to be the Messiah, he did not connive at it, saying, If the people will be deceived, let them; but openly and solemnly, without any ambiguities, confessed, I am not the Christ. His disowning of himself to be the Christ, is called his confessing and not denying Christ. Note, Those that abase themselves, thereby confess Christ, and give honor to Him; but those that will not deny themselves, do in effect deny Christ.

The Jews expected Elias to return and live among them, and promised themselves great things from it; hearing of John's character, doctrine and baptism, and observing that he appeared in the same part of the country from which Elijah was carried to heaven, it is no wonder that they were ready to take him for this Elijah; but he disowned this honor. He was indeed prophesied of under the name of Elijah, (Mal. 4:5.) and he came in the spirit and power of Elias, (Luke 1:17.) and was the Elias that was to come; (Matt. 11:14.) but he was not the person of that Elias that went to heaven in the fiery chariot, that met Christ in his transfiguration; he was the Elias that God had promised, not the Elias that they foolishly dreamed of. Elias did come, and they knew him not, (Matt. 17:12.) nor did he make himself known to them as the Elias, because they had promised themselves such an Elias as God never promised them.

the Father, most intimately conjoined, and the dearest to Him." It appears from Lampe, that something more is denoted than perfect familiarity and participation in any one's counsels, which is the sense of the phrase among classical writers. BLOOMFIELD.

I am not the Christ.] 'It may be inquired how the sanhedrim (priests as they were,) could ask such a question; since they knew John's ancestry was not what had been predicted of Christ. Yet when they remembered what had happened to Zechariah in the temple; and that Elisabeth his mother, was of the lineage of David, and especially as it was not entirely determined among the doctors, whether Christ was to be born at Bethlehem; hence, the sanhedrim might easily (as a Messiah was then anxiously expected,) fall into the opinion that John was possibly that Messiah, and they therefore sent to interrogate him; hoping at the same time (as we may suppose,) that John would prove himself to be the Messiah, and head them in an attempt to throw off the Roman yoke.' 22 Then said they unto him, Who art thou? that we may give an answer to them that sent us: What sayest thou of thyself?

23 He said, I am the voice of one crying in the wilderness, Make straight the way of the Lord, as said the prophet Esaias.

24 And they which were sent were of the Pharisees.

25 And they asked him, and said unto him, Why baptizest thou then, if thou be not that Christ, nor Elias, neither that prophet?

26 John answered them, saying, I baptize with water; but there standeth one among you, whom ye know not.

He also disowns himself to be that prophet, or the prophet. He was not that Prophet which Moses said the Lord would raise up to them of their brethren, like unto him. That Prophet was the Messiah, and he had said already, I am not the Christ. He was not such a prophet as they expected and wished for, who, like Samuel and Elijah, would interpose in public affairs, and rescue them from the Roman yoke. He was not one of the old prophets from the dead, as they expected one to come before Elias, as Elias before the Messiah. Though John was a prophet, yea, more than a prophet, he had his revelation, not by dreams and visions, as the Old-Testament prophets had theirs; his commission and work were of another nature, and belonged to another dispensation. If John had said that he was Elias, and a prophet, he might have made his words good; but ministers must, upon all occasions, express themselves with the utmost caution, both that they do not confirm the people in any mistakes, and, particularly that they give not occasion to any to think of them above what is meet.

They that were sent to examine him, pressed for a positive answer, (v. 22.) urging the authority of them that sent them, to which they expected he should pay a deference; Tell us what art thou? Not that we may believe and be baptized, but that we may give an answer to them that sent us, and it may not be said that we were on a fool's errand. John was looked upon as a man of sincerity, and therefore they believed he would not give an evasive and ambiguous, but a plain answer to a plain question. And he did so, I am the voice of one crying in the wilderness. Observe,

[1.] He gives his answer in the words of Scripture, to show that the Scripture was fulfilled in him, and that his office was supported by a divine authority. What the Scripture saith of the office of the ministry, should be often thought of by those in that high calling, who must look upon themselves as that, and that only, which the word of God makes them.

[2.] He gives his answer, in very humble, self-denying expressions; He chooses to apply that Scripture to himself, which spake, not his dignity, but his duty and dependence, which speaks him little; I am the voice, as if he were merely voice.

[3.] He gives such an account of himself as might excite and awaken them to hear him; for he was the voice, (see Isa. 40:3.) a voice to alarm, and to instruct. Ministers are but the voice by which God is pleased to communicate his mind. What are Paul and Apollos but messengers? Observe,

First, He was a human voice. The people received the law by the voice of thunders, and a trumpet exceeding loud, which made them tremble; but they were prepared for the Gospel by the voice of a man, a still small voice, such as that in which God came to Elijah, 1 Kings 19:20.

Secondly, He was the voice of one crying; which denotes, 1. His earnestness and importunity in calling people to repentance; he cried aloud, and did not spare. Ministers must preach as those that are in earnest, and are themselves affected with those things which they desire to affect others with. Those words are not likely to thaw the hearers' heart, that freeze between the speaker's lips. 2. He was the voice of one crying, that all manner of persons might hear. Doth not wisdom cry? Prov. 8:1.

Thirdly, It was in the wilderness; in a place of silence and solitude, out of the noise of the world, and the hurry of its business; the more retired we are from the tumult of secular affairs, the better prepared we are to hear from God.

Fourthly, He cried, Make straight the way of the Lord; that is, 1. He came to rectify the mistakes of people concerning the ways of God; it is certain that they are right ways; but the scribes and Pharisees, with their corrupt glosses upon the law, had made them crooked. Now John Baptist calls people to return to the original rule. 2. He came to dispose people for the reception of Christ and his Gospel. It is an allusion to the harbingers of a prince or great man, that cry, Make room. Note, When God is coming towards us, we must prepare to meet Him, and let the Word of the Lord have free course. See Ps. 24:7.

Why baptizest thou, if thou be not the Christ, nor Elias, nor that prophet? [1.] They readily apprehended baptism to be fitly used as a sacred rite, for the Jewish church had used it with circumcision in the admission of proselytes, to signify the cleansing of them from the pollutions of their former state. That sign was made use of in the Christian church, that it might be the more passable. Christ did not affect novelty, nor should his ministers. [2.] They expected it would be used in the days of the Messiah, because it was promised that then there should be a fountain opened, (Zech. 13:1.) and clean water sprinkled, Ezek. 36:25. It is taken for granted, that Christ and Elias, and that prophet, would baptize, for they came to purify a polluted world. Divine justice drowned the old

Verse 21.

That prophet? That is, in the sense in which the question was asked: for in another sense, he might be called Elias. See Luke 1:17. It is plain (says Rosenm.) from the article translated "that" that the particular prophet is meant: who if his commentators are not agreed, [To me it is evident, both from what is said here, and from other hints in the N. T. that there was at that time a general expectation in the people of some great prophet, beside Elijah, who was soon to appear, and who was well known by the emphatical appellation the prophet, without addition, or description. In ch. 6:40, 41, the prophet is distinguished from the Messiah, as he is here from Elijah. Campbell.] Beza, Bengel, Heumann, and others, (following Cyril, Chrysostom, and Theophylact,) have thought that the passage had reference to Deut. 18:15 which they understood of some particular prophet, like unto Moses, but different from Christ. Lampe observes, it was an ancient tradition that Jeremiah is here meant, who is sometimes so called, by way of eminence. In this Kuinoel acquiesces, and also thinks, that the word here is a gradation, Elias being inferior to Christ, and Jeremiah to Elias. Whence this persuasion of the appearance of Jeremiah at the Messiah's coming, arose, is evident from 2 Macc. 2:7.

BLOOMFIELD.

There is here an apparent contradiction to the words of our Lord concerning John, in Matt. 11:14. This is Elias that was to come. But Jesus evidently refers to the words of Malachi 4:5, his purpose being to inform his disciples that John was Elijah in the meaning of that prophet, and that the prophet's prediction was accomplished in the Baptist, inasmuch as he came in the spirit and power of Elijah. But when the question was proposed to John, the laws of truth required that he should answer it, according to the sense wherein the words were used by the proposer. The intended purport, he well knew, was whether he acknowledged that he was intrinsically the prophet Jeremiah returned from heaven to sojourn again upon the earth; for, in this manner they explained the prediction. To this he could not, without falsehood, answer in the affirmative.

CAMPBELL.

Verses 22-25.

John answers in the Jewish manner, i. e. in words borrowed from the O. T. (perhaps Is. 40:3) quoted memoriter, from the Sept. q. d. What the prophet has there said, will hold good of me." In such declarations the general purport is done regarded by the speaker;

the words ought not therefore to be too grammatically interpreted. John, instead of giving a description of his own character and office, refers those who questioned him to the words of the prophet Isaias, in which they would find it. Campbell. These legends were, (we may observe) Pharisees as indeed were most of the scribes. Now the Pharisees were extremely tenacious of rites and ceremonies, strenuous defenders of the liberties of the people, and especially anxious for an earthly Messiah. The right and power of baptizing Jews, and of collecting them by baptism into a new religion, was confined to the Messiah, and his precursors in establishing his terrestrial monarchy, and to no others. Thus, when the Pharisees saw themselves disappointed of their hope, they indignantly ask, "Why baptizest thou then?" Lightfoot, Rosenmuller and Kuinoel. There is, too, an evident allusion to the Jewish baptism of proselytes.

CAMPBELL.

(23.) Make straight the way of the Lord. Before we reached Mayar, we were met by a confidential officer of the governor of Ispahan, by a hakeem or doctor, and by several other men of respectability. These deputation were of the Persian nobles, and were one of the principal modes among the Persians of doing honor to their guests. The more distinguished the persons sent, and the greater the distance to which they go, so much more considerable is the honor.

MORIER.

Verse 26.

I baptize.] The Jews maintained that the Messiah (see Zech. 1:3. 1. seq. Mal. 3:2. seq.) and his precursors would baptize the people: and from the present passage also, it is plain they maintained, that the Messiah and his heralds, the prophets of the O. T., would return to life, would purify the people, and initiate them by baptism, into a new form of worship. Comp. Zech. 3:1. seq. Luke 3:7. Matt. 3:6. Now when the priests had notified to John (25.) that he had no right to baptize Jews, since he is neither Christ, nor Elias, nor Jeremiah, John answers, "I only baptize with water, but," &c. where one can not but admire the forcible brevity of the phraseology. The sense of the answer is plainly this: "I only baptize Jews in order to gather together a body for the Messiah, from whom a very different baptism is to be expected, and who will more effectually collect votaries, and thoroughly purify the people. He whom you require (the Messiah, and by whose authority I do this, is among you." The word translated "standeth" in the sense of live and to be, is frequent." BLOOMFIELD

Verse 28.

Bethabara. 'See Lightfoot, Whitby or Eiseley. Dr. Campbell, with reason, prefers the reading "in Bethany," which is found in MSS. both in number, and in value, more than a counterpoise to those which contain the common reading. Add to these the Vul. Sax. and both the Syriac versions, together with Nonnus' Greek paraphrase of this gospel, which is entitled to be put on the footing of an ancient translation. Also, several ancient authors, and some of the best editions so read. It is certain that, in several instances, the same name was given to different places, and this Bethany seems here to be expressly distinguished from another of the name, by the addition "upon the Jordan." It adds also to the probability of the reading here adopted, that Bethany, by its etymology, signifies a place, or house, close by a ferry.'

BLOOMFIELD. [So Dr. A. CLARKE.]

'Bethabara signifies literally, the house of passage, and is thought to be the place where the Israelites passed the river Jordan under Joshua. John 7: 24.'

Verse 29.

'We are often told that... repentance and reformation are fully sufficient to restore the most abandoned sinners to the favor of a just and merciful God, and to avert the punishment due to their offences. But what does the great herald and forerunner of Christ say to this? He came professing as a preacher of repentance. If then repentance alone had sufficient efficacy for the expiation of sin, surely we should have heard this from him who came on purpose to preach repentance. But what is the case? Does he tell us that repentance alone will take away the guilt of our transgressions, and justify us in the eyes of our Maker? Quite the contrary. Notwithstanding the great stress he justly lays on the indispensable necessity of repentance, yet he tells his followers at the same time, that it is not Christ only, and to his death, that they were to look for the pardon of their sins. "Behold," says he, "the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world." And again, "He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life; and he that believeth not shall not see life; but the wrath of God abideth upon him."

Bp. Porteus in Scott.

Lamb. 'The fitness and propriety of this type, or emblem, consists partly in some natural properties belonging to a lamb, and partly in some circumstances peculiar to the paschal lamb. A lamb being, perhaps, the least subject to cholera of any animal in the brute creation, was a very proper emblem of our Savior's humility and meekness; and of his inoffensive behavior.' Matt. 11: 29. 'The mute and meekness of the lamb also, under the most inhuman treatment, must strike the most heartless observer, and is an admirably forcible type of that resignation under intolerable evil, which He manifested who "overcame evil with good." "For He, by whose precious blood we were redeemed, was "a lamb without blemish and without spot." (1 Pet. 1: 19.) a phrase expressive of his exemplary patience and submission to his Father's will, under all his sufferings, and in the agony of death; for though He was oppressed and afflicted, yet He opened not his mouth." (Is 53: 7.) Wetstein by HORNE. Ed.

'There is an allusion etiam to the paschal lamb, or rather to the lambs world, but divine grace cleanses this new world. [3.] They would therefore know by what authority John baptized. His deifying himself to be Elias, or that prophet, subjected him to this further question, Why baptizest thou? Note, It is no new thing for a man's modesty to be improved to his prejudice; but it is better that men should take advantage of our low thoughts of ourselves, to trample upon us, than the devil take advantage of our high thoughts of ourselves, to tempt us to pride, and draw us into his condemnation.

1. He owned himself to be only the minister of the outward sign; 'I baptize with water, and that is all; I am no more, and do no more, than what you see; I have no other title than John the Baptist; I cannot confer the spiritual grace signified by it. Paul cared that none should think of him above what they saw him to be, (2 Cor. 12: 6.) so John Baptist. Ministers must not set up for masters.

2. He directed them to one that was greater than himself, and would do that for them, if they pleased, which he could not do. Note, The great business of Christ's ministers is to direct all people to Him; we preach not ourselves, but Christ Jesus the Lord. John here gave the same account that he had given to the people, (p. 15.) This was He of whom I spake. John was uniform in his testimony, not a reed shaken with the wind. The sanhedrim were jealous of his interests in the people, but he is not afraid to tell them that there is One at the door, that will go beyond him.

Christ stood among the common people, and was as one of them. Note, 1. Much true worth lies hid in this world: obscurity is often the lot of real excellency. Saints are God's hidden ones, therefore the world knows them not. 2. God Himself is often nearer than we are aware; The Lord is in this place, and I knew it not. They were gazing in expectation of the Messiah: Lo, He is here, or He is there, when the kingdom of God was already among them, Luke 17: 21.

Secondly, He tells them of his preference above himself; He comes after me, and yet is preferred before me. This he had said before; he adds here, "Whose shoe-latchet, I am not worthy to unloose; I am not fit to be named the same day with Him; it is an honor too great for me to pretend to be in the meekness of Him," 1 Sam. 25: 41. Those to whom Christ is precious, reckons his service, even the most despised instances, an honor. See Ps. 84: 10. If so great a man as John accounted himself unworthy of the honor of being near Christ, how unworthy then should we account ourselves? Now, one would think, these chief priests and Pharisees, upon this information concerning the approach of the Messiah, should presently have asked, who, and where, this excellent Person was; and who more likely to tell them than he who had given them this notice? No, they did not think that any part of their concern; they came to molest John, not to receive instruction from him: so that their ignorance was willful; they might have known Christ, and would not.

Lastly, All this was done, (p. 23.) in Bethabara beyond Jordan. Bethabara signifies the house of passage; some think it was the very place where Israel passed over Jordan into the land of promise, under Joshua; there was opened the way into the gospel-state by Jesus. It was at a great distance from Jerusalem, beyond Jordan; probably because what he did there, would least offend the government. Amos must prophesy in the country, not near the court; but it was said that Jerusalem should put far from her the things that belonged to her peace. He made this confession in the same place where he was baptizing, that all who attended his baptism, might be witnesses of it, and none might say that they knew not what to make of him.

V. 29—36. Here is an account of John's testimony concerning Jesus, to his own disciples. As soon as Christ was baptized, He was hurried into the wilderness, to be tempted; there He was forty days; during his absence, John bore testimony to Him, and told the people of Him; but now, he sees Jesus coming to him from the wilderness of temptation. As soon as that conflict was over, Christ returned ordered to be sacrificed, in the O. T. (particularly the lambs every day, morning and evening slain in the temple. Ex. 29: 38. seq. Num. 23: 3. seq. Is. 53: 7.) In this every day sacrifice, the whole of the carcass was burnt and offered up, to expiate the sins not only of the Jews, but of the whole human race. Jos. 13: 2. 10: 4. Philo de Vict. Scit. Vitrin. Wetstein. Rosenm. Thus Josephus relates that the Jews affirmed to Suetonius the president, that they every day offered up sacrifices for the welfare of Caesar and the Roman people.'

BLOOMFIELD.

The Lamb of God, which expiates and takes away sin. 'It is well observed by the author of that excellent treatise, called Christ the Mediator, that this is the only sense in which a lamb can be said to take away sin.'

DODDRIDGE.

Bloomfield, coinciding with the above interpretation of Doddridge, remarks that 'commentators, especially those of the last century, are by no means agreed on the exact meaning of this verse. The various opinions may be found detailed in Poole's Synopsis, Wolf's Curæ, Koehler's Analecta, Kuinoel, and Magree on the Atonement. En.

Kuinoel thus defines the sense of these words: 'View this innocent, pious, meek Person, wholly devoted and consecrated to God! Great and wonderful things will He perform: He will remove the sins of men, and extirpate vice from the earth: He will purify men by his doctrine; but, though mild, He will punish the obstinately contumacious. He will exclude them from the society of his faithful worshippers, and deprive them of the felicity of his kingdom, and then will collect a people purified, holy, and approved unto God.' This is indeed beautifully true, as far as relates to the effects of the Gospel on the hearts and lives of men; but, as Bloomfield observes, 'scarcely at all differs, indeed, substantially the same with the interpretations of Grotius, to which Doddridge justly applies the following censure.' 'Grotius strangely enervates the force of this text, by choosing to explain it of that reformation of the lives of men, to which Christ did not only press them by the doctrine that He taught, but gave them an example of it in his death, redeeming them (as it is said) from their vain conversation by his own precious blood; (1 Pet. 1: 18, 19.) whereas there is not any more evident than that the great design for which He died was to atone for sin, and to exempt us from the punishment that our iniquities deserved; that, having put away sin by the sacrifice of Himself, we might have redemption through his blood, even the forgiveness of our sins. Comp. Heb. 9: 26, 28. Eph. 1: 7. and Col 1: 14. It is not, in point of fact, true,' continues Bloomfield, 'that vice and sin have been so completely removed and extirpated by the Christian religion.' En.

In support of the doctrine of the atonement, there is more authority than for any other revealed in the Jewish or Christian Scriptures. It is enforced by the uniform testimony of the Jewish church. It is the peculiar foundation and principal doctrine of the Christian church in all ages, which never has deviated from the opinion that the death of Christ on the cross was the full, perfect, and sufficient sacrifice, oblation, and satisfaction for the sins of the whole world.'

then suspected that He was the Messiah, till the descent of the Holy Ghost at his baptism. All that is affirmed here is, that till this evidence was given him, he did not know Him to be the Messiah." There must, therefore, indeed, be a discrepancy between the present passage and that of Matt. 3: 14, where John is said to have refused to baptize Christ, doubtless because he knew Him to be the Messiah. But the difficulty in that passage is removed, if we suppose that Christ had held religious conversation with John, previously to his going with him to be baptized. The evangelist therefore relates briefly what in v. 32, he expresses more at large; namely, that he had on the occasion of that baptism learnt that Jesus was the Messiah. For when John took upon himself the office of baptizing, he did it only for the purpose of admonishing the people that the Messiah was at hand, but who the Messiah was to be, was then unknown to him.' Kuiznel.

BLOOMFIELD.

ADDITION.

(2.) The great intention of John's ministry; and baptism was, to introduce Christ. That He should be made manifest to Israel, therefore, unto I come baptizing with water. Though J. un- did not know Jesus by face, he knew that He should be made manifest. Note, We may know the certainty of that which yet we do not fully know the nature and intention of. We know that the happiness of heaven shall be made manifest to Israel, but cannot describe it. The assurance John had, that Christ should be made manifest, served to carry him with dili- gence and resolution through his work, though he was kept in the dark concerning particulars; Therefore I am come. Our assurance of the reality of things, though they are unseen, is enough to quicken us to duty. God reveals Himself to his people by degrees. At first, John knew no more concerning Christ but that He should be made manifest; in confidence of that, he came baptizing, and now is favored with a sight of Him. They who, upon God's word, believe what they do not see, shall shortly see

And I knew Him not. "Many think that John had frequently seen Jesus, but had not known Him to be the Messiah. "This has been thought by some (says Campbell) not perfectly consistent with what Luke acquaints us concerning the connection of their families; and particularly with what we are told in Matt. 3: 14. where we find that John, when Jesus came to him, to be baptized, modestly declined the office, and acknowledged the superiority of the latter. But, that there is no absurdity in supposing that John had never seen the Baptist knew concerning our Lord's personal character, his superior wisdom and sanctity. Nay, he might have known further, that He was a robust and highly honored of God, and yet not have known, or

then suspected that He was the Messiah, till the descent of the Holy Ghost at his baptism. All that is affirmed here is, that till this evidence was given him, he did not know Him to be the Messiah." There must, therefore, indeed, be a discrepancy between the present passage and that of Matt. 3: 14, where John is said to have refused to baptize Christ, doubtless because he knew Him to be the Messiah. But the difficulty in that passage is removed, if we suppose that Christ had held religious conversation with John, previously to his going with him to be baptized. might know it certainly, ^a of Him than other people did, otherwise than by revelation. But He that sent me to baptize, gave me this sign, Upon whom thou shalt see the Spirit descending, the same is He.

(2.) See what sure grounds John went upon, in his ministry and baptism, that he might proceed with all satisfaction. First, He did not run without sending; God sent him to baptize. He had a warrant from heaven. When a minister's call is clear, his comfort is sure, though his success is not always so. Secondly, He did not run without speeding; for when he was sent to baptize with water, he was directed to One that should baptize with the Holy Ghost; under that notion John Baptist was taught to expect Christ, as One who would give that repentance and faith to which he called people, and would carry on and complete that blessed structure of which he was now laying the foundation. Note, It is a great comfort to Christ's ministers, in their administration of the outward signs, that He whose ministers they are, can confer the grace signified thereby, and so put life and power into their ministrations; can speak to the heart what they speak to the ear, and breathe upon the dry bones on which they prophesy.

See what sure grounds he went upon, in his designation of the person of the Messiah. God had before given him a sign, as He did to Samuel concerning Saul; 'On whom thou shalt see the Spirit descend, that same is He.' This not only prevented mistakes, but gave him boldness in his testimony. When he had such assurance, he could speak with assurance. His expectations could not but be very much raised; and when the event exactly answered the prediction, his faith could not but be confirmed: and these things are written that we may believe.

This is the conclusion of John's testimony, in which all the particulars centre, (v. 34.) I saw, and bare record, that this is the Son of God.

This is the Son of God. The voice from heaven proclaimed, not only that He should baptize with the Holy Ghost by a divine authority, but that He what they now believe. The ministry of the word and sacraments is designed for no other end than to lead people to Christ, and to make Him more and more manifest. Baptism with water made way for the manifesting of Christ, as it supposed our corruption, and signified our cleansing by Him who is the Fountain opened.

To confirm his testimony concerning Christ, he here vouches the appearance at his baptism, in which God himself bore witness to Him. This was a considerable proof of Christ's mission. To assure us of the truth of it, we are here told, (v. 32, 33.)

(1.) That John Baptist saw it; he bare record, attested it, with the solemnity of witness-bearing. I saw the Spirit descending from heaven. John could not see the Spirit, but he saw the dove, which was a representation of the Spirit. The Spirit came upon Christ, both to make Him fit for his work, and known to the world. Christ was notified, not by the descent of a crown upon Him, or by transfiguration, but by the descent of the Spirit as a dove, to qualify Him for his undertaking. Thus the first testimony given to the apostles, was by the descent of the Spirit upon them. God's children are made manifest by their graces, their glories are reserved for their future state. Observe, The Spirit descended from heaven; for every good and perfect gift is from above. He descended like a dove—an emblem mild, and gentle, which makes Christ fit to teach. The dove brought the olive-branch of peace, Gen. 8:11. The Spirit that descended upon Christ, abode upon Him, as was foretold, Isa. 11:2. The Spirit did not move Him at times, as Samson, (Judg. 13:25,) but at all times. The Spirit was given Him without measure; it was his prerogative to have the Spirit always upon Him, so that He could at no time be found either unqualified for his work Himself, or unfurnished for the supply of those that seek his grace.

John was bidden to expect this sign, which very much corroborates the proof. It was not bare conjecture, that surely He on whom he saw the Spirit descending, was the Son of God; but it was a sign given before, by which he

33. He insists much that he knew no more of Him than other people did, otherwise than by revelation. But He that sent me to baptize, gave me this sign, Upon whom thou shalt see the Spirit descending, the same is He.

(2.) See what sure grounds John went upon, in his ministry and baptism, that he might proceed with all satisfaction. First, He did not run without sending; God sent him to baptize. He had a warrant from heaven. When a minister's call is clear, his comfort is sure, though his success is not always so. Secondly, He did not run without speeding; for when he was sent to baptize with water, he was directed to One that should baptize with the Holy Ghost; under that notion John Baptist was taught to expect Christ, as One who would give that repentance and faith to which he called people, and would carry on and complete that blessed structure of which he was now laying the foundation. Note, It is a great comfort to Christ's ministers, in their administration of the outward signs, that He whose ministers they are, can confer the grace signified thereby, and so put life and power into their ministrations; can speak to the heart what they speak to the ear, and breathe upon the dry bones on which they prophesy.

See what sure grounds he went upon, in his designation of the person of the Messiah. God had before given him a sign, as He did to Samuel concerning Saul; 'On whom thou shalt see the Spirit descend, that same is He.' This not only prevented mistakes, but gave him boldness in his testimony. When he had such assurance, he could speak with assurance. His expectations could not but be very much raised; and when the event exactly answered the prediction, his faith could not but be confirmed: and these things are written that we may believe.

This is the conclusion of John's testimony, in which all the particulars centre, (v. 34.) I saw, and bare record, that this is the Son of God.

This is the Son of God. The voice from heaven proclaimed, not only that He should baptize with the Holy Ghost by a divine authority, but that He has a divine nature. The peculiar Christian creed is, that Jesus is the Son of God, (Matt. 1:16,) and here is the first framing of it.

'I saw, and bare record.' Not only I now bear record of it, but I did so soon as I had seen it.' Observe, [1.] What he saw he was forward to bear record of, as they, Acts 4:20. We cannot but speak the things which we have seen. [2.] What he bare record of, was what he saw. Christ's witnesses were eye-witnesses, and therefore the more to be credited, 2 Pet. 1:16.

John took every opportunity to lead people to Christ; John stood looking upon Jesus as He walked. It would seem, John was now retired from the multitude, in conversation with two of his disciples. Note, Ministers should not only in their public preaching, but in their private converse, witness to Christ. He saw Jesus walking at some distance, yet did not go to Him himself, because he would shun every thing that might give the least color to suspect a combination. He was looking upon Jesus steadfastly, and fixed his eyes upon Him. Those that would lead others to Christ, must be diligent and frequent in the contemplation of Him themselves. John had seen Christ before, but now looked upon Him, 1 John 1:1.

He repeated the testimony which he had given the day before, though he could have delivered some other great truth concerning Him; but thus he would show that he was constant in his testimony, and consistent. His doctrine was the same in private that it was in public, Acts 20:20, 21. It is good to have that repeated, which we have heard, Phil. 3:1. The doctrine of Christ's sacrifice for the sin of the world, ought especially to be insisted upon by ministers: Christ, the Lamb of God, Christ and His crucifixion.

He intended this especially for his two disciples that stood with him; he was willing to turn them over to Christ; for to this end he bore witness to Christ in their hearing, that they might leave all to follow Him, even that they might leave him. He did not reckon that he lost those disciples who went over from him to Christ, any more than the school-master reckons that scholar lost whom he sends to the university. John gathered disciples not for himself, but for Christ, to prepare them for the Lord, Luke 1:17. So far was he from being jealous of Christ's growing interest, that there was nothing he more desired. Humble, generous souls will give others their due praise without fear of diminishing themselves by it. What we have of reputation, as well as of other things, will not be the less for our giving every body their own.

V. 37-42. Here two disciples come from John to Jesus, and one of them fetches a third, and these are the first fruits of Christ's disciples; how small the church was in its beginnings, and in the dawning of the day of its great things!

Andrew and another with him were the two that John Baptist had directed to Christ, v. 37. The other, some think, was Thomas, comparing ch. 21:2 others, that it was John himself, the penman of this gospel, whose manner it is industriously to conceal his name, ch. 13:23, and 20:3.

Here is their readiness to go to Christ; they heard John speak of Jesus as the Lamb of God, and they followed Jesus. Probably they had heard John say the same thing the day before, and then it had not the effect upon them which now it had; see the benefit of repetition

V. 12-34. That John the Baptist was filled with the Holy Ghost from his birth; he was 'great in the sight of God,' and one of the most excellent of men; yet he was nothing but the voice of a herald, to proclaim the Savior's glory; 'unworthy even to loose the latchet of his shoes.' He knew that Jesus was 'before him,' as the eternal Word; that He would forever be 'preferred before him' and all creatures; and that He alone could pardon sin, or baptize with the Holy Ghost. He thought he could not enough abase himself, or exalt his Lord; he only desired to prepare his way, and manifest Him to Israel. Their light is darkness, and their wisdom madness, who exalt themselves; and degenerate Christ, being directly in opposition to the wisdom of God, and 'the Light of the world.' Let us behold Jesus 'as the Lamb of God, who taketh away the sin of the world.' Sin must be taken away, or sinners must be ruined forever: 'God hath provided Himself a Lamb for a burnt offering,' through whose atonement, He can be 'just and the Justifier of the ungodly.' Let sinners then behold and trust in Him: let believers look to Him for pardon, strength, encouragement, righteousness, and a perfect example. Thus guilt will be removed from the conscience, and sin from the heart. While we look to Him for pardon, let us also seek to be like Him, and to partake of his baptism, that we may abound in holy fruits.

38 Then Jesus ^d turned, and saw them following, and saith unto them, 'What seek ye? They said unto him, 'Rabbi, (which is to say, being interpreted, Master,) 'where dwellest thou?'

Christ saith unto them, 'Come, and see. Good desires toward Christ and communion with Him should be countenanced. (1.) He invites them to come to his lodgings; the nearer we approach to Christ, the more we see of his beauty and excellency. Deceivers maintain their interest in their followers by keeping them at a distance, but that which Christ desired to recommend Him to his followers, was, that they would come, and see; 'Come, and see what poor accommodations I have, that you may not expect worldly advantage by following Me, as they do who court the scribes and Pharisees. Come, and see what you must count upon if you follow Me.' See Matt. 8: 20. (2.)

Verse 33.

Where dwellest Thou? 'By calling Jesus "Master," [i.e. teacher] they plainly intimate the purpose of their visit; and by this question they hint a wish to have some private and uninterrupted converse with Him.'

'They desired to be as it were, his "esoteric" disciples, and to be instructed more perfectly in the great doctrines which then occupied the attention of the reflecting part of the Jews.'

Verse 39.

Come and see. 'This is a formula frequent among the rabbinical writers, when they require singular attention to any thing of moment, which needs explanation, &c.'

'It may here, however, be taken in the physical sense.'

About the tenth hour. 'That was, two hours before night.'

This narration may seem at variance with Matt. 4: 18. seq. and and of private personal converse. They heard him speak of Christ as the Lamb of God, that takes away the sin of the world, and that made them follow Him. Note, The strongest and most prevailing argument with an awakened soul to follow Christ, is, that it is He, and He only, that takes away sin.

They came behind Him; but He soon turned, and saw them following. Note, Christ takes cognizance of the first motions of a soul toward Him, and the first step in the way to heaven; see Isa. 64: 5. Luke 15: 20. He did not stay for them to speak, but spake first. What communion there is between a soul and Christ! It is He that begins the discourse. He saith unto them, What seek ye? This was not a reprimand for their boldness; He that came to seek us, never checked any for seeking Him; it is a kind invitation of them to his acquaintance; What is your petition? What is your request? Note, They whose business it is to instruct people in the affairs of their souls, should be humble, and easy of access, and should encourage those that apply to them. This question we should all put to ourselves when we begin to follow Christ, and profess religion; 'What seek ye? What do we design and desire? Those that follow Christ, yet seek the world or the praise of men, deceive themselves. 'What seek ye in seeking Christ, a Teacher, Ruler, and Reconciler? In following Christ, do we seek the favor of God and eternal life? If our eye be single in this, we are full of light.'

Rabbi, where dwellest thou? (1.) In calling him Rabbi, they intimate their desire to be taught by Him; rabbi signifies master, a teaching master; the Jews called their learned men, rabbis. Never was there such a rabbi as Jesus, in whom were hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge. They came to Christ, to be his scholars, so must all that apply to Him. John had told them that He was the Lamb of God; now this Lamb is worthy to take the book, and open the seals, Rev. 5: 9. And unless we give up ourselves to be ruled and taught by Him, He will not take away our sins. In asking where He dwelt, they intimate a desire to be better acquainted with Him. Christ was a stranger in this country, so that they mean, where was his inn where He lodged, for there they would attend Him at some time when He should appoint, to receive instruction from Him. Civility and good manners well become those who follow Christ. And besides, they hoped to have more from Him than they could have in a short conference by the way. They resolved to make a business of conversing with Christ. Those that have had some communion with Christ, cannot but desire, [1.] A further communion with Him; they follow on to know more of Him. [2.] A fixed communion with Him; where they might sit down at his feet, and abide by his instructions. It is not enough to take a turn with Christ now and then, but we must dwell with Him.

He invites them to come and without delay. They asked Him where he lodged, that they might wait upon Him at a more convenient season; but Christ invites them immediately to come, and see; never in better time than now. Hence learn, [1.] As to others, that it is best taking people when they are in a good mind; [2.] As to ourselves, it is wisdom to embrace the present opportunities; Now is the accepted time, 2 Cor. 6: 2.

They came, and saw where He dwelt, and abode with Him that day. It had been more modesty than had done them good if they had refused this offer. They readily went with Him; They came, and saw where He dwelt. Gracious souls cheerfully accept Christ's gracious invitations; as David, Ps. 27: 8. They inquired not how they might be accommodated with Him, but would venture, and make the best of what they found. It is good being where Christ is, wherever it be. They were so well pleased with what they found, that they abode with Him that day; 'Master, it is good to be here;' and He bid them welcome. It was about the tenth hour. Some think that John reckons according to Roman time, and that it was about ten o'clock in the morning; others think that John reckons as the other evangelists did, according to Jewish time, and that it was four o'clock in the afternoon, and they abode with Him till the next day. Lightfoot conjectures that this next day that they spent with Christ was sabbath, and, it being late, they could not get home before the sabbath. As it is our duty, wherever we are, to contrive to spend the sabbath to our spiritual benefit and advantage; so they are blessed, who, by exercises of faith, love, and devotion, spend their sabbaths in communion with Christ. These are Lord's days indeed, days of the Son of man. Andrew brought his brother Peter to Christ. If Peter had been the first-born of Christ's disciples, the Papists would have made a noise with it: he did indeed afterward come to be more eminent in gifts, but Andrew had the honor first to be acquainted with Christ, and to be the instrument of bringing Peter to Him.

He first finds his own brother Simon; his finding implies his seeking him. Simon came with Andrew, to attend John's ministry and baptism, and Andrew knew where to look for him. Perhaps the other disciple that was with him, went out to seek some friend of his at the same time, but Andrew sped first; He first findeth Simon, who came only to attend on John, but has his expectations out-done; he meets with Jesus.

He told him whom they had found; We have found the Messias. Observe, He speaks humbly; not, 'I have found,' assuming the honor of the discovery to himself, but 'We have,' rejoicing that he had shared with others in it. He speaks exultingly, and with triumph; We have found that pearl of great price; and, having found it, he proclaims it as those lepers, (2 Kings 7: 9.) for he knows that he shall have never the less in Christ for others' sharing. He speaks intelligently; We have found the Messias, which was more than had yet been said. John had said, He is the Lamb of God, and the Son of God, which Andrew compares with the Old Testament, and comparing them together, concludes that He is the Messias promised to the fathers, for now the fulness of time is come. Thus, by making God's testimonies his meditation, Luke 5: 1. seq.; but, in fact, there is no discrepancy. For what John relates happened at quite different times to what Matthew and Luke record. Andrew brought his brother Simon to Jesus in Judea; for on the following day Jesus departed into Galilee. v. 44. But Jesus called both as he was walking by the sea of Galilee. Matt. 4: 18. compared with Luke 6. When Jesus called Andrew and Simon, John had been already thrown into prison. Matt. 4: 12, 18. Mark 1: 14, 16. But after the story here narrated by John, Jesus departed from Judea into Galilee, (v. 44.) and from Galilee returned to Jerusalem, in order to celebrate the Passover, (ch. 2: 13.) while John was yet alive and teaching without molestation. ch. 3: 24. We may therefore suppose that Andrew, Peter, and some others, for a time continued under the instruction of Jesus, but exercised (for a livelihood) their trade of fishing; and it was not till they had been expressly and formally called, that they attended on Him as his constant companions. When Christ imposes on Simon a new surname, namely, Peter, (rock), He shows that He is perfectly well acquainted with his disposition and manners.

Acts 9: 36. Tabitha, which by interpretation is called Dorcas; the former Hebrew, the latter Greek, for a young roe. Peter's natural temper was stiff, and resolute, which I take to be the principal reason why Christ called him Cephas. When Christ afterward prayed for him, that his faith might not fail, that so he might be firm to Christ himself, and at the same time bid him strengthen his brethren, then He made him what He here called him. Those that come to Christ, must come with a fixed resolution to be firm and constant, like a stone, solid and steadfast; and it is by his grace that they are so. His saying, Be thou steady, makes them so. This no more proves that Peter was the only rock upon which the church is built, than the calling of James and John, Boanerges, proves them the only sons of thunder, or the calling of Joseph, Barnabas, proves him the only son of consolation.

V. 43-51. We have here the call of Philip and Nathanael.

Philip was called by Christ himself; not as Andrew, who was directed to Christ, by John, or Peter, who was invited by his brother. God has various methods of bringing his chosen ones to Himself. But, whatever means He uses He is not tied to any.

Philip was called in a preventing way; Jesus findeth Philip. Christ sought and found us, before we made any inquiries after Him. The name Philip is of Greek origin, much used among the Gentiles, an instance of the degeneracy of the Jewish church at this time, and their conformity to the nations; yet Christ changed not his name.

He was called the day following. See how closely Christ applied himself to his business. When work is to be done for God, we must not lose a day. Yet observe, Christ now called one or two a day; but, after the Spirit was poured out, there were thousands a day effectually called, in which was fulfilled ch. 14: 12. 'and greater works shall he do.' &c.

Jesus would go forth into Galilee, to call him. Christ will find out all those that are given Him, and none of them shall be lost.

Philip was brought to be a disciple by the power of Christ going with the word, Follow me. See the nature of true Christianity; it is following tion, he speaks more clearly concerning Christ than ever his teacher had done, Ps. 119: 99.

He brought him to Jesus; would not undertake to instruct him himself, but brought him to the Fountain-head. Now this was an instance of true love to his own brother, so he is called here, because he was very dear to him. Note, We ought particularly to endeavor the spiritual welfare of those that are related to us; for their relation to us adds both to the obligation and to the opportunity of doing good to their souls. It was an effect of his conversation with Christ. Note, The best evidence of our profiting by the means of grace is, the usefulness of our conversation afterward. Hereby it appeared that Andrew had been with Jesus, that he was full of Him; he had been in the mount, for his face shone. He knew there was enough in Christ for all; and, having tasted that He is gracious, could not rest till those he loved had tasted it too. Note, True grace hates monopolies, and loves not to eat its morsels alone.

Peter was never the less welcome for being influenced by his brother to come, v. 42. Christ called him by his name; When Jesus beheld him, he said, Thou art Simon, the son of Jona. It would seem that Peter was a stranger to Christ, and if so, it was a proof of Christ's omniscience, that, without inquiry, He could see the name both of him and of his father. The Lord knows them that are his. It was an instance of condescension, that He did thus affably call him by name, though of mean extraction, and an obscure man. It was an instance of God's favor to Moses, that He knew him by name, Exod. 33: 17. Some observe the signification of these names, Simon—obedient, Jona—a dove. An obedient, dove-like spirit qualifies us to be disciples of Christ.

His giving him a name, speaks Christ's favor to him. A new name speaks some great dignity, Rev. 2: 17. Isa. 62: 2. By this Christ not only wiped off the reproach of his mean parentage, but adopted him into his family.

The name which He gave him, speaks his fidelity to Christ. Thou shalt be called Cephas, which is Hebrew for a stone; which is by interpretation Peter; so it should be rendered, as by interpretation is called Dorcas; the former Hebrew, the latter Greek, for a young roe. Peter's natural temper was stiff, and resolute, which I take to be the principal reason why Christ called him Cephas. When Christ afterward prayed for him, that his faith might not fail, that so he might be firm to Christ himself, and at the same time bid him strengthen his brethren, then He made him what He here called him. Those that come to Christ, must come with a fixed resolution to be firm and constant, like a stone, solid and steadfast; and it is by his grace that they are so. His saying, Be thou steady, makes them so. This no more proves that Peter was the only rock upon which the church is built, than the calling of James and John, Boanerges, proves them the only sons of thunder, or the calling of Joseph, Barnabas, proves him the only son of consolation.

V. 43-51. We have here the call of Philip and Nathanael.

Philip was called by Christ himself; not as Andrew, who was directed to Christ, by John, or Peter, who was invited by his brother. God has various methods of bringing his chosen ones to Himself. But, whatever means He uses He is not tied to any.

Philip was called in a preventing way; Jesus findeth Philip. Christ sought and found us, before we made any inquiries after Him. The name Philip is of Greek origin, much used among the Gentiles, an instance of the degeneracy of the Jewish church at this time, and their conformity to the nations; yet Christ changed not his name.

He was called the day following. See how closely Christ applied himself to his business. When work is to be done for God, we must not lose a day. Yet observe, Christ now called one or two a day; but, after the Spirit was poured out, there were thousands a day effectually called, in which was fulfilled ch. 14: 12. 'and greater works shall he do.' &c.

Jesus would go forth into Galilee, to call him. Christ will find out all those that are given Him, and none of them shall be lost.

Philip was brought to be a disciple by the power of Christ going with the word, Follow me. See the nature of true Christianity; it is following Christ, attending his motions and treading in his steps. The grace of Christ makes the call of his word prevail; it is the rod of his strength.

Philip, Andrew and Peter were of Bethsaida, v. 44. They received not their honor from, but reflected honor upon the place of their nativity. Bethsaida signifies the house of nets, because inhabited mostly by fishermen; thence Christ chose disciples, who, furnished with extraordinary gifts, needed not the ordinary advantages of learning. Bethsaida was a wicked place, (Matt. 11: 21.) yet even there was a remnant, according to the election of grace.

In what passed between Philip and Nathanael, there appears a mixture of pious zeal with weakness, such as is found in those that are yet but asking the way to Zion.

As Andrew before, so Philip here, having got some knowledge of Christ, rests not till he has made manifest the savor of that knowledge. Philip, though newly acquainted with Christ, steps aside to seek Nathanael. Note, When we have opportunities of getting good, even then we must seek opportunities of doing good to others; remembering the words of Christ, It is more blessed to give than to receive, Acts 20: 35. O, saith Philip, we have found Him of whom Moses and the prophets did write.

What transport Philip was in, upon this new acquaintance with Christ; 'We have found Him whom we have so often talked of, so long wished and waited for; at last, He is come, He is come!' What an advantage it was to him, that he was so well acquainted with the Old Testament, which prepared his mind for the reception of evangelical light. What was written from eternity in the book of the divine counsels was, in part, copied into the book of revelations. Glorious things were written there concerning the Seed of the woman, the Seed of Abraham, Shiloh, the Prophet like Moses, the Son of David, Emmanuel, the Man, the Branch, Messiah, the Prince. Philip had studied these things, and was full of them, which made him readily welcome Christ. He called Christ, Jesus of Nazareth, whereas He was of Bethlehem; and the Son of Joseph, whereas he was but his supposed Son. Young beginners in religion are subject to mistakes, which time and the grace of God will rectify. It was his weakness to say, We have found Him, for Christ found them before they found Christ. He did not yet apprehend, as Paul did, how he was apprehended of Christ Jesus, Phil. 3: 12.

Can there any good come out of Nazareth? Nathanael's caution was commendable; he did not lightly assent to every thing, but took it into examination; our rule is, Prove all things. But his objection arose from ignorance. If he meant that no good thing could come out of Nazareth, it was owing to his ignorance of divine grace, as if that were less affected to one place than another, or tied itself to men's foolish and ill-natured observations. If he meant that the Messiah could not come out of Nazareth, so far he was right; (Moses, in the law, said that he should come out of Judah, and the prophets had assigned Bethlehem for the place of his nativity;) but then he was ignorant of the matter of fact, that Jesus was born at Bethlehem; so that the blunder Philip made, in calling Him Jesus of Nazareth, occasioned this objection. Note, The mistakes of preachers often give rise to the prejudices of hearers.

The short reply Philip gave to this objection, was, Come and see. [1.] It was his weakness, that he could not give a satisfactory answer to it; yet it is the common case of beginners in religion. We may know enough to satisfy our-

We have found the Messiah! [The testimony of John the Baptist and the conversation of Jesus Himself had, it seems, completely convinced Andrew that Jesus was the Messiah.]

(43.) Galilee.] The name of a region of country, which in the time of Christ included all the northern part of Palestine lying between the Jordan and Mediterranean, and between Samaria and Phenicia. It was a happy, says Calmet, varied in its limits.

Verse 44. Bethsaida of Galilee was situated on the western shore of the lake of Genesareth, a little south of Capernaum.

Verses 47-49. [Which divine knowledge can be lodged in a no meaner person.] Just thus the woman of Samaria argued, (John 4: 23.) "Come see a man which told me all things that ever I did: is not this the Christ?" which plainly intimates that they supposed the Messiah would be endowed with the most perfect knowledge, and have the gift of prophecy in the highest degree.

(47.) The Nazarenes, nay indeed all the Galileans, were held in as little contempt by the Jews; the cause for which may be attributed to their being a mixed race, partly of Gentile origin, and contaminated with many vices. They were reckoned boorish and stupid, even to a proverb. No wonder then that it should have produced no good prophets or teachers. Hence in ch. 7: 52. it is said, "No prophet is arisen from Galilee." BLOOMFIELD.

self, and yet not be able to say enough to silence cavils. [2.] It was wise, that, when he could not answer the objection, he would have him go to one that could. Let us not argue, and raise difficulties, which we cannot get over; but go, and converse with Christ, and these difficulties will vanish. Note, It is folly to spend time in dispute, which might be spent to better purpose, in piety and devotion. Not, Go, and see, but, Come, and I will go with thee; as Isa. 2:3. Jer. 50:5. From Philip and Nathanael, we may learn, First, That many are kept from religion by unreasonable prejudices against religion upon the account of some foreign circumstances which do not touch the merits of the cause. Secondly, The best way to remove the prejudices they have entertained against religion, is, for themselves, to make trial of it. Let us not answer this matter before we hear it.

Nathanael came, and saw not in vain.

Our Lord bore honorable testimony to Nathanael's integrity; Jesus saw him coming, and met him with encouragement; He said to those about Him, Nathanael himself being within hearing, Behold an Israelite indeed. Observe,

That He commended him; not to puff him up, but perhaps because He knew him to be a modest man, if not a melancholy man, one that had mean thoughts of himself, was ready to doubt his own sincerity, and Christ by his testimony put the matter out of doubt. Nathanael had, more than any, objected against Christ; but Christ showed that He excused it, and was not extreme to mark what he said amiss, because He knew his heart was upright. He did not retort upon him, Can any good thing come out of Cana, (ch. 21: 2.) an obscure town in Galilee? but kindly gives him this character, to encourage us to hope for acceptance, notwithstanding our weakness, and to teach us to speak honorably of those who without cause have spoken lightly of us, and to give them due praise.

He commended him for his integrity.

Behold an Israelite indeed. Christ knows what men are indeed; we can but hope the best. The whole nation were Israelites in name, but all are not Israel that are of Israel; (Rom. 9: 6.) here, however, was an Israelite indeed. 1.

A sincere follower of Israel, who was a plain man, in opposition to Esau, a cunning man. He was a genuine son of honest Jacob, not only of his seed, but of his spirit. 2. A sincere professor of the faith of Israel; he was true to the religion he professed; he was as good as he seemed, and his practice of a piece with his profession. He is the Jew, that is one inwardly; (Rom. 2: 29.) so is he the Christian.

He is one in whom is no guile—that is the character of an Israelite indeed, a Christian indeed; no guile toward men; a man without trick or design; a man that one may trust; no guile toward God, sincere in his repentance for sin; sincere in covenanting with God, Ps. 32: 2. Not without guile, but, without guile. Though in many things foolish and forgetful, yet in nothing false, nor wickedly departing from God: there is no allowed guile in him; not painted, though he have his spots. Behold this Israelite indeed. 1. 'Take notice of him, that you may learn his way, and do like him.'

2. 'Admire him; behold and wonder.' Hypocrites had so leavened the Jewish church and nation, and their religion was so formal, or from state policy, that an Israelite indeed was a man wondered at; a miracle of divine grace, like Job, ch. 1: 8.

Nathanael was much surprised; upon which, Christ gives him further proof of his omniscience, and a kind memorial of his former devotion.

Here is Nathanael's modesty at the kind notice Christ was pleased to take of him; 'Whence knowest thou me, unworthy of thy cognizance; who am I, O Lord God?' 2 Sam. 7: 18. This was an evidence of his sincerity, that he did not catch at praise, but declined it. Christ knows us better than we know ourselves; we know not what is in man's heart by looking in his face, but all things are naked and open before Christ, Heb. 4: 12, 13. Doth Christ know us? Let us covet to know Him.

Christ further manifests Himself to him; Before Philip called thee, I saw thee.

He tells him that He knew him, and so manifest his divinity. It is God's prerogative infallibly to know all persons and things; by this, Christ proved Himself to be God upon many occasions. It was prophesied concerning the Messiah that He should be of quick understanding in the fear of the Lord, that is, in judging the sincerity and degree of the fear of God in others, and that He should not judge after the sight of his eyes, Isa. 11: 2, 3. How He answers that prediction. See 2 Tim. 2: 19.

Before Philip called him, He saw him under the fig-tree; this manifests particular kindness for him. His eye was toward him before Philip called him, which was the first time that ever Nathanael was acquainted with Christ. Christ has knowledge of us before we have any knowledge of Him: see Isa. 45: 4. Gal. 4: 9. This was a private token which nobody understood but Nathanael. When thou wast retired under the fig-tree in thy garden, and thought that no eye saw thee, I saw thee. It is most probable that Nathanael was employed, as Isaac in the field, in meditation, and prayer. Perhaps then and there it was that he solemnly joined himself to the Lord in covenant. Christ saw in secret, and by this public notice of it did in part reward him openly. Sitting under the fig-tree notes a quiet and composed spirit, which much befriends communion with God. See Mic. 4: 4. Zech. 3: 10. Nathanael herein was an Israelite indeed, that, like Israel, he wrestled with God alone, (Gen. 32: 24.) not like the hypocrites, in the corners of the streets.

Nathanael hereby obtained a full assurance of faith in Christ, expressed in that noble acknowledgment, (v. 49.) Rabbi, thou art the Son of God, thou art the King of Israel: that is, in short, the true Messiah.

He 'believed with the heart.' Though he had lately labored under some prejudices concerning Christ, they were now vanished. Now, the grace of God, in working faith, casts down imaginations. Now he asks not, Can any good come out of Nazareth? for he believes Jesus of Nazareth to be the Chief Good, and embraces Him accordingly.

He 'confessed with the mouth.' His confession is in form of an adoration, directed to our Lord himself; which is a proper way of confessing our faith. First, He confesses Christ's prophetic office, in calling Him Rabbi, a title which the Jews commonly gave their teachers. Christ is the great Rabbi, at whose feet we must all be brought up. Secondly, He confesses his divine nature and mission, in calling Him the Son of God; (Ps. 2: 7.) though He had but a human form, yet, having a divine knowledge of the heart, and of things distant and secret, from thence he concludes Him to be the Son of God. Thirdly, He confesses, 'Thou art the (13.) Fig-tree. 'On account of the thick-spreading branches and broad leaves of the fig-tree, which in warm eastern countries, grows much larger and stronger than with us, it was very suitable for the purpose of overshadowing those who sat under it.' Hasselquist. That conversation, meditation, reading, prayer, &c. was carried on under fig-trees is certain from the numerous examples produced from the rabbinical writers by Lightfoot and Schoettgen. 'Hence it is probable that Nathanael was engaged in prayer or pious meditation, perhaps in religious conversation with Philip respecting the promised Messiah.' Bloomfield.

Verse 51.

Many commentators take the words of this verse, in their literal and proper signification, of angelic ministrations, and refer to Matt. 4: 11. Luke 22: 43. But as to the former passage, the temptation in the desert was a thing then past; and as to the other passage, it is observed that Christ here speaks not of what would happen once or rarely, but frequently and perpetually. It therefore seems clear, that the words must be taken improperly, and understood tropically. The ministry of angels (for the Hebrews, says Rosenm. referred all the interpretations of Providence, and all unforeseen events to invisible authors, to spirits, whose ministry God used in effecting his purposes,) indicates divine providence, and God is said to send his angels to those whom He supports with his assistance, or defends by his providential interposition. See Ps. 34: 8. 91: 11, 12. We must however, understand not merely the providence of God to be evinced in the defence of Christ, but especially the testimony to his divine mission to be borne by miracles. The sense, therefore, may be thus expressed: 'You will see me enjoy the especial providence and signal defence of the Almighty; you will see far greater works than this, even mighty miracles wrought by Me; so as to leave no doubt of my Messiahship.' Thus Morus, Rosenm., and others. Quinod, however, explains it of the presence of angels, to bring messages and impart assistance and protection; and he thinks the sense of the words (after laying aside the imagery) may be this: 'It will be manifest to all, that there exists the closest connection between Me and the Deity. The commands of God will aid Me in delivering and propagating the divine doctrine. God will succor Me with his assistance, and both by doctrines and mighty deeds I shall prove Myself to be the Messiah.'

This is introduced with a solemn preface, Verily, verily. This commands a fixed attention to what is said as very weighty, and a full assent to it, as undoubtedly true; 'I say it, whose word you may rely upon, amen, amen.' None used this word at the beginning of a sentence but Christ, though the Jews often used it at the close of a prayer, and sometimes doubted it. It is a solemn asseveration. Christ is called the Amen. (Rev. 3: 14.) and so some take it here, I the Amen, the Amen, say unto you. I the faithful Witness. Christ assures them that hereafter, or ere long, or from henceforth, ye shall see heaven opened.

It is a mean title that Christ here takes to Himself; the Son of man; a title frequently applied to Him in the Gospel, but always by Himself. Nathanael had called Him the Son of God, and King of Israel: He calls Himself Son of man, (1.) To express his humility. (2.) To teach his humanity. (3.) To intimate his state of humiliation, that Nathanael might not expect this King of Israel in external pomp.

Yet they are great things here foretold; Ye shall see heaven opened, and the angels of God ascending and descending upon the Son of man.

1. Some understand it literally, as of some particular event. Either there was some vision of Christ's glory, in which this was fulfilled, of which Nathanael was an eye-witness, as Peter and James and John were of his transfiguration. There were many things which Christ did, and those in the presence of His disciples, which were not written; (ch. 20: 30.) why not that? Or, (2.) It was fulfilled in the ministrations of angels to Jesus, especially at His ascension, when heaven was open to receive Him, and the angels ascended and descended, to do Him honor, in the sight of the disciples. Christ's ascension was the great proof of His mission, and much confirmed the faith of His disciples, ch. 6: 6, 7. Or, (3.) It may refer to Christ's second coming, to judge the world, when the heavens shall be open, and every eye shall see Him, and the angels of God shall ascend and descend as attendants on Him, every one employed; and a busy day it will be. See 2 Thess. 1: 10.

2. Others take it as speaking of a state of things to commence from henceforth; we may understand it, (1.) Of Christ's miracles. Nathanael believ-

King of Israel, whom we have been waiting for.' If He be the Son of God, He is King of the Israel of God. Nathanael hereby proves himself an Israelite indeed, that he so readily owns and submits to the King of Israel.

Christ hereupon raises the expectations of Nathanael, v. 50, 51. Christ is very tender of young converts, and will encourage good beginnings, though weak, Matt. 12: 20.

He here signifies His acceptance, and (it would seem) His admiration, of the ready faith of Nathanael; Because I said, I saw thee under the fig-tree, believest thou? That such a small indication of Christ's divine knowledge should have such an effect, was a sign that Nathanael's heart was prepared beforehand. Note, It is much for the honor of Christ, when the heart is surrendered at the first summons.

He promises him greater helps to confirm and increase his faith, than he had had for the first production of it.

First, 'Thou shalt see stronger proofs of my being the Messiah;' his miracles and resurrection maketh good use of what he hath, more shall be given. 2. Those who truly believe the Gospel, will find its evidences grow upon them, and will see more and more cause to believe it. 3. Whatever discoveries Christ is pleased to make of Himself to His people while they are here in this world, He hath still greater things than these to make known to them; a glory yet further to be revealed.

See 2 Thess. 1: 10.

ed, because Christ could tell him things secret but what is this? Christ is now beginning a dispensation of miracles, much more strange, as if heaven were opened; and such a power shall be exerted by the Son of man, as if angels were continually attending his orders. Immediately after this, Christ began to work miracles, ch. 2: 11. Or, (2.) Of his mediation, and that intercourse which He had settled between heaven and earth, of which his disciples should by degrees be let into the mystery [1.] By Christ, as Mediator, they shall see heaven opened, that we may enter into the holiest by His blood; (Heb. 10: 19, 20.) heaven opened, that by faith we may look in, and at length go in; may now behold the glory, and hereafter enter into the joy of our Lord. And, [2.] They shall see angels ascending and descending upon the Son of man. Through Christ we have communion with, and benefit by, the holy angels, and things in heaven and things on earth are reconciled and gathered together. Christ is to us as Jacob's ladder, (Gen. 28: 12.) by whom angels continually ascend and descend for the good of the saints.

CHAP. II. v. 1-11. There were some so well disposed as to believe in Christ, and to follow Him when He did no miracle; yet it was not likely that many would be wrought upon till He had something wherewith to answer those that asked, What sign showest Thou? He could have wrought miracles before, could have made them the common actions of his life and the common entertainments of his friends; but miracles being designed for the seals of his doctrine, He began not to work any till He began to preach his doctrine.

It is to the honor of Moses, that all the signs he did in the wilderness, he did upon necessity; so did Christ.

The third day after He came into Galilee. The evangelist keeps a journal of occurrences, for no day passed without something extraordinary. Our Master filled up his time better than his servants, and never lay down at night complaining, as the Roman emperor, that He had lost a day.

Cana in Galilee was in the tribe of Asher, (Josh. 19: 23.) of which it was said, he shall yield royal dainties, Gen. 49: 20. Christ began to work miracles in an obscure corner of the country, remote from Jerusalem, to show that He sought not honor from men, (ch. 5: 41.) but would honor the lowly. His doctrine and miracles would not be so much opposed by the plain, honest Galileans, as by the proud and prejudiced at Jerusalem.

The occasion itself was a marriage; probably one or both of the parties were akin to our Lord. The mother of Jesus is said to be there and not to be called, as Jesus and his disciples were, which intimates that she was there as one at home. Christ graced the solemnity, not only with his presence, but with his first mira-

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 35-51. The ministers of Christ must never desire to make disciples to themselves: inquirers must hearken to those who direct them to 'the Lamb of God,' and distinguish them from all others; and they, who have known Him, should recommend Him to others; that thus each believer may bring his friend, and so, these exertions combining to draw attention to the testimony of ministers, the light may diffuse itself widely, in cities and countries.—All who desire to profit by the word of God, must beware of prejudices against places or denominations, from which even Christians are by no means exempt: they should come and examine for themselves; and then perhaps they will find good where they expected none.—Let us seek and pray to be Israelites indeed, in whom there is no guile; true Christians approved of Christ. Defects and infirmities are found in all; but hypocrisy and guile belong not to a believer. He does not profess one thing, and think another: he is not a double-minded man; allows nothing before God which he disavows before men, pretends to nothing before men, which God knows that he does not aim to perform. He is consciously, as well as by confession, a sinner, who has no hope of deliverance but through Christ; and while he seeks free salvation, he earnestly endeavors to lead a godly life, and is continually abased before God, because he 'cannot do the things that he would.' He 'who seeth in secret' observes and approves this disposition, and hears the supplications which it dictates. He marks the humble believer, when beseeching Him to teach him, and He will evince that He accepts such petitions. Thus the believer obtains 'the witness in himself,' that 'Jesus is the Son of God, and the King of Israel;' and he will attain continually to fuller discoveries of his glory, and larger communications from Him, till he learns to 'love his appearing.'

NOTES.

CHAP. II. v. 1-5. There is not the least disrespect in the word, woman; the greatest princesses were accosted, even by their own servants in the same manner among the ancients; and He afterwards used it, when speaking from the cross with the most endeared affection and tenderness. (Note, 19: 25-27.) The occasion on which this miracle was wrought, the miracle itself, and this answer of our Lord to Mary, seem to have been expressly intended, as a prophetic protest against the superstitions and idolatries of the church of Rome; especially against two leading branches of that system, namely, the prohibiting of marriage, and the worship of the virgin Mary. Even to this day, there are very large multitudes who call on her, not to beseech, but to command, her Son, now that He fills the throne of glory; though on earth, He would not allow her even to counsel Him.

heaven for Him, and He will come; Thou shalt call, and I will answer. And He will turn the water into wine.

The five disciples also were invited, for as yet He had no more: they were his family, and were invited with Him. They had thrown themselves upon his care, and they soon find though He had no wealth, He had friends. Note, [1.] Those that follow Christ, shall feast with Him: they shall fare as He fares; (ch. 12: 26.) Where I am, there shall my servant be. [2.] Love to Christ is testified by a love to those that are his, for his sake; our goodness extendeth not to Him, but to the saints. Calvin observes how generous the maker of the feast was, though he seems to be but of small substance, to invite four or five strangers because they were followers of Christ, which shows, saith he, there is more liberality, and true friendship, in some meaner persons than among many of higher rank.

They wanted wine, v. 3. (1.) There was want at a feast; though much was provided, yet all was spent. In this world, we sometimes find ourselves in straits, even when we think ourselves in the fullness of our sufficiency. If always spending, perhaps all is spent ere we are aware. (2.) There was want at a marriage-feast. Note, They who being married, are come to care for the things of the world, must expect trouble in the flesh, and disappointment. (3.) There was more company than they expected when the provision was made; but they who straiten themselves for Christ, shall not lose by Him.

The mother of Jesus saith unto Him, They have no wine. Some think that she did not expect from Him a miraculous supply. (He having as yet wrought no miracle,) but that she would have Him make excuse to the company, and save the bridegroom's reputation, or make up the want of wine with holy, profitable discourse. But, most probably, she looked for a miracle, for she knew He was the great Prophet, like unto Moses, who so often supplied the wants of Israel; and though this was his first public miracle, perhaps He had sometimes relieved her and her husband in their low estate. The bridegroom might have sent out for more wine, but she was for going to the Fountain-head. Note, [1.] We ought to be concerned for the wants of our friends, and not seek our own things only. [2.] In our own and our friends' straits, it is wisdom and duty to apply to Christ. [3.] We must not prescribe to Him, but humbly spread our case before Him, for Him to do as He pleases.

on the descent of a hill, about sixteen miles north-west of Tiberias, and six north-east of Nazareth, facing the south-west, with a copious spring, surrounded with plantations of olive and other fruit trees; and contains about three hundred inhabitants, chiefly Catholic Christians.' CALMET, &c.

'Most of Christ's disciples,' says Bloomfield, 'had before been followers of John the Baptist, who himself had led an ascetic life, abstaining from wine, animal food, &c. and recommended the same to his disciples. (See Matt. 3:4—11. Luke 7:33. Matt. 9:14.) But this austerity of diet formed no part of Christ's doctrine, nor ought ever to have been engrained upon it. (See Matt. 9:16. Col. 2:16. 1 Tim. 4:3.) Christ therefore meant by this miracle to indicate an important truth: "His social and obliging temper," says Doddridge, 'should sweeten ours, and be a lesson to his followers, that they avoid every thing sour and morose, and do not censure others for innocent liberties, at proper seasons of festivity and joy.'

(2.) 'At nuptial feasts there were guests of two sorts: 1st, those who had been invited; secondly, others who came of their own accord, and who were expected to bring presents. Lightfoot, That Jewish nuptial feasts sometimes continued seven or eight days, appears from Gen. 29:27. Judg. 14:14. What is here related of the wine failing short may therefore be understood of the fifth, sixth, or seventh day: for it is scarcely probable that such a deficiency should have occurred much earlier. It seems to have been occasioned by the unexpected arrival of Jesus and his disciples: Jesus being invited as being in the neighborhood; probably not as a prophet, but as a countryman, relation, and acquaintance.'

BROOMFIELD.

He reprimanded her for it, for He saw more amiss in it than we do, else He had not treated it thus.

Woman, what have I to do with thee? As many as Christ loves, He rebukes and chastens. He calls her Woman, not Mother. When we begin to be assuming, we should be minded that we are men and women, frail and foolish. The question might read, What is that to Me and thee? What is it to us if they do want? But it is always used as we render it. What have I to do with thee? as Judges 11:12. 2 Sam. 16 10. Ezra 4:3. Matt. 8:29. It therefore he speaks a resentment, yet not at all inconsistent with reverence and subjection to his mother according to the fifth commandment; (Luke 2:51.) for there was a time when it was Levi's praise, that he said to his father, I have not known him, Deut. 32:2. This was intended to be, First, a check to his mother for interposing in a matter which was the act of his God-head, which had no dependence on her, and of which she was not the mother. Though, as man, He was David's Son, and hers; yet, as God, He was David's Lord, and hers, and He would have her know it. The greatest advancements must not make us forget ourselves and our place, nor the familiarity which the covenant of grace admits us to, breed contempt, or any presumption. Secondly, It was an instruction to others of his relations present, that they must never expect Him to have any regard to his kindred in working miracles, or that therein He should gratify them, who, in this matter were no more to Him than other people. In the things of God, we must not know faces. Thirdly, It is a testimony against that idolatry which He foresaw his church would in after-ages sink into, in giving undue honors to the virgin Mary; a crime which the Roman Catholics, as they call themselves, are guilty of, when they call her the queen of heaven, the salvation of the world, their mediatrix, their life and hope; not only depending upon her intercession, but beseeching her to command her Son to do them good; Show that thou art his mother; lay thy maternal commands on the Savior. Does He not here expressly say, when his mother did but tacitly hint an intercession, Woman, what have I to do with thee? This was plainly designed either to prevent or aggravate such gross idolatry, such horrid blasphemy. The Son of God is our Advocate with the Father; but the mother of our Lord was never designed to be our advocate with the Son.

Mine hour is not yet come. For every thing Christ had his hour, the fixed, and the fittest time, which was punctually observed. First, 'Mine hour for working miracles is not yet come.' Yet He wrought this before the hour, because it would confirm the faith of his infant disciples, v. 11. Secondly, 'Mine hour of working miracles openly is not yet come.' Thirdly, Is not the hour of my exemption from thine authority yet come, now that I have begun to act as a Prophet? Fourthly, 'Mine hour for working this miracle is not yet come.' His

(3.) They have no wine. 'As to the motive which influenced the mother of Jesus, Euthymius suggests that she might wish to confer an obligation on the new-married couple, and acquire celebrity from her Son's power: for which last less commendable motive she probably received the rebuke contained in the following words.'

(4.) What have I to do with thee? 'The force of all the words of this phrase is modified not only by the occasion, but softened by the tone of voice of the speaker. The formula may be susceptible of a milder interpretation that it usually bears, or would seem to import, according to our ideas and modes of expression; so as to express a mild reproof, and gently to represent, that, in what concerned his office, earthly parents had no authority over Him, though in other respects He had yielded them prompt obedience.'

'It seems to have been intended as a rebuke to Mary; and it was surely expedient that she should know, that Jesus was not, upon such occasions, to be directed by her.'

VERSES 6—11.

It is not agreed how much each of these water-pots contained; but on the lowest computation the six must have held above a hoghead. The servants became unexceptionable witnesses to the reality of the miracle: and, though they had doubtless a variety of other employments on this occasion, and the order might seem ill timed and to no purpose, they obeyed without hesitation. The origin, word, which is rendered 'have well drunk,' is often used for drinking to intoxication, yet learned men have shown that it does not necessarily imply that idea, but merely a moderate exhilaration consistent with temperance.

6 And there were set there six water-pots of stone, after the manner of the purifying of the Jews, containing two or three firkins apiece.

9 When the ruler of the feast had tasted the water that was made wine, and knew not whence it was, (but the servants which drew the water knew,) the governor of the feast called the bridegroom, orders, without asking questions. Conscious of a fault in prescribing to Him, she cautions the servants to take heed of the same fault, and attend both his time and way for supply; 'Whatever He saith unto you, do it, though you may think it ever so improper. If He saith, Give the guests water, when they call for wine, do it. If He saith, Pour out from the bottoms of the vessels that are spent, do it. He can make a few drops of wine so many draughts.' Note, Those that expect Christ's favors, must with an implicit obedience observe his orders. The way of duty is the way to mercy; and Christ's methods must not be objected against.

Christ did at length miraculously supply them: He is often better than his word, but never worse.

The miracle itself was turning water into wine; the substance of water acquiring a new form, and having all the qualities of wine. Such a transformation is a miracle; but the popish transubstantiation, the substance changed, the form and appearance remaining the same, is a monster. By this Christ showed Himself to be the God of nature, who maketh the earth to bring forth wine, Ps. 104: 14, 15. The extracting of the blood of the grape from the earth, is no less a work of power, though, being according to the common law of nature, it is not such a work of wonder, as this. The beginning of Moses' miracles was, turning water into blood; (Exod. 4: 9, ch. 7: 20.) the beginning of Christ's miracles was, turning water into wine; which intimates the difference between the law of Moses and the Gospel. The curse of the law turns water into blood, common comforts into bitterness and terror; the blessing of the Gospel turns water into wine. Christ hereby showed that his errand into the world was to heighten and improve creature-comforts to all believers, and make them comforts indeed. Shiloh is said to wash his garments in wine, (Gen. 49: 11.) the water for washing being turned into wine. And the gospel call is, Come ye to the waters and buy wine, Isa. 55: 1.

The circumstances magnified it, and freed it from all suspicion: for, First, It was done in water-pots, v. 6. There were set there six water-pots of stone. These water-pots were intended for legal purifications from ceremonial pollutions. The Jews cut not, except they wash often, (Mark 7: 3,) and they used much water in their washing, for which reason there were six large water-pots provided. It was a saying among them, He who uses much water in washing, will gain much wealth in this world. Christ put them to a use quite different from what they were intended; to be the receptacles of the miraculous mother moved Him to help them when the wine began to fail; (so it may be read, v. 3.) but his hour was not come till there was a total want; not only to prevent suspicion of mixing wine with the water, but to teach us that man's extremity is God's opportunity for the help and relief of his people. Then his hour is come, when we are reduced to the utmost strait, and know not what to do. This encouraged those that waited for Him, to believe that though his hour was not yet come, it would come. Note, The delays of mercy are not the denials of prayer. At the end it shall speak.

She took the reproof submissively, and did not reply. It is best not to deserve reproof from Christ, but next best to be meek and quiet under it, and to count it a kindness, Ps. 141: 5.

She kept her hope in Christ that He would yet grant her desire. When we come to God in Christ for any mercy, two things discourage us. First, Sense of our own follies and infirmities: 'Surely such imperfect prayers as ours cannot speed.' Secondly, Sense of our Lord's frowns and rebukes. Afflictions are continued, deliverances delayed, and God seems angry at our prayers; this was the case of the mother of our Lord, and yet she encourages herself with hope that He will at length give an answer of peace; to teach us to wrestle with God by faith and fervency in prayer, even when He seems in his providence to walk contrary to us. We must against hope believe in hope, Rom. 4: 18.

wine. Thus Christ came to bring in the grace of the Gospel, which is as wine, that cheereth God and man, (Judg. 9: 13.) instead of the shadows of the law, which were as water, weak and beggarly elements. These were water-pots that had never been used to have wine in them; and as stone, which is not apt to retain the scent of former liquors. They contained two or three firkins apiece; the quantity is uncertain, but very considerable. We may be sure that it was not intended to be all drunk at this feast, but for a further kindness to the new-married couple, as the multiplied oil was to the poor widow, out of which she might pay her debt, and live of the rest, 2 Kings 4: 7. Christ gives like Himself, abundantly, according to his riches in glory. It is the penman's language to say, 'They contained two or three firkins, for the Holy Spirit could have ascertained just how much; thus (ch. 6: 19.) to teach us to speak cautiously of those things whereto we have not good assurance.

The water-pots were filled to the brim. As Moses, the servant of the Lord, when God bid him, went to the rock to draw water; so these servants, when Christ bid them, went to the water, to fetch wine. Note, Since no difficulties can be opposed to God's power, no improbabilities are to be objected against his command.

The miracle was wrought suddenly, and in such a manner as greatly magnified it. As soon as they had filled the water-pots, He said Draw out now; and it was done.

1. Without any ceremony, in the eye of the spectators. One would have thought, as Namaan, He should have come out, and stood and called on the name of God, 2 Kings 5: 11. He sits still in his place, says not a word, but wills the thing, and so works it. Note, Christ does great things and marvellous, without noise, works manifest changes in a hidden way. Sometimes Christ in working miracles, used words and signs, but it was for their sakes that stood by, ch. 11: 47.

2. He did not say, Draw out now, and let me taste it, questioning whether the thing were done; but with the greatest assurance, though it was his first miracle, He recommends it to the master of the feast first. As He knew what He would do, so He knew what He could do, and made no essay in his work, but all was very good, even in the beginning.

Our Lord directed the servants, To draw it out; not to let it alone in the vessel, to be admired. Note, [1.] Christ's works are all for use; He gives no man a talent to be buried. Has He given thee knowledge and grace? It is to profit withal; and therefore, draw out now. [2.] Those that would know Christ, must make trial of Him, use ordinary means, and then may expect extraordinary influences. That which is laid up for all that fear God, is wrought for them that trust in Him, (Ps. 31: 19.) who by the exercise of faith draw out what is laid up.

Some think that this governor of the feast was only the chief guest, that sat at the upper end of the table; but if so, surely Jesus was, upon all accounts, the principal guest; but it seems another had the uppermost room, probably one that forced it, Matt. 23: 6. and Luke 14: 7. And Christ, according to his own rule, and done in the lowest room; but, though He was not treated as the master of the feast, He kindly approved Himself a Friend to the feast and

(Note, Gen. 43: 34.) It may however be further observed, that the words refer to the general management of feasts, and not to any thing which took place on this occasion: where we may be sure, every circumstance was conducted with the utmost regard to temperance and propriety. This was the beginning of Christ's miracles, by which He manifested his glory: an expression never used concerning the miracles of any prophet or apostle, and which could not properly have been used; for they were only instruments, the power being of God and for the display of his glory which belonged to Him alone; but Jesus wrought by his own power, as Emmanuel, and displayed his own glory, as of the only-begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth.' (6.) Purifying, &c.] On the largest computation of the contents of these vessels it must be evident, that they could not supply an efficiency of water, for the immersion of all the guests, on such occasions, as well as for all other purposes of ceremonial and traditional purification; yet these are called baptisms; which is in fact a demonstration, that baptism does not always signify immersion. (Notes, 3: 25, 26, Mark 7: 3, 4, Luke 11: 37, 38.)

It is worthy of note, that walking among the ruins of a church, we saw large massive stone-pots, answering the description given of the ancient vessels of the country, not preserved nor exhibited as religious, but lying about, disregarded by the present inhabitants as antiquities with whose original use they were unacquainted. From their appearance, and the number of them, it was quite evident that a practice of keeping water in large stone-pots, each holding from eighteen to twenty-seven gallons, was once common in the country.

Dr. E. D. CLARK. (8, 9.) Governor, or ruler of the feast.] 'A person appointed to give directions to the servants, and to superintend every thing. It was part of his business to taste the wine, and present a glass to the guests.' CALMET.

the good wine until now; not good wine, he returns the thanks of the table to the bridegroom. She did not know that I gave her corn and wine, Hos. 2: 8.

Christ in providing thus plentifully for the guests, though He hereby allows a sober, cheerful use of wine, especially in times of rejoicing, (Neh. 8: 10.) yet He does not invalidate his own caution in the least, that our hearts be not at any time, no, not at a marriage feast, overcharged with surfeting and drunkenness, Luke 21: 34. When Christ provided so much good wine for them that had well drunk, He intended to try their sobriety, and to teach them how to abound, as well as how to want. Temperance, per force, is a thankless virtue; but if Providence gives us the delights of sense, and grace enables us to use them moderately, this is self-denial that is praise-worthy. He also intended that some should be left to confirm the truth of the miracle, to the faith of others. And we have reason to think that the guests at this table were so well taught, or awed by the presence of Christ, that none of them went to excess. It may be sufficient at any time to fortify us against intemperance, that our meat and drink are God's bounty, and we owe our liberty and comfort in them, to the mediation of Christ; it is therefore ungrateful and impious to abuse them. Secondly, That, wherever we are, Christ has his eye upon us; we should eat bread before God, (Exod. 18: 12.) and then we should not feed our selves without fear.

Here is the method He takes, in dealing with those that deal with Him, viz. to reserve the best for the last, and therefore they must deal upon trust. The recompense of service and suffering is reserved for the other world; it is a

if not its Founder, yet its best Benefactor. Others think that this governor was the monitor of the feast, whose office it was to see that each had enough, and that there were no indecencies or disorders. Note, Feasts have need of governors, because many at feasts have no government of themselves. Some think that this governor was a priest or Levite, that craved a blessing, and gave thanks, and Christ would have the cup brought to him, that he might bless it, and bless God for it: for the tokens of Christ's power were not to supersede the ordinary methods of piety and devotion.

The wine thus provided, was of the best and richest kind, which was acknowledged by the governor of the feast; and that it was really so, and not his fancy, is certain, because He knew not whence it was, 2. 9, 10. It was certain that this was wine. The governor knew that, when he drank it, though he knew not whence it was; the servants knew whence it was, but had not tasted it. If the taster had seen the drawing of it, or the drawers had had the testing of it, something might have been imputed to fancy, but not now. Note, Christ's works commend themselves even to those that know not their Author. The products of miracles were always the best in their kind. This wine had a stronger body, and better flavor, than ordinary. This the governor of the feast takes notice of to the bridegroom, as uncommon. The common method was otherwise. Good wine is brought out to the best advantage at the beginning of a feast, when the guests can relish it, and will commend it; but when they have well drunk, and their appetites are palled, good wine is but thrown away upon them. All the pleasures of sense soon surfeit, but never satisfy; the longer they are enjoyed, the less pleasant they grow. Thou hast kept knowing to whom they were indebted for it.

She did not know that I gave her corn and wine, Hos. 2: 8.

Christ in providing thus plentifully for the guests, though He hereby allows a sober, cheerful use of wine, especially in times of rejoicing, (Neh. 8: 10.) yet He does not invalidate his own caution in the least, that our hearts be not at any time, no, not at a marriage feast, overcharged with surfeting and drunkenness, Luke 21: 34. When Christ provided so much good wine for them that had well drunk, He intended to try their sobriety, and to teach them how to abound, as well as how to want. Temperance, per force, is a thankless virtue; but if Providence gives us the delights of sense, and grace enables us to use them moderately, this is self-denial that is praise-worthy. He also intended that some should be left to confirm the truth of the miracle, to the faith of others. And we have reason to think that the guests at this table were so well taught, or awed by the presence of Christ, that none of them went to excess. It may be sufficient at any time to fortify us against intemperance, that our meat and drink are God's bounty, and we owe our liberty and comfort in them, to the mediation of Christ; it is therefore ungrateful and impious to abuse them. Secondly, That, wherever we are, Christ has his eye upon us; we should eat bread before God, (Exod. 18: 12.) and then we should not feed our selves without fear.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-11. We should always endeavor to insure the divine approbation in our undertakings. 'Marriage is honorable' among all men, and Jesus sanctioned that institution by his first miracle, and presence: yet the believer cannot expect comfort and a blessing, unless he engage in it on such principles, and in such a manner, as may give him confidence in calling on Jesus, so to speak, to attend on it. (Note, Col. 3: 16, 17. v. 16.)—We ought not in any thing to affect superstitious austerity, nor need we scruple to feast with our friends on proper occasions; yet every social interview should be so conducted, that we might invite the Redeemer to join with us, if He were now on earth. He will at all times be present invisibly, to approve or condemn our conduct, and all levity, luxury and excess must be offensive to Him.—If we would have the comfort of his presence, we must entertain his disciples also; and our conversation should be such as they delight in. In this manner we may 'use hospitality without grudging'; and the Lord Himself will not suffer us to want. Having stated our difficulties to Him, and submitted to his wisdom the season and manner of our supply, we shall not long be left unprovided for.

How ready should we be to relieve our needy brethren, and to minister to their comfort; seeing Jesus Himself wrought a miracle to supply wine, on a joyful occasion, for the refreshment of the company!—If we would have blessings from Him, we must unreservedly and promptly follow his directions, even though some of them should seem unnecessary or unreasonable.—What He gives in a special manner to his disciples, is always the best, and his ways are not only unlike those of men, but far superior to them. (Note, Isa. 55: 8, 9.)—Those whom the world feasts have their best wine first; and even while they live, every enjoyment grows more and more insipid; their mirth is soon damped, and death at length removes them to misery and despair: (Note, Luke 16: 24-26.) but they whom Christ entertains at his marriage-supper, have indeed many present comforts, which increase here; but their best wine is kept to the last, and they shall drink it forever new in the kingdom of their Father. In all these things He manifests his glory, and his disciples, who believe in his name, will be excited more and more to honor and obey Him. SCOTT.

Verse 12.
[Marg. Ref.] This preceded John's imprisonment. Our Lord on this occasion visited Capernaum, and continued a few days there, with his disciples and brethren, before He ascended to Jerusalem to keep the approaching passover; but after John was imprisoned, He went to reside at Capernaum.

John Baptist so that this was the time, and the temple the place, when, and where, the Messiah was to be expected.

The first work he found Him at in the temple, was the purging of it; for so it was foretold, (Mal. 3: 2, 3.) He shall sit as a Refiner, and purify the sons of Levi. Now was come the time of reformation. Christ came, to be the great Reformer; and, according to the method of the reforming kings of Judah, he first purged out what was amiss, (and that used to be passover-work too, as in Hezekiah's time, 2 Chron. 30: 14, 15, and Josiah's, 2 Kings 23: 4, &c.) and then taught them to do well. First purge out the old leaven, and then keep the feast. Christ came to reform the world; and all who come to Him, should reform their hearts and lives, Gen. 35: 2. This He has taught us by purging the temple.

See what corruptions were purged out. He found a market in one of the courts of the temple, the court of the Gentiles. There, First, They sold oxen, and sheep, and doves, for sacrifice; we will suppose, not for common use, but for the convenience of those who came out of the country, and could not bring their sacrifices with them; see Deut. 14: 24-26. This market perhaps had been kept by the pool of Bethesda, (ch. 5: 2.) but was admitted into the temple by the chief priests, for filthy lucre; no doubt, the rents, and the fees for searching the beasts sold there, and certifying that they were without blemish, were a considerable revenue to them. Great corruptions in the church owe their rise to the love of money, 1 Tim. 6: 5, 10. Secondly, They changed money, for the convenience of those that were to pay a half-shekel in specie every year by way of poll, for the service of the tabernacle; (Exod. 30: 12.) and, no doubt, they gained by it.

Our Lord had seen these corruptions in the temple formerly, when in a private station; but never went about to drive them out till now, when He had taken upon Him the public character of a Prophet. He did not complain to

The Jews' passover. [Pascha, a passing over,] a name given to the festival established in commemoration of the coming forth out of Egypt, (Ex. ch. 12.) because the night before their departure, the destroying angel, who slew the first-born of the Egyptians, passed over the houses of the Hebrews without entering them, they being marked with the blood of the lamb, which, for this reason, was called the paschal lamb. The modern Jews continue to observe the passover. With those who live in Palestine the feast continues a week; but the Jews out of Palestine extend it to eight days. CALMET.

The passover made a great market. 'No less than two hundred fifty-six thousand, and five hundred victims,' observes Josephus, 'were offered at one passover.'

From Wulfen, (cited by Lampe) it appears that much extortion was practised in the sale of the sacrificial victims, and that a great part of the profit thence arising came into the hands of the priests, who sold the license to vend commodities there at a very dear rate.

BLOOMFIELD.

As the evangelists have not expressly determined the number of passovers which happened between the baptism and death of Christ, or during the course of his public ministry, learned men have been much divided in their opinion about them. By far the greatest part follow their opportunities, and go where their work led them. We do not now find Christ in the synagogues, but He privately instructed his friends, and thus entered upon his work by degrees. Young ministers should accustom themselves to pious discourse in private, that they may, with the better preparation, approach their work. The passover was at hand, and He must attend it at Jerusalem; for every thing is beautiful in its season. The less good must give way to the greater, and all the dwellings of Jacob veil to the gates of Zion.

This passover is the first after his baptism, and the evangelist takes notice of all the passovers He kept henceforward, which were four in all, the fourth, that at which He suffered, (three years after this,) and half a year was now past since his baptism. Christ, being made under the law, observed the passover at Jerusalem; see Exod. 23: 17. Thus He taught us by his example a strict observance of divine institutions, and a diligent attendance on religious assemblies. He went up to Jerusalem when the passover was at hand, that He might be there with the first. It is called the Jews' passover, because it was peculiar to them; now shortly God will no longer own it for his. Christ kept the passover at Jerusalem yearly, since He was twelve years old, in obedience to the law; but now that He is entered upon his public ministry, we may expect something more from Him than before.

The first place we find Him in at Jerusalem, was the temple, and it would seem, He did not make any public appearance till He came thither; for his presence and preaching there, were that glory of the latter house, which was to exceed the glory of the former, Hag. 2: 9. It was foretold, (Mal. 3: 1.) I will send my messenger, John Baptist; He never preached in the temple, but the Lord whom ye seek, shall suddenly come to his temple, suddenly after the appearing of the chief priests, for He knew they countenanced those corruptions. But He Himself drove the sheep and the oxen, and those that sold them, out of the temple. He never drove any into the temple, but only drove those out that profaned it. He did not seize the sheep and oxen for Himself, nor impound them, though actual trespassers upon his Father's ground; He only drove them out, and their owners with them. He made a scourge of small cords, which, probably, they had led their sheep and oxen with, and thrown them away upon the ground. Sinners prepare the scourges with which they themselves will be driven out from the temple of the Lord. He did not make a scourge to chastise the offenders, (his punishments are of another nature,) but only to drive out the cattle; He aimed no further than at reformation. See Rom. 13: 3, 4. 2 Cor. 10: 9.

In pouring out the money, He showed his contempt of it; He threw it to the earth, as it was, Eccl. 12: 7. In overthrowing the tables, He showed his displeasure against those that make religion a matter of worldly gain. Money-changers in the temple are the scandal of it. Note, in reformation, it is good to make thorough work; He drove them all out; and not only threw out the money, but the trade too.

He said to them that sold doves, (sacrifices for the poor,) Take these things hence. The doves, though a less nuisance than oxen and sheep, yet must not be allowed there. The sparrows and swallows were welcome, that were left to God's providence, (Ps. 84: 3.) but not the doves, that were appropriated to man's profit. But see Christ's prudence in his zeal. When He drove out the sheep and oxen, the owners might follow them; when He poured out the money, they might gather it again; but if He had turned the doves flying, perhaps they could not have been retrieved; therefore He said, Take these things hence. Note, Discretion must always govern our zeal, that we do nothing unbecoming, or mischievous to others.

He gave them a good reason for what He did; Make not my Father's house a house of merchandise. Reason for conviction should accompany correction.

A reason why they should not profane the temple, was, it was the house of God, and not to be made a house of merchandise. Merchandise is a good thing in the exchange, but not in the temple. This was sacrilege; it was robbing God. It was to debase that which was solemn and awful, and make it mean. It was to disturb those services in which men ought to be most solemn, and intent. It was particularly an affront to the sons of the stranger, in their worship to be forced to herd themselves with sheep and oxen, and to be distracted in worship by their noise; for this market was kept in the court of the Gentiles. It was to make the business of religion subservient to secular interest; the holiness of the place advanced the market, and promoted the sale of their commodities. Those make God's house a house of merchandise, [1.] Whose minds are filled with cares about worldly business, when they are attending on religious exercises, Amos 8: 8. Ezek. 33: 31. [2.] Who perform divine offices have supposed there were four; reckoning this the first; the feast mentioned John 5: 1. the second; the passover spoken of, John 6: 4. as the third; and that at which Christ suffered the fourth."

This was evidently a distinct transaction from that which has before been considered: (Notes, Matt. 21: 12, 13. Mark 11: 15-21.) for it took place on the first passover, after Jesus entered on his public ministry. Considering the immense number of sacrifices used at the feast of the passover, it must have been a very large market, which was there held, and a great multitude of people must have been assembled and employed: yet Jesus appearing as a poor man, at that time but little known, without human authority, without attendants or arms, except a scourge made of the small cords which were used in fastening the parts of the pens, or folds, or in other ways confining the cattle, drove them all before Him; overturning the tables of those who exchanged foreign for current coin, and clearing the place of them; though it must be supposed that pride, avarice, resentment, and every corrupt passion, would have disposed them to resistance, if they had not been overawed and overpowered. (14.) Oxen. No oxen, in the strict meaning of the word, were offered in sacrifice - but bulls, or cows only. (Note, Lev. 22: 18-21.)

His disciples remembered that it was written, The zeal of thine house hath eaten me up. They were somewhat surprised at first, to see Him whom they were directed to as the Lamb of God, whom they believed to be King of Israel, take so little state upon Him as to do this Himself; but one scripture came to their thoughts, which taught them to reconcile it with the meekness of the Lamb of God, and with the majesty of the King of Israel; for David, speaking of the Messiah, takes notice of his zeal for God's house, as so great, that it ate Him up, made Him forget himself. Ps. 69: 9.

The disciples understood the meaning of what Christ did, by remembering the Scriptures; They remembered that it was written. Note, The Word of God and the works of God illustrate each other. Dark scriptures are expounded by providence, and difficult providences are made easy by comparing them with the Scriptures. See of what use it is to be ready and mighty in the Scriptures, and to have the memory stored with scripture-truths, furnished for every good work.

The scripture they remembered was very apposite; The zeal of thine house has eaten me up. David was in this a type of Christ, that he was zealous for God's house, Ps. 132: 2, 3. What he did for it, was with all his might; see 1 Chron. 29: 2. The latter part of Ps. 69: 9, is applied to Christ, (Rom. 15: 3,) as the former part of it here. All the graces of the Old Testament saints were in Christ, and particularly this zeal for the house of God, and in them, they were types of Him. Jesus Christ was zealously affected to the house of God, his church, loved it, and was always jealous for its welfare. This zeal did even eat Him up; it made Him humble, and spend, and expose himself. My zeal has consumed me. Ps. 119: 139. Zeal for the house of God forbids us to consult our own credit and safety, when in competition with duty and Christ's service, and sometimes our bodies cannot keep pace with our souls, and we are as deaf as our Master was to those who suggested, Spare thyself. These grievances might seem small, and such as should have been connived at; but such was Christ's zeal, that He could not hear even them that sold and bought in the temple. Saith St. Austin, If He had found drunkards in the temple, how much more would He have been displeased!

Christ, having purged the temple, gave a sign to those who demanded it, to prove his authority.

Then answered the Jews, that is, the multitude of the people, with their leaders. Being Jews, they should rather have assisted Him to vindicate the honor of their temple; instead of that, they objected against it. Note, They who are earnest in the work of reform, must expect opposition. When they could object nothing against the thing itself, they questioned his authority to do it; 'What sign shonest thou unto us, to prove thyself authorized to do these things?' It was indeed a good work to purge the temple; but what right had He to undertake it, who was in no office there? They looked upon it as an act of jurisdiction, and that He must prove himself a prophet, yea, more for filthy lucre, and sell the gifts of the Holy Ghost, Acts 8: 18.

The reason why He purged it, was, It is my Father's house. (1.) He had authority to purge it, for He was faithful, as a Son, over his own house, Heb. 3: 5, 6. In calling God his Father, He intimates that He was the Messiah, of whom it was said, He shall build a house for my name, and I will be his Father, 2 Sam. 7: 12, 13. (2.) Therefore He had a zeal for the purging of it; 'It is my Father's house, and therefore I cannot bear to see it profaned, and Him dishonored.' Note, If God be our Father, and we desire that his name may be sanctified, it cannot but be our grief to see it polluted.

Christ's purging the temple may justly be reckoned among his wonderful works. Of all Christ's wonderful works, this appears to me the most wonderful. JEROME. [1.] He did it without the assistance of his friends; it had been no hard matter to raise the mob, who had a great veneration for the temple; but Christ never countenanced tumult or disorder. There was none to uphold, but his own arm did it. [2.] He did it without the resistance of his enemies, either the people themselves, or the chief priests that gave them their licenses, and had the temple force at their command. But the corruption was too plain to be justified; sin-

It was indeed a good work to purge the temple; but what right had He to undertake it, who was in no office there? They looked upon it as an act of jurisdiction, and that He must prove himself a prophet, yea, more than a prophet. But was not the thing itself a sign enough? His ability to drive so many from their posts, without opposition, was a proof of his authority; He that was armed with divine power, was surely armed with a divine commission. What ailed these buyers and sellers, that they fled, that they were driven back? Surely it was at the presence of the Lord, Ps. 114: 5, 6.

Christ does not immediately work a miracle to convince them, but gives them a sign as something to come, the truth of which must appear by the event, according to Deut. 18: 21.

The sign He gives them is his own death and resurrection. He refers them to that which would be, First, His last sign. If they would not be convinced by what they saw and heard, let them wait. Secondly, The great sign to prove Him to be the Messiah; for, concerning Him it was foretold that He should be bruised, (Isa. 53: 5,) cut off, (Dan. 9: 26,) and yet that He should not see corruption, Ps. 16: 10. These things were fulfilled in Jesus, and therefore, truly He was the Son of God, and had authority in his Father's house.

He foretells his death and resurrection, not in plain terms, as often to his disciples, but in figurative expressions; as afterward, when He gave this for a sign, He called it the sign of the prophet Jonas, so here, Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up. Thus spake He to them who were willingly ignorant, in parables, that they might not perceive, Matt. 13: 13.

They that will not see, shall not see. This figurative speech used here, proved such a stumbling-block to them, that it was produced against Him, at his trial, Matt. 26: 60, 61. Had they humbly asked Him the meaning of what He said, He would have told them, and it had been a savor of life unto life to them; but they were resolved to cavil, and it proved a savor of death unto death. They that would not be convinced, were hardened, and the manner of the expression of this prediction occasioned its accomplishment.

He foretells his death by the Jews' malice, in these words, Destroy ye this temple; that is, 'Ye will destroy it, I know. I will permit you to destroy it.' Note, Christ, even at the beginning of his ministry, had a clear foresight of his sufferings, and yet went on cheerfully in it. It is good, at setting out, to expect the worst.

He foretells his resurrection by his own power; In three days I will raise it up. There were others that were raised, but Christ raised himself.

He chose to express this by destroying and re-edifying the temple. 1. To justify his purging the temple: as if He had said, 'You that defile one temple, will destroy another; I will prove my authority to purge what you have defiled, by raising what you will destroy.' To profane the temple is to destroy it, and its reformation is its resurrection. 2. Because the death of Christ was the destruction of the Jewish temple, and his resurrection was the raising up of another temple, the gospel-church, Zech. 6: 12. The ruins of their place and nation, (Ch. 11: 43,) were the riches of the world. See Amos 9: 11. Acts 15: 16.

They cavil at this answer; (n. 20.) 'Forty and six years was this temple in building. Temple-work was always slow work, and canst thou make such quick work of it?' Here they show some knowledge; they could tell how long the temple was in building. Dr. Lightfoot computes that it was just forty-six years from the (17.) The zeal of thine house. 'See Ps. 69: 9. Zeal to promote thy glory, and to keep thy worship pure.' Dr. A. CLARKE. 'A regard for the honor of thy sanctuary, like a secret flame glowing in his bosom, preys upon his spirits, and would have consumed me, had I not given it vent.' DODDRIDGE.

Verses 18-22.

We can scarcely conceive of a more incontestable evidence of a divine energy, than the driving of the traders from the temple: yet the Jews demanded of Jesus some sign or attestation from heaven to his mission. Some think that He pointed to his body at the time; but, as his disciples did not understand Him till long afterwards, this is not likely. His opponents treated his assertion with derision: forty-six years had elapsed from the time that Herod had begun to rebuild the temple, and, though a very great number had at times been employed, it was not yet completed: and would He alone presume to rebuild it, if destroyed, in the short space of 'three days?' The explanation of the evangelist contains two direct proofs of the Deity of Christ: his body was, in an especial sense, 'a Temple,' in which God dwelt, and in which He displayed his glory: (Notes, Col. 1: 18-20. 2: 8, 9.) and He declared that He would raise his body from the dead by his own power; yet doubtless 'God raised Him from the dead.' (Marg. Ref. k.—Notes. 10: 14-18, v. 17, 18. Acts 10: 36-43, v. 40. Heb. 13: 20, 21. 1 Pet. 1: 3-5, v. 3: 17, 18, v. 18.) His enemies rebelled at these words some years after, and, by misquoting them, bare false witness against Him. (Note, Matt. 26: 57-62.)

(19.) This temple. Properly, the sanctuary, that part from the courts; and so Jesus meant; but the application of it by the Jews must be understood with some latitude; for a very large proportion of that which Herod caused to be done, was about the out-buildings of the sanctuary.

20 Then said the Jews, Forty and six years was this temple in building, and wilt thou rear it up in three days?

21 But ^{the} spake of the temple of his body

22 When therefore he was risen from the dead, ^{his} disciples remembered that he had said this unto them; and they believed the scripture, and the word which Jesus had said.

23 ¶ Now when he was in Jerusalem at the passover, in the feast-day, many believed in his name, when they saw the miracles which he did.

24 But Jesus did not commit himself unto them, because he knew all men, founding of Zerubbabel's temple, in the second year of Cyrus, to the complete settlement of the temple-service, in the thirty-second year of Artaxerxes; and also, that from Herod's beginning to build this temple, in the eighteenth year of his reign, to this very time, when the Jews said that this was just forty-six years. They show ignorance of the meaning of Christ's words. Note, Men often run into gross mistakes by understanding that literally which is figurative. What mischief has been done by interpreting, This is my body, after a corporal and carnal manner! Had they known that this was He who built all things in six days, they would not have made it such an absurdity, that He should build a temple in three days.

The difficulty is soon solved by explaining the terms; He spake of the temple of his body, v. 21. The holiness of the temple for which He was so jealous, was but typical, and leads us to consider another temple, which that was but a shadow of, the substance being Christ, Heb. 9: 9. Col. 2: 17. Some think, when He said, Destroy this temple, He pointed to his own body, or laid his hand upon it; however, it is certain that He spake of the temple of his body. Note, The body of Christ is the true temple, of which that at Jerusalem was a type. [1.] Like the temple, it was built by immediate divine direction; 'A body hast thou prepared me,' 1 Chron. 23: 19. [2.] It was a holy house; it is called that holy thing. [3.] It was the habitation of God's glory; there the eternal Word dwelt, the true Shechinah. He is Emmanuel—God with us. [4.] The temple was the place of intercourse between God and Israel. Thus by Christ God speaks to us, and we speak to Him. Worshipers looked toward that house, 1 Kings 8: 30, 35. So we must worship God with an eye to Christ.

When He was risen from the dead, some years after, his disciples remembered that He had said this. We found them, (v. 17.) remembering what had been written before Him, and here remembering what they had heard from Him. Note, The memories of Christ's disciples should, like the treasure of the good householder, furnish things both new and old, Matt. 13: 52. Now observe,

When He was risen from the dead. It seems, they did not at this time fully understand Christ's meaning, for they were as yet but babes in knowledge; but they laid it up in their hearts, and afterward it became both intelligible and useful. (20) Forty and six years was this temple in building.] 'This is not saying that Herod had employed forty-six years in building it; for Josephus assures us, that he finished it in nine years and an half. But, after the time of this prince, they still continued to make additions to it, and the same Josephus tells us that they continued working on it, till the beginning of the Jewish war.' 'Herod finished the main work in nine and an half years, yet some additional buildings or repairs were constantly carried on for many years afterwards. He began the work sixteen years before the birth of our Lord, and this conversation was in the thirtieth year of our Lord, which make the term exactly forty-six years.' Dr. A. CLARKE. Forty.] 'Solomon's temple was built in seven years. The second temple, though with more than one interruption, occupied the space of twenty years. The temple here meant is therefore the edifice which, though originally built by Zerobabel, was restored, repaired, and enlarged by Herod. Although, however, Herod had (which Josephus asserts) rebuilt the second from the foundation; yet, since he used the old materials, and did not pull down the whole temple, but by parts, according as any portion was to be removed and renewed, so they concur, but because they illustrate and strengthen each other. When the disciples saw both what they had read in the Old Testament, and what they had heard from Christ's own mouth, fulfilled in his death and resurrection, they were the more confirmed in their belief of both.

V. 23—25. We have here an account of the poor success of Christ's preaching and miracles at Jerusalem, while He kept the passover. Observe,

I. Our Lord Jesus, when at Jerusalem at the passover, did preach and work miracles. People's believing on Him, implied that He preached; and it is expressly said, They saw the miracles He did. He was now in the holy city, whence the word of the Lord was to go forth; his residence was mostly in Galilee, and therefore, when He was in Jerusalem, He was very busy. The time was holy time, the feast day, appointed for the service of God; at the passover the Levites taught the good knowledge of the Lord, (2 Chron. 30: 22.) and Christ took that opportunity of preaching, when the concourse of people was great, and thus honored the divine institution.

II. Hereby many were brought to believe in his name, to acknowledge him a Teacher come from God, and probably, some of those who looked for redemption in Jerusalem, believed Him to be the Messiah promised, so ready were they to welcome the first appearance of that bright and morning Star.

III. Yet Jesus did not commit Himself unto them; He did not trust Himself with them. It is the same word that is used for believing in Him. So that to believe in Christ, is to commit ourselves to Him, and to his guidance. Christ did not see cause to repose any confidence in these new converts at Jerusalem, where He had many enemies that sought to destroy Him; either, 1. Because they were false, at least, some of them, and would betray Him, if they had an opportunity, or were strongly tempted to it. He had more disciples that He could trust among the Galileans, than at Jerusalem. In dangerous times and places, it is wisdom to take heed whom you confide in. Or, 2. Because they were weak, and I would hope that this was the worst of it; not that they were treacherous, and designed mischief; but, (1.) They were timorous, and wanted zeal, and might be frightened to do wrong. In times of difficulty and danger, cowards are not to be trusted. Or, (2.) they were tumultuous, and wanted discretion. These in Jerusalem perhaps had their expectations more raised than others of the temporal reign of the Messiah, and, in that expectation, would be ready to assail the government, if Christ would have committed Himself to them, and put Himself at the head of them: but his kingdom is not of this world. We should be shy of turbulent, unquiet people, as our Master was, though they profess to believe in Christ as these did.

IV. The reason why He did not commit Himself to them, was, because He knew them, (v. 25.) the wickedness of some and the weakness of others. The evangelist asserts Christ's omniscience.

1. He knew all men, their nature, dispositions, affections, designs; we do not know any man, the building was still regarded as Zerobabel's. Hence the Jews called Zerobabel's temple, the second temple; though we no where read of a third. So Josephus says that the temple was twice destroyed; first, by the Chaldeans; secondly, by Titus.' BLOOMFIELD.

CHAP. III.

Nicodemus comes to Jesus by night, 1. Jesus shows him the indispensability of being born again, 2-11. He shows the difference between earthly and heavenly things, 12, 13, and speaks of his own death, and of faith in Him, 14, 15. The great love of God, in giving his only-begotten Son to redeem the world, 16, 17. Unbelief is the great cause of men's condemnation, 18-21. Jesus baptizes in Judaea, and John at Bethany, 22-24. John instructs his disciples, who were jealous for his honor, concerning the glory of Christ, the salvation of those who believe in Him, and the wrath of God abiding on unbelievers, 25-36.

THERE was a man ^a of the Pharisees, named Nicodemus, a ruler of the Jews :

2 The same ^b came to Jesus by night, and said unto him, ^c Rabbi, ^d we know that thou art a Teacher come from God : ^e for no man can do those miracles that thou doest, except God be with him.

3 Jesus answered and said unto him, Verily, verily, I say unto thee, ^f Except a scarcely ourselves. He knows all men; his hand made them all, his piercing eye sees into them. He knows his subtle enemies, and all their projects; his false friends, and their true characters; what they really are, whatever they pretend to be. He knows them that are truly his, their integrity, and their infirmity. He knows their frame.

2. He needed not that any should testify of man. His knowledge was not by information, but by his infallible intuition. It is the infelicity of earthly princes, that they must see with other men's eyes, and hear with other men's ears; but Christ goes purely on his own knowledge. Angels are his messengers, but not his spies, for his own eyes run to and fro through the earth, 2 Chron. 16: 9. This may comfort us in reference to Satan's accusations, that Christ will not take men's characters from him.

3. He knew what was in man. We know what is done by men; Christ knows what is in them; tries the heart and the reins. This is the prerogative of that essential, eternal Word, Heb. 4: 12, 13. We invade his prerogative, if we presume to judge men's hearts. How fit is Christ to be the Saviour of men, and their Physician, who has such perfect knowledge of the patient's state and case, temper and distemper; knows what is in him! How fit also to be the Judge of all! For the judgment of Him who knows all men, all in men, must needs be according to truth.

This is all the success of Christ's preaching and miracles at Jerusalem, in this journey. The Lord comes to his temple, and none come to Him, but a parcel of weak, simple people, that He can neither have credit from, nor put confidence in; yet He shall at length see of the travail of his soul.

CHAP. III. v. 1-20. Few were brought to Christ at Jerusalem, yet here was one; it is worth while to go a great way for the salvation of one soul.

Not many mighty and noble are called, yet here was one. Not many of the rulers, or of the Pharisees; yet, 1. This was a man of the Pharisees, a scholar. Let it not be said that all Christ's followers are unlearned and ignorant men. The principles of the Pharisees were contrary to the spirit of Christianity; yet there were some in whom those high thoughts were brought into obedience to Christ. Grace is able to subdue the greatest opposition. 2. He was a ruler of the Jews, a member of the great sanhedrim, a man of authority. Bad as things were, there were some rulers well inclined, who could do little good, because the stream was strong against them; they were yoked with the corrupt, so that the good which they would, they could not; yet Nicodemus continued in his place, and did what he could, when he could not do what he would.

He came to Jesus by night.

He made a private and particular address to Christ, did not think it enough to hear his public discourses. He resolved to talk with Him by Himself, where he might be free. Personal converse with ministers about our souls would be of great use to us, Mal. 2: 7.

His address by night may be considered an act of prudence and discretion. Christ was engaged all day in public work, and he would not interrupt Him then, but waited on Him when at leisure. Note, Private advantages must give way to those that are of general use. Christ had many enemies, and if the chief priests had known that Nicodemus came, they would have been the more enraged against Christ. Or it was an act of zeal and forwardness. Nicodemus could not spare time all day, and therefore would rather take time from the diversions of the evening, or the rest of the night, than not converse with Christ. When others were sleeping, he was getting knowledge, Ps. 63: 6, and 119: 148. Probably, it was the night after he saw Christ's miracles, and he would not slip the first opportunity of pursuing his convictions. He knew not how soon Christ might leave the town, nor what might happen betwixt that and another feast, and therefore would lose no time.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 12-25. Where the presence and doctrine of Christ are not valued, they will not long be continued: but He always is present with those who copy his example, by attending on the ordinances of God. His secret influence upon the minds of men extirpates corruptions from our hearts, and from his church, and constitutes the chief part of his severity. His hand now holds the scourge, not the avenging sword; nor will He ever destroy those who are willing to be cleansed. Zeal for the honor of the ordinances of God still engrosses his mind: his indignation is daily excited by those who make 'his Father's house an house of merchandise'; and, unless they repent, He will at length 'make them as a fiery oven in the day of his wrath.' They who questioned his authority, were at length enraged by his rebukes to put Him to death; but He raised up the sacred temple of his body by his own power, that in it, 'all the fulness of the Godhead might dwell.' He speedily took vengeance on the Jews for their impiety; and all who despise his authority, or hate his Gospel, shall also perish; but his disciples will reverence his words, when they do not fully understand them; they will treasure them up; and wait till the event explains them; thus their faith will be strengthened by further evidence of his truth.—Let us beware of a dead faith, or a formal profession; as carnal believers are often the most treacherous enemies. However men may impose on others, or on themselves, they cannot impose on their Judge.

SCOTT.

V. 24. Jesus did not commit Himself unto them.] 'Let us learn, also, from the caution which Jesus used, not rashly to put ourselves and our usefulness into the power of others; but to study a wise and happy medium between that universal prejudice and suspicion, which, while it wrongs the best and the most worthy characters, would deprive us of all the pleasures of an intimate friendship, and that undistinguishing easiness and openness of temper, which might make us the property of every hypocritical pretender to kindness and respect.'

CHAP. III. v. 1, 2. Came by night.] "The Jewish traditions recommended a nocturnal study of the law and theology." Lightfoot. But that Nicodemus, among other motives, was influenced by fear of exciting the hatred of his colleagues, (which Jesus had already drawn upon Himself, by casting out the traffickers from the temple) may be collected from 12: 42. On any other hypothesis the words at ch. 19: 39. would have no emphasis.

BLOOMFIELD.

It has been already observed, that the word Verily, implies a strong asseveration, and in the beginning of a sentence it is peculiar to Christ. (Note, Matt. 6: 5.) St. John generally mentions the affirmation as doubled, which adds a still greater energy to it. (Marg. Ref.—See on 1: 52.) We are therefore sure, that something of peculiar importance, and liable to be overlooked, is here intended. If it be allowed that the expression, 'born again,' is figurative, yet surely the figure should be regarded as appropriate and significant. Some argue that 'to be born again' means no more than to be baptized, and they quote the ancient fathers in proof of it. But will any man say, that no one can 'see,' or 'enter into,' the kingdom of God that is, understand the nature of true religion, or inherit the happiness of heaven, without the baptism of water? Others understand it of reformation: but outward reformation may be mere hypocrisy, or the result of selfish motives, or corrupted by pride. Nay, a man may change or be kind of sin for another, or one creed or sect for another, and yet remain very far from the kingdom of God: in short, if reformation here mean only reformation of life, our Lord instead of making any new discovery, has thrown a great deal of obscurity on 'what was before plain and known, not only to the Jews, but to wise heathens. And indeed this is the main article in dispute among many.' 'Some think, all these things in Scripture are expressed in condescension to our capacities, so that there is still to be conceived in many of them an inexpressible grandeur: whilst on the other hand, others suppose, that under the pomp and grandeur of the most hyperbolical expressions, 'things of a low and ordinary sense are to be understood.' Orren. It may here be expedient to elucidate the propriety of the metaphor. When a child is born, 'a new creature' is produced; and all its capacities, senses, and limbs are new, and suited to that new life on which it has entered. Thus when the grace of God changes the heart, the person indeed is the same; but he becomes a new man, possessed of new perceptions, affections and dispositions, and is prepared to make a new use of all his faculties; he enters the spiritual world, to which he was before an utter stranger. (Notes, Eph. 2: 4-10, v. 10. 2 Cor. 5: 17.) When an infant is born, it has all the parts of a man; but they are in a feeble state, and need nourishment and time, to grow to their proper size, and to perform their appropriate functions. Thus the regenerated sinner has the substance of right principles and dispositions communicated to his soul; but they are in an infantile state, and must grow up gradually, nourishment is provided, and 'the new-born babe,' in the spiritual as well as in the natural world, desires and thrives upon it. (Note, 2 Pet. 2: 1-3.) No man can comprehend how the infant is formed, nor can any man know how God effects the change in the sinner's heart. He works by means and instruments in both cases; and in each of them a real creation is effected by his omnipotence. The birth of the infant

yet afterward, when there was occasion, he owned Christ publicly, ch. 7: 50. 15: 39. The grace which is at first but a grain of mustard-seed, may grow to be a great tree.

He did not come to talk with Christ about state affairs, (though he was a ruler,) but about his own soul, and begins without circumlocution: he calls Christ Rabbi, which signifies a great man; see Isa. 19: 23. He shall send them a Savior, and a great one, a Savior and a Rabbi; so the word is. There are hopes of those who think and speak honorably of Christ. He tells Christ how far he had attained; we know that Thou art a Teacher.

Thou art a Teacher come from God; not drained by men, but supported with divine inspiration and authority. He that was to be the sovereign Ruler, came first to be a Teacher; for He would rule with reason, not with rigor; by the power of truth, not of the sword. The world lay in ignorance and mistake; the Jewish teachers were corrupt, and caused them to err; it is time for the Lord to work. He came a Teacher from God, the Father of mercies, in pity to a dark, deceived world; from God, the Father of lights, and Fountain of truth; all the light and truth which we may venture our souls upon.

We know, not only I, but others; the thing being so plain and self-evident. Perhaps he knew that there were Pharisees and rulers that were under the same convictions, but had not grace to own it. Or, we may suppose that he brought with him one or more of his friends and pupils; 'Master,' saith he, 'we come with a desire to be thy scholars, for we are fully satisfied that Thou art a divine Teacher.'

The ground of this assurance; No man can do these miracles which Thou doest, except God be with him.

Here we are assured of the truth of Christ's miracles; they were not counterfeit. Nicodemus, a judicious, sensible, inquisitive man, one that had all the reason and opportunity imaginable to examine them, was so fully satisfied that they were real miracles, that he was wrought upon to go contrary to his interest, and to those of his own rank who were prejudiced against Christ.

We are directed what inference to draw from Christ's miracles; we are to receive Him as a Teacher come from God. His miracles were his credentials. The course of nature could not be altered but by the power of the God of nature, who, we are sure, is the God of truth and goodness, and would never set his seal to a lie or a cheat.

Four things our Savior here discourses of.

I. The necessity and nature of regeneration, and the new birth, v. 3-8.

Jesus answered, v. 3. This answer was perhaps to rebuke what He saw defective in the address of Nicodemus. 'It was not enough for him to admire Christ's miracles, and acknowledge his mission; he must be born again. It is plain that he expected the kingdom of heaven shortly to appear; and, according to the common notion of the Jews, expects it in external pomp and power; he doubts not but Jesus is either the Messiah, or his Prophet, and therefore makes his court to Him, and so hopes to secure a share of the advantages of that kingdom. But Christ tells him that he can have no benefit by that change of the state, unless there be a change of the spirit, of the principles and dispositions equivalent to a new birth. Nicodemus came by night; 'But this will not do,' saith Christ. His religion must be owned before men. When Nicodemus owned Christ as a Teacher from God, intrusted with a revelation from heaven, he plainly intimated a desire to know what it was, and a readiness to receive it; and Christ gives it him.

In the night, his converse with Christ would be more free, and less liable to disturbance. Or, it was an act of fear and cowardice. He was afraid or ashamed to be seen with Christ, and therefore came in the night. When religion is out of fashion, there are many Nicodemites, especially among the rulers, who have a better affection to Christ and religion than they would be known to have. But observe, First, Though he came by night, Christ bid him welcome, accepted his integrity and pardoned his infirmity; He considered his temper, which perhaps was timorous, and the temptation he was in from his place and office; and hereby taught his ministers to become all things to all men, and to encourage good beginnings, though weak. Paul preached privately to them of reputation, Gal. 2: 2. Secondly, Though now he came by night, there was occasion, he owned Christ publicly, ch. 7: 50.

Verily, verily, I say unto thee; I, the Amen, the Amen, say it; so it may be read: 'I, the faithful and true Witness.' The matter is settled, that except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God. 'I say it to thee, though a Pharisee, a master in Israel.' Observe,

What it is that is required; to be born again; that is, we must live a new life. Birth is the beginning of life; to be born again, is to begin anew. We must not think to patch up the old building, but begin from the foundation. We must have a new nature, new principles, affections, aims. The word signifies both again and from above. First, We must be born anew; so the word is taken, (Gal. 4: 9.) and from the beginning, Luke 1: 3. By our first birth we were shapen in sin and iniquity; therefore our souls must be fashioned anew. Secondly, We must be born from above, (so the word is used by the evangelist, ch. 3: 31. 19: 11.) and I take it to be especially intended here, not excluding the other; for to be born from above, supposes being born again. But this new birth has its rise from heaven, ch. 1: 13; and its tendency to heaven: it is to be born to a divine and heavenly life, a life of communion with God and the upper world, and, in order to this, it is to partake of a divine nature, and bear the image of the heavenly.

See the indispensable necessity of this. Except a man (any one that partakes of the human nature,) be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of the Messiah begun in grace and perfected in glory. Except we be born from above, we cannot see this. That is, [1.] We cannot understand the nature of it. Such is the nature of the things pertaining to the kingdom of God, that the soul must be new-modelled; the natural man must become a spiritual man, before he is capable of receiving as I understanding them, 1 Cor. 2: 14. [2.] We cannot receive the comfort of it; cannot expect any benefit by Christ and his Gospel, here, &c. hereafter. Considering what we are by nature, how corrupt and sinful; what God is, in whom alone we can be happy, and what heaven is, to which the perfection of our happiness is reserved; it will appear in the nature of the thing, that we must be born again; because it is impossible that we should be happy, if we be not holy; see 2 Cor. 6: 11, 12.

precedes the exercise of its senses, and is the introduction to all the actions of life; so the new birth must precede all the actions of the spiritual life: till that has taken place, the man can, in a spiritual manner, do nothing. But as, when a living child is born, it will certainly move and act; so when the sinner is 'born again,' he will act accordingly. Whatever be a man's natural abilities, attainments, or profession, 'he cannot see the kingdom of God;' neither discern its spiritual nature, nor enjoy its blessings. (Note, Matt. 3: 2.) This unalterable appointment of God has also its foundation in the nature of things. God is perfect in holiness, all things relating to true religion are holy and spiritual; but man by nature is unholy, and cannot relish or even discern that excellency. God and the nature of holiness and happiness are unchangeable: therefore man must change, or he can never be conformed to them, or happy in them. (Notes, Rom. 8: 5-9. 1 Cor. 2: 14-16, v. 14.) Every revelation of God requires of man the deepest humiliation; but man is a self-justifying, self-sufficient creature; he must therefore be inwardly changed, before he can understand the Gospel. Without this, he can see no excellency in the holiness of God, no goodness or justice in the precepts and sanction of the law, no hatefulness in himself, no malignity deserving damnation in his sins; no preciousness and glory in salvation by Christ, no beauty in conformity to his character. Consequently, he can neither submit, love, nor obey, but must remain a rebel, and a despiser of the Gospel; he cannot therefore be a true Christian, nor be meet for heaven. He may participate in the animal life; but must remain spiritually dead, and incapable of such satisfactions as are enjoyed in heaven, and as pious men experience on earth: even as a watch, constructed with three distinct parts, may move on regularly as to two of them, when the third is incapable of motion. (Note, Gen. 2: 16, 17.) Some render the words 'born again,' born from above; and no doubt they admit of that meaning; but it is evident that Nicodemus did not thus understand them.

SCOTT. Jesus, knowing the prejudices Nicodemus labored under both as a Jew and a Pharisee, judged it necessary immediately to acquaint him with the absolute necessity of a thorough change, by divine grace, both in heart and life: a change so great as might appear like coming into a new world, and would bring the greatest and most learned man to the simplicity of little children. He therefore said to him, 'Verily, verily, I say unto thee, except a man be born again,' &c.

DODDRIDGE. 'No stronger expression could have been chosen to signify a great and remarkable change of state and character. We must be entirely different from what we were before, as that which begins to be at any time, is not, and cannot be the same with what did formerly exist.'

WITHERSPON. 'The great moral change, of which our Lord chiefly speaks in this conversation, and which is repeatedly inculcated through the scriptures, is the commencement of that holiness, without which no man shall see the Lord. It is a spiritual frame or temper in the mind of fallen man, imparted by the Holy Spirit, the infusion of a new life into the heart, before dead in trespasses and sins. It is not a change of the essence of the soul, or the conferring of any new faculties, but a change in the direction and use of those faculties which sin had corrupted, the re-impressing on man that holy image of God, which he lost by the original transgression. When, therefore, the graces and duties, which are the inseparable effects of this change, begin to appear, even in the smallest measure, we hope the transformation under review is commenced; when they attain some consistency, we say in the judgment of charity that it has actually taken place; and as it shows itself in growing sanctification, we hesitate not on the question of the real operation of the Holy Spirit in the change of heart.' D. WILSON.

5 Jesus answered, Verily, verily, I say unto thee, Except a man be 'born of water, and of the Spirit,' he cannot enter into the kingdom of God.

This great truth of the necessity of regeneration being thus solemnly laid down,

It is objected against by Nicodemus, (v. 4.) How can a man be born when he is old? Herein appears his weakness in knowledge; what Christ spake spiritually, he seems to have understood after a corporal manner, as if there were no other way of new-moulding a soul, than by new-framing the body, and bringing that back to the rock, out of which it was hewn: as if there were such a connection between the soul and the body, that there could be no fashioning the heart anew but by forming the bones anew. Nicodemus, as the other Jews, valued himself, no doubt, very much on his first birth; the place of it, the holy land, perhaps the holy city; his parentage, such as that which Paul could have gloried in, Phil. 3: 5. And therefore it is a great surprise to him to hear of being born again. Could he be better bred and born, than bred and born an Israelite, or by any other birth stand fairer for the kingdom of the Messiah? Indeed they looked upon a proselyted Gentile to be as one born again, or born anew; he could not imagine how a Jew, a Pharisee, could ever better himself by being born again; he therefore thinks if he must be born again, it must be of her that bare him first. They that are proud of their first birth, are hardly brought to a new birth. But he does not turn his back upon Christ because of this hard saying, but ingeniously acknowledges his ignorance, which implies a desire to be better informed; and so I take this, rather than that he had such notions of the new birth Christ spake of: 'Lord, make me to understand this, for it is a riddle to me; I know no other way for a man to be born.' When we meet with that in the things of God, which is dark, and hard to be understood, we must with humility and industry continue our attendance upon the means of knowledge, till God shall reveal even that unto us.

Our Lord takes occasion to repeat and confirm what He had said; (v. 6.) 'Verily, verily I say unto thee, the very same that I said before.' Note, The word of Christ is not vain and nay, but yea and amen; what He hath said, He will abide by, whoever saith against it; nor will He retract any of his sayings for the ignorance and mistakes of men. Though Nicodemus understood not the mystery of regeneration, yet Christ asserts the necessity of it as positively as before. Note, It is folly to think of evading the obligation of evangelical precepts by pleading that they are unintelligible, Rom. 3: 3, 4.

He further shows,
(1.) The Author of this blessed change, and who it is that works it. To be born again, is to be born of the Spirit, v. 5-8. It is not by any wisdom or power of our own, but by the power and influence of the Spirit. It is the sanctification of the Spirit, (1 Pet. 1: 2.) and renewing of the Holy Ghost, Tit. 3: 5. The word He works by, is his inspiration, and the heart to be wrought on, He has access to.

(2.) The nature of this change; that which is wrought, is spirit, v. 6. Those that are regenerated are made spiritual, refined from sensuality. The dictates and interests of the soul have retrieved the dominion over the flesh. The Pharisees placed their religion in external purity and performances, and it would be with them no less than a new birth, to become spiritual.

(3.) The necessity of this change.
That which is born of the flesh is flesh. Here is our malady, and the causes of it, which are such as speak plain that there is no remedy but we must be born again.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-5. Numbers are convinced concerning the doctrines of Christianity, and of the piety and faithfulness of its ministers, but they dare not avow their sentiments in the face of the world, or among despisers of the Gospel: and, though we must not excuse such as are afraid or ashamed to associate with those whom they believe to be 'sent of God,' yet we must not 'quench the smoking flax' for by proper instruction and encouragement, they may at length be more decided.—True religion consists in the right state of the heart: and since, 'except a man be born again, he cannot see,' or 'enter into, the kingdom of God,' it becomes every one seriously to inquire into the meaning of this declaration, and to beseech the Lord to direct him. In this way, a man may meditate and pray, for a considerable time, before he clearly enters into the meaning; yet he will gradually and certainly obtain experimental knowledge of it. But it is the most absurd presumption to expect future happiness without either knowing what it is to be 'born again,' or inquiring about it; as if we could enter heaven in defiance of Christ, and by so doing prove his most solemn declaration a falsehood! Nor is it safer or wiser so to interpret it as to leave a man proud, and an enemy of God and holiness, as he was before; neither evidencing his title to the kingdom, nor giving him a meetness for its employments. But 'the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God; for they are foolishness to him.' To evade conviction, it is common for man to put an absurd construction on the words of those, who speak according to the oracles of God; to draw ridiculous conclusions from them; and then to inquire, whether this be not very foolish. Whereas the folly lies in the misconception, not in the doctrine itself, which appears reasonable to every teachable inquirer.—The Lord will explain his declarations, but will not retract them, nor alter the rules of admission into his kingdom, to humor the prejudices of any set of men; and the true baptism is not 'that which is outward in the flesh, but that which is inward, even that of the heart,' by the work of the Holy Spirit, 'whose praise is not of men, but of God.'

SCOTT.

By 'the kingdom of God' He doubtless primarily meant the kingdom of the Messiah; but as admission into this is necessary, in order to 'enter into the kingdom of God' in heaven, both may be included. 'Elsewhere the Spirit and fire are joined, but the order is reversed. "He shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost, and with fire." Water 'in the sacrament of baptism, is an outward sign and seal of the spiritual and divine energy, which inwardly cleanses us. But fire, when joined to the Spirit, cannot be understood otherwise than metaphorically. In this place, 'the Spirit' being added to 'water' is a declaration of the external sacramental baptism; in the other the fire is mentioned as an explanation of the divine energy, taken from a corporal thing.' Beza. (Note, Matt. 3: 11, 12.) If baptism and being born again be the same, or the one invariably accompanies the other, so that all who are rightly baptized are regenerate, and none else; then all who die unbaptized, even infants, are shut out of heaven! A proposition far more dreadful than any held by the most unfeeling Calvinists.

SCOTT.

Though our Lord, in this account of regeneration, joins water and Spirit together, he does not, in contrasting it with natural generation, verse 6th, mention the water at all, but opposes simply the Spirit to the flesh. And, in what he says, verse 8th, of the manner wherein this change is effected, the regenerate are distinguished solely by the words, 'born of the Spirit.'

It is not necessary that by water and the Spirit (in this place) we should understand two different things: it is probably only an elliptical form of speech, for the Holy Spirit under the similitude of water; as in Matt. 3: 3, the Holy Ghost and fire, do not mean two things, but one, viz. the Holy Ghost under the similitude of fire, refining and purifying the whole.

Dr. A. CLARKE.

To understand by 'the flesh,' in the first clause, the body exclusively, would destroy all connection between the two parts of the verse. And where would be the need of regeneration, or to be renewed 'in the spirit of our mind,' if the soul were in itself spiritual, and only the body carnal? In fact, the soul, or heart, is the more immediate seat and source of sin, and the body only or mainly its instrument. (Notes, Prov 4: 23. Jer. 17: 9, 10. Matt. 15: 15-20.) 'It appears to me 'impossible, to clear up either the beauty of the antithesis, or the truth of the assertion, on any other interpretation.' Doddridge in Scott's

Verse 7, 8.

Marvel not, &c.] 'Since the degeneracy of human nature is of a universal extent as to be common to you all. Nor have you any cause to be surprised if there be some things in this doctrine of regeneration which are of an obscure and unsearchable nature, for even to the natural world many things are so: The triad, for instance, bloweth where it will, and is not subject to the direction or command of man; and though thou hearest the sound thereof, and feelest its sensible and powerful effects, yet thou canst not exactly tell whence it cometh, and whither it goeth. So it is with every one that is born of the Spirit. You are so far from being capable of accounting for it, that it is easy to be seen there is a sovereign freedom in that Divine agency, which makes it oftentimes impossible to say, why it is imparted to one rather than to another; and there is a secret in the manner of its operation on the mind, which it is neither necessary to know nor possible to explain.'

DODDRIIDGE.

'The Spirit Himself, the great Agent, is invisible, his manner of operating is beyond our discovery: but the reality of his operation is perceived by the effects produced in the disposition and life of the regenerate.'

CAMPBELL.

(8.) As the same word signifies both spirit and the wind, in the original languages, the similitude has a peculiar propriety; if 'being born again' be interpreted of the communication of divine life to the dead in sin.' But if understood of baptism exclusively, or what al-thereof, but canst not tell whence it cometh, and whither it goeth: 'so is every one that is born of the Spirit.

Himself never did, nor ever will, unsay it, so all the world cannot gainsay it. The great Luogiber, whose will is a law; the great Mediator of the new covenant, who has full power to settle the terms of our reconciliation to God, the great Physician of souls, who knows their case, and what is necessary to their cure, hath said, Ye must be born again. 'I said unto thee that which all are concerned in, Ye must all be born again; not only the common people, but the masters in Israel.' We are not to marvel at this, for, when we consider the holiness of the God with whom we have to do, the design of our redemption, the depravity of our nature, and the nature of the happiness set before us, we shall not think it strange that so much stress is laid upon this as the one thing needful, that we must be born again.

This change is illustrated by two comparisons.

[1.] The regenerating work of the Spirit is compared to water, v. 5. To

First, We are flesh, not only corporeal, but corrupt, Gen. 6:3. The soul is still a spiritual substance, but so wedded to the flesh, so captivated by the flesh, so in love with the delights of the flesh, so employed in making provision for the flesh, that it is justly called flesh; it is carnal. And what communion can there be between God, who is a Spirit, and a soul in this condition?

Secondly, We came to be so, by being born of the flesh. It is a corruption that is bred in the bone with us, and therefore we must be born again. The corrupt nature, which is flesh, takes rise from our first birth; therefore the new nature which is Spirit, must take rise from a second birth. Nicodemus spake of the natural birth being repeated; but, to what purpose? If he were born a hundred times, still that which is born of the flesh, is flesh; a clean thing cannot be brought out of an unclean. He must be born of the Spirit, or he cannot become spiritual. The spiritual part of man has so much the dominion over his corporeal part that he was denominated a living soul; (Gen. 2:7.) but by indulging the appetite of the flesh, in eating forbidden fruit, he prostituted the soul to the tyranny of sensual lust, and became no longer a living soul, but flesh; Dust thou art. The living soul became inactive; thus in the day he sinned, he surely died. In this degenerate state, he beget a son in his own likeness, transmitted the human nature, which had been deposited in his hands, thus corrupted and depraved; and in the same plight it is still propagated. Corruption and sin are woven into our nature; we are shaped in iniquity, which makes it necessary that the nature be changed. It is not enough to put on a new coat, or a new face, but we must put on the new man, we must be new creatures.

Marvel not that I said unto thee, Ye must be born again. Christ hath said it, and as He be born again, is to be born of water, and of the Spirit, that is, of the Spirit working like water; (as Matt. 3:11.) with the Holy Ghost and with fire, means, with the Holy Ghost as with fire.

That which is primarily intended here, is to show that the Spirit, in sanctifying a soul 1. Cleanses and purifies it; takes away that by which it was unfit for the kingdom of God. It is the washing of regeneration, Tit. 3:5. Ye are washed, 1 Cor. 6:11. See Ezek. 36:25. 2. Cools and refreshes it, as water doth the hunted hart and the weary traveller. The Spirit is compared to water, Isa. 44:3. ch. 7, 33, 39. In the first creation, the fruits of heaven were born of water, (Gen. 1:20.) in allusion to which, perhaps, they that are born from above, are born of water.

It is probable that Christ had an eye to baptism, which John had used, and He Himself had begun to use. Regeneration by the Spirit would be signified by washing with water, as the visible sign of spiritual grace: not that all they, and they only, that are baptized, are saved; but without that new birth which is wrought by the Spirit, and signified by baptism, none shall be looked upon as the protected, privileged subjects of the kingdom of heaven. The Jews cannot partake of the benefits of the Messiah's kingdom they had so long looked for, unless they quit all expectations of being justified by the works of the law, and submit to the baptism of repentance, the great gospel-duty, for the remission of sins, the great gospel-privilege.

[2.] It is also compared to wind; The wind bloweth where it listeth; so is every one that is born of the Spirit. The same word signifies both the wind and spirit. The Spirit came upon the apostles in a rushing mighty wind, Acts 2:2. His strong influences on the hearts of sinners are compared to the breathing of the wind, (Ezek. 37:9.) and his sweet influences on the souls of saints, to the north and south wind, Cant. 4:16. This comparison is here used to show,

First, That the Spirit of regeneration works at will, and as a free Agent. The wind bloweth where it listeth, nor is it subject to our command; God directs it, it fulfils his word, Ps. 148:8. The Spirit dispenses his influences where, and when, on whom, and in what measure and degree, He pleases; giving to every man, severally as He will, 1 Cor. 12:11.

Secondly, He works powerfully, and with evident effects: Thou hearest the sound thereof;

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 6-11. Without regeneration, we cannot come to God, or spiritually worship Him. 'The carnal mind,' which belongs to us all as 'born of the flesh,' is 'enmity against God,' so that 'they who are in the flesh cannot please Him.' Happy are they who are 'born of the Spirit,' and made spiritually minded: they can discern the things of God; religion becomes their element; they are made subjects of that kingdom which is in righteousness, peace, and joy.' Let it not then be marvelled at, that Jesus has said, 'Ye must be born again'; it is enough that the Author, the nature, the necessity, and the effects of this work are manifest, though the manner and rule of it be not known. Can we indeed understand fully how the most ordinary effects in nature are produced? Can we comprehend all that relates to our natural birth? Or can we change the course which God has established? One ship is wafted into port, and another dashed upon the rocks by the wind, as it pleases God. The sailors can neither comprehend, he reasons of it, nor repel its effects; but yet they may use means, and employ their skill to avail themselves of a wind, or to retire from a tempest; and we may also use means, and expect the blessing of God on them. There are many 'teachers in Israel,' professed ministers of Christianity, of great repute, who say, 'How can these things be?' Nay, they positively declare that they cannot be; and that all are enthusiasts or hypocrites, who profess them. In an inferior sense, however, we may say with humble confidence, 'We testify that which we have seen,' by experience, whether men receive or reject our testimony.

ways accompanies it when rightly administered, there seems nothing appropriate in it. The administration of baptism is evident and public. Every thing relating to it depends on 'the will of man,' of the baptized person in adults, of parents and sponsors in infants, and of the officiating minister in both cases.

SCOTT.

'Divine Providence is accustomed, by hidden modes and inconspicuous methods, to bring about the most important events.' See Gen. 24, 35. The passage may be thus paraphrased: 'You stumble on my very estate, and that of my disciples, and inquire who and whence I am? See 8:14. 9:29. 19:9. Since my person is obscure, you feel confident, that nothing great will be effected by Me or my disciples; but the event will be contrary to your expectations. 1 Cor. 1:26-29. Idolatry will be abolished, and the temple of Jerusalem destroyed. There will be a mighty and incredible change of affairs. The Gospel will be propagated, not by the eloquence of the learned, not by the wealth of the rich, nor the power of princes; but will be introduced, and prevail, in spite of the learned, the eloquent, the rich, and the great; and multitudes innumerable will receive it with their whole hearts and minds: not attracted by the hope of riches, honor, and pleasures, but influenced solely by the promise of the benefits of a future life, even a heaven.' Wolstein will neither believe the truths of Christianity, nor submit to the laws of it, further than they please. Christ shall be their Teacher, provided they may choose their lesson.

Nicodemus owns himself ignorant of Christ's meaning, after all; 'How can these things be?' They are things I do not understand. Thus the things of the Spirit of God are foolishness to the natural man. He is not only estranged from them, but prejudiced against them, and thus they are foolishness to him.

Because this doctrine was unintelligible to him, he questions the truth of it; as if, because it was a paradox to him, it was a chimera in itself. Many have such an opinion of their own capacity, as to think that that cannot be proved, which they cannot believe; by wisdom they knew not Christ.

Christ reproved him for his dulness and ignorance. Art thou a master in Israel?—a teacher; one who sits in Moses' chair, and yet not only unacquainted with the doctrine of regeneration, but incapable of understanding it? This word is a reproof, (1.) To those that undertake to teach others, and yet are ignorant and unskillful themselves. (2.) To those that spend their time in teaching notions and ceremonies in religion, niceties and criticisms in the Scripture, and neglect that which is practical, and tends to reform the heart and life. Two words in the reproof are very emphatic: [1.] The place where he is lost was cast; in Israel, where there was great plenty of the means of knowledge, where divine revelation was. He might have learned this out of the Old Testament. [2.] The things he was thus ignorant in; these things, these necessary things, these divine things; had he never read Ps. 50:5, 10. Ezek. 18:13. 36:25, 26.

II. Christ discoursed hereupon, of the certainty and sublimity of gospel-truths; (v. 11-13.) to show the folly of those who make strange of these things, and to recommend them to our search.

The truths Christ taught, were very certain, and what we may venture upon; (v. 11.) We speak that we do know; whom does He mean beside Himself? Some understand it of those that bore witness to Him on earth, the prophets and John Baptist; they spoke what they knew, and had seen, and were themselves abundantly satisfied in: divine revelation carries its own proof along with it. Others, of those that bore witness from heaven, the Father and the Holy Ghost; the Father was with Him, the Spirit of the Lord was upon Him; therefore He speaks in the plural number, as ch. 14:23. We will come unto him. Observe [1.] The truths of Christ are of undoubted certainty. We have all the reason in the world to be assured, that the sayings of Christ are such as we may venture our souls upon; for He is not only a credi-

Verses 12, 13.
No creature can find satisfaction, without capacities of enjoyment suited to his situation. Pleasure cannot be experienced without appetite and relish, as well as the means of gratification. Every animal must be in its element, in order to be easy and comfortable. The fish could not enjoy life on dry ground, unless its nature should be changed. Holiness and spirituality are not the sinner's element: submission to God, and communion with Him, are not his desired enjoyments; he has a revealed enmity against them. Yet happiness is impossible to a rational creature without holiness, and holiness cannot be so much as begun without 'being born again.' So that this truth, which men are so apt to deny, and treat as enthusiasm, has as evident a ground in reason, as in Scripture. Let it be granted, that God is perfectly holy; that happiness consists in his favor, presence, image, and service; and that man by nature has no relish for this kind of happiness: and from these premises (which any one must be very hardy to deny,) it follows that 'except a man be born again,' he could not enjoy happiness, were he admitted into heaven; but for that reason, among others, he never can enter thither. If men will not therefore believe this doctrine, of which we 'that are of the earth, and earthly,' can reason so plainly, and illustrate by the nature of animals, and the grafting of trees, and various other apt similitudes; (Note, Is. 11: 6-9.) and which is actually witnessed in its effects, whenever sinners are converted; how shall they believe what Jesus testifies to them concerning 'heavenly things?' namely: such as relate to the mysteries of the Trinity, to his own eternal Deity, to his incarnation, and redemption by his blood? which could never have been thought of, had not God revealed them, and which must rest wholly on the testimony of Revelation. Our Lord says, 'the Son of man which is in heaven,' when He was here on earth, because One with the eternal Word and Son of God. (Notes. 1: 1-2, 14, 18. Acts 20: 28.) This language seems

Me, but a competent Witness, who could not Himself be deceived; We testify that we have seen. He spake not upon hearsay, but upon the clearest evidence, and therefore with the greatest assurance. What He spake of God, of the invisible worlds, of the divine will concerning us, and the counsels of peace, was what He knew and had seen, for He was by Him as one brought up with Him. Prov. 8: 30. What ever Christ spake, He spake of his own knowledge. [2.] The unbelief of sinners is greatly aggravated by the infallible certainty of the truths of Christ. The things are thus sure thus clear, and yet ye receive not our witness. Multitudes seem to be unbelievers of that, which yet (so cogent are the motives of credibility) they cannot disbelieve!

The truths Christ taught, though the language and expressions were borrowed from common and earthly things, yet in their own nature were more sublime and heavenly; this is intimated, (v. 12.) 'If I have told them earthly things, the great things of God in similitudes taken from earthly things, to make them intelligible, as that of the new birth and the wind, if I have thus accommodated myself to your capacities and language, and cannot make you to understand my doctrine, what would you do if I should accommodate myself to the nature of the things, and speak with that language which mortals cannot utter? If such familiar expressions be stumbling-blocks, what would abstract ideas be, and spiritual things, painted proper?' We may learn hence, [1.] To admire the height and depth of the doctrine of Christ; it is a great mystery of godliness. The things of the Gospel are heavenly things, out of the road of the inquiries of human reason, and much more out of the reach of its discoveries. [2.] We should acknowledge with thankfulness the condescension of Christ, that He is pleased to suit the manner of the revelation to our capacities; to speak to us as to children. He considers our frame, that we are of the earth, and our place, that we are on the earth, and therefore makes things sensible the vehicle of things spiritual, to make them the more easy and familiar. Thus He has done both in parables and in sacraments. [3.] We should lament the corruption of our nature, and our great unappetence to receive the truths of Christ. Earthly things are despised because they are vulgar, and heavenly things because they are abstruse; and so, whatever method is taken, still some fault is found with it; (Matt. 11: 17.) but Wisdom is justified of her children.

Our Lord Jesus alone was fit to reveal such a doctrine; (v. 13.) No man besides hath ascended up into heaven.

None but Christ was able to reveal the will of God for our salvation. Nicodemus addressed Christ as a Prophet; but He is greater than all the Old-Testament prophets, for none of incapable of any other interpretation; and to worst it to agree with any other doctrine, makes our Lord to speak in the most unintelligible manner. Doubtless this was intended as a specimen of those 'heavenly things' which He had before mentioned.

Scott.
(13.) 'The Hebrews used to call "heavenly" not only those things which are hidden from men, and are known to God only, but used to say of those who thoroughly understood things obscure and commonly unknown, "they have been in heaven, have ascended to heaven, and fetched their knowledge from thence." The sense is, And no one has ever ascended to heaven, to bring down this information, nor can any one, except the Son of man (the Messiah), reveal the councils of God for the salvation of man; that is, no one knoweth the councils of God, but I who came down from Him.'

Bloomfield.
'Came down from heaven.' 'The divine legation is not alone meant, since the expression is no where used by the prophets, and Christ declares Himself superior to the prophets. It undoubtedly involves at once the celestial origin and pre-existence of Christ; as is plain from ch. 6: 62. 7: 7. And that John himself understood this formula is clear from ch. 1. and infra, v. 31.'

Keinoel.
'Regeneration, or the new birth, brought to view in the preceding verses, is a subject to which the world is very averse; it is, however, the one subject, in which all others meet—the grand inquiry, in comparison with which every thing else, how excellent soever, is but a conscious trifling. What does it signify, though we have food in plenty, and variety of raiment, if we are not born again? If, after a few mornings and evenings spent in unthinking mirth and sensuality, we die in our sins, and lie down in sorrow? What does it signify, though we are accomplished to act well our parts in life, in every other respect, if at last repulsed from the supreme Judge with "Depart from Me, I know you not, ye workers of iniquity?"

more than a mere man; He is the Lord from heaven, 1 Cor. 15: 47. He had intimate acquaintance with the divine counsels; for, coming from heaven, He had been from eternity conversant with them. This speaks God manifest. Under the Old Testament, God's favors to his people are expressed by his hearing from heaven, (2 Chron. 7:14.) looking from heaven, (Ps. 80: 4.) speaking from heaven, (Neh. 9:13.) sending from heaven, Ps. 57: 3. But the New Testament shows us God coming down from heaven. That He thus descended, is an admirable mystery; for the Godhead cannot change places, nor die. He brings his body from heaven; but that He thus condescended for our redemption, is a more admirable mercy; herein He commended his love.

2. He is the Son of man, spoken of by Daniel, (7: 13.) by which the Jews always understood the Messiah. Christ, in calling Himself the Son of man, shows that He is the second Adam, for the first Adam was the father of man. And of all the titles of the Messiah, He chose to make use of this, because it was most expressive of his humility and his present state of humiliation.

3. He is in heaven. Now when He is talking with Nicodemus, on earth, yet, as God, He is in heaven; the Son of man, as such, was not in heaven till his ascension; but He that was the Son of man by his divine nature, was now every where present, and particularly in heaven. Thus the Lord of glory, as such, could not be crucified, nor could God, as such, shed his blood; yet that person, who was the Lord of glory, was crucified, (1 Cor. 2: 8.) and God purchased the church with his own blood, Acts 20: 28. So close is the union of the two natures in one person, that there is a communication of properties.

III. Christ here discourses of the great design of his own coming into the world; and the happiness of those that believe in Him, v. 14-18. Here we have the marrow of the whole Gospel; that faithful saying, (1 Tim. 1: 15.) that Jesus Christ came to seek and to save men from death, and recover them to life. Sinners are dead men, 1. As one that is mortally wounded, or sick of an incurable disease, is said to be a dead man; for he is dying; and so Christ came to save us, by healing us, as the brazen serpent healed the Israelites, v. 14, 15. 2. As one that is justly condemned to die for an unpardonable crime, is a dead man, he is dead in law; and in reference to this part of our danger, Christ came to save as a Prince or Judge, publishing an act of general pardon, under certain provisos; this saving here is opposed to condemning, v. 16-18.

Verse 14.

¶ Jesus proceeds to illustrate by an example what He had said in v. 12, explaining what kind of person the Messiah would be; i. e. not the avenger of Jewish wrongs, or the restorer of their liberty, not an earthly monarch, such as they now expected, but the Author, not of temporal, but of eternal salvation, produced by the sacrifice of the death of Christ. He instances these things as "heavenly" counsels, known to none but Himself, and thus hints that if He should discover such "heavenly things," the Jews would repose no faith in Him. Indeed, the doctrine of a suffering and dying Messiah was so contrary to their expectations, that, had Jesus pronounced this at the commencement of his ministry, no one would have followed Him; nay, even the apostles, though they had the advantage of long, constant attention, and unreserved instruction, could not have endured this truth. Therefore, to Nicodemus also, tempered as he was with prejudices, Jesus speaks of his death figuratively and obscurely. And though Nicodemus did not John perceive; Christ's meaning, yet was he thoroughly prepared for the v. 16, which were to follow.

BLOOMFIELD.

Jesus Christ came to save us by healing us, as the children of Israel, stung with fiery serpents, were cured and lived by looking up to the brazen serpent; Num. 21. e. 9. It was the last miracle that passed through the hand of Moses before his death.

In this type of Christ we may observe, [1.] The deadly and destructive nature of sin, implied here. Guilt is like the pain of the biting of a fiery serpent; the power of corruption is like the venom diffused thereby. The devil is the old serpent, subtle at first, (Gen. 3: 1.) but ever since fiery, and his temptations fiery darts; his assaults terrifying, his victories destroying. Ask awakened consciences, ask damned sinners, and they will tell you, how charming soever the allurements of sin are, at the last it bites like a serpent. Prov. 23: 30-22. God's wrath against us for sin is as those fiery serpents which God sent among the people, to punish them for their murmurings. The curses of the law are as fiery serpents, so are all the tokens of divine wrath.

The case of poor sinners is deplorable; but it is desperate? Thanks be to God, it is not; there is balm in Gilead. The Son of man is lifted up, as the serpent of brass by Moses, which cured the Israelites. It was a serpent of brass, that cured them. Brass is bright; we read of Christ's feet shining like brass, Rev. 1: 19. It is divine, Christ is the same. It was made in the shape of a fiery serpent, and yet had no poison, no sting; fitly representing Christ, who was made Sin for us, and yet knew no sin. The serpent was a cursed creature, Christ was made a Curse. That which cured them, reminded them of their plague; so in Christ sin is set before us, most terrific. Secondly, It was lifted up upon a pole, and so must the Son of man be lifted up; thus it behooved Him, Luke 24: 26, 46. No remedy now. Christ is lifted up upon the cross. His death is called his being lifted up; ch. 12: 32, 33. He was lifted up as a spectacle, as a mark between heaven and earth, as if unworthy of either, and abandoned by both. In his exaltation, he was lifted up to the Father's right hand, to give repentance and remission; He was lifted up to the cross, to be further lifted up to the crown also, in the publishing and preaching of his everlasting Gospel, Rev. 14: 6. The serpent was lifted up, that all the thousands of Israel might see it. Christ in the Gospel is exhibited to us, evidently set forth; Christ is lifted up as an Engage, Isa. 11: 19. Thirdly, The serpent was lifted up by Moses. Christ was made under the law of Moses, and Moses testified of Him. Fourthly, Being thus lifted up, it was appointed for the cure of those that were bitten by fiery serpents; He that sent the plague provided the remedy; none could redeem and save us, but He whose justice had condemned us. It was God Himself that found the ransom, and the efficacy of it depends upon his appointment. The fiery serpents were sent to punish them for their tempting Christ; (so the apostle saith, 1 Cor. 10: 9.) and yet they were healed by virtue derived from Him. He whom we have offended, is our Peace.

The way of applying 'tis remedy, is by believing; which plainly alludes to the Israelites looking up to the brazen serpent, in order to be healed. If any stung Israelite were either so little sensible of his pain and peril, or had so little confidence in Moses, as not to look up to the brazen serpent, justly did he die of his wound; but every one that looked up, did well.

¶ From these words of our Lord we may learn, 1. That as the serpent was lifted up on the pole, or ensign, so Jesus Christ was lifted up on the cross. 2. That as the Israelites were healed by looking up to the brazen serpent, so sinners must look to Christ for salvation. 3. That as God provided no other remedy, than this looking, for the wounded Israelites, so He has provided no other way of salvation than faith in the blood of his Son. 4. That as he who looked at the brazen serpent, was cured and did live, so he that believeth on the Lord Jesus Christ shall not perish, but have eternal life. 5. That as neither the serpent, nor looking at it, but the invisible power of God healed the people, so neither the cross of Christ, nor his merely being crucified, but the pardon He has bought by his blood, communicated by the powerful energy of his Spirit, saves the souls of men.

Numb. 21: 9. If any so far slight either their disease by sin, or the method of cure by Christ, as not to embrace Christ, upon his own terms, their blood is upon their own head. He hath said, Look and be saved, (Isa. 45: 22,) look and live. We must take a complacency in, and give consent to, the methods which Infinite Wisdom has taken of saving a guilty world, by the mediation of Jesus Christ, as the great Sacrifice and Intercessor.

Great encouragements are given us by faith to look to Him. First, For this end He was lifted up, that his followers might be saved: and He will pursue his end. Secondly, The offer of salvation by Him, is general; that whosoever believes in Him, without exception, might have benefit by Him. Thirdly, The salvation offered is complete. 1. They shall not perish, by their wounds; though they may be pained and frightened, iniquity shall not be their ruin. But that is not all. 2. They shall have eternal life. They shall not only not die of their wounds in the wilderness, but they shall reach Canaan, (which the Israelites were then just ready to enter) the promised rest.

Christ came to save us by pardoning us, that we might not die by the sentence of the law, v. 16, 17. Here is gospel indeed, good news, the best that ever came from heaven. Here is much, here is all in a little; the word of reconciliation in miniature.

First, Here we have the great gospel-mystery revealed; God so loved the world, that He gave his only-begotten Son. The love of the Father is the original of our regeneration by the Spirit, and our reconciliation by the lifting up of the Son. Note, Christ is the only-begotten Son of God. This magnifies his love in giving Him for us; now know we that He loves us, when He has given his only-begotten Son for us, which speaks not only his dignity in Himself, but his dearness to his Father; He was always his delight. In order to the redemption and salvation of man, it pleased God to give his only-begotten Son. He not only gave or sent Him into the world with full power to negotiate a peace between heaven and earth, but He gave Him up as the great expiatory Sacrifice. It comes in here as a reason why He must be lifted up; for so it was determined and designed by the Father, who gave Him for this purpose, and prepared Him a body in order to it. His enemies could not have taken Him, if his Father had not given Him. Though He was not yet crucified, yet in the determinate counsel of God He was given up, Acts 2: 23. Nay, further, God has given Him, that is, made an offer of Him, to all true believers, to all the intents and purposes of the new covenant. He has given Him to be our Prophet, a Witness to the people; the High-Priest of our profession; our Peace; the Head of the Church, and Head over all things to the church; to be to us all we need. Herein God has commended his love to the world; God so loved the world; so really, so richly. His creatures shall see that He loves them, and wishes them well. He so loved the world of fallen man, as He did not love that of fallen angels; see Rom. 5: 8. 1 John 4: 10. Behold, and wonder, that the great God should love such a worthless world. That the holy God should love such a wicked world with a love of good will, when He could not look upon it with any complacency! This was a time of love indeed, Ezek. 16: 7, 8. The Jews vainly conceived that the Messiah should be sent only to their nation, and to advance that upon the sins of their neighbors; but Christ tells them that He came in love to the whole world, Gentiles as well as Jews, 1 John 2: 2. Though many of the world of mankind perish, yet God's giving his only-begotten Son was an instance of his love to the whole world, because through Him there is a general offer of life and salvation to all. It is love to the revolted province, to issue a proclamation of pardon to all that will come in, plead it upon their knees, and return to their allegiance. So far God loved the apostate world, that He sent his Son with this proposal, that whosoever believes in Him shall not perish. Salvation has been of the Jews, but now Christ is known as a common Salvation.

Secondly, Here is the great gospel-duty, to believe in Jesus Christ, whom God hath thus given; to accept the gift, and answer the intention of the Giver. We must give an unfeigned consent to the record God hath given concerning His Son. God having given Him to be our Prophet, Priest, and King, we must give up ourselves to be ruled, and taught, and saved, by Him.

Thirdly, Here is the great gospel benefit, That whosoever believes in Christ shall not perish. This He said before, and here repeats it. It is the unspeakable happiness of all true believers, for which they are eternally indebted to Christ, that they are saved from the miseries of hell, from going down to the pit; God has taken away their sin, they shall not die. They are entitled to the joys of heaven: they shall have everlasting life. The convicted traitor is not only pardoned, but proffered, and treated as one whom the King of kings delights to honor. Out of prison, he cometh to reign. Eccl. 4: 14. If believers, then children; and if children, then heirs.

Here is God's design in sending his Son into the world; that the world through Him might be saved. He came into the world with salvation in his eye, with salvation in his hand. Therefore the afore-mentioned offer of life and salvation is sincere, and shall be made good to all that by faith accept it; (v. 17.) God sent his Son into this apostate world, as his Ambassador; nor as sometimes He had sent angels into the world, as visitants, but as resident. Even since man sinned, he has dreaded the appearance of any special messenger from heaven, as being conscious of guilt, and looking for judgment; We shall surely die, for we have seen God. If therefore the Son of God Himself come, we are concerned to inquire on what errand He comes; Is it peace? Or, as they asked Samuel trembling, Comest thou peaceably? And this Scripture returns the answer, Peaceably.

First, He did not come to condemn the world. We had reason enough to expect that He would, for it is convicted, and what cause can be shown why judgment should not be given according to law? That one blood of which all men are made, (Acts 17: 26,) is not only tainted with a hereditary disease, like Gehazi's leprosy, but that it is tainted with a hereditary guilt, like that of the Amalekites, with whom God had war from generation to generation; and justly may such a world be condemned; and if God would have sent to condemn it, He had angels at command, to pour out the vials of his wrath; cherubim with flaming sword. If the Lord had been pleased to kill us, He would not have sent his Son among us. He came with full power indeed to execute judgment, (ch. 5: 22, 27,) but did not begin with a judgment of condemnation, nor take advantage against us for the breach of the covenant of innocence; but put us upon a new trial before a throne of grace.

Secondly, He came that the world through Him might be saved; that a door of salvation might be opened, and whoever would might enter in. God was in Christ reconciling the world to Himself, and so saving it. An act of indemnity is published, a remedial law made; and mankind dealt with, not according to the rigors of the first covenant, but according to the riches of the second; that the world through Him might be saved; it could never be saved but through Him; there is salvation in no other. This is good news to a convinced conscience, healing to broken bones and bleeding wounds, that Christ, our Judge, came not to condemn, but to save.

From all this is inferred the happiness of true believers; (v. 18.) He that believeth on Him, is not condemned. Though a great sinner, and convicted by his own confession, yet, upon his believing, judgment is arrested, and he is not condemned. This speaks more than a reprieve; he is not condemned, that is, he is acquitted; and if not condemned, he is discharged—he is not judged, not dealt with in strict justice according to his sins. He is accused, and he cannot plead not guilty, but he can plead in bar to the indictment, as Paul does, Who is he that condemns? It is Christ that died. He is afflicted, chastened of God, persecuted by the world; but not condemned. The cross perhaps lies heavy upon him, but he is saved from the curse: condemned by the world, it may be, but not with the world, Rom. 8: 1. 1 Cor. 11: 32.

IV. Christ, in the close, discourses concerning the deplorable condition of those that Man's redemption originated in the love of God to 'the whole world, trying in wickedness,' or 'the wicked one.' 1 John 5: 19. The expedient adopted, exposed the desert of their sin more, than would the eternal punishment of the whole race. The world, or the race of men, (not merely Israel, as the Jews supposed,) is therefore borne with, as under a dispensation of mercy; sinners in general are called on to believe in Christ, and partake of the blessing; believers without exception are saved. Scott.

proves its divine original. Light is discovering, and truly sweet, and rejoices the heart. It is a light shining in a dark place, and a dark place indeed the world would be without it. It is come into all the world, (Col. 1: 6.) and not confined, as the Old Testament light was. It is the

Observe, (1.) How great the sin of unbelievers; it is aggravated from the dignity of the Person they slight; they believe not in the name of the only-begotten Son of God, who is infinitely true, and deserves to be believed; infinitely good, and deserves to be embraced. God sent One to save us, that was dearest to Himself; and shall not He be dearest to us? Shall we not believe on Him, who has a name above every name? (2.) How great the misery of unbelievers; they are condemned already; which speaks, [1.] A certain condemnation. They are as sure to be condemned in the judgment of the great day, as if they were condemned already. [2.] A present condemnation. The curse, the wrath of God, now fastens upon them. They are condemned already, for their own hearts condemn them. [3.] Condemnation is grounded upon their former guilt. He is condemned already, lies open to the law for all his sins; the obligation of the law is in full force against him, because he is not by faith interested in the Gospel; he is condemned already, because he has not believed. Unbelief may truly be called the great damning sin; it leaves us under the guilt of all our other sins; it is a sin against the remedy; against our appeal.

Read also the doom of those that would not so much as know Him, v. 19. Many inquisitive people had knowledge of Christ, his doctrine and miracles, but were prejudiced and would not believe, while the generality were sotsitly careless and stupid, and would not know Him. This is the condemnation, the sin that ruined them, that light is come into the world, and they loved darkness rather. The Gospel is light, and while the gospel came, light came into the world. Light is self-evidencing, so is the Gospel, it unpeakable folly of most men, that they love darkness rather than this light. The Jews loved the shadows of their law, and the instructions of their blind guides, rather than the doctrine of Christ. The Gentiles loved the superstitious services of an unknown God, ignorantly worshipped, rather than the reasonable service which the Gospel enjoins. Sinners, wedded to their lusts, love their ignorance which supports them in their sin: safer than the truths of Christ, who would part them from their sins. Man's apostasy began in forbidden knowledge, but is kept up by forbidden ignorance. Wretched man is in love with his sickness, his slavery, and will not be made free nor whole. The true reason why men love darkness rather than light is, their deeds are evil. They love darkness because they think it is an excuse for their evil deeds; they hate the light, because it robs them of the good opinion they had of themselves, by showing them their sinfulness and misery. Their case is sad; and, because they will not mend it, they will not see it. Wilful ignorance is so far from excusing sin, that it will aggravate the condemnation; This is the condemnation that ruins souls, they shut their eyes against the light, and will not so much as parley with Christ and his Gospel; they set God so much at defiance, that they desire not the knowledge of his ways, Job 21: 14. We must account in the judgment, not only for the knowledge we had, and used not, but for the knowledge we might have had, and would not; not only for the knowledge we sinned against, but for the knowledge we sinned away.

According as men's hearts and lives are good or bad, they stand affected to the light of Christ.

It is not strange, if those that do evil, and resolve to persist in it, hate the light of Christ's Gospel; for it is a common observation, that every one that doeth evil, hateth the light, v. 20. Evil-doers seek concealment, out of shame, and fear of punishment; see Job 24: 13, &c. Sinful

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 12-21. If more obvious truths be rejected, we need not wonder, that the mysteries of redemption are controverted; for how can men believe that the Creator of all worlds atoned for the sins of his enemies by his death; when they are not sensible, that their hearts must be changed before they can delight in the joys of heaven? If they do not believe that, which is as capable of illustration and comprehension, as earthly things in general; how can they believe that the Son of man was so 'One with the Father,' that He was in heaven when teaching here on earth; and that He actually is present with his people, now that 'he ever liveth to appear in the presence of God for them?' These are 'heavenly things,' and out of the reach of all, 'no judge of God by carnal sense or blind reason: yet in their is contained the great plan of God for 'destroying the works of the devil,' and the healing of those who have been wounded with the venom of the serpent. However infidels may deride or revile; still Christ crucified, beheld with the eye of faith, brings salvation to perishing sinners; and there is no other way of escaping everlasting misery. But if we so look to Him as to be saved from wrath, we shall also be delivered from the power of sin, restored gradually to spiritual health, and transformed into the image of Christ.—Words can never express the love of God to a sinful world, in 'giving His only-begotten Son' to be the 'propitiation for our sins.' Did it ever enter into the heart of an earthly prince to give his only son, to suffer death, in order that he might honorably save the lives of traitors? Yet even this would be little and mean, compared with the love of God to rebellious man. But though God is so ready to pardon all who 'believe in the name of his Son,' yet his infinite love will lead to the deeper condemnation of all, who 'neglect so great salvation.' The believer 'is not condemned,' and 'shall not come into condemnation;' but the unbeliever 'is condemned already;' the wrath of God abideth on him; and he is continually under a load, which is sufficient to sink him to everlasting misery. Nor is this unbelief a light matter: it springs from enmity against God, and from love of sin. 'Men love darkness rather than light, because their deeds are evil;' but this would not have been so fully proved, if 'Light had not come into the world,' and been hated by them. And is it proper that men should hate God, and love wickedness and Satan's service, with impunity? They may shelter themselves under some plausible pretext, or varnish it over with specious appearances; but they have a secret hatred of the truth, because it opposes their favorite iniquities; they wish to disbelieve, and then seek for arguments to satisfy themselves in infidelity. Let us remember it: The Judge has declared, that unbelief springs from this source, and that 'every one who doeth truth cometh to the light, that his deeds may be made manifest that they are wrought in God.' Let us judge ourselves, and bring our characters and conduct to his Word; let us beseech Him to discover to us our motives, and to prevent our being deceived by Satan and our own hearts, and so lead us in the way to everlasting life. Scott.

Verses 19-21.

Unbelief is not a mere speculative mistake, into which an honest mind may be led; it originates from the wickedness and enmity of the heart to God. Men left to themselves, love ignorance, delusion, superstition, or infidelity, in preference to his light because more congenial to the pride, and rebellion of their hearts, and the secret or open wickedness of their lives. For every one, who habitually loves and practises evil, hates and shuns that which exposes it: thus men keep aloof from the true Gospel, and run into various perversions of it: lest it should unsettle their consciences, interfere with their sin, or detect their presumptuous confidence. (Notes, Job 24: 13-17. Eph. 5: 8-14.) But he, who acts uprightly and conscientiously, and desires to know and do the will of God, is glad to bring his creed, his character, and private spirit and conduct to the Light, that he may be directed; and that it may be made manifest that 'his works are wrought in God,' by virtue of union with Him, and grace derived from Him. These are important truths of general application: yet they were spoken with peculiar reference to the Pharisees; and it was thus declared, that the opposition, which would be made by them, to Jesus and his doctrine, arose from the wickedness of their hearts and lives, which could not endure [630]

the light of his spiritual ministry. Nicodemus, therefore, and those to whom he might report the result of this conference, were warned not to 'reject the counsel of God against themselves.' Some think that the conduct of Nicodemus, in coming to Jesus by night, as if he 'loved darkness rather than light,' is gently reprov'd. Scott.

(19.) Condemnation.] 'From the context it is plain, that by the word translated condemnation is meant the cause of eternal condemnation, or the manner in which men incur eternal condemnation. So Chrysostom, Beza, Piscator, Kuinoel, Rosenm., Schoettgen, &c.' BLOOMFIELD.

(21.) Doeth truth.] "Properly speaking," says Schoettgen, "we cannot do the truth, but tell it. Therefore the idea of truth here and in some other passages of the N. T. is right, see 2. 1. 1. phrase, he that practices truth, often occurs as the character of a good man; comp. Ps. 119: 30. Is. 26: 2. 1 Pet. 1: 23. 1 John 1: 6, and 2 John c. 4. and it is used with great propriety, see there is really a truth or falsehood in actions as in words. (Of the same kind, the beautiful opposition, is the phrase, "maketh" or "practiseth" a lie, used more than once by St. John. And see Rev. 11: 7. 22: 15." L. CAMPBELL.

22 ¶ After these things came Jesus and his disciples into the land of Judea; and there he tarried with them,^a and baptized.

23 And John also was baptizing in Ænon,^b near to Salim, because there was much water there: and they came, and were baptized.

works are works of darkness, Job 31: 53. The light shakes the wicked, Job 33: 12, 13. Thus the Gospel is a terror to the wicked world; They come not to this light, but keep as far off as they can, lest their deeds should be reprov'd. Note, First, The light of the Gospel is sent into the world, to reprove the evil deeds of sinners; (Eph. 6: 13.) to show people their transgressions; to show that to be sin, which was not thought to be so; and to show them the evil of their transgressions, that sin by the new commandment might appear exceeding sinful. The Gospel has its convictions, to make way for its consolations. Secondly, It is for this reason that evil-doers hate the light of the Gospel. There were those who had done evil, and were sorry for it, who bade this light welcome, as the publicans and harlots. But he that doeth evil, and resolves to go on in it, hateth the light, cannot bear to be told of his faults. All that opposition which the Gospel of Christ has met with in the world, comes from the wicked heart, in Christ is hated because sin is loved. Thirdly, They who do not come to the light, thereby evidence a secret hatred of the light. If they had not an antipathy to knowledge, they would not sit down so contentedly in damning ignorance.

On the other hand, upright hearts, that approve themselves to God, bid this light welcome; (p. 21.) He that doeth truth, cometh to the light. Though the Gospel had many enemies, it had some friends. It is a common observation, that truth seeks no corners. They who are honest dread not a scrutiny, but desire it; so it is applicable to the gospel-light; as it convinces and terrifies evil-doers, so it confirms and comforts those that walk in their integrity. Observe here,

First, The character of a good man. 1. He is one that doeth truth; that is, acteth truly and sincerely in all he doeth. Though sometimes he come short of doing the good he would, yet he doeth truth; he has his infirmities, but holds fast his integrity; as Gaius, that did faithfully; (3 John 5.) as Paul, (2 Cor. 1: 12.) as Nathanael, (ch. 1: 47.) as Asa, 1 Kings 16: 14. 2. He is one that cometh to the light. He is ready to receive and entertain divine revelation, as far as it appears to him to be so, what uneasiness soever it may create him. He that doeth truth, is willing to know the truth by himself, and to have his deeds made manifest. A good man is much in trying himself, and desirous that God would try him, Ps. 26: 2. He is solicitous to know what the will of God is, and resolves to do it, though ever so contrary to his own will.

Secondly, The character of a good work is, it is wrought in God, in union with Him by a covenanting faith, and in communion with Him by devout affections. Our works are good, and will bear the test, when the will of God is the rule, and the glory of God the end of them; when they are done in his strength, and for his sake, to Him, and not to men; and if by the light of the Gospel it be manifest to us that our works are thus wrought, then shall we have rejoicing, Gal. 6: 4. 2 Cor. 1: 1, 2.

Thus far we have Christ's discourse with Nicodemus; it is probable that much more passed between them, and it had a good effect, for we find (ch. 19: 39.) that Nicodemus, though puzzled at first, afterwards became a faithful disciple of Christ.

Verses 22-24.

It is remarkable, that we read nothing of the apostles or disciples baptizing, before our Lord's ascension, except in those few passages of John's gospel. Yet the disciples of Jesus are expressly distinguished from those of John: and at this time He made and baptized more disciples than John. (4: 1.) It must then be supposed, that the disciples of Jesus were baptized in his name: and that this baptism discriminated them, not only from those Jews who had been baptized, but also from those who had been baptized by John as his disciples, yet had not become the professed disciples of Jesus, and received his baptism. But Christian baptism, 'into the name of our Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost,' was at this time not instituted: and as circumcision still continued in force, as the initiatory sacrament of the Abrahamic and Mosaic covenants, the baptism of Jesus was doubtless of adults alone. It appears then to me, that all, who at this time or afterwards, during our Lord's personal ministry, who by means of John's testimony, or in other ways, professed themselves the disciples of Jesus, as the Messiah, the Son of God, in an intelligent manner, were baptized in the name of Jesus: and whether He personally baptized any individuals or not, (for the language may only mean, that, in general He did not baptize, but his disciples,) all those above described were thus baptized, though we do not further read of it. Among these we may number the one hundred and twenty, who met at Jerusalem after the day of Pentecost, and most of the five hundred brethren to whom He appeared at Galilee, to that time the institution of Christian baptism, just before our Lord's ascension, those who had thus been baptized in his name, were not re-baptized. Nor were they considered as unbaptized persons; neither should they be adjudged, as a precedent for unbaptized persons being employed in preaching the Gospel, and baptizing others, or receiving and administering the Lord's supper. Whether either John, or Jesus during his personal ministry, baptized women, is no where expressly said: and the argument about the subjects and mode of baptism has no immediate connection with the subject: for that rests exclusively on those scriptures which relate to baptism, as superseding circumcision, in becoming the true sign and seal of the covenant. The evangelist here speaks of 25 Bartol's imprisonment, as well known; but no where mentions further particulars, either of that, or of his being put to death by Herod. Had he not been satisfied, that these important facts remov'd often, as the patriarchs in their journeys. As it was a good part of his humiliation, that He had no certain dwelling-place, but was in journeys often, so it was an instance of his unwearied industry in his work that He went about in prosecution of it; many a weary step He took to do good to souls. The Sun of righteousness took a large circuit to diffuse his light and heat, Ps. 19: 6.

He was not wont to stay long at Jerusalem; though He went frequently thither, yet He soon returned into the country; after He had had this discourse with Nicodemus, He came into the land of Judea; not so much for greater privacy, (though mean and obscure places best suited his humble state,) but for greater usefulness; his preaching and miracles, perhaps, made most noise at Jerusalem, the fountain-head of news, but did least good there, where the most considerable men of the Jewish church had so much the ascendancy.

When He came into the land of Judea, his disciples came with Him; for these were they that continued with Him in his temptations. Many that flocked to Him at Jerusalem, would not follow Him into the country, they had no business there; but his disciples attended Him. If the ark remove, it is better to remove and go after it (as they did, Josh. 3: 3.) than sit still without it, though it be in Jerusalem itself.

There He tarried with them, conversed with them. He did not retire into the country for his pleasure, but for more free conversation with his followers. See Cant. 7: 11, 12. Note, Those that are ready to go with Christ, shall find Him as ready to stay with them. It is supposed that He staid five or six months in this country.

There He baptized such as believed in Him, and had more honesty and courage than those at Jerusalem, ch. 2: 24. John began to baptize in the land of Judea, (Matt. 3: 1.) therefore Christ began there, for John had said, There comes one after me. He baptized not with his own hand, but his disciples by his order and directions; as appears, ch. 4: 2. His disciples' baptizing was his baptizing. Holy ordinances are Christ's, though administered by weak men.

John continued in his work, as long as his opportunities lasted, v. 23, 24.

1. John was baptizing. Christ's baptism was, for substance, the same with John's, for he bore witness to Christ, and therefore they did not interfere. But Christ began to preach and had been recorded by other divinely inspired writers, he would hardly have passed them over in this manner, after having so particularly insisted on the ministry and testimony of John. This confirms the opinion, that he intended his gospel, as a kind of supplement to the three other gospels, which had before been published.

(23.) In Ænon. [A place eight miles southward from Scythopolis, between Salim and Jordan.] There was much water. [This was equally necessary, where such multitudes were baptized, whether the ceremony were performed either by dipping or sprinkling. But as the Jewish custom required the persons to stand in the water, and having been instructed, and entered into a covenant to renounce all idolatry, and take the God of Israel for their God, then plunge themselves under the water; it is probable that the rite was thus performed at Ænon.] But could a northern climate admit of this dipping with safety at least a great part of the year? We may rest assured that it would not. And may we not presume, that, if John had opened his commission in the north, for many months of the year, he would have dipped neither man nor woman, unless he could have procured a tepid bath? Those who are dipped or immersed in water, in the name of the Holy Trinity, I believe to be evangelically baptized. Those who are washed or sprinkled with water, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, I believe to be equally so; and the repetition of such a baptism I believe to be profane. Others have a right to the contrary, if they see good. After all, it is the thing signified, and not the mode, which is the essential part of the sacrament. Dr. A. CLARKE.

Much water. [Beza and Piscator, not observing the Hebrews, have rendered this, many rivers. Grotius, Lampe, Rosenm., and Kuinoel, however, rightly explain plenty of water; and such, indeed, would be required by the mode of baptism then generally (though, as Lightfoot proves, not universally) adopted, namely, by immersion. In this sense the word translated 'waters' often occurs in the Apocalypse. So also it was taken by Nonnus.]

I cannot avoid the belief, that the original phrase, as Beza says, to designate "many streams," or "rivers." John chose a place abounding in these, when he removed from the banks of Jordan in order that the multitude who flocked to him might be accommodated.

2. The matter in dispute was about purifying, or religious washing. (1.)

We may suppose that John's disciples cried up his baptism, as superior to all others, and gave it the preference, as perfecting and superseding all the purifications of the Jews; they were in the right; but young converts are too apt to boast of their attainments; whereas he that has found the treasure, should hale it till he is sure that he has it, and not talk of it too much at first. (2.)

No doubt the Jews applauded the purifications that were instituted by Moses, and those that were imposed by the tradition of the elders; for the former they had a divine warrant, and for the latter the usage of the church. It is very likely that the Jews, in this dispute, when they could not deny the excellent nature of John's baptism, raised an objection against it from 'his baptism, which gave occasion for the complaint that follows; v. 26.

'Here is John baptizing in one place, and Jesus in another; and therefore John's baptism is dangerous to peace; for it opens a door to endless parties. Now that John has begun, we shall have every little teacher set up for a baptist presently.' Or, 'At the best, it is imperfect. If John's baptize before John laid it down, that He might be ready to receive John's disciples when he should be taken off, and so the wheels might be kept going. It is a comfort to useful men, when they are going off the stage, to see those rising up, who are likely to fill their place. John continued to preach and baptize, though Christ had taken it up; for he would still, according to the measure given to him, advance the interests of God's kingdom. There was still work for John to do, for Christ was not yet generally known, nor the minds of people thoroughly prepared for Him by repentance. From heaven John had received his command, and he would go on till he received his countermand, and would have his dismission from the same hand that commissioned him. He does not come in to Christ, lest it should look like a combination between them; but he goes on with his work, till Providence lays him aside. The greater gifts of some do not render the labors of others needless; there is work enough for all. They are sullen, that will do nothing, when they see themselves outshone. Though we have but one talent, we must account for that; and when we see ourselves going off, must yet go on to the last.

2. He baptized in Enon near Salim, places no where else mentioned; and therefore we are at a loss where to find them; wherever it was, it seems that John removed from place to place; he did not think that there was any virtue in Jordan, because Jesus was baptized there; but as he saw cause, removed to other waters. Ministers must follow their opportunities; and he chose a place where there were many waters, that is, many streams of water; so that wherever he met with any that were willing to submit to his baptism, water was at hand to baptize them; shallow, perhaps, as is usual where there are many brooks, but such as would serve his purpose. And in that country, plenty of water was a valuable thing.

3. Though people did not come in such crowds, as when he first appeared, yet he was not without encouragement; there were still those that attended and owned him. Some refer this both to John and to Jesus: They came, and were baptized; that is, some came to John, some to Jesus; and, as their baptism was one, so were their hearts.

4. It is noted, (v. 24.) that John was not yet cast into prison, to clear the order of the story, and to show that these passages (ch. 2. and 3.) are to come in before Matt. 4:12. John never desisted from his work as long as he had his liberty; nay, he seems to have been the more industrious, because he foresaw his time was short; he was not yet cast into prison, but he expected it, ch. 9:4.

A contest between John's disciples and the Jews, about purifying, v. 25. The gospel of Christ came not to send peace upon earth, but division.

The disputants were some of John's disciples, and the Jews who had not submitted to his baptism of repentance. Penitents and impenitents divide this sinful world. In this contest, it would seem, John's disciples were the aggressors, and gave the challenge; they were novices, who had more zeal than discretion. The truths of God have often suffered by the rashness of some that have undertaken to defend them before they were able.

2. The matter in dispute was about purifying, or religious washing. (1.) We may suppose that John's disciples cried up his baptism, as superior to all others, and gave it the preference, as perfecting and superseding all the purifications of the Jews; they were in the right; but young converts are too apt to boast of their attainments; whereas he that has found the treasure, should hale it till he is sure that he has it, and not talk of it too much at first. (2.) No doubt the Jews applauded the purifications that were instituted by Moses, and those that were imposed by the tradition of the elders; for the former they had a divine warrant, and for the latter the usage of the church. It is very likely that the Jews, in this dispute, when they could not deny the excellent nature of John's baptism, raised an objection against it from 'his baptism, which gave occasion for the complaint that follows; v. 26. 'Here is John baptizing in one place, and Jesus in another; and therefore John's baptism is dangerous to peace; for it opens a door to endless parties. Now that John has begun, we shall have every little teacher set up for a baptist presently.' Or, 'At the best, it is imperfect. If John's baptism, which you cry up thus, have any good in it, the baptism of Jesus goes beyond it, so that you are shaded already by a greater light, and your baptism is gone out of request.' Thus objections are made against the Gospel, from the advancement and improvement of gospel-light as if childhood and marriage were contrary to each other, and the superstructure were against the foundation. There was no reason to object Christ's baptism against John's, for they consisted very well.

John's disciples made complaint to their master concerning Christ and his baptizing, v. 26. They, being non-plussed by the fore-mentioned objection, and probably ruffled by it, come to their master, and tell him, 'Rabbi, he that was with thee, and was baptized of thee, is now set up for himself; He baptizeth, and all men come to Him; and wilt thou suffer it?' Their love for disputing occasioned this. It is common for men, when they find themselves run around in disputation, to fall upon those that do no harm. If these disciples of John had not undertaken to dispute about purifying, before they understood the doctrine of baptism, they might have answered the objection without passion. In their complaint, they speak respectfully to their own master, Rabbi; but speak very slightly of our Savior, though they do not name Him.

They suggest that Christ's setting up a baptism of his own was presumption, very unaccountable; as if John, having first set up this rite, must have the monopoly of it, and, as it were, a patent for the invention; 'He that was with thee beyond Jordan, as a disciple, behold the same baptizes, and takes thy work out of thy hand.' Thus the voluntary condescensions of the Lord Jesus, as that of his being baptized by John, are often unjustly turned to his reproach.

They suggest that it was a piece of ingratitude to John. He to whom thou bearest witness, baptizes; as if Jesus owed his reputation to John, and yet had very unworthily improved it to the prejudice of John. But Christ needed not John's testimony, ch. 5:36. He reflected more honor upon John than He received from him; yet thus it is incident to us to think that others are more indebted to us than really they are. Christ's baptism was not an impeachment, but the greatest improvement, of John's baptism; which was but to lead the way to Christ's. John was just to Christ, in bearing witness to Him; and Christ, answering to his testimony, did rather enrich than impoverish John's ministry.

They conclude that it would be a total eclipse to John's baptism; 'All men come to Him; they that used to follow with us, now flock after Him, it is therefore time to look about us.' It was not indeed strange that all men came to Him. As far as Christ is manifested, He will be magnified; but why should John's disciples grieve? Note, Aiming at the monopoly of honor and respect, has been in all ages the bane of the church, and the shame of its members and ministers; as also a rying of interests, and a jealousy of rivalry and competition. We mistake if we think that the gifts and usefulness of one, are a disparagement to another that has obtained mercy to be faithful; for the Spirit dispenses to every one severally as He will. Paul rejoiced in the usefulness even of those that opposed him, Phil. 1:8. We must leave it to God to choose and honor his own instruments as He pleaseth, and not covet to be placed alone.

John's disciples expected that he would resent this matter, as they did; but Christ's manifestation to Israel was no surprise to John, but what he looked for; it was no disturbance to him, but what he wished for. He therefore checked the complaint, as Moses, Enraged thou for my sake? and took this occasion to confirm the testimonies he had formerly borne to Christ, cheerfully consigning to Him all the in-

The Spirit without measure, (p. 34.) shall they gudge at it? The same reason will hold as to others. If God is pleased to give to others more ability and success than to us, shall we be displeased at it, and reflect upon Him as unjust and partial? see Matt. 20: 15. We should not be discontented, though inferior to others in gifts and usefulness, and eclipsed by their excellences. John was ready to own that it was the free gift of heaven, that made him a preacher, a prophet, a Baptist: it was God that gave him the interest he had in the love and esteem of the people, and if now his interest decline, God's will be done! He that gives, may take. What we receive from heaven, we must take as it is given. John never received a commission for a perpetual, but only for a temporary office, which must soon expire; and therefore, when he has fulfilled his ministry, he can contentedly see it go out of date. Some give quite another sense of these words; John had taken pains with his disciples, to teach them that Christ should be preferred before him; and yet they dote upon John, and grudge this preference of Christ above him; Well, saith John, I see a man can receive, that is, perceive, nothing, except it be given him from heaven. The labor of ministers is lost labor, unless the grace of God make it effectual. Men do not understand that which is made most plain, nor believe that which is made most evident, unless it be given them from heaven to understand and believe it.

John appeals to the testimony he had formerly given concerning Christ; (p. 18.) You can bear me witness, that I said, I am not the Christ, but I am sent before Him. John was, in his testimony to Christ, not as a reed shaken with the wind; neither the frowns of the chief priests, nor the flatteries of his own disciples, could make him change. This serves here as a conviction to his disciples, of the unreasonableness of their complaint. They had spoken of the witness which their master bore to Jesus; v. 26. 'Now,' saith John, 'do not you remember what the testimony was that I bore? Call that to mind, and you will see your cavil answered. Did I not say, I am not the Christ? Why then do you set me up as a rival with Him? Did I not say, I am sent before Him? Why then does it seem strange to you that I should give way to Him?' It is a comfort to himself, that he had never given his disciples any occasion thus to set him up in competition with Christ: but, on the contrary, had particularly cautioned them against this mistake. It is a satisfaction to faithful ministers, if they have done what they could to prevent extravagances that their people ran into. John had not only not encouraged them to hope that he was the Messiah, but had plainly told them the contrary; which was now a satisfaction to him. It is a common excuse for those who have undue honor paid them, If the people will be deceived, let them; but that is an ill maxim for those whose business is to undeceive people. The lip of truth shall be established.

John was so far from regretting the advancement of Christ and his interest, as his disciples did, that he rejoiced in it. This he expresses, (v. 29.) by an elegant simile. [1.] He compares our Savior to the bridegroom; 'He that has the bride, is the bridegroom. Do all men come to Him?' It is well; whither else should they go? Has He the throne in men's affections? Who else should have it. It is his right; to whom should the bride be brought out to the bridegroom? Christ was prophesied of as a Bridegroom, Ps. 45. 'The Word was made flesh, that the disparity of nature might not be a bar to the union. Provision is made for purifying the church, that sin might be no bar. Christ espouses his church to Himself; He has the bride, for He has her love; the church is subject to Christ. As far as particular souls are devoted to Him in faith and love, so far the Bridegroom has the bride. He compares himself to the friend of the bridegroom, who attends upon him, to do him honor and service, uses his interest on his behalf, rejoices when the point is gained, and he has the bride. All that John had done in preaching and baptizing was to introduce Him; now that He was come he had what he wished for; The friend of the Bridegroom stands, and hears Him: expecting and waiting for Him; rejoices with joy because of the Bridegroom's voice, because He is come to the marriage long expected. Note, First, Faithful ministers are friends of the Bridegroom, to recommend Him to the children of men; to bring messages from Him; and herein they must be faithful to Him. Secondly, The friends of the Bridegroom must stand, and hear the Bridegroom's voice; must receive and attend his orders; must desire to have proofs of Christ's speaking in them, and with them; (2 Cor. 13: 8.) that is the Bridegroom's voice. Thirdly, The espousing of souls to Christ in faith and love, is the fulfilling of the duty of every good minister. If the day of Christ's espousals be the day of the gladness of his heart, (Cant. 3:11.) it cannot but be theirs, too, who love Him, and wish well to his kingdom. Surely they have no greater joy.

He owns that the reputation and interest of Christ should be advanced, and his own diminished; (v. 30.) He must increase, and I must decrease. If they grieve at the growing greatness of Jesus, they will have more and more occasion to grieve, as they have, that indulge themselves in envy and emulation. John speaks of Christ's increase, and of his own decrease, not only as unavoidable, but as highly just and agreeable. He was well pleased to see the kingdom of Christ getting ground; 'He must increase. You think He has gained, but it is nothing to what He will gain.' Note, The kingdom of Christ is, and will be, a growing kingdom, like the light of the morning, like the grain of mustard-seed. He was not at all displeased at the diminishing of his own interest; I must decrease. Created excellencies must decrease; I have seen an end of all perfection. Note, First, The shining forth of the glory of Christ eclipses the lustre of all other glory. The glory that stands in competition with Christ, that of the world and the flesh, loses ground in the soul, as the knowledge and love of Christ increase; but it is here spoken of that which is subservient to Him. As the light of the morning increases, that of the morning-star decreases. Secondly, If our abasement may in the least contribute to advance Christ's name, we must cheerfully submit and be content to be any thing, or nothing, so that Christ may be all.

John Baptist advances Christ, and instructs his disciples concerning Him, that instead of grieving that so many come to Him, they might come themselves.

He that cometh from above, is above all. He came from heaven; which speaks not only his divine extraction, but his divine nature. He had, before his conception, a heavenly being. None but He that came from heaven, was fit to show us the will of heaven, or the way to heaven. When God would save man, He sent from above. Hence his sovereign authority; He is above all things and all persons, God over all, blessed forevermore. It is daring presumption to dispute precedence with Him. When we come to speak of the honors of the Lord Jesus, we find they transcend all conception and ex-

Verses 29, 30.

'The voice of the bridegroom and bride frequently mean in the O. T. (Jer. 7: 34. 16: 9. 25: 10. 33: 11.) the festivity and expressions of joy at a wedding. Thus the nuptial benediction still usual among the Jews is, "Praised be Thou, our Lord God, King of the world, who hast created joy and cheerfulness, the bride of the world, singing, delight, love, relationship, peace, and friendship!" Soon ... let there be heard ... the voice of joy and of mirth, ... the voice of the rejoicing couple under the nuptial canopy, and of the youths whose music is heard at the entertainment.' "The bridegroom himself," says Boetius, "is, besides, obliged to sing in honor of the bride before the wedding feast." The office of the bride-man, to whom John compares himself, lasted only seven days; but the bridegroom became the husband. He must increase, but I must decrease. RICHMOND.

Such hyperboles are closely connected in the high-wrought pathos, such as that which breathes in this beautiful passage; they are also especially employed by those who speak under the influence of anger, envy or any of the stronger passions, as in v. 26. fieth nothing but what He had seen and heard, what He was thoroughly acquainted with. What He discovered of the divine nature and of the invisible world, was what He had seen; what He revealed of the mind of God, He had heard immediately from Him. The prophets testified what was made known to them in dreams, by the mediation of angels, but not what they had seen and heard. John was the crier's voice, that said, 'Make room for the witness, and keep silence while the charge is given,' but then leaves it to the witness to give in his testimony, and the judge to give the charge. The Gospel of Christ is not a doubtful opinion, like a new notion in philosophy, which every one is at liberty to believe or not; but it is a revelation of the mind of God; eternal truth in itself, and of infinite concern to us. See his divine grace and goodness: that which He had seen and heard, because He knew it nearly concerned us, He was pleased to make known to us. What Paul had seen and heard in the third heavens, he could not testify; (2 Cor. 12:4.) but Christ knew how to utter what He had seen and heard. Christ's preaching is here called his testifying; to denote, (1.) The convincing evidence of it; it was not reported as by hearsay, but was testified as evidence in court, with great caution and assurance. (2.) The affectionate earnestness of the delivery of it; it was testified with concern and importunity, as Acts 18:5.

From the certainty of Christ's doctrine, John takes occasion to lament the infidelity of men; though He testifies what is infallibly true, yet very few, comparatively, receive it. This He speaks of, not only as matter of wonder, (Who hath believed our report? How stupid and foolish are the greatest part of mankind; what enemies to themselves!) but as matter of grief: John's disciples grieved that all men came to Christ; (v. 26.) they thought his followers too many. But John grieves that no man came to Him; he thought them too few. Note, The unbelief of sinners is the grief of saints. It was for this that St. Paul had great heaviness, Rom. 9:2. He that hath received his testimony, (such there were, though very few,) hath set to his seal that God is true. God is true, though we do not set our seal to it; his truth needs not our faith to support it, but we do ourselves honor and justice by subscribing to his truth, and hereby God reckons Himself honored. God's promises are all yea and ay; by faith we put our amen to them, as Rev. 22:20. Observe, He that receives the testimony of Christ, subscribes not only to the truth of Christ, but to the truth of God, for his name is the word of God; the commandments of God, and the testimony of Christ are put together, Rev. 12:17. By believing in Christ we set to our seal, First, That God is true to all the promises which He has made concerning Christ, by the mouth of all his holy prophets; what He swore to our fathers, is all accomplished, Luke 1:70., &c. Acts 13:32, 33. Secondly, That He is true to all the promises He has made in Christ; we venture our souls upon God's veracity, satisfied that He is true; we are willing to deal with Him upon trust, and to quit all in this world for a happiness in reversion and out of sight. By this we greatly honor God's faithfulness. Whom we credit, we honor.

pression, and we can say but this, He is above all. It was said of John Baptist, There is not a greater among them that are born of women. But the descent of Christ from heaven put a dignity on Him of which He was not divested by being made Flesh; still He was above all. This He further illustrates by the meanness of those who stood in competition with Him; He that is of the earth, is earthly; he that has his original of the earth, has his food out of the earth, his converse with earthly things, and his concern is for them. Note, First, Man has his rise out of the earth; not only Adam at first, but we also still are formed out of the clay, Job 33:6. Look to the rock whence we were hewn. Secondly, Man's constitution is therefore earthly; not only his body, but his soul, corrupt and carnal, and his bias strong towards earthly things. The prophets and apostles were of the same mould with other men; they were but earthen vessels, though a rich treasure was lodged in them; and shall these be set up for rivals with Christ? Let the potsherds strive with the potsherds of the earth; but let them not cope with Him that came from heaven.

John's disciples were displeased that Christ's preaching was attended upon, more than his; but He tells them there was reason for it.

He, for his part, spake of the earth, and so do all those that are of the earth. The prophets were men, and spake like men; of themselves they could not speak but of the earth, 2 Cor. 3:5. The preaching of the prophets and of John was but low and flat, compared with Christ's preaching; as heaven is high above the earth, so were his thoughts above theirs. By them God spake on earth, but in Christ He spake thru heaven.

But He that cometh from heaven, is not only in person, but in doctrine, above all the prophets that ever lived; none teacheth like Him. The doctrine of Christ is here recommended to us as infallibly sure and certain, and to be entertained accordingly; (v. 32.) What He hath seen.

See here Christ's divine knowledge; He testifies what He had seen and heard, what He was thoroughly acquainted with. What He discovered of the divine nature and of the invisible world, was what He had seen; what He revealed of the mind of God, He had heard immediately from Him. The prophets testified what was made known to them in dreams, by the mediation of angels, but not what they had seen and heard. John was the crier's voice, that said, 'Make room for the witness, and keep silence while the charge is given,' but then leaves it to the witness to give in his testimony, and the judge to give the charge. ness in reversion and out of sight. By this we greatly honor God's faithfulness. Whom we credit, we honor.

For He whom God hath sent, speaketh the words of God, for God giveth not the Spirit by measure unto him. The prophets were messengers that brought letters from heaven, but Christ came under the character of an Ambassador, and treats with us as such; for He spake the words of God, and nothing He said was of human infirmity; both substance and language were divine. He proved Himself sent of God, (ch. 3:2.) and therefore his words are to be received as the words of God. By this rule we may try the spirits; those that speak as the oracles of God, and prophesy according to the proportion of faith, are to be received as sent of God. He spake so as no other prophet did; for God giveth not the Spirit by measure to Him. None can speak the words of God, without the Spirit of God, 1 Cor. 2:10, 11. The Old-Testament prophets had the Spirit, and in different degrees, 2 Kings 2:9, 10. But whereas God gave them the Spirit by measure, (1 Cor. 12:4.) He gave Him to Christ without measure; all fulness dwelt in Him, the fulness of the Godhead, unmeasurable. The Spirit was not in Christ as in a vessel, but as in a bottomless ocean. 'The prophets that had the Spirit in a limited manner, only with respect to some particular revelation, sometimes spake of themselves; but He that had the Spirit always residing in Him, always spake the words of God.'

Concerning the power and authority He is invested with.

He is the beloved Son of the Father; (v. 35.) The Father loveth the Son. The prophets were employed as servants, but Christ was beloved as a Son, always his Delight, Prov. 8:30. The Father was well pleased in Him; not only He did love Him, but He doth love Him; He continued his love to Him even in his estate of humiliation, loved Him never the less for his poverty and sufferings.

He is Lord of all. The Father, as an evidence of his love to Him, hath given all things into his hand. Love is generous. The Father took such complacency, and had such confidence in Him, that He constituted Him the great Trustee for mankind. Having given Him the Spirit without measure, He was thereby qualified to be Master of all. Note, It is the honor of Christ, and the unspeakable comfort of all Christians, that the Father hath given all things into the hands of the Mediator. First, All power; Matt. 28:18. All the works of creation being put under his feet, all the affairs of redemption are put into his hand; He is Lord of all. Angels are his servants, devils his captives. He has power over all flesh; the heathen are given Him for his inheritance. The kingdom of providence is committed to his administration. He has power to settle the terms of the covenant of peace as the Plenipotentiary, to govern his church as the Lawgiver, to dispense favors as the Almoner, and call to account as the Judge. Both the golden sceptre and the iron rod are in his hand. Secondly, All grace is given into his hand as the channel of conveyance; all those good things which God intended to give to the children of men; eternal life, and all its preliminaries. We are unworthy that the Father should give those things into our hands, for we have made ourselves the children of his wrath; therefore the things He intended for us He gives into his hands, who is worthy, and has merited both honors for Himself, and favors for us, to be given into ours. This is a great encouragement to faith, that the riches of the new covenant are deposited in so sure, so kind, so good a hand, that of Him who is able to keep all that which both God and believers have agreed to commit to Him.

He is the Object of faith, the great condition of eternal happiness, and herein has pre-eminence. (v. 36.) He that believeth on the Son, hath life. We have here the application of Jesus leaves Judea, 1-3. In the absence of his disciples. He discourses with a Samaritan woman concerning the value of life, 4-15; brings her to be the Messiah, 16-18; shows her the nature of acceptable worship, 20-24; and declares himself to be the Messiah, 25, 26. The disciples return, and are surprised to see Him thus employed, 27. The woman goes to inform her neighbors, and induces them to come and hear Him, 28-30. Jesus shows his disciples his delight in the Father's work, and the blessed harvest about to be reaped by them, with reference to the Samaritans coming to Him, 31-38. The Samaritans believe in Him, and He continues among them for two days, 39-42. He returns to Cana; and heals a nobleman's son, who lay sick at Capernaum, 43-54.

CHAP. IV. v. 1-3. It is computed that Christ staid in Judea about six months, to build upon the foundation of John.

I. He made disciples; prevailed with many to embrace his doctrine, and follow Him.—His ministry was successful, notwithstanding opposition, Ps. 110: 2, 3. Note, It is Christ's prerogative to make disciples; first to bring them to his feet, and then to force them to his will. The Christian is made, not born. Tertullian.

II. He baptized those whom He made disciples, by the ministry of his disciples, v. 2. He would put a difference between his baptism and that of John, who baptized all himself; for he baptized as a servant, Christ as a Master. He would apply himself more to preaching; 1 Cor. 1: 17. He would honor his disciples, by employing them, and so train them to further service. If He had baptized some Himself, they would have been apt to value themselves upon it, and despise others, 1 Cor. 1: 13, 14. He would reserve himself for the honor of baptizing with the Holy Ghost, Acts 1: 5. He would what he had said concerning Christ and his doctrine; it is the conclusion of the whole matter. If God has honored the Son, we must by faith give honor to Him. As God offers and conveys good things to us by the testimony of Christ, whose word is the vehicle of divine favors, so we receive and partake of those favors, by believing the testimony, and entertaining that word as true and good; this way of receiving fitly answers that way of giving. We have here the sum of that Gospel which is to be preached to every creature, Mark 16: 16. Learn,

First, The blessed state of all true Christians; He that believeth on the Son, hath everlasting life. Note, 1. It is the character of every true Christian, that he believes on the Son of God; not only believes Him, but believes on Him, consents to, and confides in Him. The benefit of true Christianity is everlasting life: Christ came to purchase it for us, and confer it upon us; it can be no less than the happiness of an immortal soul in an immortal God. 2. True believers, even now, have everlasting life; not only they shall have it hereafter, but they have it now. For they have good security for it. The deed is sealed, and delivered to them, and so they have it, though not yet in possession. They have the Son of God, and in Him they have life; and the Spirit of God, the Earnest of this life. They have foretastes of it, in present communion with God and the tokens of his love. Grace is glory begun. Learn, Secondly, The wretched condition of unbelievers; He that believeth not the Son, is undone. The words include both incredulity and disobedience. An unbeliever is one that gives not credit to the doctrine of Christ, nor is in subjection to the government of Christ. Now those that will neither be taught nor ruled by Christ, cannot be happy in this world, or that to come; He shall not see that life which Christ came to bestow. He shall not enjoy it, he shall not have any prospect of it, except to aggravate his loss. They cannot but be miserable; the wrath of God abides upon an unbeliever. He is not only under the wrath of God, which is as surely the soul's death, as his favor is its life; but it abides upon Him. The wrath of the law, if not removed by the Gospel, is bound upon him. God's wrath for his daily actual transgressions, lies upon him. Old scores lie undischarged; new ones are added: something is done every day to fill the measure, and nothing to empty it. Thus the wrath of God abides; it is treasured up against the day of wrath.

CHAP. IV. v. 1-3. It is computed that Christ staid in Judea about six months, to build upon the foundation of John.

I. He made disciples; prevailed with many to embrace his doctrine, and follow Him.—His ministry was successful, notwithstanding opposition, Ps. 110: 2, 3. Note, It is Christ's prerogative to make disciples; first to bring them to his feet, and then to force them to his will. The Christian is made, not born. Tertullian.

II. He baptized those whom He made disciples, by the ministry of his disciples, v. 2. He would put a difference between his baptism and that of John, who baptized all himself; for he baptized as a servant, Christ as a Master. He would apply himself more to preaching; 1 Cor. 1: 17. He would honor his disciples, by employing them, and so train them to further service. If He had baptized some Himself, they would have been apt to value themselves upon it, and despise others, 1 Cor. 1: 13, 14. He would reserve himself for the honor of baptizing with the Holy Ghost, Acts 1: 5. He would teach us that the efficacy of sacraments depends not upon the hand that administers them, as also, that what is done by ministers according to his direction, He owns as done by Himself.

III. He made and baptized more disciples than John; not only more than John did at this time, but at any time. Christ's converse was more winning than John's. His miracles were convincing, and the cures He wrought, inviting.

IV. The Pharisees were informed of this; they heard what multitudes He baptized, by their spies who gave them notice concerning Him. When the Pharisees thought they were rid of John, and were pleasing themselves with that, Jesus appears, who was a greater vexation to them than John. The witnesses will rise again. That which grieved them was, that Christ made so many disciples. The success of the Gospel exasperates its enemies, and it is a sign that it is getting ground, when the powers of darkness are enraged against it.

V. Our Lord Jesus knew very well what transformations were given against Him to the Pharisees. The informers perhaps were willing to have their names concealed, and the Pharisees loath to have their designs known; but none can hide their counsels from the Lord, (Isa. 29: 15.) and Christ is here called the Lord. He knew what was told the Pharisees, and how it exceeded the truth; for it is not likely that Jesus had yet baptized more than John; but so the thing was represented, to make Him appear more formidable; see 2 Kings 6: 12.

1. Because He was likely to be persecuted there to death; such was the rage of the Pharisees, and such their impious politics. To escape their designs, Christ quitted the country, and went thither, where what He did would be less provoking. For, his hour was not yet come, (ch. 7: 30.) the time fixed in the counsels of God, and the prophecies, for Messiah's being cut off. He had not finished his testimony, and therefore would not surrender or expose Himself. The disciples He had gathered in Judea, were not able to bear hardships, and therefore He would not expose them. Hereby He gave an example to his own rule; When they persecute you in one city, flee to another. We are not called to suffer, while we may avoid it without sin; and therefore, though we may not, for our own preservation, change our religion, yet we may change our place. Christ secured himself, not by miracles, but in a way common to men, for the direction and encouragement of his suffering people.

2. He departed into Galilee, because He had work to do there, and many friends and fewer enemies. He went to Galilee now, (1.) Because John's ministry had made way for Him there, for Galilee, which was under Herod's jurisdiction, was the last scene of John's baptism. (2.) Because John's imprisonment had now made room for Him there. The minds of the people would not be divided between him and Christ. The liberties and restraints of good ministers are for the furtherance of the Gospel, Phil. 1: 12.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 22-36. The same state of heart and mind, which leads to bigotry and formality in religion, produces also ambition, and jealousy of those who outshine us: but true excellency and sanctifying grace are combined with humility, submission to God, and a willing dependence on Him. As a man can receive nothing except it be given him from heaven, let us seek all our blessings from thence; give God all the glory of whatever we have or do; occupy with our talents as we are able; rejoice in the honor and service of Christ, the Bridegroom of his church; stand and hear his voice; and seek our happiness in his favor. And should we be laid aside from usefulness, and see others increase while we decrease, and are obscured by their superior talent and success; let us pray to be enabled to hear it meekly, yea, thankfully, that Christ may be honored; and that numbers of such burning and shining lights may be sent forth into every part of the earth, when we are neglected or forgotten, as laid aside, and become as a broken vessel. Let us attend to Him, 'who cometh from above, and is above all,' that we may simply receive heavenly things from Him, and neither call any one father or master, nor lean to our own understanding; 'as all men being of the earth are earthly, and speak of the earth.' And though few indeed thus set to their seal that God is true, let us seek so to honor his Word, that He may seal his salvation to us, by the Spirit of his Son 'shedding abroad his love in our hearts.' This is the only way of everlasting life, through faith in the Son of God, whom the Father loveth, and into whose hand all things are given; for there is no salvation for sinners in any other: and 'he that believeth not shall perish.'

2. His resting place happened to be a city of Samaria.

It was called Sychar; probably Sichem, or Shechem. Names of places are commonly corrupted by time. Shechem yielded the first proselytes to the church of Israel (Gen. 34); and now it is the first place where the gospel is preached out of Israel; the valley of Achor, which was given for a door of hope, to the Gentiles, ran along by this city, Hos. 2: 15. Abimelech was made king here; it was Jeroboam's royal seat; but the evangelist, when he would give us the antiquities of the place, takes notice of Jacob's interest there, which was more honor to it than crowned heads. Here lay the parcel of ground which Jacob gave to his son Joseph, whose bones were buried in it, Gen. 48: 22. Josh. 24: 32. Probably Christ, when He reposed himself here, took occasion to meditate on the good report which the elders by faith obtained. Jerome chose to live in Canaan, that the sight of the places might affect him the more with scripture-stories. Here was Jacob's well which he digged, or at least used, for himself and family. We find no mention of this well in the Old Testament; but the tradition was, it was Jacob's well.

Our Lord was wearied with his journey. Though it was but the sixth hour, and He had performed but half his day's journey, yet He was weary; or, He was weary because it was the sixth hour, the time of the heat of the day. Here we see, First, That He was a Man, subject to the infirmities of human nature. Toil came with sin, (Gen. 3: 19.) and therefore Christ, having made himself a Curse for us, submitted to it. Secondly, He was a poor Man, else He might have travelled in a chariot. To this He humbled Himself for us, that He went all his journeys on foot. When servants were those colonies which the king of Assyria planted after the captivity of the ten tribes, with whom the poor of the land that were left behind, and many other Jews afterwards, incorporated themselves. They worshipped the God of Israel only, and erected a temple on mount Gerizim, in competition with that at Jerusalem. There was great enmity between them and the Jews; the Samaritans would not admit Christ, when they saw He was going to Jerusalem, Luke 9: 53. The Jews thought they could not give Him a worse name than to say, He is a Samaritan. When the Jews were in prosperity, the Samaritans claimed kindred to them, (Ezra 4: 2.) but when they were in distress, they were Medes and Persians.

Christ charged the disciples not to enter into any city of the Samaritans, (Matt. 10: 5.) to preach, or work miracles; nor did He here preach publicly, or work any miracle, his eye being to the lost sheep of the house of Israel. His kindness here was accidental; it was only a crumb that fell from the master's table.

1. His road from Judea to Galilee lay through Samaria. There was no other way, unless on the other side Jordan. The wicked are at present so intermixed with Israel, that, unless we go out of the world, we cannot avoid going through their company, 1 Cor. 5: 10. We therefore need the armor of righteousness on the right hand and on the left, that we may neither give provocation, nor contract pollution. We should not go into places of temptation, but when we needs must; and then should hasten through them. Some think that Christ must needs go through Samaria, because a poor woman was to be converted, a lost sheep to be sought.

This was work his heart was upon, and therefore He must needs go this way. It was happy for Samaria, that it lay in Christ's way, which gave Him an opportunity of calling on them. When I passed by thee, I said unto thee, Live, Ezek. 16: 6.

Secondly, He was a poor Man, else He might have travelled in a chariot. To this He humbled Himself for us, that He went all his journeys on foot. When servants were on horses, princes walked as servants on the earth, Eccl. 10: 7. When we are carried easily, let us think on the weariness of our Master. Thirdly, It would seem, He was not of a robust constitution; his disciples were not tired, for they went into the town without any difficulty. Bodies of the finest mould are more sensible of fatigue, and can worst bear it.

Being wearied, He sat on the well, an uneasy place, cold and hard; He had no couch to repose Himself in, but took that to teach us not to be curious in the conveniences of life, but content with mean things. Secondly, He sat thus, in an uneasy posture; or, so as people wearied with travelling are accustomed to sit.

His discourse with a Samaritan woman is here recorded at large, while his dispute with the doctors, and his discourse with Moses and Elias on the mount, are buried in silence.

There comes a woman of Samaria to draw water. This intimates her poverty, she had no servant; and her industry, she would do it herself. God approves of honest, humble diligence in our places. Christ was made known to the shepherds, when they were keeping their flock. Divine Providence brings about glorious purposes by events which seem to us accidental. This woman's meeting with Christ at the well, may remind us of the stories of Rebekah, Rachel, and Jethro's daughter, who all met with good husbands, Isaac, Jacob, and Moses, when they came to the wells for water. The preventing grace of God sometimes brings people unexpectedly under the means of conversion and salvation. He is found of them that sought Him not.

His disciples were gone away into the city to buy meat. Hence learn a lesson, 1. Of justice and honesty. The meat Christ ate, He paid for, as Paul, 2 Thess. 3: 8. 2. Of daily dependence upon Providence; Take no thought for the morrow. Christ did not go into the city to eat, but sent his disciples to fetch his meat thither. (1.) Because He had a good work to do at that well, which might be done while they were trading. It is wisdom to fill up vacant minutes with good, that the fragments of time may not be lost. Peter, while his dinner was getting ready, fell into a trance, Acts 10: 10. (2.) Because it was more retired, cheap and homely, to have his dinner brought Him thither, than to go into the town for it. Perhaps his purse was low, and He would teach us good husbandry; to spend according to what we have, and not go beyond it. However, He would teach us not to affect great things. Christ could eat his dinner as well upon a draw well, as in the best inn in the town. Let us comport with our circumstances.

This gave Christ an opportunity of discoursing with this woman about spiritual concerns. He often preached to multitudes, yet here He condescends to teach a poor woman, a Samaritan, to teach his ministers to do likewise; a glorious achievement it is to help save one soul from death.

refers to their idolatry, the word denoting both a lie and an idol. The place was afterwards called Neapolis, and is now the village Naplosa. Bloomfield. The Arabic version of Gen. 37: 13, made about A. D. 940, translates Sychem or 'Shechem' by 'Nablosa.' Ed. 'It was ten miles from Shiloh, forty from Jerusalem, and fifty-two from Jericho.'

The sacred story of events transacted in the fields of Sychem, is remembered from our earliest years, with delight. The principal object of veneration is Jacob's well, situated a small distance from the town. In the road to Jerusalem, and has been visited by pilgrims of all ages; but particularly since the Christian era, as the place where our Savior revealed Himself to the woman of Samaria. The spot is so distinctly marked by the evangelist, and so little liable to uncertainty, from the circumstance of the well itself, and the features of the country, that, if no tradition existed for its identity, the site of it would hardly be mistaken. Perhaps no Christian scholar ever attentively read the fourth chapter of John, without being struck with the numerous internal evidences of truth which crowd upon the mind in its perusal. Within so small a compass, it is impossible to find in other writings so many sources of reflection and interest. Independently of its importance as a theological document, it concentrates so much information, that a volume might be filled with the illustration it reflects on the history of the Jews, and on the geography of their country. All that can be gathered on these subjects from Josephus, seems but as a comment to illustrate this chapter. The journey of our Lord from Judea into Galilee; the cause of it; his passage through the territory of Samaria; his approach to the metropolis of this country; its name; his arrival at the Amorite field, which terminates the narrow valley of Sychem; the ancient custom of halting at a well; the female employment of drawing water; the disciples sent into the city for food, by which its situation out of town is obviously implied; the question of the woman, referring to existing prejudices which separated the Jews from the Samaritans; the depth of the well; the oriental allusion contained in the expression 'living water'; the history of the well, and the customs thereby illustrated; the worship on mount Gerizim—all these occur within the space of twenty verses; and if to these be added what has already been referred to in the remainder of the same chapter, we shall perhaps consider it as a record, which, in the words of Him who sent it, 'we may lift up our eyes, and look upon, for it is white, already, to harvest.'

Chrysostom in BLOOMFIELD.

Jesus begins with a request for a draught of water; Give me to drink. He that for our sakes became poor, becomes a beggar, that they who want, and cannot dig, may not be ashamed to beg. Christ asked for it, not only because He needed it, but to draw on further discourse with her, and teach us to be willing to be beholden to the meanest when there is occasion. Christ is still begging in his poor members, and a cup of cold water, given to them in his name, shall not lose its reward.

The woman, though she does not deny his request, quarrels with Him because he did not carry the humor of his nation; (v. 9.) How is it?

Observe, What a mortal feud there was between the Jews and the Samaritans; The Jews have no dealings with the Samaritans. The Samaritans were the adversaries of Judah, (Ezra 4: 1.) and upon all occasions mischievous to them. The Jews were extremely malicious against them, 'looked upon them as having no part in the resurrection; excommunicated and cursed them by the name of God, with this law, That no Israelite eat of any thing that is a Samaritan's, for it is as if he eat swine's flesh.' Note, Quarrels about religion are usually the most implacable. Men were made to have dealings one with another; but if men, because one worships at one temple, and another at another, will deny the offices of humanity and common civility, will be morose, scornful and censorious, and this under color of zeal for religion, they plainly show that however their religion may be true, they are not truly religious.

The woman upbraided Christ with the haughtiness and ill nature of the Jewish nation; How is it that thou, being a Jew, askest drink of me? By his stress or dialect, or both, she knew Him to be a Jew, and thinks it strange that He runs not to the same excess of riot against the Samaritans with other Jews. Note, Moderate men of all sides are, like Joshua and his fellows, (Zech. 3: 8.) men wondered at. Two things this woman wonders at, 1. That He should ask this kindness; for the Jews would endure any hardship rather than be beholden to a Samaritan. It was part of Christ's humiliation, that He was born of the Jewish nation, which was now not only in an ill state, subject to the Romans, but in an ill name. With disdain Pilate asks, Am I a Jew? Thus He made himself not only of no reputation, but of ill reputation; herein He has set us an example of swimming against the stream of common corruptions. We must, like our Master, put on kindness, though our country, or party, be morose and ill-natured. Chrysostom in BLOOMFIELD.

If she had known Him, she would not have given Him such an uncivil answer; she would have been so far from affronting Him, that she would have made her addresses to Him; Thou wouldst have asked. Note, (1.) Those that would have any benefit by Christ, must be earnest in prayer to God for it. (2.) Those that have a right knowledge of Christ, will seek to Him; if we do not, it is a sign that we know Him not, Ps. 9: 10. (3.) Christ knows what they that want the means of knowledge, would have done, if they had had them, Matt. 11: 21.

If she had applied to Him, 'He would have given thee (not upbraided thee, as thou dost me) living water.' By this is meant the Spirit, who is not like the water in the well, but like living or running water, much more valuable. Note, (1.) The Spirit of grace is as living water, see ch. 7: 33. Under this similitude are the blessings of the Messiah promised in the Old Testament, Isa. 12: 3. 35: 7. 44: 3. 55: 1. Zech. 14: 8. The graces of the Spirit, and his comforts, satisfy the soul, that knows its necessity. (2.) Jesus Christ can and will give the Holy Spirit to them that ask Him; for He received, that He might give.

The woman cavils at the intimation which Christ gave her; Thou hast nothing to draw with; and besides, Art Thou greater than our father Jacob? What He spake figuratively, she took literally; Nicodemus did so too. What confused notions they have of spiritual things, who are wholly taken up with the things of sense! Some respect she pays to his person, in calling him Sir, or Lord; but little to what He said.

She does not think Him capable of furnishing her with any water, nor, not this in the well. Thou hast nothing to draw with, and the well is deep. He who causeth the vapors to ascend from the ends of the earth, needs nothing to draw. Some will trust Christ no farther than they can see Him, and will not believe his promise, unless the means of the performance of it be visible; as if He were tied to our methods, and could not draw water without our buckets. She asks scornfully, 'Whence hast Thou this living water?' Note, The springs of the living water which Christ has for those that come to Him, are secret. The fountain of life is hid with Christ. Christ has enough for us, though we see not whence He has it.

She does not think any water better than this which she could come at, but He could not; Art thou greater than our father Jacob, who gave us the well?

We will suppose the tradition true, that Jacob himself, and his children, and cattle, did drink of this well. Observe, (1.) The power and providence of God in the continuance of the fountains, by the constant circulation of the rivers, like the blood in the body, (Ecl. 1: 7.) to which circulation perhaps the flux and reflux of the sea, like the pulses of the heart, contribute. (2.) The plainness of Jacob; his drink was water; he and his children drank of the same well with his cattle.

Allowing that to be true, she was out in several things; (1.) In calling Jacob father. The Samaritans were descended from that mixt multitude which the king of Assyria had placed in the cities of Samaria; what have they to do with Jacob? They were the invaders of Israel's rights, and the unjust possessors of Israel's lands; were they therefore the inheritors of Israel's blood and honor? How absurd were those pretensions! (2.) Jacob no more gave this shall thirst again. Yesterday's meat and drink will not do to-day's work.

The living waters He would give, would yield a lasting satisfaction. Christ's gifts appear most valuable, compared with the things of this world; there is no comparison between them. Whoever partakes of the Spirit of grace, and the comforts of the everlasting Gospel, shall never thirst; never want that which will abundantly satisfy his soul's desires; they long, but not languish. A desiring thirst he has for more and more of God; but not a despairing thirst. This water that Christ gives, shall be in him a well of water. He can never be reduced to extremity, that has in himself a fountain of supply. It shall be in him. The principle of grace in him, is the spring of his comfort; see ch. 7: 38. A good man is satisfied from himself, for Christ dwells in his heart. The anointing abides in him; he needs not the world for comfort; the work and witness of the Spirit furnish him with a firm hope, and an overflowing fountain of joy. It shall be in him a well of water. Believers have in them a well of water, ever flowing. The principles and affections which religion forms in the soul are this well of water. It is springing up, ever in motion, which speaks the actings of grace. If truths stagnate in our souls, they do not answer their end. If there be a good treasure in the heart, we must bring forth good things. It springs up to everlasting life. A sanctified soul has its eye on heaven; does all for that, will take up with nothing short of that. Spiritual life springs up towards perfection in eternal life. It will continue springing up till it come to perfection. The crown of them is eternal life at last. The living water rises from heaven, and therefore rises toward heaven; see Eccl. 1: 7. And now, is not this water better than that of Jacob's well?

The woman (whether in jest or earnest it is hard to say) says, Give me this water, that I thirst not. Some think that she speaks tauntingly; and, in derision, not desires but challenges Him to give her some of this water:

A rare invention! it will save me a great deal of pain if I thirst not, and a deal of pains if I never come hither to draw.' Others think that it was a well-meant, but weak and ignorant desire. She apprehended that He meant something very useful, and therefore saith Amen, at a venture. Whatever it be, let me have it; who will show me any good? Ease, or saving of labor, is well, than Moses gave the manna, ch. 6: 32. We are apt to call the messengers of God's gifts the donors; and to look so much at the hands they pass through, as to forget the hand they come from. Jacob gave it to his sons, not to them. Thus the church's enemies not only usurp, but monopolize, the church's privileges. (3.) She speaks of Christ as not worthy to be compared with Jacob. A fond veneration for antiquity makes God's graces, in the good people of our own day, to be slighted.

Though she spake perversely, Christ did not cast her off, but instructed her.

The water of Jacob's well yielded but a transient satisfaction: 'Whoso drinketh of this water, shall thirst again. It is no better than other water; the thirst will return, and in a few hours a man will have as much need and desire of water as ever.' This speaks, 1. The infirmities of our bodies; they are ever craving. Life is a fire, a lamp, which will go out, without continual supplies. The natural heat preys upon itself. 2. Our comforts in this world are not lasting, nor our satisfaction in them remaining. Whatever waters of comfort we drink of, we

a valuable good to poor laboring people. Note, 1. Even those that are weak and ignorant may yet have faint desires towards Christ and his gifts, and some good wishes. 2. Carnal hearts, in their best wishes, look no higher than carnal ends. 'Give it me,' saith she, 'not that I may have everlasting life,' but that I come no farther to draw.'

The next subject of discourse is concerning her husband, v. 16-18. It was not to let fall the discourse of the water of life, that Christ started this, as many who will bring in any impertinence, that they may drop a serious subject; but it was with a gracious design. What He had said concerning grace and eternal life, had made little impression, because she had not been convinced of sin; therefore, waving the discourse about the living water, He sets himself to awaken her conscience, to open the wound of guilt, and then she would more easily apprehend the remedy by grace. This is the method of dealing with souls; they must first be made weary and heavy-laden, then brought to Christ for rest; first pricked to the heart, and then healed. This is the course of spiritual physic; and if we proceed not in this order, we begin at the wrong end.

Observe, How discreetly Christ introduces this discourse; (v. 16.) Go, call thy husband, and come hither. The order had a very good color; 'Call thy husband, that he may teach thee.' The wives that will learn, must ask their husbands, (1 Cor. 14: 35;) who must dwell with them, as men of knowledge, 1 Pet. 3: 7. 'Call thy husband, that he may learn with thee; that then ye may be heirs together of the grace of life. Call thy husband, that he may be witness to what passes between us.' Christ would thus teach us to provide things honest in the sight of all men, and to study that which is of good report. As it had a good color, so it had a good design; for from hence He would take occasion to call her sin to remembrance. There is need, in giving reproof, to fetch a compass, as the woman of Tekoa, 2 Sam. 14: 20.

The woman seeks to evade conviction, and yet convicts herself, and owns her fault; she said, I have no husband. She did not care to have her husband spoken of, lest, in further discourse, the truth of the matter should come out, to her shame; and therefore, 'Pray, talk of something else, I have no husband.' The carnal mind is ingenious to keep convictions from fastening; careful to cover the sin.

Our Lord brings home conviction to her conscience. He said more than is recorded, for He told her all that over she did. Thou hast had five husbands. Doubtless, it was not her afflic-

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-15. The success of the Gospel always exasperates unbelievers, especially Pharisees, and formal rulers in the church, however prudent its ministers: but it is best in general to give way to violence as far as consists with faithful usefulness.—In all our journeys we should copy our Lord's example: into whatever place we come, we should endeavor to be useful; and always to subordinate personal accommodation to that object.—We should frequently meditate on his 'weariness,' and his exposed and inconvenient situation, when 'He sat thus at the well;' few would be cheerfully satisfied to journey, rest, and fare as He did. This consideration may teach the poor, contentment; and the rich, self-denial, simplicity, and liberality.—But let us observe where and what the 'lost sheep' of Christ are, when He comes 'to seek and save them;' and how He meets them frequently, when they are not thinking of Him. If we now believe in his name, after a careful review of our character and plans, when He first made himself known to us; we shall be constrained to confess, that we were as unworthy and unlikely, as much prejudiced against Him, as this poor Samaritan woman. This illustrates his grace, and should excite our humble gratitude. (Note, Is. 65: 1, 2. P. O. 1-10.)—Bigotry and controversy are inimical to piety and charity: they indispose men to communicate good, or to receive it from others: thus when they should pray together, or edify one another, they are separated by antipathy. Those who are agreed in the most important matters, and only differ about subordinate points, are often most vehement. But, if we 'know the Gift of God' and the excellency of Christ, we shall ask of Him, and He will give us the blessings of salvation. If we are wise in the things of God, we shall gladly take a hint from a stranger, or one of another sect: and they who are like Jesus will readily counsel or help the meanest, or the most prejudiced. Blessed be God, for 'the wells of salvation,' and 'the water of life;' and that we are assured that God will 'give his Holy Spirit to all who ask Him.' Men in general do not value these blessings: they thirst for sensual pleasures, honors, wealth, or splendor; and how largely soever they drink of these streams, they thirst again, and will thirst for ever, unless they now drink the waters of life. Happy are they, who 'thirst for the living God,' for his image and favor! (Notes, Ps. 42: 1-3. 63: 1-4. 84: 1, 2.) The trifles of this world will no more quiet them, than toys will content a hungry child; they will importune for the blessings which Jesus bestows, and the more they perceive that 'the well is deep,' the more earnestly will they beseech God for his Holy Spirit. When they experience his consolations, their thirst after sinful pleasures abates; the world appears worthless; an abiding change is manifested in their souls; He, who began the good work, carries it on; holy affections spring up in the heart, earnest desires and foretastes of everlasting life, and will terminate and be perfected in it. (P. O. 7: 37-53. Rev. 7: 9-17.) SCOTT.

Verse 14.

Shall never thirst.] 'The force and truth of our Lord's assertion seems to be in this, that the most impatient and restless desires of the [638] soul being satisfied, when it is fixed on God as its supreme happiness, other thirst is not worth being mentioned; see John 8: 51, 52. 11: 26. 13: 10.' DODDRIE.

16 Jesus saith unto her, 'Go, call thy husband, and come hither.'

17 The woman answered and said, 'I have no husband. Jesus said unto her, Thou hast well said, I have no husband.'

19 The Samaritan saith unto him, Sir, 'I perceive that thou art a prophet.'

faithfully with us. Christ gave her no ill language, and then she gave Him none. She acknowledges Him to be a prophet; one that had correspondence with Heaven. Note, Christ searching the heart, and convincing of secret sins, is a great proof of his divine authority, 1 Cor. 14: 24, 25. Many that are not angry at their reprovers, yet are afraid of them, and keep out of their way; but this woman was willing to have some more instructive discourse with Him that told her of her faults.

The case that she propounded was concerning the place of religious worship. Some think that she started this, to turn off further discourse concerning her sin. Controversies in religion often prejudice godliness; but, it would seem, she proposed it with a good design: knowing she must worship God, she desired to do it aright; and therefore, meeting with a prophet, begs his direction. Note, It is wise to improve all opportunities of knowledge in the things of God. When we are in company with those that are fit to teach, let us be forward to learn; and have a good question ready for those who are able to give a good answer.

The Jews and the Samaritans agreed that God is to be worshipped: (even fools that worship false gods, were not such brutes as to worship none;) and that religious worship is an affair of great importance: men would not contend about it, if they were not concerned about it. But the question was, where they should worship God.

The Samaritans worshipped in this mountain, near adjoining to this city, and this well; there the Samaritan temple was built by Sanballat; in favor of which she insinuates, [1.] That, whatever the temple was, the place was holy: it was mount Gerizim, on which the blessings were pronounced; and, some think, the same on which Abraham built his altar, (Gen. 12: 6, 7.) and Jacob his, Gen. 33: 18. [2.] Our fathers worshipped here. She thinks they have antiquity and tradition on their side. A vain conversation often supports itself with this, it was received by tradition from our fathers. But she had little reason to boast of their fathers; for, when Antiochus persecuted the tion, (the burying of so many husbands,) but her sin, that Christ intended to upbraid her with; either she had run away from her husbands, and married others, or by her undutiful conduct had provoked them to divorce her, or had, contrary to law, divorced them. Those who make light of such scandalous practices, as if the guilt were over as soon as the talk, should remember that Christ keeps account of all. He whom thou now hast, is not thy husband. She was never married to him, or he had some other wife; or, which is most probable, her former husband or husbands were living; so that, in short, she lived in adultery. Observe how mildly Christ tells her of it; He with whom thou livest, is not thy husband: and leaves it to her conscience to say the rest. Note, Reproofs are ordinarily most profitable when least provoking. He puts a better construction than it would well bear, upon what she said by way of evasion; Thou hast well said, I have no husband; and again, In that saidst thou truly. What she intended as a denial of the fact, (that she had none with whom she lived as a husband,) He turned upon her as a confession of the fault. Note, Those who would win souls should make the best of them, and work upon their good-nature; for if they make the worst of them, they certainly exasperate their ill-nature.

The next subject is a case of conscience proposed to Christ concerning the place of worship.

Observe, Why she put this case; Sir, I perceive that Thou art a Prophet. She does not deny the truth, but by silence owns the justice of the reproof; nor is she in a passion, as many are when touched in a sore place; does not impute his censure to the general disgust the Jews had to the Samaritans; but (which is a rare thing) can bear to be told of a fault. She goes further, she speaks respectfully to Him, calls Him Sir. We should honor those that deal faithfully with us. Christ gave her no ill language, and then she gave Him none. She acknowledges Him to be a prophet; one that had correspondence with Heaven. Note, Christ searching the heart, and convincing of secret sins, is a great proof of his divine authority, 1 Cor. 14: 24, 25. Many that are not angry at their reprovers, yet are afraid of them, and keep out of their way; but this woman was willing to have some more instructive discourse with Him that told her of her faults.

The case that she propounded was concerning the place of religious worship. Some think that she started this, to turn off further discourse concerning her sin. Controversies in religion often prejudice godliness; but, it would seem, she proposed it with a good design: knowing she must worship God, she desired to do it aright; and therefore, meeting with a prophet, begs his direction. Note, It is wise to improve all opportunities of knowledge in the things of God. When we are in company with those that are fit to teach, let us be forward to learn; and have a good question ready for those who are able to give a good answer.

The Jews and the Samaritans agreed that God is to be worshipped: (even fools that worship false gods, were not such brutes as to worship none;) and that religious worship is an affair of great importance: men would not contend about it, if they were not concerned about it. But the question was, where they should worship God.

The Samaritans worshipped in this mountain, near adjoining to this city, and this well; there the Samaritan temple was built by Sanballat; in favor of which she insinuates, [1.] That, whatever the temple was, the place was holy: it was mount Gerizim, on which the blessings were pronounced; and, some think, the same on which Abraham built his altar, (Gen. 12: 6, 7.) and Jacob his, Gen. 33: 18. [2.] Our fathers worshipped here. She thinks they have antiquity and tradition on their side. A vain conversation often supports itself with this, it was received by tradition from our fathers. But she had little reason to boast of their fathers; for, when Antiochus persecuted the Jews, the Samaritans, for fear of sharing in their sufferings, not only renounced all relation to the Jews, but surrendered their temple to Antiochus, with a request that it might be dedicated to Jupiter Olympinus, and called by his name.

The Jews say, that in Jerusalem is the place where men ought to worship. The Samaritans governed themselves by the five books of Moses, and (some think) received them only as canonical. The place God would choose, they did not find named there; they saw the temple at Jerusalem stripped of its ancient glories, and therefore think themselves at liberty to set up another place.

Those that apply themselves to Christ for instruction, shall find Him meek, to teach the meek his way.

He puts a slight upon the question; 'Woman, believe Me, and mark what I say. Thou art expecting the hour, when, by revelation, or some signal providence, this matter shall be decided in favor either of Jerusalem or of mount Gerizim; but the hour is at hand, when that shall be set aside as a thing indifferent.' Note, It should cool us in our contests, to think that those things which we make such a noise about, will shortly be no more; The hour comes when ye shall neither in this mountain, nor yet at Jerusalem, worship the Father. The object of worship will continue the same.—God, as a Father; under 'hath' notion the heathen worshipped God, the Jews did so, and, probably, the Samaritans. But a period shall be put to all differences about the place of worship. The dissolution of the Jewish economy, and the erecting of the evangelical state, shall lay all in common, so that it shall be a thing indifferent, where men worship God. Note, The worship of God is not now appropriated to any place, as it was under the law; it is God's will that men pray every where, 1 Tim. 2: 8. Mal. 1: 11. Our reason teaches us to consult decency and convenience in the places of worship; but religion gives no preference to one place above another, in respect of holiness and acceptableness to God. They who prefer any worship merely for the sake of the house in which it is performed, forget that the hour is come, when there shall be no difference put in God's account; no, not between Jerusalem, so famous for sanctity, and the mountain of Samaria, so infamous for impiety.

When He made so light of the place of worship, He did not intend to lessen our concern about the thing itself.

He determines against the Samaritan worship, and in favor of the Jews.

The Samaritans are certainly in the wrong; not merely because they worshipped in this mountain, though, while Jerusalem was the chosen place, that was sinful; but because of the Object of their worship; if the worship itself had been as it should be, its separation from Jerusalem might have been connived at as the high places were in the best reigns; But ye worship ye know not what, or that which ye do not know; they worshipped the God of Israel; (Ezra 4: 2. 2 Kings 17: 32.) but were sunk into gross ignorance; they worshipped him as the God of that land, (2 Kings 17: 27, 33.) as a local Deity, like the gods of the nations, whereas God must be served as the universal Cause and

Verses 16—18.

It is probable, she lived with a man to whom she had never been married according to custom. This shows, that a recognition before witnesses, duly authenticated, is necessary to marriage, and distinguishes it from fornication. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Ruth 4: 11, 12. Matt. 19: 3—9.) 'Five husbands from whom thou hast been divorced' for thy adulteries. Whittby. This is neither said, nor hinted at, in the narrative: neither is it at all probable. The adulteress was punishable by death, according to the Mosaic law: (Notes, 8: 3—11, v. 2.) and it is likely, that the Samaritans so far regarded that law, as not to suffer a woman five times convicted of adultery, and divorced for it, to escape with impunity.

Verse 20.

Abraham and Jacob erected altars at Shechem, which was very near to Gerizim; and from that mountain God ordered the blessings to be pronounced, while the curses were spoken from mount Ebal. (Marg. Ref. f.—Notes, Deut. 11: 26—30. 27: 1—13. Josh. 8: 30—35.) From these and similar premises, the Samaritans inferred, that Gerizim was the place where the temple of God ought to have been built, and his sacrifices offered; and that the Jews were schismatics and sectari-ans; and they rejected the greatest part of the Old Testament, perhaps because it so expressly and continually declared, that Zion was the place which God had chosen for his residence. (Marg. Ref. g.) Indeed there was no temple on mount Gerizim, till Sanballat built one there, after the days of Nehemiah. (Notes, 2 Kings 17: 24—41. Ezra 4: 1—6, 17—24. Neh. 13: 23—30, v. 22.) This had been destroyed by John Hyrcanus, about one hundred and thirty-one years before Christ; but probably it had been rebuilt, though with less magnificence. The Samaritans, however, thought the example of the patriarchs in their favor; and it is woman, notwithstanding her immorality, was eager in the controversy.

Some few Samaritans remain at the present day, who occasionally celebrate divine worship on mount Gerizim. BLOOMFIELD. In this mountain. In the Hebrew Pentateuch, (Deut. 27: 4, 7, &c.) where the Israelites are commanded to build an altar on mount Ebal, and offer sacrifices, &c. the Samaritan Pentateuch has Gerizim instead of Ebal. [This name the Samaritans accuse the Jews of substituting MAUNDRELL.] Dr. Kennicott strongly contends that Gerizim is the genuine reading. Dr. A. CLARKE. De Rossi, however, (Var. Lect. in 1.) is of a different opinion, and defends the present text.

21 Jesus^b saith unto her, Woman, believe me, the hour cometh, when ye shall neither in this mountain, nor yet at Jerusalem, 22 Ye worship¹ ye know not what:^m we know what we worship; for Salvation is of the Jews.

23 But the hour cometh, and now is, when the true worshippers shall worship the Father in spirit and in truth: for the Father seeketh such to worship him.

24 God is a Spirit: and they that worship him, must worship him in spirit and in truth.

worship in the Spirit, one would think, would not strive whether He should be worshipped here or there. Christ had justly preferred the Jewish worship before the Samaritan, yet here He intimates the imperfection of that. The worship was ceremonial, Heb. 9: 1, 10. The worshippers were generally carnal, and strangers to the inward part of divine worship. Note, It is possible that we may be better than our neighbors, and yet not as good as we should be. It concerns us to be right, not only in the Object of our worship, but in the manner of it. Observe the revolution which would introduce this change; The hour cometh, and now is. The time of its appearance is fixed to an hour, so exact are the divine counsels; the time of its continuance is limited to an hour, so close and pressing is the opportunity of divine grace, 2 Cor. 6: 2. This hour is coming in its full strength and perfection, it now is in infancy. The perfect day is coming, and now it dawns. In gospel-times, the true worshippers shall worship the Father in spirit and in truth. As creatures, we worship the Father of all: as Christians, we worship the Father of our Lord Jesus. The change will be,

First, In the nature of the worship. Christians shall worship God in spiritual ordinances, consisting less in bodily exercise, and with more of divine power. The way of worship which Christ has instituted, is refined from those external ceremonies with which the Old-Testament worship was both clouded and clogged. This is called true worship; that was typical. The legal services were figures of the true, Heb. 9: 9, 24. They that revolted from Christianity to Judaism, are said to begin in the spirit, and end in the flesh, Gal. 3: 3. Such was the difference between Old-Testament and New-Testament institutions.

Secondly, In the temper and disposition of the worshippers; and so the true worshippers are distinguished from hypocrites; all should, and they will, worship God in spirit and in truth. It is spoken of, (p. 23.) as their character, and, (p. 24.) as their duty. Note, It is required of all that worship God, that they worship him in spirit and in truth. We must worship God in spirit, Phil. 3: 3. We must depend upon God's Spirit for assistance, laying our souls under his operations: we must devote our own spirits to, and employ them in, the service of God; (Rom. 1: 9.) must worship Him with fixedness of thought,

Lord. Note, Ignorance is so far from being the mother of devotion, that it is the murderer of it. Those that worship God ignorantly, offer the blind for sacrifice, and it is the sacrifice of fools.

The Jews were certainly in the right. For, First, 'We know what we worship.' We go upon sure grounds, for our people are trained up in the knowledge of God, as He has revealed Himself in the Scripture.' Note, Those who by the Scriptures have obtained some knowledge of God, may worship Him comfortably to themselves, and acceptably to Him, for they know what they worship. Christ elsewhere condemns the corruptions of the Jews' worship, (Matt. 15: 9.) and yet here defends the worship itself; the worship may be true, where yet it is not pure and entire. Observe, Our Lord was pleased to reckon Himself among the worshippers of God; We worship. Though He were a Son, yet learned He this obedience, in the days of his humiliation. Let not the greatest of men think the worship of God below them, when the Son of God Himself did not.

Secondly, Salvation is of the Jews; and therefore they know what ground they go upon in their worship. Not that all the Jews were saved, or that it was not possible but that many Gentiles and Samaritans might be saved; for in every nation he that fears God, and works righteousness, is accepted of Him; but, 1. The Author of eternal salvation comes of the Jews, (Rom. 9: 8.) and is sent first to bless them. 2. The means of eternal salvation are afforded to them. The word of Salvation (Acts 13: 26.) was of the Jews. It was delivered through them to other nations. This was a sure guide to them in their devotions, and therefore they knew what they worshipped. To them were committed the Oracles of God, (Rom. 3: 2.) and the service of God, Rom. 9: 4. The Jews therefore being thus privileged, it was presumption for the Samaritans to vie with them.

Having showed that the place is indifferent, He shows what is necessary and essential—that we worship God in spirit and in truth, p. 23, 24. The stress is not to be laid upon the place where we worship God, but with what mind we worship Him. Note, The most effectual way to make up differences in less matters, is to be more zealous in the greater. They who daily and affection, with all that is within us. Spirit is sometimes put for the new nature, in opposition to the flesh, which is the corrupt nature; and so to worship God with our spirit, is to worship Him with our graces, Heb. 12: 28. In truth, is in sincerity; God requires not only the inward part, but truth in the inward parts, Ps. 61: 6. We must mind the power more than the form; aim at God's glory, and not to be seen of men; draw near with a true heart, Heb. 10: 22.

The reason why God must be thus worshipped. In gospel-times they, and they only, are accounted the true worshippers. The Gospel erects a spiritual way of worship, so that the professors of the Gospel are not true in their professions, do not live up to gospel-light and laws, if they do not worship God in spirit and in truth.

The Father seeketh such worshippers. This intimates, First, That such worshippers are very rare, and seldom met with, Jer. 30: 21. The gate of spiritual worshipping is strait. Secondly, That such worship is what the God of heaven insists upon. When God comes to inquire for worshippers, the question will not be, 'Who worshipped at Jerusalem?' but, 'Who worshipped in spirit?' Thirdly, God is well pleased with, and graciously accepts of such worshippers. I have desired it, Ps. 132: 13, 14. Cant. 2: 14. Fourthly, There has been, and will be to the end, a remnant of such worshippers; his seeking of such, implies his making of them such. God is in all ages gathering to Himself a generation of spiritual worshippers.

God is a Spirit. Christ came to declare God to us, ch. 1: 18. And this He declared concerning Him, to this poor Samaritan woman, for the meanest are concerned to know God; and to rectify her mistakes concerning worship, to which nothing contributes more than the right knowledge of God. Note, God is a Spirit, an infinite and eternal Mind; incorporeal, invisible, and incorruptible. It is easier to say what God is not, than what He is; a spirit has not flesh and bones, but who knows the way of a spirit? If God were not a Spirit, He could not be perfect, nor infinite, nor independent, nor the Father of spirits. Secondly, The spirituality of the divine nature is a reason for the spirituality of divine worship. If we do not worship God, who is a Spirit, in the spirit, we neither give Him the glory due to his name, and so do not perform the act of worship; nor can we hope to obtain his acceptance, and so we miss of the end of worship, Matt. 15: 8, 9.

The last subject of discourse with this woman is, concerning the Messiah, p. 25, 26.

The woman expected the Messiah; I know that Messiah cometh—and He will tell us all things. She had nothing to object against what Christ had said; but thinks it best to suspend her belief. Thus many have no heart to the prize in their hand, (Prov. 17: 16.) because they think they have a better in their eye, and deceive themselves with a promise that they will learn that hereafter, which they neglect now.

I know that Messiah cometh. The Jews and Samaritans, though so much at variance, agreed in the expectation of the Messiah. The Samaritans received the writings of Moses, and were no strangers to the prophets, nor to the hopes of the Jews; those who knew least, knew this, that Messiah was to come; the expectation of Him, at this time, was more raised than ever; (the sceptre was departed from Judah; Daniel's weeks were near expiring;) so that she concludes not only, He will come, but 'He comes'; is just at hand.' The evangelist, though he retains the Hebrew word Messias, yet, writing for the use of the Gentiles, takes care to render it by a Greek word of the same signification—Christ, Anointed; giving an example to the Schoettgen, to prove that the Jews, even then, knew that, in the time of the Messiah, divine worship would be confined to no certain place, quotes a passage of Sohar, where it is said of the Messiah, 'At that time the prayers of the Israelites shall ascend to God in whatever place they may come into his holy presence.' The recollection of this, if it were so, may have led the woman to mention the Messiah, p. 25.

He did here to this poor Samaritan, and to the blind man; (ch. 9: 37.) not to John Baptist, when he sent to Him; (Matt. 11: 4, 5.) not to the Jews, when they challenged Him to tell them whether He was the Christ, ch. 10: 24. But Christ would honor such as were poor and despised, Jam. 2: 6. This woman, for aught we know, had never had an opportunity of seeing Christ's miracles, which were then the ordinary method of conviction. Note, To those who have not the advantage of the external means of knowledge and grace, God hath secret ways of making up the want of them; we must therefore judge charitably concerning such; God can make the light of grace shine into the heart, even where He doth not make the light of the Gospel shine in the face. This woman was better prepared to receive such a discovery than others were; she expected the Messiah, and was ready to receive instruction from Him. Christ will manifest Himself to those who with an honest, humble heart desire to be acquainted with Him; I that speak to thee am He. How near Christ was to her, when she knew not who He was, Gen. 23: 16. Many are lamenting Christ's absence, and longing for his presence, when at the same time He is speaking to them. Christ makes Himself known to us by speaking to us; I that speak unto thee so convincingly, with such assurance, with such authority, am He.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 16—26. In vain do we enlarge on the privileges of the new covenant; in vain do we represent Christ to the unregenerate sinner. He can 'see no beauty in Him,' no desirableness in his salvation, no need of it; and will not apply for healing before he feels sickness, nor for the binding up of his heart, till it be broken by a sense of guilt and danger. (Notes, 3: 3—6. Matt. 5: 3.) We should therefore open the law as 'the ministration of condemnation,' and endeavor to put men in remembrance of their crimes, that 'their mouths may be stopped,' and their thoughts turned from other objects to their own hearts and lives. When the Word of God is faithfully opened, and skillfully divided, it often reaches the case at one stroke; thus it produces a conviction of sin in the outward conduct, and a discovery of the evil concealed within. (P. O. 1 Cor. 14: 12—25, v. 24, 25.) The sinner, thus attacked, often employs means to shift off the conviction; and even religious controversy is frequently had recourse to for evasion. When those subjects are started, which detect men's sensuality, or ambition, they will, as it were, say, 'Let us talk of something else.' What think you of this or the other doctrine? Of this 'sect, book, sermon, or this preacher?' They appear to be religiously disposed, but it is in order plausibly to escape conviction; and in fact they say, 'any subject but Herodias,' or nor awake my Love till he please. They wondered at Christ's converse with this woman; marvelled that He talked thus earnestly (as perhaps they observed at a distance) with a strange woman, alone; He used to be more reserved; especially with a Samaritan woman not of the lost sheep of the house of Israel, they thought their Master should be as shy of the Samaritans as the other Jews were; at least, that He should not preach the Gospel to them. They wondered He should condescend to talk with such a poor, contemptible woman, forgetting what despicable men they themselves were when Christ first called them into fellowship. Yet they acquiesced in it; they knew it was for some good reason, which He was not bound to give, and therefore none of them asked, What seekest thou? or, Why talkest Thou with her? Thus when particular difficulties occur in the word and providence of God, it is good to satisfy ourselves with this, that all is well which Christ saith and doeth. Perhaps there was something amiss in their marvelling that Christ talked with the woman, and that it was something like the Pharisees being offended at his eating with publicans and sinners. But, whatever they thought, they said nothing: If thou hast thought evil at any time, lay thy hand upon thy mouth, to keep it from turning into an evil word, Prov. 30: 32. Ps. 39: 1—3.

The woman forgot her errand to the well, v. 28. Because the disciples were come, and broke up the discourse, and perhaps she observed they were not pleased with it, she went her way. She withdrew, in civility to Christ, that He might have leisure to eat. She delighted in his discourse, but would not be rude; every thing is beautiful in its season. She supposed that Jesus when He had dined, would go forward in his journey, and therefore hastened to tell her neighbors, that they might come quickly; Yet a little while is the light with you. She improved time; when one good work was done, she applied herself to another. When opportunities of getting good cease, we should seek opportunities of doing good; when we have done hearing the word, then is a time to be speaking of it.

Notice is taken of her leaving her water-pot.

(25.) Which is called Christ.] This is evidently the evangelist's remark, to his readers, who understood Greek, and not Hebrew; and not the words of the woman, who doubtless spake in the language of the country, which was Syriac, or a dialect of the Hebrew.

SCOTT.

(26.) 'The Samaritans seem to have formed just notions of the Messiah's character. For his kingly dignity being chiefly described in the prophetic books, which they rejected, they considered Him only as a Savior' (v. 42.) and a Teacher, according to Moses' description of Him, Gen. 22: 18. To the latter description Nehemiah refers (7: 65.) when, speaking of the Messiah, he calls Him a priest with Urin and Tammim, a priest under the immediate influence of inspiration. Hence the woman speaking of the Messiah, says, He will tell us all things. And therefore while our Lord industriously avoided the title of Messiah among the Jews, He without scruple discovered Himself now to the Samaritans, because He could do it with success and safety, the meanness of his condition being no ways inconsistent with the prophetic character.'

Marvelled.] 'This need not surprise us, for so great (however absurd and illfounded) was the pride of the Jewish literal, that they imagined that to hold discourse with women, on any serious and important matter, would but ill suit the dignity and gravity which ought to be uniformly maintained by a rabbi, or doctor of their law. That the disciples were not, in any thing, superior to the prejudices of the age, is manifest from the whole of their history. That the woman was a Samaritan, doubtless made the matter more astonishing.'

others; nor can we do ourselves a greater honor. This woman becomes an apostle. She who went forth, a specimen of impurity, returns, a teacher of evangelical truth, saith one. Christ had bid her call her husband, which she thought was warrant enough to call every body. She went into the city, where she dwelt among her kinsfolks and acquaintance. Though every man is my neighbor, that I have opportunity of doing good to, yet I have most opportunity, and therefore lie under the most obligations, to do good to those that live near me. Where the tree falls, there let it be made useful.

She tells them, He has told me all things that ever I did. No more is recorded than what He told her of her husbands; but it is not improbable that He had told her more of her faults. Or, his telling her that which she knew He could not by any ordinary means know, convinced her that He could have told her all that ever she did. If He has divine knowledge, it must be omniscience. He told her that which none knew but God and her own conscience. We ourselves cannot tell all that ever we did; but Christ knows all the thoughts, words, and actions of all men; see Heb. 4:13. He hath said, I know thy works. The power of his word made a great impression upon her; He had told her her secret sins with such unaccountable power that, being told of one, she is convinced and judged of all. She does not say, 'Come, see a man that has decided the controversy between this mountain and Jerusalem, call him the Messiah; but 'Come, see a man that has told me of my sins.' That part of Christ's discourse, one would think, she would have been shy of repeating; but experimental proofs of the power of Christ's word and Spirit are most cogent; and that knowledge of Christ into which we are led by conviction of sin and humiliation, is most likely to be sound and saving. 'Come and see Him.' Not barely, 'Come, and look upon Him,' (she does not invite them to a show,) but, 'come and converse with Him; hear his wisdom.' She would not undertake to repeat the arguments which had convinced her; all that see the evidence of truth themselves, are not able to make others see it; but, 'Come, and talk with Him, and you will find a power in his word above all other evidence.' Note, Those who can do little else toward the conversion of others, may, and should, bring them to those means which they themselves have found effectual. Jesus was now at the town's end; 'Now come.' When opportunities of getting knowledge are brought to our doors, we are inexcusable if we neglect them; shall we not go over the threshold to see Him, whose day prophets and kings desired to see?

She appeals to themselves; Is not this the Christ? She does not peremptorily say, 'He is the Messiah,' how clear soever she was in her own mind; and yet she prudently mentions Him, whom otherwise they would not have thought of; she will not impose her faith upon them, but only propose it to them. By such fair, but forcible appeals, men's judgments and consciences are sometimes taken hold of ere they are aware.

They went out of the city and came to Him. Though it might seem improbable that a woman of so small a figure, and so ill a character, should

She left it in kindness to Christ, that He might have to drink; and water was his drink; He turned water into wine for others, but not for Himself. Compare this with Rebecca's civility to Abraham's servant, (Gen. 24:18.) and see that promise, Matt. 10:42. She left it that she might make the more haste into the city, to carry good tidings. Those whose business it is to publish the name of Christ, must not encumber themselves. When the disciples were to be made fishers of men, they must forsake all. She left her water-pot as careless of it; being wholly taken up with better things. Note, Those who are brought to the knowledge of Christ, will show it by a holy contempt of this world. And those who are newly acquainted with the things of God, must be excused, if at first they be so taken up with that new world into which they are brought, that the things of this world seem to be for a time neglected. This verse may be made to justify those who leave their worldly business on week days to hear sermons.

She minded her errand to the town, for her heart was upon it; she went into the city, and said to the men, probably the men in authority, whom she found met together upon some public business; or to every man she met in the streets; she proclaimed it in the chief places of concourse; Come, see a man which told me all things that ever I did. Is not this the Christ?

How solicitous was she to bring her friends and neighbors acquainted with Christ. When she had found that treasure, she called together her friends and neighbors, (as Luke 15:9.) not only to rejoice with her, but to share with her; knowing there was enough to enrich herself and all. Note, They that have been with Jesus, and found comfort in Him, should do all they can to bring others to Him. Has He done us the honor to make Himself known to us? Let us do Him the honor to make Him known to others.

This woman becomes an apostle. She who went forth, a specimen of impurity, returns, a teacher of evangelical truth, saith one. Christ had bid her call her husband, which she thought was warrant enough to call every body. She went into the city, where she dwelt among her kinsfolks and acquaintance. They went out of the city and came to Him. Though it might seem improbable that a woman of so small a figure, and so ill a character, should have the honor of the first discovery of the Messiah among the Samaritans; yet it pleased God to incline their hearts to take notice of her report. Time was when repara were the first that brought tidings to Samaria of a great deliverance, 2 Kings 7:3, &c. They came unto Him; did not send for Him; but, in token of their respect, and the earnestness of their desire to see Him, they went out to Him. Those that would know Christ, must meet Him where He records his name.

Christ discoursed with his disciples, while the woman was absent, v. 31-34. Our Lord redeemed time. When the disciples were gone into the town, He discoursed with the woman; when she was gone, He discoursed with them; it were well if we could thus gather up the fragments of time, that none of it be lost.

Christ expresses the delight which He had in his work. His work was to seek and save that which was lost, to go about doing good. This work we here find Him wholly taken up with. He neglected his meat and drink for his work. When He sat down upon the well, He needed refreshment; but this opportunity of saving souls made Him forget his weariness and hunger. And He minded his food so little, that his disciples were forced to invite Him to it; They prayed Him, saying, Master, eat. It was an instance of their love to Him, lest He should be faint for want of support; it was a greater instance of his love to souls, that He needed invitation; let us learn hence a holy indifference even to the needful supports of life, in comparison with spiritual things. He minded it so little, that they suspected He had meat brought Him in their absence; He had so little appetite to his dinner. They that make religion their business, will prefer it before their food: Abraham's servant would not eat till he had told his errand, (Gen. 24:33.) and Samuel would not sit down till David was anointed, 1 Sam. 16:11.

He made his work his meat and drink. The work He had done in instructing the woman; the work He had to do among the Samaritans; the prospect He now had of doing good to many, was meat and drink to Him; the greatest satisfaction imaginable. Never did a hungry man expect a plentiful feast with so much desire, nor feed with so much delight, as our Lord expected and improved an opportunity of doing good. Concerning this He saith, it was such meat as the disciples knew not of. They did not imagine that He had any design of planting his Gospel among the Samaritans. Note, Christ by his Gospel and Spirit does more good to the souls of men than his own disciples know or expect. This may be said of Christians, who live by faith, that they have meat to eat which others know not of; joy which a stranger does not intermeddle with. This made them ask, Has any man brought Him ought to eat? So apt were even his own disciples to understand Him after a carnal manner. The reason why his work was his meat and drink was, it was his Father's work and will; (v. 34.) My meat is to do the will of Him that sent Me. Note, The salvation of sinners is the will of God, and the instruction of them in order thereunto is his work. See 1 Tim. 2:4. There is a chosen remnant whose salvation is in a particular manner his will. Christ was sent into the world on this errand, to bring people to know God, and to be happy in Him. He made this work his business and delight. Nothing could be more grateful to Him than doing good; when He was invited to meat, He went, that He might do good, for that was his meat always. He was not only ready upon all occasions to go to his work, but was earnest and in care to go through it, and to finish his work in all parts of it. He resolved never to quit it, or lay it down, till he could say, It is finished. Many have zeal to carry them out at first, but not zeal to carry them on to the last; but our Lord was

Verses 33-38.

The occasion of this discourse of Christ is the question of the disciples, v. 33. The proposition is, You ought not to think so much [642] of food, and things that concern the body, as of enlarging the kingdom of God. This is not said expressly, but hinted at in v. 35. The arguments are, 1. Because I set you an example of it, v. 34. 2. Because now is the time, v. 35. 3. Because ye may confidently hope to be rewarded for your labors, v. 36. 4. Because God will afford you his aid, v. 37, 38.

But not to them.

34 Jesus saith unto them, 'My meat is to do the will of him that sent me, * and to finish his work.'

35 Say not ye, There are yet four months, and then cometh harvest? behold, I say unto you, Lift up your eyes, and look on the fields; 'for they are white already to harvest.'

36 And he that reapeth receiveth wages, and gathereth fruit unto life eternal: that both he that soweth, and he that reapeth, may rejoice together.

ment of the sower at seed-time, it will be but four months to the harvest.' Or, 'Particularly now, at this time, you reckon it will be four months to next harvest, according to the ordinary course of Providence.' The Jews' harvest began at the passover, about easter; by which it appears that this journey of Christ was about the end of November, for He travelled all weathers, to do good. God has not only promised us a harvest every year, but has appointed the weeks of harvest; so that we know when to expect it, and take our measures accordingly. Christ's heart was as much upon the fruits of His Gospel as the hearts of others were upon the fruits of the earth, and to that He would lead the thoughts of His disciples: Look, the fields are already white.

In this place where they now were, there was harvest-work for Him to do. They would have Him eat, p. 31. 'Eat!' saith He, 'I have other work more useful; look what crowds of Samaritans are coming out of the town over the fields, ready to receive the Gospel;' probably, there were many now in view. People's forwardness to hear the word, is a great excitement to ministers' diligence and liveliness in preaching it.

In other places, all the country over, there was harvest-work. 'Consider the regions; and you will find there are multitudes as ready to receive the Gospel as a field of corn fully ripe, is ready to be reaped.' Now was the time when the gathering of the people should be to Christ, (Gen. 44: 10.) when great accessions should be made to the church, and the bounds of it should be enlarged, and therefore it was time for them to be busy. It is a great encouragement to engage in any work for God, if we understand by the signs of the times that this is the proper season for that work, for then it will prosper. John Baptist has made ready a people prepared for the Lord, Luke 1: 17. Since he began to preach the kingdom of God, every man pressed into it, Luke 16: 16. This therefore was a time for the preachers of the Gospel to apply themselves with the utmost vigor; to thrust in their sickle, Rev. 14: 15. It was necessary to work now; pity that such a season should slip. If the corn be not reaped, it will shed, and the fowls will pick it up. If souls that are under convictions, be not helped now, their beginnings will come to nothing, and they will be a prey to pretenders. It was also easy to work now; when the people's hearts are prepared, the work will be done suddenly, 2 Chron. 29: 36. It quickens ministers to preach, when they observe that people take pleasure in hearing it.

It was profitable and advantageous work, which they themselves would gain by; (c. 36.) 'He that reapeth, receiveth wages.' Christ pays those well whom He employs in his work; He will never do as Jehoiakim did, who used his neighbor's service without wages, (Jer. 22: 13.) or those who by fraud kept back the hire of those who reaped down their corn-fields, Jam. 5: 4. Christ's reapers, though they cry to Him day and night, shall never have cause to cry against Him, nor to say that they served a hard Master. He that reapeth, not

Christ's reapers have fruit; He gathereth fruit unto life eternal; he shall both save Himself and those that hear Him, 1 Tim. 4: 16. If the reaper save his own soul, that is fruit gathered to life eternal. And if he be instrumental to save the souls of others, there is fruit gathered; souls gathered to Christ are the fruit that Christ seeks for, Rom. 1: 13. Cant. 8: 11, 12. This is the comfort of faithful ministers, that their work has a tendency to the eternal salvation of souls.

They have joy; that he that sows, and they that reap, may rejoice together. The minister who is the happy instrument of beginning a good work, is he that sows, as John Baptist was; he that is employed to carry it on, is he that reaps; and both shall rejoice together. Note, Though God is to have all the glory of the success of the Gospel, yet faithful ministers may take the comfort of it. The reapers share in the joy of harvest, though the profits belong to the master, 1 Thess. 2: 19. Those ministers who are variously gifted and employed, should be so far from envying one another, that they should rather rejoice in each other's success. Though all Christ's ministers are not alike serviceable, nor successful, yet, if they have obtained mercy of the Lord to be faithful, they shall all enter together into the joy of their Lord.

It was easy work, half done to their hands by those that went before them; (c. 37, 38.) One soweth, and another reapeth. This sometimes speaks a grievous judgment upon him that sows, Mic. 6: 15. Deut. 28: 30. Thou shalt sow, and another shall reap; as Deut. 6: 11. Houses full of all good things which thou filledst not. Moses and the prophets and John Baptist had sown the good seed of which the New-Testament ministers did in effect but gather the fruit. I send you to reap that whereon ye bestowed, in comparison, no labor, Isa. 40: 3-5.

This speaks two things concerning the Old-Testament ministry. First, That it was very much short of the New-Testament ministry. Moses and the prophets sowed, but little did they see of the fruit of their labors. Their writings have done much more good since they left us than ever their preaching did. Yet it was very much serviceable to the New Testament ministry; the writings of the prophets which were read in the synagogues every Sabbath-day, raised people's expectations of the Messiah, and prepared them to bid Him welcome. Had it not been for the seed sown by the prophets, this Samaritan woman could not have said, We know that the Messiah cometh. The writings of the Old Testament are in some respects more useful to us than they could be to those to whom they were first written, because better understood by the accomplishment of them. See 1 Pet. 1:12. Heb. 4:2. Rom. 16:25, 26.

This also speaks two things concerning the ministry of the apostles. First, That it was a fruitful ministry; they were reapers that gathered in a great harvest of souls to Christ, and did more in seven years towards the setting up of the kingdom of God, than the prophets of the Old Testament had done in twice so many ages.

Secondly, It was much facilitated among the Jews, by the writings of the prophets. The prophets sowed in tears, crying out, We have labored in vain; the apostles reaped in joy, saying, Thanks be to God who always causeth us to

(35) The clause, 'There are yet four months, and then cometh harvest,' seems to have been meant of the fact, and not as a proverb; but how far it may be made use of to settle the chronology of our Lord's life, must be determined by those, whose studies have been more immediately directed to that object; which, after all, seems to be of very subordinate consequence. 'In your common harvest, you usually say, after your seed is sown, four months hence will come the harvest. But in this spiritual harvest it is otherwise; for the seed of the word is sown in the heart of the woman of Samaria, in your absence, hath made the Samaritans already ripe for the harvest.' Whitby. Say not ye, 'There are yet four months?' This appears to have been said, to intimate to the disciples that the time for preaching to the Samaritans was much nearer than they thought, who perhaps supposed that all Israel was first to be converted; although at a subsequent period, when they might have followed the present example of their Master, they were inhibited from preaching to them, as yet. Comp. Matt. 10: 5. and Acts 8: 5-8.

'I choose, with Sir Isaac Newton, to take these words in their plainest sense, as an intimation that it was then four months to the beginning of harvest.'

'After all that learned men have said on this passage, it does not appear that our Lord meant any thing by it, more than an illustration of his present subject. Though there were ordinarily four months from seed-time to harvest, and that a man, after he had sowed his seed, must wait patiently till the regular harvest came; yet it was not the case now—the seed of life which He had just sown, had already brought forth much fruit; therefore He says, Lift up your eyes and look on the fields, over which it is likely the Samaritans were then coming in troops, guided by the woman, who had already received the Gospel.'

27 And herein is that saying true, 'One sowing, and, another reaping.'

38 I sent you to reap that whereon ye bestowed no labor: other men labored, and ye are entered into their labors.

39 ¶ And many of the Samaritans of that city believed on him for the saying of the woman, which testified, He told me all that ever I did.

40 So when the Samaritans were come unto him, they besought him that he would tarry with them: and he abode there two days.

41 And many more believed, because of his own word;

Let not ministers be either careless in their preaching, or discouraged in it, because their hearers are few and mean; for, by doing good to them, good may be conveyed to more, and those that are more considerable. If they teach every man his neighbor, and every man his brother, a great number may learn at second hand. Philip preached the Gospel to a man in his chariot upon the road, and he not only received it himself, but carried it into his country, and propagated it there. Thirdly, See how good it is to speak experimentally of Christ and the things of God. This woman could say little of Christ, but what she did say she spake feelingly; He told me all that ever I did. Those are most likely to do good, that can tell what God has done for their souls, Ps. 66: 16.

When they were come to him, they besought him that he would tarry with them. Upon the woman's report, they believed him to be a prophet, and came to him; when they saw him, the poverty of his outward condition did not lessen their esteem of him, but still they respected him as a prophet. Note, There are hopes of those who are got over the vulgar prejudices that men have against true worth in a low estate. Blessed are they that are not offended in Christ at the first sight. They begged he would tarry with them; [1.] That they might testify their respect, and treat him with the honor and kindness due to his character. God's prophets and ministers are welcome guests to all who sincerely embrace the Gospel; as to Lydia, Acts 16: 15. [2.] That they might receive instruction from him. Those that are taught of God, are truly desirous to learn more, and to be better acquainted with Christ. Many would have flocked to one that would tell them their fortune, but these flocked to one that would tell them their faults. The historian seems to lay emphasis upon their being Samaritans; as, Luke 10: 33. 17: 16. The Samaritans had not that reputation for religion that the Jews had; yet the Jews, who saw Christ's miracles, drove him from them, while the Samaritans, who saw not his miracles, nor shared in his favors, invited him to them. The proof of the Gospel's success is not always according to the probability, nor what is experienced according to what is expected. The Samaritans were taught to be shy of the Jews. There were Samaritans that refused to let Christ go through their town, (Luke 9: 62.) yet these begged him to tarry with them. Note, It adds much to our love to Christ, if it conquers prejudices, and sets light by the censures of men.

Verse 40.

Two days.] 'This was a proper medium between entirely neglecting them, and giving them so much of his time and company as would have broken in upon the design of his journey into Galilee, or might have given umbrage to the Jews.'

He abode there so long, that He might not condemn persons desirous to learn of him; he staid no longer, that He might not neglect the Jews, or them to prefer the Samaritans before them; and He com-triumph. Note, From the labors of ministers that are dead, much fruit may be reaped by the people that survive, and the ministers that succeed them. John Baptist, and those that assisted him had labored, and the disciples of Christ entered into their labors. What reason we have to bless God for those that are gone before us; for their preaching and writing; for what they did and suffered, for we are entered into their labors; their studies and services have made our work the easier. When the ancient and modern laborers, those that came at the third hour, and those that came at the eleventh, meet, they will be so far from envying one another the honor of their respective services, that both they that sowed and they that reaped shall rejoice together; and the great Lord of the harvest shall have the glory of all.

The woman's testimony concerning Christ, though a single testimony, and of one of no good report, and no more than this, He told me all that ever I did, yet had a good influence upon many. One would have thought that his telling the woman her secret sins, would have made them afraid of coming to him, lest he should tell them of their faults; but they will venture that, rather than not be acquainted with one that they had reason to think was a prophet.

Many of the Samaritans of that city believed on him for the saying of the woman. So far they believed on him, that they took him for a prophet, and were desirous to know the mind of God from him; this is favorably interpreted a believing on him.

They that believed were Samaritans, who were not of the house of Israel. Their faith not only aggravated the unbelief of the Jews, from whom better might have been expected, but was an earnest of the faith of the Gentiles, who would welcome that which the Jews rejected.

They believed for the saying of the woman. See here, First, How God is sometimes pleased to use very unlikely instruments for a good work. A little maid directed a great prince to Elisha, 2 Kings 5: 2.

Secondly, How great a matter a little fire kindles. Our Savior, by instructing one poor woman, spread instruction to a whole town. Let not ministers be either careless in their preaching, or discouraged in it, because their hearers are few and mean; for, by doing good to them, good may be conveyed to more, and those that are more considerable. Many would have flocked to one that would tell them their fortune, but these flocked to one that would tell them their faults. The Samaritans had not that reputation for religion that the Jews had; yet the Jews, who saw Christ's miracles, drove him from them, while the Samaritans, who saw not his miracles, nor shared in his favors, invited him to them. Note, It adds much to our love to Christ, if it conquers prejudices, and sets light by the censures of men.

He abode there. Though it was a city of the Samaritans near their temple, yet, when He was invited, He tarried there; though upon a journey, yet, when He had an opportunity of doing good, He abode there. That is no real hindrance, which will further our account. He abode there but two days, because He had other places to visit and other work to do, and two days were as many as came to the share of this city, out of the few days of our Savior's sojourning upon earth.

We are told what impressions were made upon them by Christ's own word, and his personal converse with them. The labors of a minister are best told by the good fruit of them. Their hearing of him had a good effect, but now their eyes see him; and the effect of that was,

Many more believed; many that would not be persuaded to go out of the town to him, were yet wrought upon when He came among them. Note, It is comfortable to see the number of believers; and sometimes the zeal and forwardness of some may be a means to provoke many to a holy emulation, Rom. 11: 14.

Those who had been wrought upon by the report of the woman, now saw cause to say, Now we believe, not for thy saying, v. 42.

Upon the testimony of the woman, they believed him to be a prophet, or some extraordinary messenger from heaven; but now that they have conversed with him, they believe that He is the Christ; and that being the Christ, He is the Savior of the world; for He was anointed, to save his people from their sins. They believed him to be the Savior not only of the Jews, but of the world, which they hoped would take them in, though Samaritans, for it was promised that He should be Salvation to the ends of the earth, Isa. 49: 6.

Their faith now grew up to a full assurance; We know that this is indeed the Christ; not a pretended Christ, but a real one; not a typical Savior, as many under the Old Testament, but truly one. Such an assurance we should labor after; not only, We think it probable, and are willing to suppose that Jesus may be the Christ, but, We know that He is indeed the Christ.

The ground of it was experience; 'We have heard him ourselves. They had before believed for her saying; but now they find further and much firmer footing for their faith; We have heard ourselves, such truths, accompanied with such power, that we are sure this is the Christ.' This is like what the queen of Sheba said of Solomon; (1 Kings 10: 6, 7.) The half was not told me. The Samaritans, who believed for the woman's saying, now gained further light; for to him that hath said be given; he that is faithful in a little shall be trusted with more.

In this instance see how faith comes by hearing. [1.] Faith comes to the birth by hearing the report of men. These Samaritans, for the sake of the woman's saying, believed so far as to come and see. The instructions of parents and preachers, and the testimony of the church incline us to entertain the doctrine of Christ as highly probable. But, [2.] Faith comes to its maturity, by hearing the testimony of Christ himself; and this goes further, and obliges us to believe it as certain. We were induced to look into the Scriptures, by the saying of those who told us that in them they had found eternal life; but when we ourselves have experienced the convincing, regenerating, comforting power of the Word, we believe, not for their saying, we have searched them ourselves; our faith stands not in the wisdom of men, but in the power of God, 1 Cor. 2: 5. 1 John 5: 9, 10.

Thus was the seed of the Gospel sown in Samaria. Four or five years after, when Philip preached the Gospel in Samaria, he found such remains of this good work that the people withmanded his apostles, (Matt. 10: 5.) not to go to any city of Samaria, as the Gospel was first to be preached to the Jews.' Whithy in Scott.

Verse 41.

And many more believed.] 'This was the more extraordinary; as they not only had a national prejudice against him as a Jew, out, living near mount Gerizim, had a particular interest in maintaining the usual worship there, which must be very advantageous to the neighborhood.'

V. 27-42. Even wise and good men are incompetent judges of what it becomes the Lord to do: but reverence will impose silence on them, even when perplexed with difficulties; and they will abhor such blasphemies as unbelievers often utter, concerning 'things which they understand not.'—When the heart is engaged after 'the Pearl of great price,' outward concerns will sometimes be neglected: and when our affections are greatly excited, we shall be led to call on others to seek those blessings, which we see to be beyond all comparison. Thus, the greatest sinners witness for Christ; and from their own experience, declare his truth. But no trembling sinner can be more earnest to hear the words of life, than some zealous ministers are (and than all ministers should be) to preach them.—When we consider Jesus, counting his rugged path, and his whole work on earth, till He 'finished' it on the cross, (Note, 9: 21-30,) as more pleasant to Him than necessary food; and when we remember that his love and zeal are unabated, while the exercise of them is attended with no suffering; we may confidently seek to Him for all the blessings of salvation. But we should also consider Him as our example; and, in our inferior services and lighter trials, it should be our 'meat to do 'he will of God, and to finish his work.' This mind of Christ should be in all his disciples, in his ministers especially. When the harvest is ripe, the husbandmen endure hardship to reap it, and when sinners are disposed to hear the Gospel, we should deem the 'fields already white for harvest,' and disregard personal inconvenience to improve the precious occasion. On the other hand, the husbandman, having sown his seed, waits patiently till 'the appointed weeks of harvest;' and so should we, when we have sown the good seed of the Word, though we do not presently see the fruit of our labors. Indeed comparatively small success will render this the most gainful employment in the world. Every soul converted will be the minister's everlasting crown, and be forever happy with him. Let us then cheerfully endure 'the heat and burden of the day;' for as prophets, apostles, and martyrs have labored and suffered in sowing that seed, of which we now reap the harvest without their toil and tribulation; so others may reap the crop of what we now sow, weeping because perhaps it seems to be thrown away. Faithful ministers often labor long, and with little encouragement, but the seed is not lost; for others enter into their labors, and gather many souls to Christ: and in that world, where ambition and envy are no more, they will all unite in rejoicing over that success, to which they have been instrumental. In the mean time let us labor, (whether sowing or reaping,) in faith and patience.—The chief usefulness of ministers is sometimes found among those, who previously bore the worst characters, and were counted the most hopeless persons. Such are often the instruments of exciting others, by carrying a report of what they have heard and experienced; and the effects of 'the quick and powerful word' of Christ, in detecting their hearts, and bringing to remembrance past sins, are the general means by which men are brought to believe. Those who receive the word of God, 'have the witness in themselves;' and shall know that 'Jesus is the Christ, the Savior of the world.' (Notes, 1 John 5: 9-13. Scott.)

one accord gave heed to those things which Philip spake, Acts 8: 5, 6, 8. But as some were p'able to good, so were others to evil, whom Simon Magus bewitched with his sorceries, v. 9, 10.

V. 43-54. Though Christ was as welcome among the Samaritans as He could be any where, and had better success, yet after two days He left them; not because He might confirm those in their prejudices against Him, who said, He is a Samaritan, (ch. 8: 43.) but because He must preach to other cities, Luke 4: 43. He went into Galilee, for there He spent much of his time.

Christ went into the country of Galilee, but not to Nazareth, which was strictly his own country; He went among the villages, but declined going to Nazareth for a reason which Jesus himself testified, who knew the hearts of all men, and the experiences of all prophets. A prophet has no honor in his own country. Note, Prophets ought to have honor, because God has put honor upon them, and we do or may receive benefit by them. The honor due the Lord's prophets has very often been denied them, and contempt put upon them. This due honor is most frequently denied them in their own country; see Luke 4: 24. Matt. 13: 57. Not that it is universally true, (no rule but has some exceptions,) but it holds for the most part. Joseph, when he began to be a prophet, was most hated by his brethren; David was disdained by his brother; (1 Sam. 17: 28.) Jeremiah was malign'd by the men of Anathoth, (Jer. 11: 21.) Paul by his countrymen the Jews; and Christ's near kinsmen spake most slightly of Him, ch. 7: 5. Men's pride and envy make them scorn to be instructed by those who once were their school-fellows and play-fellows. Desire of novelty, and of that which is far-fetched, makes them despise persons and things to which they have been long used and of which they know the rise. It is a great discouragement to a minister to go among a people that have no value for him. Christ would not go to Nazareth, because He knew how little respect He should have there. It is just with God to deny his Gospel to those that despise the ministers of it. They that mock the messengers, forfeit the benefit of the message. Matt. 21: 35, 41.

The Galileans in the country received Him, and cheerfully attended on his doctrine. Christ and his Gospel are not sent in vain; if they had not honor with some, they shall have with others. The reason given why these Galileans were so ready to receive Christ, is, they had seen the miracles He did at Jerusalem, v. 45.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

They went up to Jerusalem at the feast of the passover. The Galileans lay very remote from Jerusalem, and their way thither lay through the country of the Samaritans; yet, in obedience to God's command, they went up to the feast, and there they became acquainted with Christ. Note, They that are diligent in attending on public ordinances, some time or other meet with more spiritual benefit than they expect. At Jerusalem they saw Christ's miracles, which commended Him and his doctrine to their faith and affections. The miracles were wrought for the benefit of Jerusalem; yet the Galileans, who were accidentally there, had more advantage by them than they for whom they were chiefly designed. Thus the word preached to a mixed multitude may perhaps edify occasional more than the constant hearers. When He would go to a city, He chose to go to Cana of Galilee, where He had made the water wine; (v. 46.) thither He went, to see if there were any fruits of that miracle remaining; and, if there were, to water what He had planted. The evangelist mentions this miracle, to teach us to keep the works of Christ in remembrance. There was a certain nobleman; a little king; so called, either for the largeness of his estate, or the extent of his power. Some understand it as bespeaking his preferment, he was in some office about the king; others, as bespeaking his party, he was a Herodian, a royalist. Perhaps it was Chuzza, Herod's steward, (Luke 8: 3.) or Manaen, Herod's foster-brother, Acts 13: 1. There were saints in Caesar's household. The father a nobleman, and yet the son sick; dignities and titles of honor will be no security from the assaults of sickness and death. It was fifteen miles from where this nobleman lived to where Christ now was; yet this affliction in his family sent him to Christ. Having heard that Jesus was come out of Judea to Galilee, and finding that He did not come toward Capernaum, he went to Him himself, and besought Him to come and heal his son, v. 47. See here, (1.) His tender affection to his son, he would spare no pains to get help for him. (2.) His great respect to our Lord; he would come himself, when he might have sent a servant; and he besought Him, when, as a man in authority, some would think he might have ordered his attendance. The greatest men, when they come to God, must become beggars. We may observe a mixture in his faith. There was sincerity in it; he did believe that Christ could heal his son, though his disease went thither, because He foresaw that the Galileans would receive Him now more readily than before, on account of the miracles they had seen at the feast. Bloomfield.

out of Judea into Galilee, he went unto him, and besought him that he would come down and heal his son: for he was at the point of death.

48 Then said Jesus unto him, "Except ye see signs and wonders ye will not believe."

49 The nobleman saith unto him, Sir, come down ere my child die.

50 Jesus saith unto him, "Go thy way; thy son liveth." And the man believed the word that Jesus had spoken unto him, and he went his way.

51 And as he was now going down, his servants met him, and told him, saying, "Thy son liveth."

52 Then inquired he of them the hour when he began to amend. And they said unto him, Yesterday at the seventh hour the fever left him.

53 So the father knew that it was at the same hour in the which Jesus said unto him, Thy son liveth: and himself believed, and his whole house.

54 This is again the second miracle that Jesus did, when he was come out of Judea into Galilee.

make it for a denial, but still continued to wrestle till he prevailed. He might argue thus, 'If Christ heal my soul, surely He will heal my son; if He cure my unbelief, He will cure his fever.' This is the method Christ takes, first to work upon us, and then to work for us; 'here is hope, if we find Him entering upon this method.'

He seems, however, to take no notice of the reproof Christ gave him, says nothing to it, by way either of confession or excuse, for he is so wholly taken up with concern about his child, that he can mind nothing else. Note, The sorrow of the world is a great prejudice to our profiting by the word of Christ. Inordinate care and grief are thorns that choke the good seed; see Exod. 6:2. He still discovered the weakness of his faith in the power of Christ.

was dangerous. It is probable that physicians had given him over; but he believed that Christ could cure when the case seemed deplorable. Yet there was infirmity in his faith; he believed that Christ could heal his son, but as it would seem, he thought He could not at a distance, and therefore he besought Him that He would come down, expecting, as Naaman did, that He would come and strike his hand over the patient. We are apt to limit the Holy One of Israel. The centurion, a Gentile, was so strong in faith, as to say, Lord, I am not worthy that Thou shouldst come under my roof, Matt. 8:8. This nobleman, a Jew, must have Christ come down, though it was a good day's journey, and despairs of a cure unless He come down, as if He must teach Christ how to work. We are encouraged to pray, but we are not allowed to prescribe; 'Lord, heal me; but whether with a word or a touch, thy will be done.'

Jesus said to him, 'Except ye see signs and wonders, ye will not believe; the Samaritans did, though they saw no signs and wonders; I must work miracles among you.' Though he was a nobleman, Christ gives him a reproof; men's dignity in the world shall not exempt them from the rebukes of the Word or Providence; for Christ reproves not after the hearing of his ears, but with equity, Isa. 11:3. Observe, Christ first shows him his sin and weakness, to prepare him for mercy, and then grants him his request. Christ humbles those first with his frowns, whom He intends to honor with his favors. The Comforter shall first convince. Herod longed to see some miracle, (Luke 23:8.) and this courtier was of the same mind.

That which is blamed, is, that whereas they had heard by incontestable report of the miracles He had wrought in other places, they would not believe except they saw them with their own eyes, Luke 4:23. They must be honored, and humored; or they will not be convinced. Their country must be graced, their curiosity gratified, or else they will not believe; like Thomas, they will yield to no method of conviction but what they shall prescribe. They had seen miracles, which they could not gainsay, which sufficiently proved Christ a Teacher come from God, and should have applied themselves to Him, for instruction which would have led them on, in believing, to spiritual perfection; instead of this, they would go no further in believing than they were driven by signs and wonders. The spiritual power of the Word did not attract them, but only the sensible power of miracles, which were for them who believed not, while prophesying was for them that believe, 1 Cor. 14:22. Those that admire miracles only, and despise prophesying, rank themselves with unbelievers.

He still continued to importune: Sir, come down ere my child die.

He took the reproof patiently, spake to Christ respectfully; though he wore soft clothing, he could bear reproof. It is none of the privileges of peerage to be above the reproofs of Christ; but it is a sign of a good disposition in men, especially in great men, when they can be told of their faults, and not be angry. And as he did not take the reproof for an affront, so he did not

He must have Christ come down, thinking that else He could do the child no kindness. It is hard to persuade ourselves that distance of time and place are no obstructions to Jesus; He sees afar off, his eyes run to and fro; He acts afar off, for the word of his power runs very swiftly. He believes that Christ could heal a sick child, but not raise a dead child, and therefore, Come down, ere my child die: as if then it would be too late; whereas Christ has the same power over death that He has over diseases. He forgot that Elijah and Elisha had raised dead children; and is Christ's power inferior to theirs? Observe what haste he is in; Come down ere my child die. He that believeth, doth doth not make haste, but refers himself to Christ: 'Lord, what, and when, and how thou pleasest.'

The answer of peace which Christ gave was, Go thy way, thy son liveth. Christ here gives us a proof that He not only could heal, but with so much ease. Nothing is said, nothing done, nothing ordered to be done, and yet the cure wrought; Thy son liveth. The healing beams of the Sun of righteousness dispense influences from one end of heaven to another; there is nothing hid from the heat thereof. Though Christ is now in heaven, and his church on earth, He can send from above. This nobleman would have Christ come down and heal his son; Christ will heal his son, and not come down. Thus the cure is the sooner wrought the nobleman's mistake rectified, and his faith confirmed; so that the thing was better done in Christ's way. When He denies what we ask, He gives what is much more to our advantage; we ask for ease, He gives patience. Observe, His power was exerted by his word. In saying, Thy son lives, He showed that He has life in Himself, and power to quicken whom He will. Christ's saying, Thy soul lives, makes it alive.

He observed the nobleman to be in pain about his son; and therefore Christ dropped the reproof, and gave him assurance of the recovery of his child; for He knows how a father pities his children.

The nobleman believed and went away. Though Christ did not gratify him so far as to go down with him, he is satisfied with the method Christ took. How easily is that which is lacking in our faith, perfected by the word of Christ. Now he sees no sign or wonder, and yet believes the wonder done.

Christ said, Thy son liveth, and the man believed Him; not only believed the omniscience of Christ, but the omnipotence of Christ, that the cure was effected by his word. He left him dying; yet, when Christ said, he lives, like the father of the faithful, against hope, he believed in hope, and staggered not through unbelief.

Christ said, Go thy way; and, as an evidence of the sincerity of his faith, he went his way. He did not press Christ to come down, did not say, 'If he do recover, yet a visit will be acceptable;' he seems no further solicitous, but, like Hannah, goes his way, and his countenance is no more sad. As one entirely satisfied, and did not hurry home that night, but returned leisurely, perfectly easy in his mind.

His servants met him with news of the child's recovery, v. 51. Probably they met him not far from his own house, and, knowing their master's care, were willing, as soon as they could, to make him easy. David's servants were loath to tell him, when the child was dead. Christ said, Thy son liveth; and now the servants say the same. Good news will meet those that hope in God's word.

He inquired what hour the child began to re-

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

v. 43-54. Pride, prejudices, and worldly prosperity concur in keeping men from the Savior; and those are happy afflictions which induce any to inquire after Him. The rich and honorable seldom come to Him; till trial shows them the vanity of their distinctions, and that they need other help than man or wealth can purchase. (P. O. Matt. 9: 13-26.) This conviction, and a heart broken for sin, prepare the mind to see the sorefulness of Christ and his salvation to their wants and desires, that signs and wonders are no longer needful, in order to belief and humble trust in Him. We must submit to his rebukes, and renew our applications with increasing importunity; we must credit his words and follow his directions, if we would have the blessing from Him. Then experience will strengthen our faith; and we shall find that every event accords with his declarations, and that all things in heaven and earth obey Him. In this way, the knowledge of Christ spreads through families, and men find salvation. These miracles never cease; may we and all our's seek and experience them. Scott comes again up to Jerusalem; and at the pool of Bethesda on the Sabbath-day, heals one who had been diseased thirty-eight years; and orders him to carry his bed, 1-9. The Jews demand of the man, who ordered him to carry his bed: Jesus answers him at the temple, and warns him to sin no more; and he informs the Jews that Jesus had healed him, 10-15. They persecute Jesus, 16. He defends Himself, asserting his personal and mediatorial dignity and authority, in the most explicit and energetic language, 17-22, appealing to the testimony of John, 18: 3-5; to his own miracles, 36; to the testimony of God by a voice from heaven, 37, 38, and to the scriptures, 39-40. He exposes their unbelief, ambition, and ungodliness; and shews, that in dishonouring him, they dishonoured Moses also, 41-47.

AFTER this there was a feast of the Jews, and Jesus went up to Jerusalem.

2 Now there is at Jerusalem by the sheep market, a pool, which is called in the Hebrew tongue Bethesda; having five porches.

the very time when it is prayed for, as Peter's deliverances, Acts 12:12. In men's works, distance of place is the delay of time, and the retarding of business; not so in the works of Christ. The peace and spiritual healing, which He speaks in heaven, is, if He pleases, at the same time effected; and when these two come to be compared in the great day, Christ will be glorified in his saints, and admired in all them that believe.

The bringing of the cure to the family brought salvation to it.

The nobleman himself believed. He had before believed, with reference to this particular occasion; but now he believed in Christ as the Messiah, and became one of his disciples. Thus the particular experience of the power and efficacy of one word of Christ, may settle the whole authority of Christ's dominion in the soul. Christ has many ways of gaining the heart, and, by the grant of a temporal mercy, may make way for better things.

His whole house believed likewise. The miracle preserved the blossom and hopes of the family; this affected them all, and endeared Christ to them. A master of a family cannot give faith to those under his charge, nor force them to believe, but he may be instrumental to remove external prejudices, and then the work is more than half done. Abraham was famous for this, (Gen. 18: 19.) and Joshua, ch. 24: 15. This was a nobleman, and, probably, he had a great household; but when he comes into Christ's school, he brings them all with him. What a blessed change was here in this house, occasioned by the sickness of the child! This should reconcile us to afflictions, we know not what good may follow from them. Probably, the conversion of this nobleman and his family at Capernaum might invite Christ to come afterward, and settle at Capernaum, as his head-quarters in Galilee. When great men receive the Gospel, they may be instrumental to bring it to the places where they live.

NOTES.

CHAP. V. v. 1. This is generally supposed to have been the feast of the passover: (Marg. Ref.) yet perhaps none of the evangelists mention all the passovers, which occurred during our Lord's ministry. But subsequent to what was related in the former chapter, several things, recorded by the other evangelists, are supposed to have taken place, before Jesus went up to Jerusalem. He had called several disciples to a stated attendance on Him, wrought many miracles, and probably delivered the sermon on the mount. (Notes, Matt. 4: 12-25. Luke 4: 16-44. 5: 1-11.) He refused not communion with a church, which had clogged these festivals with human traditions; though perhaps He performed only the rites required by the law. Wistly.

Verses 2-4.

As the evangelist uses the present tense, saying, 'There is at Jerusalem, &c.' it has been conjectured, that he wrote his gospel before the conversion of that city; but the pool might remain, even though the porches were in ruins, and the spot on which the city stood was called Jerusalem, long after the temples and buildings were destroyed by Titus; and indeed it is so to this day. Thus our Lord says, 'Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles, until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled.' (Luke 21: 24.) If 'the troubling of the water' took place so regularly, that the time might be certainly foreknown, it does not appear that the diseased persons would have had any occasion previously to wait by the pool, as it would have sufficed for them to come at the appointed seasons. The hypothesis of Dr. Hammond, (though supported by the sanction of some of the ancient fathers,) which supposes, that the washing of the numerous sacrifices and the entrails in this pool, had given it a salutary virtue; and that the angel was no other than a messenger, sent by the priests or rulers, to stir up the water, that this efficacy might be more powerfully exerted, is so unscriptural and irrational, cover, not as if he doubted the influence of Christ's word upon the child, but he desired to have his faith confirmed, to satisfy any to whom he should relate it; for it was a material circumstance. Note, It is good to furnish ourselves with corroborating proofs, to strengthen our faith in the word of Christ, that it may grow up to a full assurance. Show me a token for good. The diligent comparing of the works of Christ with his word, will be of great use to confirm our faith. That was the course this nobleman took; He inquired of the servants the hour when he began to amend; they told him, Yesterday, at the seventh hour, the fever left him: not only he began to amend, but he was perfectly well on a sudden; so the father knew that it was at the same hour, when Jesus said to him, Thy son liveth. As the Word of God, well studied, will help us to understand his providences; so the Providence of God, well observed, will help us to understand his word, for God is every day fulfilling the Scripture. Two things would help to confirm his faith. The child's recovery was sudden, and not gradual. They name the precise time to an hour; not about, but at, the seventh hour, the fever left him; not, it began to decrease, but left him in an instant. The word of Christ did not, like physic, require time. It was just at the same time that Christ spake to him; at that very hour. The coincidence of events adds very much to the beauty and harmony of Providence. Observe the time, and the thing itself will be more illustrious, for every thing is beautiful in its time; at the very time when it is promised, as Israel's deliverance, (Exod. 12: 14.) at the

The evangelist's remark upon this cure is, This is the second miracle; referring to ca. 2: 11. That was soon after his first return out of Judea, this soon after the second. In Judea He had wrought many miracles, ch. 3: 2; 4: 45. They had the first offer; but, being driven thence, He wrought miracles in Galilee. Somewhere or other, Christ will find a welcome. People may if they please, shut the sun out of their own houses, but cannot shut it out of the world. This is noted to be the second miracle, 1. To remind us of the first, wrought in the same place some months before. Fresh mercies should revive the remembrance of former mercies, as former mercies should encourage our hopes of further mercies. Christ keeps account of his favors, whether we do or no. 2. To let us know that this cure was before those many cures which the other evangelists mention to be wrought in Galilee, Matt. 4: 23. Mark 1: 34. Luke 4: 40. Probably, this cure, (the patient being a person of quality) was the more talked of for that reason, and sent Him crowds of patients; when this nobleman applied himself to Christ, multitudes followed. What abundance of good may great men do, if they be good men!

CHAP. V. v. 1-16. The other evangelists confine themselves mostly to the miracles wrought in Galilee, but John relates those wrought at Jerusalem.

The time when this cure was wrought, was at a feast of the Jews, the passover, for that was the most celebrated feast. Christ, though residing in Galilee, went up to Jerusalem at the feast, v. 1.

1. Because it was an ordinance of God, which He would observe, being made under the law; though, as a Son, He might have pleaded an exemption. Thus He teaches us to attend religious assemblies, Heb. 10: 25.

2. Because it was an opportunity of good. There were great numbers gathered there, at that time, at least, of serious people from all parts of the country, beside proselytes from other nations; and wisdom must cry in the places of concourse, Prov. 1: 21. It was to be hoped that they were in a good frame, for they came together to worship God, and for religious exercises. A mind inclined to devotion, and secluded itself to exercises of piety, lies open to further discoveries of divine light, and Christ will be acceptable to it.

The place was the pool of Bethesda, which had a healing virtue in it, and it is here particularly described.

It was situated at Jerusalem by the sheep-market; it might be rendered, the sheep-cote, where the sheep were kept; or the sheep-gate, which we read of, (Neh. 3: 1.) through which the sheep were brought; as the sheep-market, where they were sold. Some think it was near al, that it is wonderful it should ever have been thought of a second time, by any one to whose imagination it might once occur. To mention nothing else, what were the brazen sea, and the lavers, in the courts of the temple provided for, and always replenished with abundance of water, but that the sacrifices (as well as the priests and Levites,) might be washed upon the spot, and not carried out of the holy place, to a distant pool for that purpose? It is probable, that this miracle was not wrought for any length of time, and perhaps it ceased on this occasion. This may account for the surprising silence of Josephus in a story which made so much for the honor of his nation. He was himself not born when it happened; and though he might have heard the report of it, he would perhaps (in the modern way) oppose speculation and hypothesis to fact. Or, if he secretly suspected 'it to be true, his dread of the marvellous, and fear of disgusting his pagan readers, might as well lead him to suppress this, as to disguise the passage through the Red sea, and the divine voice from mount Sinai, in so mean and foolish a manner, as it is known he does. And the relation in which this fact stood to the history of Jesus, would render him peculiarly cautious in touching on it.' Doddridge. This miraculous effect seems to have been an emblem of the healing of men's souls by the Gospel, and by washing in 'the Fountain opened for sin and uncleanness'; and compared with the multiplied and continual miracles wrought by our Lord, 'not at distant periods of time, but by him only performed a single cure, but heard of by whole multitudes that resorted to Him' (Doddridge,) it might also denote the efficacy of divine grace under the old dispensation, as distinguished from its more extensive effects under the ordinances of the New Testament.

(2-4.) By the sheep market' [Or, according to some, 'by the sheep gate,' Neh. 3: 1. 'Market' is not in the original Having five porches.] It seems that [y the pool there was a building called

3 In these lay a great multitude of impotent folk, of blind, halt, withered, waiting for the moving of the water.

4 For an angel went down at a certain season into the pool, and troubled the water: whosoever then first, after the troubling of the water, stepped in, was made whole of whatsoever disease he had.

These are mentioned, because, being least able to help themselves into the water, they lay longest in the porches. Those that were sick of bodily diseases, took the pains to come far, and had the patience to wait long, for a cure; any of us would have done the same; but O! that men were as solicitous to get their spiritual diseases healed! We are all by nature impotent in spiritual things, blind, halt, and withered; but effectual provision is made for our cure, if we will but observe orders.

An angel went down, and troubled the water; and whoso first stepped in was made whole. That this strange virtue in the pool was natural, or artificial rather, and was the effect of the washing of the sacrifices, which impregnated the water with healing virtue even for blind people; and that this angel was a common person, sent down to stir the water, is altogether groundless; there was a room in the temple on purpose to wash the sacrifice in. Expositors generally agree, that the virtue this pool had, was supernatural. It is true, the Jewish writers who are not sparing in praise of Jerusalem, do none of them mention this pool; of which perhaps this was the reason, that it was taken for a presage of the approach of the Messiah, and therefore, they who denied Him to be come, industriously concealed such an indication of his coming.

An angel went down into the pool, and stirred the water. Angels are God's servants, and friends to man; and perhaps are more active in the removing of diseases, (as evil angels in the inflicting of them,) than we are aware. Raphael, the apocryphal name of an angel, signifies, God's physician. See what mean offices the angels condescend to, for the good of men. If we would do the will of God as the angels, we must think nothing below us but sin. The troubling of the water was the signal of the descent of the angel; as the going upon the top of the mulberry trees was to David, and then they must bestir themselves. The waters of the sanctuary are healing, when they are put in the temple, and if so, it yielded a melancholy, but profitable, spectacle to those that went up to the temple to pray.

It was a pool, (or bath,) which is called in Hebrew, Bethesda—The house of mercy; for therein appeareth the mercy of God to the sick and diseased. In a world of such misery as this, it is well that there are some Bethshas—houses of mercy, that the scene is not all melancholy. Lightfoot's conjecture is, that this was the upper pool, (Isa. 7:3.) and the old pool; (Isa. 22:11.) that it had been used for washing from ceremonial pollutions, for convenience of which, the porches were built to dress and undress in, but it was lately become medicinal.

It had five porches, piazzas, or roofed walks, in which the sick lay. Thus the charity of men concurred with the mercy of God for the relief of the distressed. Nature has provided remedies, but men must provide hospitals.

It was frequented with sick and cripples: In these lay a great multitude of impotent folk. How many are the afflictions in this world! How full of complaints, and what multitudes of impotent folks! It may do us good to visit hospitals, that we may take occasion to thank God for our comforts. The evangelist specifies three sorts of diseased people, blind, halt, and withered, or sineo-shrunk, either in one particular part, as the man with the withered hand, or all over paralytic.

The troubling of the water was the signal of the descent of the angel; as the going upon the top of the mulberry trees was to David, and then they must bestir themselves. The waters of the sanctuary are healing, when they are put in motion. Ministers must stir up the gift that is in them. When they are cold and dull in their ministrations, the waters settle, and are not apt to heal. The angel descended to stir the water, not daily, but at a certain season; some think, at the three feasts, to grace those solemnities; or, now and then, as Infinite Wisdom saw fit God is a free Agent in dispensing his favors.

Whosoever first stepped in, was made whole. Here is a miraculous extent of the virtue; what disease soever it was, this water cured it. Natural and artificial baths are as hurtful in some cases as they are useful in others, but this was a remedy for every malady. The power of miracles succeeds, where the power of nature succumbs. He that first stepped in, had the benefit; not those that lingered and came in after. This teaches us to observe and improve our opportunities, and to look about us, that we slip not a season which may never return. The angel stirred the waters, but left the disease on themselves to get in. God has put virtue in the Scriptures and ordinances, for He would have us healed; but if we do not make a use; improvement of them, it is because we would not be healed.

This is the only account we have of standing miracles; it is uncertain when it began, and when it ceased. Some conjecture it began when Eliashib the high priest began the wall about Jerusalem, and sanctified it with prayer; and that God testified his acceptance, by putting this virtue into the adjoining pool. Some think it began at Christ's birth; others at his baptism. Dr. Lightfoot, finding in Josephus, (Antiq. lib. 15. cap. 7.) mention of a great earthquake in the seventh year of Herod, thirty years before Christ's birth, supposed, since there used to be earthquakes at the descent of angels, that then the angel first descended. Some think it ceased with this miracle, others at Christ's death; however, it is certain that it had a gracious signification.

It was a token of God's good will to that people, and an indication, that though they had been long without prophets and miracles God had not cast them off; though they were now an oppressed people, and many were ready to say, Where are all the wonders that our fathers told us of? God hereby let them know, that He had still a kindness for the city of their solemnities.

We may from hence take occasion to acknowledge with thankfulness God's goodness in the mineral waters, that contribute so much to the health of mankind, for God made the fountain of water, Rev. 14: 7.

Bethesda, or "the house of mercy," having five porches, or separate divisions for the sick.

I choose to retain the common translation of sheep market rather than gate; because, if the report of the best travellers is to be credited, the place shown for the pool of Bethesda is much nearer the temple than the sheep gate could be. Compare Neh. 3: 1. and 12: 39.

That which they now call the pool of Bethesda, is about one hundred and twenty paces long, and forty broad, and at least eight deep, but void of water; at its west end were some old arches which were shown as the remains of the five porches here mentioned; but instead of five, there were only three of them.

(3.) Waiting for the moving of the waters. This clause, and the whole of the fourth verse, are wanting in some MSS. and versions, but I think there is no sufficient evidence against their authenticity. Eriechab seems to be of the same opinion; for though he has marked the whole passage with the notes of doubtfulness, yet he has left it in his text.

The sanative property of this pool has been supposed by some to have been communicated by the blood of the sacrifices, and others have referred it to the mineral properties of the water. But 1. The beasts for sacrifice were not washed here, but in a laver in the temple. 2. No natural property could cure all manner of diseases. 3. The cure only extended to the first who entered. 4. It took place only at one particular time—after the troubling of the water. 5. A healing was effected by immersion, it must have been instantaneous, and it was never failing in its effects. All which not being observed in medicinal waters, determine the cures to have been miraculous, as expressly stated in this text.

(4.) A healing. "Of the Lord." is added by AKL about twenty others, the Ethiopic, Armenian, Slavonic, Vulgate, Anglo-Saxon, and six copies of the Zala: Cyril and Ambrose have also this reading. If this reading be genuine, and the authorities which support it are both ancient and respectable, it destroys Dr. Hammond's conjecture that "by an angel a messenger only, sent from the sanhedrim, is meant, and that these cures were all performed in a natural way." Many deny the influence of God's Spirit, merely because they never felt them.

This is to make any man's experience the rule by which the whole Word of God is to be interpreted, and consequently to leave no more divinity in the Bible than is found in the heart of him who professes to explain it.

An angel. As we must wholly rely on Scripture accounts, we shall do well to examine the language of Scripture in reference to angels, and their nature, and ascertain its import. Taken impersonally, the word angel implies, that agent which executes the will of another; and, as the great natural agents of the world around us are wholly beyond the direction of man, and, therefore, are esteemed as exclusively obedient to God, it imports something of power, or commission, to execute his will. Now, though all the powers of nature are, in this sense, angels of God, as acting for Him—extraordinary effects or operations of Providence are principally noticed among men, as being most evidently his agents; and, though accomplished by natural means, are thus considered in Scripture. So the Psalmist observes, (104: 4.) that God can, if He please, "make winds his angels," to conduct his dispensations; and "flames of fire his ministers," or servants, to perform his pleasure. We may trace a gradation in the use of the word angel, which it may be proper to exhibit in connection:—1. Human messengers; i. e. agents for others. 2 Sam. 2: 5. Prov. 13: 17. Matt. 11: 10. &c. 2. Divine messengers, yet human persons; i. e. agents for God:—as prophets, (Hag. 1: 13.) and priests, (Mal. 2: 7. Eccl. 5: 6. 3. Officers, or bishops of the churches. Rev. 2: 1. 3: 1. &c. So Prideaux. 4. Providence, i. e. the agency of divine dispensations, conducting natural causes, apparent on remarkable occasions. (Ps. 104: 4.) [and, as some think, 2 Kings 19: 35. and 2 Sam. 24: 16.] 5. Created intelligences; i. e. agents of a nature superior to man; performing the divine commands, in relation to mankind. Matt. 25: 31. 1 King 22: 19. Gen. 22: 11. Heb. 1: 14. &c. 6. The great Angel between God and man; i. e. the deputed Agent of God, eminently so. Gal. 4: 14. Not to extend this very delicate subject too far, I is sufficient, if this mode of representing it excite the reader's consideration. We should be cautious of intruding into things not seen. C. TAYLOR.

and tender compassion: and the world, which was to seek and save the sick and wounded. There was a great multitude of cripples at Bethesda, but Christ singled out this man from the rest, because he was senior of the house, and in a more deplorable condition than the rest; Christ delights to help the helpless; and hath mercy on whom He will have mercy. Perhaps his companions insulted him, because he had been often disappointed of a cure, therefore Christ took him for his patient: it is his honor to side with the weakest, and bear up those whom He sees run down.

He knew how long he had lain in this condition. Those that have been long in affliction, may comfort themselves with this, that God keeps account how long, and knows our frame.

He asked him, Will thou be made whole? A strange question to be asked one that had been so long ill. Some would not be made whole, because their sores serve them to beg by, and for an excuse for idleness; but this man was as unable to go begging as to work, yet Christ expressed thus his own pity and concern. Christ is tenderly inquisitive concerning the desires of those that are in affliction, and is willing to know their petition; 'What shall I do for you?' He tried him whether he would be beholden to Him for a cure, whom ^a he great were so prejudiced against. He would teach him to value the mercy, ^b which excites in Him desires after it. People are not willing to be cured of their sins, and are loath to part with them. If this point were but gained, the work were half done, for Christ is willing; Matt. 8:3.

The poor man renews his complaint, and sets forth the misery of his case, which makes his cure the more illustrious; (p. 7.) Sir, I have no man to put me into the pool. He seems to take Christ's question as an imputation of carelessness; 'If thou hadst had a mind to be healed, thou wouldst have got into the healing waters long before now.' 'No, Master,' saith he, 'it is not for want of a good will, but of a good friend; I have done what I could to help myself, but in vain; for no one will help me.'

He does not think of any other way of being cured than by these waters, and desires to be helped into them; therefore, when Christ cured him, his imagination could not contribute to it, for he thought of no such thing.

He complains for want of friends; I have no man to do me that kindness. One would think that some who had been healed, would have lent him a hand; but it is common for the poor to be destitute of friends; no man careth for thy soul. To the sick and impotent, it is as true a piece of charity to work for them, as to relieve them: thus the poor are capable of being charitable to one another, though we seldom find that they are so; I speak it to their shame.

It was a type of the Messiah, who is the Fountain opened; and was intended to raise people's expectations of the Sun of righteousness, that rises with healing under his wings. These waters had formerly been used for purifying, now for healing, to signify both the cleansing and curing virtue of the blood of Christ, which heals all our diseases. The waters of Siloam, which filled this pool, signified the kingdom of David, and of Christ the Son of David; (Isa. 9: 6.) fitly, therefore, have they this sovereign virtue. Regeneration is to us as Bethesda's pool, healing our spiritual diseases; not at certain seasons, but at all times. Whoever will, let them come.

The patient on whom this cure was wrought, had been infirm thirty-eight years.

His disease was grievous; he had lost the use of his limbs, at least on one side, as is usual in palsies. It is sad to have the body so disabled, that, instead of being the soul's instrument, it is become, even in the affairs of this life, its burden. What reason have we to thank God for bodily strength, to use it for Him, and to pity those who are his prisoners!

The duration of it was tedious, thirty-eight years: he was lame longer than most live. Many are so long disabled, that, as the Psalmist complains, they seem to be made in vain; for suffering, not for service; born to be always dying. Shall we complain of one wearisome night, or one ill fit, who perhaps for many years have scarcely known what it has been to be a day sick, when many others, better than we, have scarcely known what it has been to be a day well? Mr. Baxter's note on this passage is very affecting:—'How great a mercy was it, to live thirty-eight years under God's wholesome discipline. Oh my God, I thank Thee for the like discipline of fifty-eight years; how safe a life is this, in comparison of full prosperity and pleasure!'

Jesus saw him lie. When Christ came to Jerusalem, He visited not the palaces, but the hospitals, which is an instance of his humility and an indication of his design in coming into it as he had been disused. He, who this minute was able to carry his bed, the next minute was able to turn in his bed, the next minute was able to carry his bed. The man sick of the palsy (Matt. 9: 6.) was bid go to his house, but probably this man had no house; the hospital was his home; therefore he is bidden to rise, and walk. This also proclaimed the cure; for, being the Sabbath, every one would inquire what was the meaning of it; thereby the notice of the miracle would spread, to the honor of God. Christ would thus witness against the elders, who had stretched the law of the sabbath beyond its intention; and would likewise show that He was Lord of the sabbath, and had power to alter and overrule the law. Joshua, and the host of Israel, marched about Jericho on the sabbath, when God commanded them; so did this man carry his bed, in obedience to a command. It may become a work of necessity or mercy, to carry a bed on the sabbath; but here it was a work of piety, being designed purely for the glory of God. He would hereby try the faith of his patient. By carrying his bed publicly, he exposed himself to censure, and was liable to be scourged in the synagogue. Now will he run the venture, in obedience to Christ? Yes, Those that have been healed by Christ's word, should be ruled by his word, whatever it cost them.

Immediately he was made whole, took up his bed, and walked. He felt the power of Christ's word healing him; Immediately he was made whole. What a joyful surprise was this to find himself suddenly so strong, so able to help himself; what a new world was he in, in an instant! Nothing is too hard for Christ. He obeyed Christ's word. He took up his bed and walked, and did not care who blamed or threat-

He bewails his infelicity, that often when he was coming, another stepped in before him. But a step between him and a cure, and yet he continues impotent. Note—had the charity to say, 'Your case is worse than mine, do you go now, I will stay till the next time.' Every one for himself. Having been so often disappointed, he begins to despair, and now is Christ's time to come to his relief; He delights to help in desperate cases. Observe, this man speaks of the unkindness of those about him, without any peevish reflections. As we should be thankful, for kindness, so we should be patient under the greatest contempts; and, let our resentments be ever so just, our expressions should ever be calm. And further, to his praise, though he had waited so long, still he continued lying by the pool-side, hoping that help would come, Hab. 2: 3.

He is bidden to rise and walk; a strange command to an impotent man, long disabled; but this word was the vehicle of a divine power; it commanded the disease to be gone, nature to be strong; but is expressed as a command to him to bestir himself. He must rise and walk, that is, attempt it, and in the essay he should receive strength. The conversion of a sinner is the cure of a chronic disease; this is ordinarily done by a word of command; Turn and live; make ye a new heart; which no more supposes a power in us to do it, without the grace of God, than this supposed such a power in the impotent man. But if he had not attempted to help himself, he had not been cured, and must have borne the blame; it does not therefore follow, that, when he did rise and walk, it was by his own strength; no, it was by the power of Christ, and He must have all the glory. Christ did not bid him go into the waters, but rise and walk. Christ did that for us, which the law could not do, and set that aside.

He is bidden to take up his bed, to make it appear that it was a perfect cure, and miraculous; for he did not recover by degrees, but from extreme impotency stepped into the highest bodily strength; he was able to carry as great a load as any porter that had been as long used to it as he had been disused. He, who this minute was not able to turn in his bed, the next minute was able to carry his bed. The man sick of the palsy (Matt. 9: 6.) was bid go to his house, but probably this man had no house; the hospital was his home; therefore he is bidden to rise, and walk. This also proclaimed the cure; for, being the Sabbath, every one would inquire what was the meaning of it; thereby the notice of the miracle would spread, to the honor of God. Verse 5.
[And had an infirmity thirty and eight years.] 'What it was, the inspired writer does not say—probably it was a palsy: his case was deplorable—he was not able to go into the pool himself, and he had no man to help him. The length of the time he had been afflicted, makes the miracle of his cure the greater. There could have been no collusion in this case; as his affliction had lasted thirty-eight years, he must have been known to multitudes: therefore he could not be a person prepared for the occasion. All Christ's miracles have been wrought in such a way, and on such persons and occasions, as absolutely to preclude all possibility of the suspicion of imposture.'

ened him. The proof of our spiritual cure is our rising and walking. Hath Christ healed our spiritual diseases? Let us go where He sends us, and take up whatever He lays upon us, and walk before Him.

The Jews saw him carry his bed on the sabbath; and it was the sabbath that fell within the passover-week, and therefore a high day, ch. 19: 31. Christ needed not make any difference between sabbath-days and other days, for
He was always about his Father's business;
but He wrought many cures on that day, perhaps to encourage his church to expect spiritual favours from Him on the Christian sabbath.

Now here,
The Jews tell him that it was not lawful, v.
10. It does not appear whether they were magistrates, who had power to punish, or common people who could only inform against him; but thus far was commendable, that, while they knew not by what authority he did it, they were jealous for the honor of the Sabbath, and could not unconcernedly see it profaned; like Nehemiah, ch. 13: 17.

The man justifies himself by a good warrant,
v. 11. 'I do it not in contempt of the Sabbath, but in obedience to One, who, by making me whole, hath given proof that He is greater. He that could make me whole, no doubt might command me to carry my bed; He that could overrule the powers of nature, no doubt might overrule a positive law. He that was so kind as to make me whole, would not be so unkind as to bid me do what is sinful.' Christ, by curing another paralytic, proved his power to forgive sin, here to give law; if his pardons are valid, his edicts are so, and his miracles prove both.

The Jews inquire further, What man is that?
How industriously they overlooked that which might be a ground of their faith in Christ.
They inquire not, 'Who made thee whole?'
While they caught at that which might reflect upon Christ; (What man is that who said unto thee, Take up thy bed?) they would have the patient witness against the Physician, and be his betrayer. In their question, they resolve to look upon Christ as a mere man. For though

He gave such convincing proofs, they were resolved that they would never own Him to be the Son of God. They resolved to look upon Him as a bad man. He who bid this man carry his bed, whatever divine commission He might produce, was certainly a delinquent, and as such, they resolve to prosecute Him. What man is that who durst give such orders?

The poor man was unable to give them any account of Him; He wist not who He was.

Christ was unknown to him, when He healed him. Probably he had heard of Jesus, but had never seen Him, and therefore could not tell that this was He. Note, Christ doth many a good turn for those that know Him not,
Isa. 45: 4, 5. He enlightens, quickens, comforts us, and we wist not who He is; nor are we aware how much we receive daily by his mediation. This man, being unacquainted with Christ, could not actually believe in Him for a cure: but Christ knew the dispositions of his soul, and suited his favors to them, as to the blind man in a like case, ch. 9: 36. Our covenant with God takes rise, not so much from our knowledge of Him, as from his knowledge of us. We know God, or rather, are known of Him, Gal. 4: 9.

For the present, He kept Himself unknown;
for as soon as He had wrought the cure, He conveyed himself away. He made himself unknown; (so some read it;) a multitude being in that place. This is mentioned, to show, First,
How Christ conveyed Himself away—by retiring into the crowd, so as not to be distinguished. He that was the Chief of ten thousand, often made Himself one of the throng. It is sometimes the lot of those who have by their services signalized themselves, to be levelled with the multitude, and overlooked. Or, Secondly, Why He conveyed Himself away: because there was a multitude there, and He industriously avoided both the applause of those who admired the miracle, and the censure of those who would censure Him as a sabbath-breaker. Those that are active for God must expect evil report and good report; it is wise to keep out of the hearing of both; lest by the one

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-14. The earth appears to a considerate mind, as a 'Bethesda,' a great hospital, full of those whom sin has made miserable, and to whom the compassion of God affords the means of relief. As therefore 'his mercies are over all his works,' and even those, who most deserve misery, experience his goodness during their continuance here; the mercy of man should also coincide, and we should endeavor to alleviate the sufferings of the vilest, and do them whatever good we can.
Medicines are created by our offended God, to relieve diseases which all originate from sin: and we should attempt to render the poor partakers of this benefit. In this view every hospital, or dispensary, is a 'Bethesda,' and would more completely deserve that name, if proper means were diligently employed, or doing good to the soul, as well as of healing the body. Yet how few, who in this manner obtain relief, are found in the house of God, offering the sacrifice of thanksgiving! How few of them live thenceforth to his glory! How few take warning to 'sin no more, lest a worse thing come unto them!'
But the place, where the Gospel is preached, is the true 'Bethesda': thither the poor and helpless should repair, and hope and wait for a cure, whatever their spiritual maladies be, or however inveterate. Though the miracles of converting grace, which better ages witnessed, are not generally vouchsafed among us; yet we still see instances of such as, by washing in 'the Fountain' which God hath opened, are made whole of the most desperate maladies. All the power indeed is of God; yet those who would have the benefit must be watchful, earnest, and patient; (Note, Luke 13: 22-30, v. 24.) they must not be dilatory, but make haste to be clean; and then they should endeavor in their turn to assist others. Yet, if any meet disappointments, they should still seek; not neglecting the means of grace, or ceasing to labor and pray for the blessing: for sometimes they, whose case seems most hopeless, and who are ready to give up all for lost, are made partakers of mercy and spiritual health, when they least expected them.—

The Savior perfectly knows both how long men have been contracting habits of sin, and how long seeking the help and joy of his salvation: and He continually attends in his houses of mercy, to inquire of sinners, whether they will be made whole. Yet it is a common case, for men to go thither, who are in love with their disease, and only desire to excuse the loathsomeness of it! But if we earnestly desire to be healed and saved in his way, we shall certainly at length obtain that blessing.—When He speaks, power attends his word; and the ability of believers to perform such duties as are impracticable to others, and once were so to them, will best evidence their cure, and recommend their Physician. Though scribes and Pharisees object and revile, yet redeemed sinners must honor their Benefactor; and follow his directions. By attending on the ordinances of God, they obtain further acquaintance with Him; but without deliverance from sin, there can be no well-grounded hopes of escaping 'the wrath to come.'—Even in this life, how many days, nay, years of pain, do some wicked men endure, through their momentary unlawful indulgences! And if such afflictions are heavy and tedious, whilst year after year men are confined to their beds, and made a burden to themselves and others; how dreadful, beyond all conception, will be the everlasting punishment of the wicked!

SCOTT.

Verse 10.

Th. It was forbidden to carry even a bundle on the Sabbath, is plain from Jer. 17: 21. What sort of "burdens" those mentioned in that text were, may be learnt from Neh. 13: 15, seq. Now the Jewish doctors too superstitiously interpreted this law, so as to prohibit the carrying of the lightest weight. But it appears from the Jewish writers, that there were cases in which it was permitted to carry burdens on the Sabbath.
Our Lord indeed felt no desire to impugn their rigid observance of the law; but He testified, both by words and deeds, his disapprobation of their idle superstition, so destructive of all solid and real virtue.

BLOOMFIELD.

Verse 11.

The Jews maintained, that by the command of a prophet, the sabbath might be broken, appealing to the example of those, who, by the [650]

orders of Joshua, stormed Jericho. So the Jewish rabbins. "Certainly if a prophet shall say unto thee, Transgress the words of the law, hear him, except in a matter which involves idolatry." This opinion the man seems to have had in view.

KUNOEL.

Verse 12.

'Only fixing on what seemed liable to exception.' They do not ask, Who is it that has made thee well? but, Who is it that bade thee to take up thy couch upon the sabbath-day? though he had just told them it was the author of his cure that gave him that command; for all that they proposed was, not to hear of any good that had been done, to engage their admiration and applause, but to lay hold of some occasion to find fault, to gratify the pride and malice of a censorious temper. I am obliged to Grotius for this delicate remark, which will illustrate their partiality and malignity.

DOVERIDGE.

5 The man departed, and told the Jews that it was Jesus which had made him whole.

16 And therefore did the Jews persecute Jesus, and sought to slay him, because he had done these things on the sabbath-day.

17 But Jesus answered them, My Father worketh hitherto, and I work.

18 Therefore the Jews sought the more to kill him, because he not only had broken the sabbath, but said also that God was his Father, making himself equal with God.

sin; whether of some remarkable sin, or only of sin in general, we cannot tell; we know that sin is the cause of sickness, Ps. 107:17, 18. Some observe that Christ did not mention sin to any of his patients but this man, and one other, in like manner diseased, Mark 2:5. While those chronic diseases lasted, they prevented the outward acts of many sins, and now that the disability was removed, they had the more need to be watchful. Christ intimates to him, that those who are eased of the sensible punishment of sin, are in danger of returning to sin, unless divine grace dry up the fountain. When the trouble which damned up the current is over, the waters will return to their old course;

Verses 15, 16.

When the man had discovered to whom he owed his cure, he went and told the Jews, 'partly out of gratitude to own the author of his cure, and partly to excuse himself, as only doing this at the command of so great a prophet.' Wholly. It is likely that Jesus was brought before the sanhedrim, and spoke what follows before that assembly. (Marg. Ref. 33.—Note, 1: 19—23.) This view of the subject makes the discourse peculiarly interesting, and there is a dignity in it which indeed is inexpressible.

Verses 17, 18.

God finished the work of creation in six days, and rested on the seventh. (Notes. Gen. 2: 2, 3. Ex. 20: 8—10.) But He incessantly works in upholding the universe, and in continuing the course of nature. In this work the Son concurs, by a union of will and operation, 'upholding all things by the word of his power.' (Note, Heb. 1: 3, 4. His work also as Mediator was to be conducted by the same unremitted action, as that of sustaining the universe: this miracle was a part of the work well suited to the Sabbath; and He claimed the prerogative of carrying it forward on that day, as well as on others, even as the Father conducts his providential operations on every day alike. (Marg. Ref. d.) Unless we suppose this, or something to this purpose, to have been the Lord's meaning, there could be no argument in his plea; for the example of the Creator in 'working hitherto' can be no reason why a creature, a servant, a mere man, should do as he pleased on the Sabbath-day; nor did any of the prophets ever advance a claim of that kind. The divine power of the miracle proved Jesus to be 'the Son of God'; and He insisted on the prerogative of working with and like unto his Father, as He saw good, without giving any account of his conduct. (Matt. 12: 8.) These ancient enemies of Christ plainly understood Him, (though modern opposers of his Deity cannot) and were thus rendered more violent in their prosecution, not only charging Him with sabbath-breaking, but with blasphemy, in calling God his own Father, and making Himself equal with God in perfection and operation. 'If God my Father, working on the Sabbath, doth not violate the Sabbath, neither do I, when I work on the Sabbath, violate the Sabbath. This conclusion cannot stand, unless the quality of the persons of the Father and of the Son be determined. 'Making Himself equal with God.' These are the words of the evangelist, not only repeating, out approving what the Jews rightly collected from the words of Christ. Beza. 'The whole nation of the Jews thought God their Father, (8: 41.) and they could not have accounted it blasphemy to have used that phrase, had they not interpreted it in so high and appropriating a sense.' Doddridge. (Marg. Ref. e. f.—Notes, 10: 25—33.)

(17.) 'This way of arguing from his Father's working to his own, plainly intimates that He speaks of Himself as one with his Father in

we be exalted, and by the other depressed. Christ left the miracle to commend itself, and the man on whom it was wrought, to justify it.

At their next interview, Christ found him in the temple, the place of public worship; in our attendance on public worship, we may expect to meet Christ, and improve our acquaintance with Him. Observe, Christ went to the temple; though He had many enemies, yet He appeared in public, because there He bore testimony to divine institutions, and had opportunity of doing good. [2.] The man that was cured, went to the temple; there Christ found him the same day, as it would seem; thither he straightway went, because he had, by his infirmity, been so long detained thence: perhaps he had not been there for thirty-eight years, and therefore as soon as ever the embargo is off, his first visit shall be to the temple, as Hezekiah intimates his shall be; Isa. 38: 22. He had, by his recovery, a good errand thither; he went to return thanks. When God has restored us our health, we ought to attend Him with solemn praises; (Ps. 116: 18, 19.) and the sooner the better, while the sense of the mercy is fresh. He had, by carrying his bed, seemed to condemn the Sabbath; he would thus honor it, and made conscience of sabbath-sanctification. Works of necessity and mercy are allowed; but when they are over, we must go to the temple.

When Christ has cured us, He has not done with us; He now applies Himself to the healing of his soul, and this by the word.

Behold, thou art made whole. He found himself made whole, yet Christ calls his attention to it. Consider it seriously; how strange, how cheap, how easy the cure; behold and wonder: let the impressions of it never be lost, Isa. 63: 9.

Being made whole, sin no more. This implies that his disease was the punishment of nature and operation; otherwise the argument loses its force and beauty: for if a mere creature who only receives a commission from God, as for instance, a prophet or an apostle, were to say, God does whatever He pleases, and therefore, I have a right to do whatever I please likewise, on the Sabbath-day, who would not see the reasoning to be inconclusive and absurd? But understanding our Lord to speak of Himself as one in nature and operation with the Father, in all his works, the argument is irresistible; and it is evident from the following verse, that the Jews understood Him in this peculiar and exalted sense.

GYUSE.

'The words of Christ from their brevity are not a little obscure; inasmuch that Rosenm. thinks our evangelist has not recorded the whole of the answer. For it is not to be supposed (says Schoetigen) that Christ delivered so abrupt an answer. The occasion (continues he) of the words was the Sabbath. Hence Christ says, "As my Father on the Sabbath-day perpetually worketh in the reign of his power, so also do I in the reign of grace." The first is plain, and God could not, by the Jewish traditions, be held guilty of the violation of the Sabbath: hence neither could Christ. Of this whole conference Schoetigen gives the following analytical scheme: Occasion, v. 18. Proposition: I am the Son of God; which, though not expressed, is implied in each of the verses. And this is proved, 1. From my works, and that, 1st. in general, Because I do the work of my Father, v. 19, 20. 2dly, in specie, Because I exercise judgment, (v. 21, 22,) and raise the dead, v. 25—30. Use or application of this first part; Therefore worship ye the Son, and hear his words, v. 23, 24. II. From the testimony of my Father, (v. 31, 32, 36—38.) and this is amplified from a comparison with that of John the Baptist, v. 33—35. Use or application of this part: 1st. Examine the Scriptures, and especially Moses, in order that ye may believe on me, v. 39—42, 46, 47. 2dly. Beware of false Christs, v. 43. 3dly. Seek the glory of God, and not your own, v. 44. 4thly. Account me not as your enemy, v. 45.'

(18.) 'The Jews themselves often called God their Father, and would never have found fault with, much less charged blasphemy upon any, that came to them under the character of a prophet, for using the same style; and therefore they must be supposed to understand our Lord, as speaking of God as his Father, in a sense superior to any covenant or office-relation, and in a sense so peculiar to Himself as to estimate his partaking of the same nature and perfections with Him, or else there would have been no room for their imagining or suggesting, that, by his claim of relation to God as his Father, He made Himself equal with God.'

'Called God his own Father This is the plain and literal sense of the original.'

19 Then answered Jesus, and said unto them, ^aVerily, verily, I say unto you, ^bThe Son can do nothing of himself, but what he seeth the Father do: ^cfor what things soever he doeth, these also doeth the Son likewise.

20 For ^kthe Father loveth the Son, ^land sheweth him all things that himself doeth: and he will shew him ^mgreater works than these, that ye may marvel.

21 For ⁿas the Father raiseth up the dead, and quickeneth them; ^oeven so the Son quickeneth whom he will.

when arraigned before them; whether on the same day, or after, does not appear.

He answered them. This supposes that He had something laid to his charge: My Father worketh hitherto, and I work. In answer to the like charge, He had pleaded the example of David's eating the shew-bread, of the priest's slaying the sacrifices, and of the people's watering their cattle, on the Sabbath; but here He goes higher, and alleges the example of his Father and his divine authority, waving all other pleas, and abides by what He had mentioned, Matt. 12: 8. The Son of man is Lord even of the Sabbath. He here enlarges on it.

He pleads that He was the Son of God, in calling God his Father; and if so, his holiness was unquestionable, and his sovereignty uncontested, and He might make what alterations He pleased of the divine law. Surely they will reverence the Son.

My Father worketh hitherto. The example of God's resting on the seventh day, is made the ground of observing it as a sabbath. God rested only from such work as He had done the six days before; otherwise He worketh hitherto. He is every day working, sabbath-days and week-days; upholding and governing all creatures; therefore, when we are appointed to rest on the Sabbath, we are not restrained from doing that which has a direct tendency to the glory of God; as the man's carrying his bed had.

I work; not only therefore I may work, like Him, but I also work with Him. As God created all things by Christ, so He supports and governs all by Him, Heb. 1: 3. This sets what He does, above all exception; he that is so great a Worker, must needs be an uncontrollable Governor; He that does all, is Lord of all, and therefore Lord of the Sabbath: which particular branch of his authority He was shortly to show further, in the change of the day from the seventh to the first.

The Jews sought the more to kill Him. His defence was made his offence, as if by justifying himself He had made bad worse. Note, Those that will not be enlightened by the word of Christ, will be exasperated by it; and nothing more vexes the enemies of Christ, than his asserting his authority; see Ps. 2: 3-5. They sought to kill Him.

Because He had broken the Sabbath: for let Him say what He would, they are resolved to find Him guilty of sabbath-breaking. When malice and envy sit upon the bench, reason and justice may be silent at the bar, for whatever they can say, will be overruled.

He had said also, That God was his Father. They pretend a jealousy for God's honor, as for the Sabbath, and charge Christ with it as a heinous crime, that He made himself equal with God; and a heinous crime it had been, if He had not really been so. It was the sin of Lucifer, I will be like the Most High.

This was justly inferred from what He said. He had said that He worked with his Father, by the same authority and power; and, hereby, He made himself equal with God. Behold, the Jews understand what the Ariens do not.

Yet it was unjustly imputed to Him as an offence, for He is God, equal with the Father; (Phil. 2: 6.) and therefore Christ, in answer to this charge,

Verse 19.

The Son can do nothing of Himself. ^aBecause of his inseparable Union with the Father; nor can the Father do any thing of Himself, because of his unity with the Son. What things soever He doeth, these also doeth the Son. God does nothing but what Christ does. What God does is the work of God, and proper to no creature.—Jesus does whatsoever God does, and therefore is no created being. The conclusion from the argument is, "If I have broken the Sabbath, so may God also, for I can do nothing but what I see Him doing."

Dr. A. CLARKE.

^bWhen Moses says, God rested on the seventh day from all his works, (Gen. 2: 2.) and Jesus says, (v. 17.) My Father worketh hitherto, there is no opposition or contradiction, for Moses is speaking of the works of creation, and Jesus of the works of providence.

Verse 20.

Sheweth Him all things that Himself doeth. ^cIt refers to the ample and comprehensive knowledge which the Son has, of the whole plan of the Father's counsels, in their mutual relations and dependence; whereas the prophets, and apostles too, had, in comparison of this, but limited and contracted views. Compare Is. 40: 10. where it is said, (as we have no room to doubt,) of Christ, and probably in this sense—his work is before Him. DODDGE.

Verses 21-23.

(21.) Whom He will. Thus it is also said of the Holy Spirit, "Dividing to every man severally as He will." 1 Cor. 12: 11. Is anything in the least degree like this spoken in Scripture, of prophets, apostles, angels, or archangels? (Notes, 11: 20-27, v. 28. Deut. 32: 37-38, v. 39. 1 Sam. 2: 4-8, v. 6.)

^dIs there not here an equality of power and honor ascribed to the [52]

does not except against the imputed as strained or forced, but makes out his claim, and proves that He is equal with God in power and glory.

Christ in these verses explains, and afterwards confirms, his commission, as Mediator and Plenipotentiary between God and man. And as the honors He is hereby entitled to, are such as it is not fit for any creature to receive, so the work He is intrusted with, it is not possible for any creature to go through with, and therefore He is God equal with the Father.

He is one with the Father in all He does as Mediator; there was a perfect understanding between them in the whole matter. it is ushered in with a solemn preface, Verily, verily, I say unto you. This speaks what is said to be, (1.) Very awful and great, and such as commands the most serious attention. (2.) Very sure, and such as commands an unfeigned assent. (3.) It intimates that the matters are purely of divine revelation; things which Christ has told us, and which we could not otherwise know.

The Son conforms to the Father; He Son can do nothing of Himself, but what He sees the Father do, for these things does the Son. The Lord Jesus, as Mediator, is obedient to his Father's will; so that He can do nothing of Himself, in the same sense as it is said, God cannot lie, cannot deny Himself, which speaks the perfection of his truth, not any imperfection in his strength; so Christ was so entirely devoted to his Father's will, that it was impossible for Him in any thing to act separately. He is obedient of his Father's counsel; He can, He will, do nothing but what He sees the Father do. No man can find out the work of God, but the only-begotten Son, who sees what He does, is intimately acquainted with his purposes, and has the plan of them ever before Him. What He did as Mediator, was the exact transcript of what the Father designed when He formed the plan of our redemption, and settled those measures which never could need to be altered; it was the copy of that great original; Christ as Moses, did all according to the pattern shewed Him in the mount. This is expressed in the present tense, what He sees the Father do, for the same reason, that, when He was upon earth, it was said, He is in heaven, and is in the bosom of the Father; as He was even then by his divine nature present in heaven, so the things done in heaven were present to his knowledge. What the Father did in his counsels, the Son still had his eye upon, as David in spirit spoke of Him, I have seen the Lord always before me, Ps. 16: 8. Further; Yet He is equal with the Father in working, for what things soever the Father does, these also does the Son likewise; He did not such things, but the same things; and He did them in the same manner, with the same authority, wisdom, energy. Does the Father enact, repeal, and alter, positive laws?

Father and Son? It is perfectly plain, that, so far as the "committing of judgment to the Son" is concerned, it must be to the mediatorial Person; to one who, in respect to office, is subordinate to God. But, so far as qualifications, requisite to perform the duties that commitment requires, are concerned, the Savior is divine, and the honor to be claimed by Him, the same with that which the Divinity claims. Multitudes of prophets, as commissioned by God, have borne his messages of mercy and judgment to his people; but to whom among them all, did He grant the privilege of being honored, as Himself? I cannot well conceive how our Savior could have used the words above cited, without exposing Himself to renewed and just accusations of the Jews for blaspheming, unless He were really divine. The Jews had accused Him of violating the Sabbath, because He had on that day healed the impotent man. The reply of Christ to them was, "My Father worketh hitherto, and I work" which, if I understand the argument, must mean, My Father has never ceased to work on the Sabbath, in carrying on all the operations of the natural and moral world; He supercedes the law of the Sabbath. I have the same right. "The Son of man is Lord of the Sabbath." The Jews then sought to slay Him, because, as they affirmed, He had violated the Sabbath, and said that God was his Father, making Himself equal with God. In reply to their bitter accusations, Jesus made use of the language above cited; telling them He did whatever the Father did, and was entitled to the same honor. Was this relinquishing his claim to the equality with God, which the Jews had charged Him with assuming? Or was it speaking out plainly, that He wrought on the Sabbath by the same right that the Father did, and was entitled to the same defence? Can his words, interpreted without regard to any preconceived theory, be made to signify less than this? Phil. St. AUST.

22 For the Father judgeth no man; but hath committed all judgment unto the Son:

23 That all men should honor the Son, even as they honor the Father. He that honoreth not the Son, honoreth not the Father which hath sent him.

24 Verily, verily, I say unto you, He that heareth my word, and believeth on him that sent me, hath everlasting life, and shall not come into condemnation; but is passed from death unto life.

they will prove that Christ said not amiss, when He made Himself equal with God.

Observe what is said concerning the Mediator's power to raise the dead, and give life.

As the Father raiseth up the dead, so the Son quickeneth whom He will.

It is God's prerogative to raise the dead, and give life: He first breathed into man the breath of life, and made him a living soul; see Deut. 32:39. Sam. 2:6. Ps. 68:20. Rom. 4:17.

This God had done by the prophets Elijah and Elisha, to confirm their mission. A resurrection from the dead never lay in common nature, nor ever fell within the thought of those that studied only nature's power, one of whose received axioms was point-blank against it; Existence, once extinguished, cannot be rekindled. It was therefore ridiculed at Athens as absurd, Acts 17:32. It is purely the work of divine power, and the knowledge of it purely by divine revelation. This the Jews would own.

The Mediator is invested with this prerogative; He quickens whom He will; raises whom He will to life, and when He pleases. He does not enliven things by natural necessity, as the sun whose beams revive of course; but acts as a free Agent, has the dispensing of his power in his own hand, and is never either constrained, or restrained, in the use of it. As He has the power, so He has the wisdom and sovereignty, of a God; the keys of the grave and of death, (Rev. 1:18.) not as a servant, to open and shut as he is bidden; He has the key of David, which He is Master of, Rev. 3:7. An absolute price is described by this; (Dan. 6:19.) Whom he would he slew, or kept alive; it is strictly true of Christ.

His ability to do it. Therefore He has power to quicken whom He will, because He has life in Himself, as the Father has, v. 26.

Verses 24-27.

It is not conceivable that a mere creature can 'have life in himself.' In the same sense, as the eternal self-existent Father has, and for the purpose of communicating it to others, as it is here evidently meant; but that the Son of God (being, according to his divine nature, self-existent, eternal, and One with the Father,) should, as Mediator, have been given to Him by covenant, on the condition of his humiliation and expiatory sufferings, 'to have life in Himself,' for the benefit of those, who had forfeited life, who were dead in sin, and doomed to eternal death by the law, and whose Surety He was become, that they might be quickened, pardoned, and saved, consistently with the honor of divine justice and holiness; is very intelligible and important; for this was, to have life 'in Himself,' for other purposes and in another manner, than His had as 'God over all blessed for evermore.' (Notes, 3:

Does He overrule the course of nature, know men's hearts? So does the Son. The power of the Mediator is a divine power.

The Father loveth the Son; He declared, This is my beloved Son. He had not only a good will to the undertaking, but infinite complacency in the Undertaker. Christ was hated of men, one whom the nation abhorred; (Isa. 49:7.) but He comforted himself with this, that his Father loved Him. He shows it,

In what He does communicate to Him; He sheweth Him all things that Himself doeth. The Father's measures in making and ruling the world are shewed to the Son, that He may take the same measures in framing and governing the church, which was to be a duplicate of the work of creation and providence, and is therefore called the world to come. He shows Him all things which He does, that is, which the Son does, so it might be construed; all that the Son does, is by direction from the Father; He shews Him.

He will show Him, that is, appoint and direct Him to do, greater works than these. Works of greater power than the curing of the impotent man; for He should raise the dead, and should Himself rise from the dead. By the use of means, a disease may possibly in time be cured; but nature can never, by the use of any means, raise the dead. Works of greater authority than warranting a man to carry his bed on the Sabbath. They thought that a daring attempt; but what was that to his abrogating the whole ceremonial law, and instituting new ordinances, which He would shortly do; that ye may marvel. Now they looked upon his works with indignation, but He will shortly do that which they will look upon with amazement, Luke 7:16. Many are brought to marvel at Christ's works, whereby He has the honor of them, who are not brought to believe, by which they would have the benefit of them.

He proves his equality with the Father, by specifying works which He does, that are the peculiar works of God. (1.) He does that which is the peculiar work of God's almighty power—raising the dead, and giving life. (2.) He does and shall do, the peculiar work of God's sovereign dominion,—judge, and execute judgment. These two are nearly connected; and what is said once, is repeated; put both together, and they said not amiss, when He made Himself equal with God.

It is certain that the Father has life in Himself. Not only He is self-existent, does not derive from, or depend upon, any other, (Exod. 3:14.) but a sovereign Giver of life; has the disposal of life and of all good; (for so life sometimes signifies;) He is to his creatures the Fountain of life, and all good; Author of their being and well-being; the living God, and the God of all living.

It is as certain that He has given to the Son to have life in Himself. As the Father is the Original of life, being the great Creator, so the Son, as Redeemer, is the Original of all spiritual life and good; is that to the church, that the Father is to the world; see 1 Cor. 8:6. Col. 1:19. The kingdom of grace, and all the life in that kingdom, are in the hand of the Redeemer, as the kingdom of providence is in the hand of the Creator; and as God, who gives being to all things, has his being of Himself, so Christ, who gives life, raised Himself to life by his own power, ch. 10:19. Having life in Himself, and being authorized to quicken whom He will, by virtue hereof there are, accordingly, two resurrections performed by his powerful word; both which are here spoken of.

1. A resurrection that now is, from the death of sin to the life of righteousness, by the power of Christ's grace. The hour is coming, and now is. It is a resurrection begun already, and to be carried on; when the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God. This is plainly distinguished from the resurrection at the end of time, v. 28. This says nothing, as that does, of the dead in their graves, of all of them, and their coming forth. Some think this was fulfilled in Jairus's daughter, the widow's son, and Lazarus; and it is observable, that all whom Christ raised, were spoken to; damsel, arise; Young man, arise; Lazarus, come forth; whereas, those raised under the Old Testament, were raised not by a word, but other applications, 1 Kings 17:21. 2 Kings 4:34. 13:21. Some understand it of the souls of saints that rose with Christ; but we do not read of the voice of the Son of God calling them. I rather understand it of the power of the doctrine of Christ, for the quickening of the dead in trespasses and sins, Eph. 2:1. The hour was coming, when dead souls should be made alive by the preaching of the Gospel, and a spirit of life from God accompanying it; it then was, while Christ was upon earth. It may refer especially to the calling of the Gentiles, which is said to be as life from the dead, and some think, was prefigured by Ezekiel's vision, (ch. 37:1.) and foretold, Isa. 26:19. They that were dead shall live. But it is to be applied to all the success of the Gospel, among both Jews and Gentiles; an hour which still is, and is still coming, till all the elect be effectually called. Note, Sinners are destitute of spiritual life, dead to God, neither sensible of their misery, nor able to help themselves out of it. The conversion of a soul to God is its resurrection; when it begins to live to God, to breathe after, and move toward Him. It is by the voice of the Son of God that souls are raised to life; it is wrought by his power, and that power communicated by his word; The dead shall be made to hear, to understand, and believe the voice of the Son of God. The voice of Christ must be heard by us, that we may live by it. They that hear, and attend to what they hear, shall live. Hear, and your soul shall live, Isa. 55:3.

A resurrection yet to come, is spoken of, v. 28, 29. Marvel not at this, which I have said

27-26, v. 35, 36. Matt. 28:18.) In respect of the same undertaking, the Father had also given Him 'authority to execute judgment,' for the punishment of all his enemies, and the salvation of his people; because He, the Son of God, was also become 'the Son of man.' Marg. Ref. b. c.—Notes, Rom. 14:7-9. Phil. 2:9-11. It is evident that the office of 'Judge of all men' must require omniscience, omnipotence, infinite justice, truth, and perfection: these are absolutely incommunicable to any mere creature; and 'the Son of man' cannot be conceived capable of having this work absolutely committed to Him, and of properly executing it, but upon the supposition that He is 'the Son of God,' and equal with the Father. (Notes. 28-30. Matt. 25:34-46. 1 Cor. 4:3-5, v. 5. 2 Cor. 5:9-12, v. 10. 2 Thess. 1:5-10. Acts. 2:11-15.)

at the resurrection of men we find three voices spoken of, 1 Thess. 4: 16. The Lord shall descend with a shout, with the voice of the archangel; either Christ himself, the prince of the angels, or the commander-in-chief, under Him, of the heavenly hosts; and with the trumpet of God: the soldier's trumpet sounding the alarm of war, the Judge's trumpet publishing the summons to the court.

The effect of it; They shall come forth out of their graves; they shall arise out of the dust, and shake themselves from it; see Isa. 52: 1, 2, 11. But that is not all; they shall appear before Christ's tribunal; shall come forth as those that are to be tried; come forth to the bar, publicly to receive their doom.

They shall be raised to a state of happiness or misery, according to their character; according to what they did in the state of probation.

They that have done good, shall come forth to the resurrection of life; they shall live forever. Note, Whatever name men are called by, or whatever plausible profession they make, it will be well in the great day with those only, that have done good; have done that which is pleasing to God, and profitable to others. The resurrection will be a resurrection of life to those only, that have been sincere and constant in doing good. They shall not only be publicly acquitted, as we say a pardoned criminal has his life; but they shall be admitted into the presence of God, and that is better than life. To live is to be happy, and they shall be advanced above the fear of death; that is life indeed, in which mortality is swallowed up.

They that have done evil, to the resurrection of damnation; they shall live again, to be forever dying. The Pharisees thought that the resurrection pertained only to the just, but Christ rectifies that mistake. Note, Evil doers, whatever they pretend, will be treated in the day of judgment as evil men. The resurrection will be to evil doers, who did not by repentance undo what they had done amiss, a resurrection of damnation. They shall come forth to be publicly convicted of rebellion against God, and publicly condemned to everlasting punishment; to be sentenced and sent to it without reprieve. Such will the resurrection be.

Concerning the Mediator's authority to execute judgment; as He has an almighty power, so He has a sovereign jurisdiction; and who so fit to preside in the great affairs of the other life, as He who is the Father and Fountain of life?

Christ's commission to the office of Judge, is twice spoken of here; (v. 22.) He hath committed all judgment to the Son: and again, (v. 27.) He hath given Him authority.

The Father judges no man; not that the Father has resigned the government, but is pleased to govern by Christ; so that man is not under the terror of dealing with God immediately, but has the comfort of access to Him by a Mediator. The Father judges no man; He does not rule us by the mere right of creation, but by covenant, and by a Mediator. He has made us, He may do what He pleases with us, as the potter with the clay; but He does not do so, He draws us with the cords of a man. He does not determine our everlasting condition by the covenant of innocence, nor take the advantage He has against us for the violation of that covenant; the Mediator having undertaken to make a vicarious satisfaction, upon which the matter is referred to Him, and God is willing to enter upon a new treaty; not under the laws of the Creator, but the grace of the Redeemer.

He has committed all judgment to the Son, constituted Him Lord of all, (Acts 10: 36. Rom. 14: 9.) as Joseph in Egypt, Gen. 41: 40. This was prophesied of, Ps. 72: 1. Isa. 11: 2, 4. Jer. 23: 5. Mic. 5: 1-4. Ps. 67: 4-9; 13: 98: 9. All judgment is committed to our Lord; for He is intrusted with the providential kingdom; is Head over all things, (Eph. 1: 22.) Head of every man, 1 Cor. 11: 3. All things consist by Him, Col. 1: 17. He is empowered to make laws to bind conscience. I say unto you, is the form in which the statutes of the kingdom of heaven run; Be it enacted by the Lord Jesus, and by his authority. All the acts now in force are touched with his sceptre. He is authorized to settle the terms of the new covenant, to draw up the articles of peace between God and man; it is God in Christ that reconciles the world, and He has power to confer eternal life. The book of life is the Lamb's book; by his award we must stand or fall. He is commissioned to complete the war with the powers of darkness; to cast out and give judgment against the prince of this world, ch. 12: 31. He is commissioned not only to judge, but to make war, Rev. 19: 11. All that will fight for God against Satan, must enlist themselves under his banner. He is constituted sole Manager of the judgment of the great day. The ancients generally understood these words of that crowning act of his judicial power. The final and universal judgment is committed to the Son; it is the judgment-seat of Christ; the retinue is his, his mighty angels; He will try the causes, and pass the sentence, Acts 17: 31.

He has given Him authority to execute judgment also, v. 27. An authority to execute judgment; He has not only a legislative and judicial, but an executive power. The phrase here is used particularly for the judgment of condemnation, Jude 15. To execute judgment upon all; the same with taking vengeance, 2 Thess. 1: 8. The ruin of impenitent sinners comes from Christ; He that executes judgment upon them, is the same that would have wrought salvation for them; and there is no relief against the sentence of the Redeemer; salvation itself cannot save those whom the Savior condemns. That authority, the Father gave Him. Christ's authority as Mediator is delegated. He acts as the Father's Vicegerent, as the Lord's Anointed, the Lord's Christ.

All this redounds to the honor of Christ, acquitting Him from the guilt of blasphemy, in making Himself equal with God; and very much to the comfort of believers, who may with the greatest assurance venture their all in such hands.

Here are the reasons for which this commission was given Him

He is the Son of man; which speaks his humiliation and condescension. Man is a worm, the son of man a worm; yet this was the nature, this the character, which the Redeemer assumed, in pursuance of the counsels of love; to this low estate He stooped, and submitted to all the mortifications attending it, because it was his Father's will; in recompense therefore of this wonderful obedience, God did thus dignify Him. Because He condescended to be the

'Hereafter all mankind shall hear his voice at once, and be raised out of their graves, and stand before his judgment-seat. Let us then, in this our day, suffer these considerations to have their proper efficacy, in exciting us to a due preparation for that decisive hour. Let it influence every thought, word, and action of our lives, to remember that the Judge standeth at the door; that the day approacheth when all that are in their graves shall hear his voice, and come forth to judgment.'

the duty of all those to honor Him, to whom He is made known.

We must honor the Son, must look upon Him as to be honored, both upon account of his perfections and of his relations to us, we must confess that He is Lord, and worship Him; must honor Him who was dishonored for us.

Even as they honor the Father. This supposes it our duty to honor the Father; for revealed religion is founded upon natural religion, and directs us to honor the Son with divine honor; we must honor the Redeemer with the honor of the Creator. So far was it from blasphemy, that He made Himself equal with God, that it is the highest injury that can be done to us to make Him otherwise. The truths and laws of the Christian religion are as sacred and honorable as those of natural religion, and to be equally had in estimation; for we lie under the same obligations to Christ, the Author of our well-being, that we lie under to the Author of our being; and have as necessary a dependence upon the Redeemer's grace, as upon the Creator's providence, which is a sufficient ground for this law—to honor the Son as we honor the Father.

To enforce this law, it is added, He that honors not the Son, honors not the Father, who has sent Him. Some pretend a reverence for the Creator, and speak honorably of Him, who make light of their Redeemer, and speak contemptibly of Him; but the honors and interests of the Father and Son are so interwoven, that the Father never reckons Himself honored by any that dishonor the Son. Note, First, Indignities done to the Lord Jesus reflect upon God Himself, and will so be construed in the court of heaven. The Son having so far espoused the Father's honors to take to Himself the reproaches cast on Him, (Rom. 15: 3.) the Father does no less espouse the Son's honor. Secondly, The reason of this is, the Son is sent and commissioned by the Father; it is the Father who hath sent Him. Affronts to an ambassador are justly resented by the prince that sends him. And, by this rule, those who truly honor the Son, honor the Father also; see Philip. 2: 11.

He that heareth and believeth, hath everlasting life. Here we have the substance of the Gospel; the preface commands attention to a thing most weighty, and assent to a thing most certain; 'Verily, verily, I say unto you, I, to whom all judgment is committed, I, in whose lips is a divine sentence; take from Me the Christian's character and charter.

1. The character of a Christian; He heareth my word, and believeth on Him that sent Me. To be a Christian indeed is (1.) To hear the word of Christ. It is not enough to be within hearing of it, but we must attend on it as on the instructions of teachers; and attend to it, as servants to the commands of their masters; we must hear and abide by the Gospel of Christ,

Son of man, his Father made Him Lord of all, Philip. 2: 8, 9. The Father has committed the government of the children of men to Him, because, being the Son of man, He is of the same nature with those whom He is set over, and therefore the more unexceptionable; as a Judge. Their government shall proceed from the midst of them, Jer. 30: 21. Of this that law was typical; One of thy brethren shall thou set King over thee, Deut. 17: 15. In that famous vision of his kingdom and glory, (Dan. 7: 13, 14.) He is called the Son of man; and, Ps. 8: 4—6. Thou hast made the Son of man have dominion over the works of thy hands. He is the Messiah, and therefore is invested with this power. The Jews usually called the Christ the Son of David; but Christ usually called Himself the Son of man, the more humble title, which speaks Him a Prince and Savior, not to the Jewish nation only, but to the race.

That all men should honor the Son, v. 23. The honoring of Christ is here spoken of, (1.) As God's great design. The Son intended to glorify the Father, and therefore the Father intended to glorify the Son, ch. 13: 32. (2.) As man's great duty, in compliance with that design. If God will have the Son honored, it is the duty of all those to honor Him, to whom He is made known.

We must honor the Son, must look upon Him as to be honored, both upon account of his perfections and of his relations to us, we must confess that He is Lord, and worship Him; must honor Him who was dishonored for us.

Even as they honor the Father. This supposes it our duty to honor the Father; for revealed religion is founded upon natural religion, and directs us to honor the Son with divine honor; we must honor the Redeemer with the honor of the Creator. Some pretend a reverence for the Creator, and speak honorably of Him, who make light of their Redeemer, and speak contemptibly of Him; but the honors and interests of the Father and Son are so interwoven, that the Father never reckons Himself honored by any that dishonor the Son. Note, First, Indignities done to the Lord Jesus reflect upon God Himself, and will so be construed in the court of heaven. The Son having so far espoused the Father's honors to take to Himself the reproaches cast on Him, (Rom. 15: 3.) the Father does no less espouse the Son's honor. And, by this rule, those who truly honor the Son, honor the Father also; see Philip. 2: 11.

He that heareth and believeth, hath everlasting life. Here we have the substance of the Gospel; the preface commands attention to a thing most weighty, and assent to a thing most certain; 'Verily, verily, I say unto you, I, to whom all judgment is committed, I, in whose lips is a divine sentence; take from Me the Christian's character and charter.

1. The character of a Christian; He heareth my word, and believeth on Him that sent Me. To be a Christian indeed is (1.) To hear the word of Christ. It is not enough to be within hearing of it, but we must attend on it as on the instructions of teachers; and attend to it, as servants to the commands of their masters; we must hear and abide by the Gospel of Christ, as the rule of faith and practice. (2.) To believe on Him that sent Him; for Christ's design is to bring us to God; and as He is the Original of grace, so is He the Object of faith. Christ is our Way, God our Rest. We must believe on God as having sent Christ, and recommended Himself to us, by manifesting his glory in the face of Christ, 2 Cor. 4: 6.

2. The charter of a Christian. See what we get by Christ: (1.) A charter of pardon; He shall not come into condemnation. The grace of the Gospel is a full discharge from the curse of the law. A believer shall not only not lie under condemnation eternally, but not come into the danger of it, (Rom. 8: 1.) not be so much as arraigned. (2.) A charter of privileges; he is passed out of death to life, invested in a present happiness in spiritual life, and entitled to future happiness. The tenor of the first covenant was, The man that doeth them shall live in them. Now this proves Christ equal with the Father, that He has power to propose the same benefit to the hearers of his word, that had been proposed to the keepers of the old law, that is, life; Hear and live, believe and live, is what we may venture our souls upon, when we are disabled to do and live; see ch. 17: 2.

All judgment being committed to Him, we cannot but ask how He manages it. Here He answers, My judgment is just. Christ's acts, both legislative and judicial, are agreeable to the rules of equity; see Prov. 8: 8. There can lie no exceptions against any of His determinations of the Redeemer; and therefore as there shall be no repeal of any of his statutes, so there can be no appeal from any of his sentences.

His judgments are just, for they are directed.

By the Father's wisdom; I can of my own self do nothing, nothing without the Father, but as I hear, I judge, as He had said before, v. 19. The Son can do nothing but what He sees the Father do; so here, nothing but what He hears the Father say. As I hear, from the secret eternal counsels of the Father, so I judge. Would we know what we may depend upon in dealing with God? Hear the Word of Christ. We need not dive into the divine counsels, but attend to the dictates of Christ's government and judgment, and those will furnish us with an unerring guide; for what Christ has adjudged, is an exact counterpart of what the Father has decreed. Christ, in all the execution of his undertaking, had an eye to the Scripture, and made it his business to conform to and fulfill that: as it was written in the volume of the book. Thus He taught us to do nothing of ourselves, but as we hear from the word of God.

My judgment is just, because I seek not mine own will, but his who sent me. Not as if the will of Christ were contrary to the will of the Father, but Christ had, as Man, the sense of pain and pleasure, an inclination to life, an aversion to death; yet He pleased not himself, did not consult these, when He was to go on in his un-

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 15—29. We are still called to trust in Him, whom Pharisees and infidels despise. As 'the Father worketh hitherto, so does his co-equal Son, especially in carrying on and sustaining his new creation. May those declarations of his eternal power and Godhead, which engage his enemies, fill our hearts with confidence and gratitude! Nor ought we at all to regard those, who accuse us of giving the glory of God to another: such do not understand 'the mystery of the Father and of the Son,' or perceive that a union of essence, will, and operation, renders it forever impossible, to honor the one without honoring the other also.—The eternal Son is the adequate and infinite Object of the Father's love: He possesses all his perfections, and performs all his works, creates or destroys, raises from the dead and quickens whom He will; 'our life is hid in Him,' future judgment is committed to Him; and, as dwelling in human nature, He exercises all power and authority throughout the universe, that 'all men might honor Him, even as they honor the Father.' Unless therefore we can honor the Father too much, we need not fear honoring the Son more than we ought. Here is no danger of excess, but much of defect; and the adoration and worship, rendered to the Son, is directed to the glory of God the Father; (Note, Phil. 2: 8—11.) and they 'who honor not the Son' will be condemned, as enemies and despisers of the Father. May we then hear his voice, and believe his testimony, as He reveals God to man, and invites us to 'come to Him, and learn of Him, and take his yoke upon us,' with promises, that in this way 'He will give us rest for our souls.' (Notes, Matt. 11: 25—30.) Thus 'our faith and hope will be in God;' we shall 'have everlasting life, and not come into condemnation;' for in so doing we shall 'pass from death to life.' May his voice reach the hearts of those, who are dead in sin, that they may arise from the dead, 'repent,' and do works meet for repentance; 'and thus prepare for the day of retribution! For the hour will soon arrive, 'in which all that are in the graves shall hear his voice, and shall come forth: they that have done good, to the resurrection of life, and they that have done evil, to the resurrection of damnation.' May we now live, as those who desire and hope then to be found 'a people prepared for the Lord!'

36. I bear witness of myself, and the Father beareth witness of me. Observe the seal which the Father put to his commission. He beareth witness of me, not only hath done so by a voice from heaven, but still doth so by the tokens of his presence. They to whom God bears witness, are, [1.] Those whom He sends and employs; where He gives commissions, He gives credentials. [2.] Those who bear witness to Him; so Christ did. God will own and honor those that own and honor Him. [3.] Those who decline bearing witness of themselves; so Christ did. God will take care that those who humble and abase themselves, and seek not their own glory, shall not lose by it.

The satisfaction Christ had in this testimony; 'I know that the witness which He witnesseth of me, is true. I am assured that I have a divine mission, and do not in the least hesitate concerning it; thus He had the witness in himself. The devil tempted Him to question his being the Son of God, but He never yielded.

John Baptist witnessed to Christ, v. 33, &c. John came to bear witness of the light; (ch. 1:7.) his business was to prepare his way, and direct people to Him; Behold the Lamb of God. The testimony of John was solemn and public testimony; 'Ye sent an embassy of priests and Levites to John, which gave Him an opportunity of publishing what he had to say; it was a true testimony; He bore witness to the truth, as a witness ought to do. Christ doth not say, He bore witness to me, (though every one knew he did,) but like an honest man, to the truth. John was confessedly such a holy man, so mortified to the world, and so conversant with divine things, that it could not be imagined he would say what he did concerning Christ, if he had not been sure of it. John's was testimony, in fact, more than he needed to vouch; (v. 34.) I receive not testimony from man. Though Christ quoted John's testimony, it is with a protestation that it shall not be construed so as to prejudice his self-sufficiency. Christ needs no letters of commendation, or certificates, but his own worth; why then did Christ here urge the testimony of John? That ye might be saved. This He aimed at in all this discourse, to save not his own life, but the souls of others; He produced John's testimony, because, being one of themselves, it was to be hoped they would hearken to it. Note, Christ desires and designs the salvation even of his enemies and persecutors. The word of Christ is the ordinary means of salvation. Christ in His Word considers our infirmities, and condescends to our capacities; consulting not so much what it befits so great a Prince to say, as what we can bear, and what it will be most likely to do us good.

John Baptist was one for whom they had a respect. He was a burning and a shining light. Christ often spake honorably of John; he was now in prison under a cloud, yet Christ gives him his due praise, which we must be ready to do to all that faithfully serve God. He was a light, not light, (Christ was the Light,) but a luminary, a subordinate light. His office was to enlighten a dark world with notices of the Messiah's approach, to whom he was the morning star. He was a burning light, which denotes sincerity; painted fire may be made to shine, but that which burns, is true fire. It denotes also his activity, and burning love to God and men; fire is always working on itself or something else, so is a good minister. He was a shining light, which denotes either his exemplary conversation, (Matt. 5:16.) or an eminent diffusive influence. He was illustrious in the sight of others; though he affected obscurity and retirement, and was in the deserts, yet such were his doctrine, his baptism, his life, that he became remarkable, and attracted the eyes of the nation.

Ye were willing for a season to rejoice in his light. It was a transport that they were in, upon the appearing of John; 'ye were very proud that ye had such a man among you, the honor of your country; ye were willing—will ing to dance, and make a noise about this light.' It was but transient. 'Ye were fond of him for an hour, as little children are of a new thing, but soon grew weary of him and his ministry, and said that he had a devil, and now you have him in prison.' Note, Many that seem to be affected and pleased with the Gospel at first, afterward despise and reject it; it is common for forward and noisy professors to cool and fall off. These rejoiced in John's light, but never walked in it; they were like the stony ground. While Herod was a friend to John, the people caressed him; when he fell under Herod's frowns, he lost their favors; 'Ye were willing to countenance John for temporal ends' (so some take it); 'ye were in hopes to make a tool of him, and under the umbrage of his name, shake off the Roman yoke, and recover civil liberty and honor.' Christ mentions their respect to John, to condemn them for their opposition to Him—to whom John bore witness. If they had continued their veneration for John, they would have embraced Christ. He mentions the passing away of their respect, to justify God in depriving them, as He had now done, of John's ministry.

Christ's own works witnessed to Him; (v. 36.) I have a testimony greater than that of John; for if ye believe the witness of men, sent of God, the witness of John is not, though the ministry of men, is greater. 1 John 5:9. Though the witness of John was a less considerable witness, yet our Lord was pleased to make use of it. We must be glad of all the supports that offer themselves for the confirmation of our faith, though they may not amount to a demonstration; and we must not invalidate any, under pretence that there are others more conclusive.

This greater witness was, the works which his Father had given Him to finish.

The whole course of his life and ministry—his revealing of God to us, setting up his kingdom, reforming the world, destroying Satan's kingdom, restoring fallen man to purity, and shedding abroad in men's hearts the love of God and one another—all that work, of which He said, It is finished, was all from first to last, a work worthy of God; all He said and did, was holy and heavenly, and a divine power and grace shone in it, and proved abundantly that He was sent of God.

The miracles He wrought, witnessed of Him. It is here said that these works were given him by the Father, that is, He was both appointed and empowered to work them; for, as Mediator, He derived both commission and strength from his Father. They were given him to finish; He must do all which the counsel and foreknowledge of God had before determined to be done; and his finishing of them proves a divine power; for, as for God, his work is perfect. These works did bear witness that He was sent of God, and that what He said concerning Himself, was true; see Heb. 2:4. Acts 2:22. The Father had sent Him as a father sends his son to take possession for himself; if God had not sent Him, He would not have sealed Him, as He did by the works He gave Him to do; for the world's Creator will never be its deciver.

The Father that sent me, hath borne witness of me. The prince is not accustomed to follow his ambassador himself, to confirm his commission by speaking; but God was pleased to bear witness of his Son, by a voice from heaven, (Matt. 3:17.) This is my Ambassador, my beenigmas in the Christian entertain it. Some give this sense of it: 'The Father bore witness of me by a voice, and the descent of a dove, which is such an extraordinary thing, that you never saw or heard the like; and yet for my sake there was such a voice and appearance, or shape; you might have heard that voice, you might have seen that appearance, as others did, if you had closely attended the ministry of John; but by slighting it, you missed of that testimony.'

[2] Because they were not affected with the ordinary ways by which God had revealed Himself to them; (v. 38.) Ye have not his Word abiding in you. They had the Old Testament; might they not then be disposed to receive Christ? Yes, if it had had its due influence upon them. But First, The Word of God was not in them; it was among them, in their country, in their hands, but not in their hearts, not ruling in their souls, but only shining in their eyes, and sounding in their ears. What did it avail them that they had the oracles of God committed to them, (Rom. 3:2.) when they had not these oracles commanding in them? If they had, they would readily have embraced Christ. Secondly, It did not abide. Many have the Word of God coming into them, and making some impressions for a while, but it does not abide with them, as a way-faring man. If the Word abide in us, by frequent meditation, if we conform to it in our conversation, we shall readily receive the witness of the Father concerning Christ; see ch. 7: 17.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 30—33. Let none treat the things above stated as uncertain speculations; for they are authenticated by divine testimonies; and are published, that sinners may believe, and be saved. To the Redeemer all the servants of God bear witness; but He cannot derive from them any addition to his essential glory; 'From his fulness they have all received;' (Note, 1: 16.) if they be 'burning and shining lights,' they glow with his love, and shine by his splendor: He honors them, and they reflect a little of his glory.—Many are willing to hear teachers who are entitled to this character, and are pleased with their gifts or doctrine; but they do not obey the word,

'they have no root in themselves, and so in time of temptation fall away.' Not only the works which Christ finished on earth bore witness to Him, as the Son of God; but those also that He has wrought since his ascension, in the success of the Gospel, demonstrate the same truths; and the voice of God, accompanied by the power of the Holy Ghost, and made effectual to the conversion of sinners, still proclaims, that this is 'the beloved Son in whom the Father is well pleased,' and that all who would be saved must hear and obey Him, as the 'Author of eternal salvation.'

Verse 37, 38.
'Or Lord here refers them to the testimony given of Him at his baptism, when the Holy Spirit descended on Him in a visible form, and when G. I. with an audible voice, declared Him to be his beloved Son and our saviour, whom we ought to hear and obey.' CAMPBELL.
Campbell gives the following version: 'Did ye never hear his voice or see his form? Or have ye forgotten his declaration, that ye believe not Him whom He hath commissioned?' He adds: 'The sacred writers do not scruple to call the visible symbol which God, on any occasion, employs for impressing men more strongly with a sense of his presence, by a word, which I have rendered his form. Thus Luke says, (ch. 3: 22.) in relating the transaction here alluded to, that the Holy Spirit descended upon Jesus in a bodily form. The same word is applied to the appearances God made to men, under the Mosaic dispensation, Ex. 24: 17. Num. 12: 8. (Sept.)—'In the language of Scripture, there is a manifest difference between seeing God, which no man ever did, He being in Himself a pure Spirit, and seeing his form the appearance which, at any time, in condescension to the weakness of his creatures, He pleases to assume. Another evidence in favor of the above rendering is, that there seems, from the connection, no intention to express the invisibility of the divine nature. Ye have neither, &c. Some think that this different sentence is to be understood as a repetition of the objections the Jews are supposed to make in denying that they have the 'witness of the Father,' (spoken of in the first clause of the verse,) and therefore read as if it were, Ye answer me, 'We have neither heard his voice at any time, nor seen his shape,' true, but, &c.? So Markland. Kuinoel understands the verse thus: 'The Father Himself hath borne witness of Me, sufficiently clear is his testimony, although ye have neither heard his voice, nor seen his form; i. e. although He has not appeared to you in a visible form, and borne a vera voce testimony concerning Me. (So Doddridge.) But you understand not his declaration; this you evince by the very circumstance, that you repose not faith in Him whom He hath sent.' Doddridge, in his paraphrase, connects this verse with v. 33. thus: 'and after all that He has said, it is evident you have not his word cordially abiding in you, for, &c.'

Me; and yet ye will not come to me, to whom they direct you.' Their estrangement from Christ was the fault, not so much of their understandings, as of their wills. This is expressed as a complaint; Christ offered life, and it would not be accepted. Note, There is life to be had with Christ; we may have the life of pardon and grace, and comfort, and glory: life is the perfection of our being, and inclusive of all happiness; and Christ is our Life. Those that would have this life, must come to Christ; we may have it for coming. It supposes an assent of the understanding to the doctrine of Christ, and the record concerning Him; it lies in the consent of the will to his government and grace, and produces an answerable compliance in the affections and actions. The only reason why sinners die, is they will not come to Christ: it is not because they cannot, but because they will not. They will neither accept the life offered, because spiritual and divine; nor agree to the terms, nor use the appointed means; they will not be cured, for they will not observe the methods of cure. The wilfulness and obstinacy of sinners are a great grief to Jesus.

Those words, (v. 41.) I receive not honor from men, come in a parenthesis, to obviate an objection against Him, as if He sought his own glory, and made Himself the head of a party, in obliging all to come to Him. Note, He did not covet or court the applause of men, nor affect that worldly pomp and splendor in which the Jews expected the Messiah to appear. He charged those He cured, not to make Him known, and withdrew from those that would make Him king. He had not the applause of men. Instead of receiving honor from men, He received dishonor and disgrace; for He made Himself of no reputation. He needed not the applause of men; it was no addition to his glory, whom all the angels of God worship, nor was He otherwise pleased with it, than as it was according to his Father's will, and for the happiness of those who, in giving honor to Him, receive greater honor from Him.

In them ye think, &c.] This is a most decided testimony, that the Jews considered eternal life to be revealed and promised in their Scriptures; and that so far they thought right; whatever paradoxes modern learned men may endeavor to support on the subject. (Notes, 1 John 5:11, 12.) 'If the Jews did truly think the doctrine of life eternal was contained there, and that they by searching might find it there, it must be to them a sufficient rule of faith; if in this they erred, it behoved Christ to correct in them an error so pernicious.' Whist. This is worthy the serious consideration of all, whether Papists or Protestants, who oppose the circulation of the Scriptures without note or comment.

[Search the Scriptures.] Doddridge and Campbell prefer the indicative mood. Ye search the Scriptures. Says Campbell, 'It is entirely suitable to say, Ye search, because ye think thereby to obtain. Ye act thus in conformity to a fixed opinion. But if the words be understood as a command, it is not a cogent argument.' Ed.

40. Ye will not. Ye are not willing. 6: 21. (44.) How can.]

think ye have eternal life. The Scripture assures us of an eternal state, and offers us eternal life in that state; it contains the chart that describes it, the charter that conveys it, direction in the way that leads to it, and the foundation upon which the hope of it is built. But to the Jews, Christ saith only, Ye think ye have eternal life in the Scriptures; because, though they did retain the belief and hope of eternal life, and grounded their expectations of it upon the Scriptures, yet they looked for it by the bare reading and studying of the Scripture. It was a comma, but corrupt saying among them, He that has the words of the law, has eternal life; they thought they were sure of heaven, if they could say, by rote, such passages of Scripture as were directed by the tradition of the elders; as they thought all the vulgar cursed because they did not thus know the law, (ch. 7: 49.) so they concluded all the learned undoubtedly blessed.

2. We must search the Scriptures for Christ, as the new and living Way, that leads to this end. Those are the principal witnesses that testify of me. Note, The Scriptures, even of the Old Testament, testify of Christ, and by them God bears witness to Him. The Spirit of Christ in the prophets testified beforehand of Him, (1 Pet. 1: 11.) the purposes and promises of God concerning Him, and the previous notices of Him. The Jews knew very well that the Old Testament testified of the Messiah, and were critical in their remarks upon the passages that looked that way; and yet were careless in the application of them. Therefore we must search the Scriptures, and may hope to find eternal life in that search, because they testify of Christ; for this is life eternal to know Him; see 1 John 5: 11. Christ is the Treasure hid in the field of the Scriptures, the Water in their wells.

'Ye will not come to me that ye might have life. Ye search the Scriptures, ye believe the prophets, which ye cannot but see, testify of

'I know you, that you have not the love of God in you. Why should I wonder that you do not come to me, when you want even the first principle of natural religion, the love of God?' Note, The reason why people slight Christ is, they do not love God; for if we did indeed love God, we should love his express Image, and hasten to Him, by whom only we may be restored to the favor of God. He hath charged them, (p. 37.) with ignorance of God, and here, with want of love to Him: therefore men have not the love of God, because they ignore not the knowledge of Him.

Observe, The crime charged upon them; You have not the love of God in you. They pretended a great love to God, and thought they proved it by their zeal for the law, the temple and the Sabbath; yet they were really without the love of God. Note, There are many who make great profession of religion, who yet show they want the love of God by their neglect of Christ and contempt of his commandments; they hate his holiness, and undervalue his goodness. Observe, It is the love of God in us, seated in the heart, a living acting principle that God will accept; the love shed abroad there, Rom. 5: 5.

The proof of this charge is, the personal knowledge of Christ, who searches the heart, (Rev. 2: 23.) and knows what is in man; I know you. Christ sees through all our disguises, and can say to each of us, I know thee. Christ knows men better than their neighbors know them. The people thought that the scribes and Pharisees were very devout, good men, but Christ knew that they had not the love of God in them. Christ knows men better than they know themselves. These Jews had a very good opinion of themselves; we may deceive ourselves, but we cannot deceive Him. Christ knows men who do not, and will not, know Him; He looks on those who industriously look off Him, and calls by their true name, those who have not known Him.

Another crime charged upon them is, their readiness to entertain false christs and false prophets, while they obstinately opposed the true Messiah; (p. 43.) I am come in my Father's name, and ye receive me not; if another shall come in his own name, him ye will receive. Be astonished, O heavens, at this; (Jer. 2: 12, 13.) for my people have committed two evils. First, They have forsaken the Fountain of living waters, for they would not receive Christ, who came in his Father's name, had his commission from his Father, and did all for his glory. Secondly, They have heaved out broken cisterns, they hearken to every one that will set up in his own name. They forsake their own mercies, for lying vanities. Observe here Those are false prophets who come in their own name, run without being sent, and set up for themselves only. It is just with God to suffer those to be deceived with false prophets, who receive not the truth in the love of it, 2 Thess. 2: 10, 11. The errors of antichrist are the just punishment of those who obey not the doctrine of Christ. They that shut their eyes against the true light, are by the judgment of God given up to wander endlessly after false lights. It is the gross folly of many, that while they nauseate ancient truths, they are fond of upstart errors; they loathe manna, and at the same

He gives grace. This honor that comes from God, we must seek, aim at, and set for it, and take up with nothing short of it; (Rom. 2:29.) we must account it our reward, as the Pharisees accounted the praise of men. Those that will not come to Christ, and those that are ambitious of worldly honor, make it appear that they seek not the honor that comes from God, and it is their folly and ruin. See the influence it had on their infidelity; How can ye believe? The difficulty of believing arises from our own corruption; we make our work hard to ourselves, and then complain it is impracticable. The ambition of worldly honor is a great hindrance to faith. How can they believe, who make the praise of men their idol? When the profession and practice of godliness are unfashionable, and every where spoken against, when Christ and his followers are men wondered at, and to be a Christian, is to be like a speckled bird, how can they believe, the top of whose ambition is, to make a fair show in the flesh?

The last witness here called, is Moses. The Jews had a great veneration for Moses, and valued themselves upon being his disciples, and pretended to time feed upon ashes. After the Jews had rejected Christ and his Gospel, they were continually haunted with spectres, with false christis and false prophets, (Matt. 24: 24.) and their proneness to follow such, occasioned those distractions and seditions that hastened their ruin.

They are here charged with pride and vain-glory, and unbelief, the effect of it, v. 44. Having sharply reproved their unbelief, like a wise physician, He here searches into the cause. They therefore slighted and undervalued Christ, because they admired and overvalued themselves.

They were ambitious of worldly honor. Christ despised it, v. 41. They set their hearts upon it; Ye receive honor one of another; that is, 'Ye look for a Messiah in outward pomp, and promise yourselves worldly honor by Him.' Ye receive honor; 'Ye desire to receive it, and aim at that in all you do. Ye give honor to others, and applaud them, only that they may return it, and applaud you.' It is the proud man's art to throw honor upon others only that it may rebound upon himself. 'Ye are very careful to keep all the honors to yourselves, as if ye had the monopoly of that which is honorable. What respect is showed you, ye receive yourselves, and do not transmit it to God, as Herod.' Idolizing men and their sentiments, and affecting to be idolized by them, are idolatry.

Spiritual honor is called here the honor that comes from God only; this they sought not. Come, True honor, that which comes from God only, is real and lasting honor; those are honorable indeed, whom He takes into covenant and communion with Himself. This honor have all the saints. All that believe in Christ, through Him, receive the honor that comes from God. He is not partial, but will give glory wherever

V. 39-47. When the hearts of men are occupied by pride, ambition, and the love of the world, there is no room for the Word of God to abide in them.—Thus many profess to believe that 'in the Scriptures they have eternal life'; yet they bestow little pains to understand these sacred oracles; others search them with a proud, curious, or prejudiced mind, and so cannot see that they 'testify of Christ'; others admit this as a doctrine, yet they 'are not willing to come to Him, that they may have life.' Being destitute of the love of God, they are careless about spiritual and eternal blessings; or they imagine they shall be able to obtain them in some other way; or they are proud of their knowledge; they 'seek honor one of another'; and are glad to follow carnal, self-sufficient teachers, who come in their own name, coincide with their views, flatter their pride, connive at their sins, and seek their own ends. How many trust in their attachment to some form of doctrine, or to some renowned head of a party; who no more enter into the real meaning of those doctrines, or into the views of the persons whose names they bear, than the Jews believed the words of Moses, or entered into his views of the predicted Messiah. Thus the creeds and formularies of many sects will suffice for the condemnation of immense multitudes, who glory in belonging to them, as members, as ministers, nay, as rulers! and it is well if the sermons many preach, and the books which they publish, do not appear in judgment against them, to accuse them of not believing or practising what they preached or printed. Let us then most diligently search and fervently pray over the Scriptures, as men intent on finding eternal life; let us observe that Christ is the grand Subject of them, and daily apply to Him for that life which He bestows: let us seek 'that honor, which cometh from God only,' and 'not fear the reproach of men'; and thus 'by patient continuance in well-doing, seek for glory honor, and immortality.'

adhere to Moses in their opposition to Christ but Christ here shows them,

That Moses was a witness against them, and accused them to the Father: There is one that accuses you, even Moses. This may be understood either, [1.] As showing the difference between the law and the Gospel. Moses, that is, the law, accuses you, for by the law is the knowledge of sin; it condemns you, it is a ministration of death; but it is not the design of Christ's Gospel to accuse us; Think not that I will accuse you. Christ did not come into the world to find fault with every body, or as a spy upon the actions of men; He came to be an Advocate, not an Accuser; to reconcile God and man, and not to set them more at variance; what fools were they then that adhered to Moses against Christ, and desired to be under the law! Gal. 4: 21. Or, [2.] It shows the unreasonableness of their infidelity; 'Think not that I will appeal from your bar to God's, and challenge you to answer there for what you do against Me, as injured innocence usually does; you are already accused in the court of heaven; Moses himself convicts and condemns you for your unbelief.' Let them not mistake concerning Christ; though He was a Prophet, He did not improve his interest in heaven against those that persecuted Him; did not, as Elias, make intercession against Israel, (Rom. 11: 2.) or, as Jeremiah, desire to see God's vengeance on them, Jer. 20: 12. Instead of accusing his crucifiers to his Father, He prayed, Father, forgive them. Nor let them mistake concerning Moses, as if he would stand by them, in rejecting Christ; no, There is one that accuses you, even Moses in whom ye trust. Note, External privileges are commonly the vain confidence of those who reject Christ and his grace. The Jews trusted in Moses, and thought their having his laws and ordinances would save them. Those that confide in their privileges, and do not improve them, will find not only that their confidence is disappointed, but that those very privileges will witness against them.

Moses was a witness for Christ, and to his doctrine; (v. 46, 47.) He wrote of me. Moses did particularly prophesy of Christ, as the Seed of the woman, the Seed of Abraham, the Shiloh, the great Prophet; the ceremonies of the law of Moses were figures of Him that was to come. The Jews made Moses the patron of their opposition to Christ; but Christ here shows them that Moses, so far from writing against Christ, wrote for Him and of Him. But,

Verse 45.

'It is not necessary that I accuse you, for, even now, Moses, in whom ye trust, your great lawgiver and patron, is, as it were, your accuser before God, and charges you with being regardless of him as well as of Me.' One of the most expressive passages we can imagine; in which Moses, their great lawgiver, is represented looking down with indignation upon these elders, who gloried in being the most distinguished of his disciples; and seeing how injuriously they treated Jesus, the great Prophet, turning himself to God with a severe accusation against them, urging his own predictions as an aggravation of their inexcusable infidelity. For he wrote of Me. Christ might perhaps intend to refer to what Moses had written of the seed of the woman, (Gen. 3: 15.) of the seed of Abraham, in which all nations should be blessed, (Gen. 22: 18.) of the Shiloh who should come to gather the people, (Gen. 49: 10.) and of the Prophet whom God should raise up unto them from their brethren; (Deut. 18: 15.) as well as to the many ceremonial institutions which had their final accomplishment in Him.

DODDRIEGE.

'It appears that our Lord's discourse effectually confounded the Jews, for they went away without replying—a proof that they had nothing to say. But when a man, through prejudice, bigotry, or malevolence, is determined to disbelieve, evidence and demonstration are lost on him; he is incapable of conviction, because determined not to yield.'

Dr. A. CLARKE.

Verse 47.

This whole passage is peculiarly suited to show us, in what light to consider the writings of Moses, and the prophets, or the Old Testament, nearly, if not entirely, as we have it. Our Lord certainly sanctioned the general opinion of the Jews, not only that these books were authentic, or genuine; but also that they were divinely inspired, and as such worthy of the most implicit credence and confidence. And, in particular, he has given his full attestation to the books of Moses, not as compiled from his records, but as written in their present form by Moses himself.

eat: five (five thousand men, with five oxen and two fishes, 1-14. He will draw from the multitude, with purpose to make Him King, 15. His disciples put to sea without Him, and meet with a storm; but He comes to them walking on the sea, 16-21. Being followed to Capernaum by multitudes, He reproves their carnal motives even in their diligence about religion; and requires faith in Him, 22-29. They demand a sign, like that of the manna; and He speaks copiously of Himself as the Bread of life, and of living by faith in Him, 30-59. Many are offended, and forsake Him, 60-66. Peter, in the name of the twelve, professes steadfast faith in Him, as 'the Son of God'; but Jesus pronounces one of them to be a devil, 67-71.

a great multitude followed Him, because they saw his miracles, v. 2. Note, Our Lord, while He went about doing good, lived continually in a crowd, which gave Him more trouble than honor. Useful men must not complain of a hurry of business, when they are serving God and their generation; it will be time enough to enjoy ourselves, when we come where we shall enjoy God. Christ's miracles drew many after Him, that were not drawn to Him. They had their curiosity gratified, who had not their consciences convinced.

He went up into a mountain, and there sat with his disciples, the more conveniently to be seen and heard; this was a natural pulpit, not, like Ezra's, made for the purpose. Christ was now driven to be a Field-preacher; but his word was not the less acceptable, to those who knew how to value it, who followed Him, not only when He went out to a desert place, but when He went up to a mountain, though up-hill be against heart. He sat there, as teachers do, in the chair of instruction; He did not sit at ease, nor in Christ here charges it on the Jews, that they did not believe Moses. He had said, (v. 45.) that they trusted in Moses, and yet here undertakes to make out that they did not believe Moses; they trusted to his name, but they did not receive his doctrine in its true meaning; they did not rightly understand, nor credit the writings of Moses concerning the Messiah.

He proves this charge from their disbelief of Him; Had ye believed Moses, ye would have believed Me. Note, The surest trial of faith is by the effects it produces; many say that they believe, whose actions give their words the lie, for had they believed the Scriptures, they would have done otherwise. Those who rightly believe one part of Scripture, will receive every part. The prophecies of the Old Testament were so fully accomplished in Christ, that who rejected Christ, did in effect deny those prophecies, and set them aside.

From their disbelief of Moses, He infers that it was not strange that they rejected Him: If ye believe not his writings, how shall ye believe my words? First, 'If ye do not believe sacred writings, how shall ye believe my words?' words being usually less regarded. Secondly, 'If ye do not believe Moses, for whom ye have such a profound veneration, how is it likely that ye should believe Me, whom ye look upon with so much contempt?' See Exod. 6:12. Thirdly, 'If ye believe not what Moses spake and wrote of Me, which is a strong testimony for Me, how shall ye believe Me and my mission?' If we admit not the premises, how shall we admit the conclusion? The truth of the Christian religion being a matter purely of divine revelation, depends upon a divine authority of the Scripture; if therefore we believe not the inspiration of those writings, how shall we receive the doctrine of Christ?

Thus ends Christ's plea for Himself, in answer to the charge exhibited against Him; what effect it had, we know not; it would seem that their mouths were stopped for the present, and they could not for shame but drop the prosecution; yet their hearts were hardened.

CHAP. VI. v. 1-14. This miracle is the only passage of Christ's life recorded by all the evangelists. John, who does not usually relate what had been recorded before, relates this, because of the reference the following discourse has to it.

The place and time where and when this miracle was wrought, are noted for the greater evidence of the truth of the story; it is not said that it was done once upon a time, nobody knows where, but the circumstances are specified, that the fact might be inquired into.

He went over the sea of Galilee, called elsewhere the lake of Genesareth, here the sea of Tiberias, from a city adjoining, which Herod had lately enlarged, and called so in honor of Tiberius the emperor, and, probably, had made his metropolis. Christ did not directly cross this inland sea, but made a coasting voyage to another place on the same side. It is not tempting God, to go by water when there is convenience for it, even to those places whither we never tempted the Lord his God, Matt. 4:7.

CHAP. VI. v. 1. After these things. [That is, on having heard of the death of John.]

Verse 4.

Passover, a feast of the Jews. [Almost all who have compiled harangues of the gospels, have concluded that this was at least the third passover of our Lord's public ministry. The hypothesis, that it was the feast of Pentecost has no authority, all the old manuscripts {660}] state, yet as one having authority; ready to receive addresses; whoever would, might come, and find Him there. He sat with his disciples; condescended to take them to sit with Him, to put a reputation upon them; before the people, and give them an earnest of the glory in which they should shortly sit with Him. We are said to sit with Him, Eph. 2:6.

The first words, After those things, do not signify that this immediately followed what was related in the foregoing chapter, but, in process of time; we are told, (v. 4.) that it was when the passover was nigh; which is well noted, (1.) Because, perhaps, that had brought in the apostles, (who were sent as itinerant preachers,) to attend their Master to Jerusalem, to keep the feast. (2.) Because it was a custom with the Jews, religiously to observe the approach of the passover thirty days, with some sort of solemnity; they repaired the roads and bridges, if there was occasion, and discoursed of the passover. (3.) Perhaps the approach of the passover, when every one knew Christ would go up to Jerusalem, and be absent for some time, made the multitude attend the more diligently on Him. Note, The prospect of losing our opportunities should quicken us to diligence; and when solemn ordinances are approaching, it is good to prepare for them by conversing with the Word of Christ.

He lifted up his eyes, and saw a great company come to Him, poor, ordinary people, no doubt, in such remote corners of the country; yet Christ showed Himself pleased with their attendance, and concerned for their welfare; to teach us to condescend to them of low estate, and not to set those with the dogs of our flock, whom Christ hath set with the lambs of his. The souls of the poor are as precious to Christ, as those of the rich.

He directed Himself to Philip, who had seen all his miracles, particularly that of his turning water into wine, and therefore it might be expected that he would say, 'Lord, if Thou wilt, it is easy to Thee to feed them all;' those that have been witnesses of Christ's works, and have shared in them, are inexcusable if they say, Can He furnish a table in the wilderness? Philip was of Bethsaida, in the neighborhood of which Christ now was, and therefore he was most likely to help them to provision; and, probably, much of the company was known to him, and he was concerned for them. Now Christ asked, Whence shall we buy bread, that these may eat? He takes all to eat with Him. When He had taught and healed them, He had done his part; and now they should treat Him and his disciples; (for some of the people, it is likely, were rich;) and we are sure that Christ and his disciples were poor; yet He is solicitous to entertain them. Those that will accept Christ's gifts, instead of paying for them, shall be paid for their acceptance of them. Christ, having fed their souls, feeds their bodies with food convenient, to show that the Lord is for the body, and to encourage us to pray for our daily bread; and to set us an example of compassion to the poor, James 2:15. His inquiry is, Whence shall we buy bread? One would think, that He would rather have asked, Where shall we have money to buy? But He will rather lay out all He has than they shall want. He will buy to give, and we must labor, that we may give, Eph. 4:28.

This inquiry was only to try the faith of Philip, for He Himself knew what He would do, v. 6. Note, Our Lord is never at a loss in his counsels; but, how difficult soever the case is, He knows what He has to do, and what course He will take, Acts 15:18. He knows the thoughts He has toward his people, (Jer. 26:11.) and is never at uncertainty; when we know not, He Himself knows what He will do. When Christ is pleased to puzzle his people, it is only with a design to and versions agreeing with the received reading, which therefore should not be changed without urgent necessity; whereas there is none in this place, because such things are expressly said to have happened, as could not be crowded into the narrow compass assigned them of this scheme.

The passover was nigh. [This happened about ten or twelve days before the third passover which Christ celebrated, after his baptism.]

CALMET.

7 Philip answered him, 'Two hundred pennyworth of bread is not sufficient for them, that every one of them may take a little.

8 One of his disciples, ^m Andrew, Simon Peter's brother, saith unto him, 9 There is a lad here, which hath five ^o barley-loaves, and two small fishes: ^p but what are they among so many?

10 And Jesus said, 'Make the men sit down. Now there was much grass in the place. So the men sat down, in number about five thousand.

11 And Jesus took the loaves; and when he had given thanks, he distributed to the disciples, and the disciples to them that were set down; and likewise of the fishes as much as they would.

12 When they were filled, he said unto his disciples, Gather up the fragments that remain, that nothing be lost.

13 Therefore they gathered them together, and filled twelve baskets with the fragments of the five barley-loaves, which remained over and above unto them that had eaten.

prove them. The question put Philip to a non-plus, yet Christ proposed it, to try whether he would say, 'Lord, if Thou wilt exert thy power for them, we need not buy bread.'

Philip's answer to this question; 'Two hundred pennyworth of bread is not sufficient. It is to no purpose to talk of buying bread for them, for neither will the country afford so much bread, nor can we lay out so much money.' Two hundred pence of their money amount to about six pounds of ours, and if they lay out that, it will exhaust their fund, and they must starve. Grotius computes, that two hundred pennyworth of bread would scarcely reach to two thousand; but Philip would have every one take a little; and nature, we say, is content with a little. Philip, as if the Master of the family had been an ordinary person, looked for supply only in an ordinary way. Christ might have said to him, as afterward, Have I been so long time with you, and yet hast thou not known Me, Philip? Or, as God to Moses in a like case, Is the Lord's hand waxen short? We are apt to distrust God's power when visible means fail; that is, to trust Him no further than we can see Him.

Andrew is here said to be Simon Peter's brother; though he was senior to Peter in discipleship, and instrumental to bring Peter to Christ, yet Peter afterward so far outshone him, that he is described by his relation to Peter: he acquainted Christ with what they had at hand; and herein we may see the strength of his love, in that he was willing to bring out all they had, though any one would have said, Charity begins at home. He did not conceal it, under pretence of being a better husband of their provision than the Master, but honestly gives account of all they had. There is a lad here, probably one that used to follow this company, as suiters the camp, with provisions to sell, and the disciples had bespoken what he had for themselves; and it was five barley-loaves, and two small fishes. The provision was coarse and ordinary. Canaan was a land of wheat, (Deut. 8: 8.) its inhabitants were commonly fed with the finest wheat, (Ps. 91: 16. Deut. 32: 14.) yet Christ and his disciples were glad of barley-bread. It does not follow, that we should tie ourselves to coarse fare, and place religion in it: (when God brings finer to our hands, receive it, and be thankful:) but it does follow, that we must not desire dainties, (Prov. 23: 5.) nor murmur if reduced to coarse fare, but be thankful, and reconciled to it; barley-bread is better than we deserve: nor let us despise the mean provision of the poor, remembering how Christ was provided for. There were but five loaves, and those so small, that one little lad carried them all; and we find, (2 Kings 4: 42, 43.) that twenty barley-loaves, with some other provision to help out, would not dine a hundred men without a miracle. There were but two fishes, and those small; I take the fish to have been cured, for they had not fire to dress them. The provision of bread was little, but that of fish was less, so that many a bit of dry bread they must eat before they could make a meal of this provision. Bread is meat for hunger; but of them that murmured for flesh, it is said, They asked meat for their lusts, Ps. 78: 18. Well, Andrew was willing that the people should have this, as far as it would go. Note, A distrustful fear of wanting ourselves, should not hinder us from needful charity to others. See the weakness of his faith, 'But what are they among so many?' To offer that to such a multitude, is but to mock them.' Philip and he had not considered the power of Christ, (which they had largely experienced.) Who fed the camp of Israel in the wilderness? He that could make one man chase a thousand, could make one loaf feed a thousand.

14 Make the men sit down, though ye have nothing, and trust Me.' This was like going to buy without money; Christ would thus try their obedience. Observe, The furniture of the dining-room; there was much grass in that place, though a desert place; see how beautiful nature is, it makes grass grow upon the mountains, Ps. 147: 8. The grass was uneaten; God gives not only enough, but more than enough. Here was this plenty of grass where Christ was preaching; the Gospel brings other blessings along with it, Then shall the earth yield her increase, Ps. 67: 6. This plenty of grass made the place the more commodious, and served them for cushions, or beds; (as they called what they sat on at meat, Esth. 1: 6.) and considering what Christ says of the grass of the field, (Matt. 6: 29, 30.) these beds excelled those of Ahasuerus; nature's pomp is the most glorious. The number of the guests, about five thousand; a great entertainment, representing that of the Gospel, which is a feast for all nations, Isa. 25: 6.

The distribution of the provision was done with thanksgiving; He gave thanks. Note We ought to give thanks for our food, for we have it from the hand of God, and must receive it with thanksgiving, 1 Tim. 4: 4, 5. And this is the sweetness of our creature-comforts, that they will furnish us with matter, and give us occasion, for thanksgiving. Though our provision be coarse and scanty, though we have neither plenty nor plenty, we must give God thanks.

It was distributed from the hand of Christ by the hands of his disciples. Note, All our comforts come to us originally from the hand of Christ; whoever brings them, it is He that sends them. In distributing the bread of life to those that follow Him, He is pleased to make use of his disciples; they are the servants at Christ's table, or rather rulers in his household, to give to every one their portion of meat in due season.

It was done to universal satisfaction. They did not every one take a little, but all had as much as they would; and, considering how long they had fasted, with what an appetite they sat down, how agreeable this food may be supposed to be, above common food, it was not a little that served them, when they ate as much as they would, and on free cost. Those whom Christ feeds with the bread of life, He does not stint, Ps. 81: 10. There were but two small fishes, and yet they had of them too, as much as they would. He did not reserve them for the better sort of the guests, and put off the poor with dry bread, but treated them all alike, for they were alike welcome. They who call feeding upon fish fasting, reproach the entertainment Christ here made, which was a full feast.

When they were filled, and every man had a witness to the truth of the miracle, Christ said to his disciples, Gather up the fragments. Note, We must always take care that we make no waste of any of God's creatures; for the grant we have of them, though large and full, is with this proviso, willful waste only excepted. It is just with God to bring us to the want of that which we waste. The Jews were very careful not to lose any bread, or let it be trodden upon. He who despises bread, falls into the depth of poverty, was a saying among them. Though Christ could command supplies, yet He would have the fragments gathered up. When we are filled, we must remember that others want, and we may want. Those that would be charitable must be provident. Had this broken meat been left upon the grass, the beasts and fowls would have gathered it up; but that which is fit for men, is wasted if it be thrown to the brute. Christ did not order the broken meat to be gathered up, till all were filled; we must not begin to hoard, till all is laid out that ought to be, for that is withholding more than is meet. Mr. Baxter notes here, 'How much less should we lose God's Word, or our time, or such greater mercies!'

They filled twelve baskets with the fragments, an evidence not only of the truth of the miracle, that they were fed with real food, but of the greatness of it; they were not only filled, but there was all this over and above. How large the divine bounty! it not only fills the cup, but makes it run over; bread enough, and to spare

14 Then those men, when they had seen the miracle that Jesus did, said "This is a truth that Prophet that should come into the world."

15 When Jesus therefore perceived that they would come, and take him by force to make him a King, he departed again into a mountain himself alone.

19 So when they had rowed about five and twenty or thirty furlongs, they see Jesus walking on the sea, and drawing nigh unto the ship: and they were afraid.

20 But he saith unto them, "It is I; be not afraid."

without their toil, and save them from eating their bread in the sweat of their face. They hoped this might be an opportunity of shaking off the Roman yoke, which they were weary of. If they had one to head them, who could victual an army cheaper than another could provide for a family, they could not fail of success, and the recovery of their liberties. Thus is religion often prostituted to a secular interest, and Christ is served, only to serve a turn, Rom. 16: 18. Jesus is usually sought after for something else, not for his own sake. Augustine. It was a seditious attempt, a disturbance of the public peace; it would make the country a seat of war, and expose it to the resentments of the Roman power. It was contrary to the mind of our Lord Himself; for they would take Him by force, whether He would or no. Note, Those who force honors upon Christ, which He has not required at their hands, displease Him, and do Him the greatest dishonor. They that say, I am of Christ, in opposition to those that are of Apollus and Cephas, (so making Christ the Head of a party,) take Him by force, to make Him a King.

Here is an instance of the humility and self-denial of Jesus, that, when they would have made Him a King, He departed; so far was He from countenancing the design. Herein He has left a testimony, [1.] Against ambition of worldly honor, to which He was perfectly mortified. Had they come to take Him by force, and make Him prisoner, He could not have been more industrious to abscond, than when they would make Him King. Let us not then covet to be the idols of a crowd, nor be desirous of vain-glory. [2.] Against faction, and rebellion, and whatever tends to disturb the peace of kings and provinces. By this it appears that He was no enemy to Caesar, nor would have his followers so, but he the quiet in the land; He would have his ministers decline every thing that looks like sedition, and improve their interest only for their work's sake.

in our Father's house. The fragments filled twelve baskets, one for each disciple; they were thus repaid for their willingness to part with what they had for public service; see 2 Chron. 31:10. The Jews, when they have eaten a meal, leave a piece of bread upon the table, upon which the blessing after meat may rest, for it is a curse upon the wicked man, (Job 20:21.) there shall none of his meal be left.

Here is the influence of this miracle; They said, This is of a truth that Prophet. Note, Even the vulgar Jews with great assurance expected the Messiah to come into the world, and to be a great Prophet. They speak here with assurance of his coming. The Pharisees despised them as not knowing the law; but, it would seem, they knew more of Him, the End of the law, than they did. The miracles which Christ wrought, did clearly demonstrate that He was the Messiah, a Teacher come from God, the great Prophet, and could not but convince the amazed spectators that this was He that should come. There were many who were convinced that He was that Prophet which should come into the world, who yet did not cordially receive his doctrine, for they did not continue in it. Such wretched inconsistency there is between the faculties of the corrupt, unsanctified soul, that it is possible for men to acknowledge that Christ is that Prophet, and yet turn a deaf ear to Him.

V. 15-21. Christ retired from the multitude, because He perceived that they who acknowledged Him to be that Prophet that should come into the world, would come, and take Him by force, to make Him a King, v. 15. Here we have an instance of the irregular zeal of some of Christ's followers.

This was an act of zeal for the honor of Christ, and against the contempt which the ruling part of the Jewish church put upon Him.

They were concerned to see so great a Benefactor to the world so little esteemed; and therefore, since royal titles are the most illustrious, they would make Him a King, knowing that the Messiah was to be a King, and if a Prophet, like Moses, then a sovereign Prince and Lawgiver; and if they cannot set Him up upon the holy hill of Zion, a mountain in Galilee shall serve for the present. Those whom Christ has feasted with the dainties of heaven, should make Him their King, set Him upon the throne in their souls; let Him that has fed us, rule us. But it was an irregular zeal; for it was grounded upon a mistake concerning the nature of Christ's kingdom, as if He must appear with outward pomp; which was as great a disparagement to his glory, as it would be to lacker gold, or paint a ruby. Right notions of Christ's kingdom would keep us to right methods for advancing it. It was excited by the love of the flesh; they would make Him their King, who could feed them

He departed again into a mountain, the mountain, where He had preached, v. 3.) when He came down into the plain, to feed the people, and then returned to it alone, to be private. Christ, though so useful in the places of concourse, chose sometimes to be alone, to teach us to sequester ourselves from the world now and then, for free converse with God and our souls; and never less alone, says the serious Christian, than when alone. Public services must not jostle out private devotions.

Here is the disciples' distress at sea. They that go down to the sea in ships, see the works of the Lord, for He raiseth the stormy wind, Ps. 107:23.

When even was come, and they had done their work, it was time to look homeward, and therefore they set sail for Capernaum. This they did by particular direction from their Master, with design (as it would seem) to get them out of the way of countenancing those that would have made Him a King.

Here is the stormy wind arising, and fulfilling the word of God. They were Christ's disciples, and were now in the way of their duty, and Christ was in the mount praying for them; yet they were in this distress. The perils and afflictions of this present time may very well consist with our interest in Christ and his intercession. They had lately been feasted at Christ's table; but after the sunshine of comfort expect a storm. It was now dark; this made the storm more dangerous. Sometimes the people of God are in trouble, and cannot see their way out; in the dark concerning the cause of their trouble, the design of it, and what the issue will be, Jesus was not come to them. When they were in that storm, (Matt. 8:21.) Jesus was with them; but now their Beloved was gone. The absence of Christ is the great aggravation of troubles. The sea arose, by reason of a great wind. It was calm and fair when they put to sea, (they were not so presumptuous as to launch out in a storm,) but it arose when they were at sea. In times of tranquility we must prepare for trouble, for it may arise when we little think of it. Let it comfort good people, when they happen to be in storms at sea, that the disciples of Christ were so; and let the promises of a gracious God balance the threats of an angry sea; though in a storm, and in the dark, they are no worse off than Christ's disciples. Clouds and darkness sometimes surround the children of the light, and of the day.

Christ seasonably approaches when they were in this peril, v. 19. They had rowed, (being forced by the wind to betake themselves to their oars,) about twenty-five or thirty furlongs. The Holy Spirit that indited this, could have ascertained the number of furlongs precisely, but that, being only circumstantial, is left to be expressed according to the conjecture of the penman. And when they were a good way at sea, they see Jesus walking on the sea. See here, the power Christ has over the laws of nature. It is natural for heavy bodies to sink, but Christ walked upon the water as upon dry land, which was more than Moses' dividing, and walking through, the water.

He drew nigh to the ship; for therefore He walked upon the water, as He rides upon the heavens, for the help of his people, Deut. 33:26. He will not leave them comfortless, when tossed with tempests, and not comforted. When banished, as John, into remote places, or shut up as Paul and Silas, in close places, He will be nigh them. They were more afraid of an apparition (for so they supposed Him to be) than of the winds and waves. It is more terrible to wrestle with the rulers of the darkness of this world, than with a tempestuous sea. When they thought a demon haunted them, and perhaps was instrumental to raise the storm, they were more terrified than while they saw nothing in it but what was natural. Note, Our real distresses are often much increased by our imaginary ones, the creatures of fancy. Even the approach of comfort and deliverance is often so misconstrued as to occasion fear and perplexity. We are often not only worse frightened than hurt, but most frightened when ready to be 21 'her. 'they willingly received him into the ship: and immediately the ship was at the land whither they went.

[Practical Observations.]

22 ¶ The day following, when the people, which stood on the other side of the sea, saw that there was none other boat there, save that one whereinto his disciples were entered, and that Jesus went not with his disciples into the boat, but that his disciples were gone away alone;

23 (Howbeit there came other boats from Tiberias, nigh unto the place where they did eat bread, after that the Lord had given thanks.)

24 When the people therefore saw that Jesus was not there, neither his disciples, they also took shipping, and came to Capernaum, seeking for Jesus.

25 And when they had found him on the other side of the sea, they said unto him, Rabbi, when camest thou hither?

that would find Christ, must accomplish a diligent search; seek till they find; go from sea to sea, to seek the Word of God, rather than live without it. Those whom Christ has feasted with the bread of life, should have earnest desires toward Him. Much would have more in communion with Christ. They resolve to go to Capernaum in quest of Him; there He usually resided. Thither his disciples were gone, and they knew He would not be long absent from them; they that would find Christ, must go forth by the footsteps of the flock. Providence favored them with an opportunity of going by sea, the speediest way; for there came other boats from Tiberias, that lay further off upon the same shore, nigh, though not so nigh to the place where they did eat bread; and, probably, the boats were bound for Capernaum. Note, Those that in sincerity seek Christ, and opportunities of converse with Him, are commonly assisted by Providence in those pursuits. The evangelist, having occasion to mention their eating the multiplied bread, adds, after that the Lord had given thanks. So much were the disciples affected with this, that they never forgot the impressions made by it, but took pleasure in remembering the gracious words that proceeded out of his mouth. That was the grace and beauty of that meal, and made it remarkable: their hearts were within them.

helped. But Christ silenced their fears with a word, (v. 20.) It is I, be not afraid! Nothing is more powerful to convince sinners than that word, I am Jesus, whom thou persecutest; nothing more powerful to comfort saints than, I am Jesus whom thou lovest; it is I that love thee, and seek thy good; be not afraid of Me, nor of the storm. When trouble is nigh, Christ is nigh.

They welcomed Christ into the ship; they willingly received Him. Note, Christ's absenting Himself for a time, is but so much the more to endear Himself; at his return, to his disciples, who value his presence above any thing; see Cant. 3:4. Christ landed them safe at the shore; immediately the ship was at the land whither they went. Note, [1.] The church, in which the disciples of Christ have embarked their all, may be shattered and distressed, yet it shall come safe to the harbor at last; tossed at sea, but not lost; cast down, but not destroyed; the hush burning, but not consumed. [2.] The power and presence of the church's King shall expedite her deliverance, and conquer the difficulties which have baffled all her other friends. The disciples had rowed hard, but could not make their point till Christ was in the ship, and then the work was done suddenly. If we have received Christ willingly, though the night be dark, and the wind high, yet we shall be at shore shortly, and nearer to it than we think we are. Many a doubting soul is fetched to heaven by a pleasing surprise, or ever it is aware.

V. 22-27. In these verses the people inquire after Christ, v. 23, 24. They saw the disciples go to sea, they saw Christ retire to the mountain, probably with an intimation that He desired to be private for some time; but, their hearts being set upon it to make Him a King, they way-laid his return.

They were much at a loss for Him; He was gone, and they saw not what was become of Him; they saw there was no other boat there, but that in which the disciples went off, Providence so ordering it for the confirming of the miracle of his walking on the sea, for there was no boat for Him to go in. They observed also, that Jesus did not go with his disciples. Note, Those that would find Christ, must diligently observe his motions, and learn to understand the tokens of his presence and absence, that they may steer accordingly.

They are very industrious in seeking Him. They searched thereabouts, and when they saw that Jesus was not there, nor his disciples, (nor any one that could give tidings of Him,) they resolved to search elsewhere. Note, Those

They also took shipping, and came to Capernaum seeking for Jesus. They did not defer, in hopes to see Him again on this side the water; but, their convictions being strong, and their desires warm, they followed Him presently. Good motions are often crushed for want of being prosecuted in time. They came to Capernaum, and, for aught that appears, these hypocritical followers of Christ had a pleasant passage, while his sincere disciples had a stormy one. It is not strange if it fare worst with the best men in this evil world. They came, seeking Jesus. Note, Those that would find Christ, and find comfort in Him, must be willing to take pains, and, as those here, compass sea and land, to seek and serve Him who came from heaven to earth, to seek and save us.

They found Him on the other side of the sea. Note, Christ will be found of those that seek Him; and it is worth while to cross a sea, nay, to go from sea to sea, and from the river to the ends of the earth, if we may but find Him at last. Those people appeared to be unsound, and not actuated by any good principle, and yet were thus zealous. Note, Hypocrites may be very forward in their attendance on God's ordinances. If men have no more to show for their love to Christ, than their running after sermons and prayers, and their pangs of affection to good preaching, they have reason to suspect themselves no better than this eager crowd. But though these people were no better principled, Christ was willing to be found of them; if we could know the hearts of hypocrites, yet while their profession is plausible, we must not exclude them our communion, much less when we do not know their hearts.

Rabbi, when camest Thou hither? It would seem by v. 59, that they found Him in the synagogue. That was the likeliest place to see Christ in, for it was his custom to attend public worship, Luke 4:16. Note, Christ will be found in congregations of his people, and in the administration of ordinances; public worship Christ owns, and graces with the manifestations of Himself. There they found Him, and all they had to say to Him, was, Rabbi, when camest Thou hither? They saw He would not be made a king, and therefore say no more of that, but call Him Rabbi, Teacher. Their inquiry refers not only to the time, but to the manner, of his conveying Himself thither; not only When, but How, camest Thou hither? for there was no boat for Him to come in. They were curious in asking concerning Christ's motions, but not solicitous to observe their own.

The answer Christ gave them, was not direct to their question. What was it to them, when and how He came?

He discovers the corrupt principle that they acted from; 'Verily, verily, I say unto you, I that search the heart, and know what is in man, (Rev. 3:14, 15.) Ye seek Me; that is well, but not from a good principle.' Christ knows not only what we do, but why we do it. These followed Christ, not for his doctrine's sake; not because ye saw the miracles. The miracles were the confirmation of his doctrine; Nicodemus sought Him, for the sake of them, (John 3:2.) and argued from the power of his works to the truth of his word; but these here were so stupid that they never considered that. But it was because ye did eat of the loaves, and were filled; not because He taught them, but because He fed them. He had given them, [1.] A full meal. They did eat, and were filled; and some of them

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. —21. The beneficence of our Lord's miracles concurred with their power, to convince the people that He was sent from God; and the same spirit of love displayed in our conduct, even amidst weakness and poverty, will best adorn the Gospel, evince its divine origin, and conciliate the minds of men. If we copy the example of our Lord, in rendering hearty thanks to the Giver of all our comforts, and in dispensing them to the indigent, our most homely meals will be far more comfortable and blessed, than the most luxurious feasts of ungodly men. (Note, Ps. 37:16, 17.) Moderation and indifference in respect of diet, and a parsimonious care to 'gather up the fragments that remain, that nothing be lost,' form the very basis of Christian beneficence; and, if, in opulent cities, all that which is wasted or needlessly consumed, were reserved to feed the hungry, how much more comfortably would the poor be maintained! and how much better would it be both for the souls and bodies of the affluent! Christians should be willing to fare as Christ did; to obey his commands, and to encounter difficulties at his word.—When He is not sensibly present with his people, He is pleading for them; and He will come to them through every intervening obstacle, and terminate all their fears and hardships. (P. O. Matt. 14:14—36. Mark 11:30—56. 3. 1—21.)

26 Jesus answered them, and said, 'Verily, verily, I say unto you, 'Ye seek me, not because ye saw the miracles, but because ye did eat of the loaves, and were filled.

27 *Labor not for the meat which perisheth, but for that meat which endureth unto everlasting life, which the Son of man shall give unto you: for him hath God the Father sealed.

perhaps were so poor, that they had not known for a long time, what it was to have enough. It is probable that, as the miraculous wine was the best wine, so was the miraculous food more than usually pleasant. It cost them nothing: no reckoning was brought in. Note, Many follow Christ for loaves, and not for love. Thus they do, who aim at secular advantage, and follow it, because by this they get preferments. This fable respecting Christ, what a gainful concern we have made of it! said one of the popes: these people complimented Christ with Rabbi, and showed Him respect, yet He told them faithfully of their hypocrisy; his ministers must hence learn not to flatter those that flatter them, nor to be bribed by fair words, but to give faithful reproofs where there is cause for them; nor cry peace to all that cry rabbi to them.

He directs them to better principles; Labor for that meat that endureth to everlasting life. He had discoursed with the woman of Samaria, under the similitude of water; here He speaks of the same things under the similitude of meat, taking occasion from the loaves they had eaten. His design is, to moderate our worldly pursuits; Labor not for the meat that perishes. This does not forbid honest labor for food convenient, 2 Thes. 3: 12. But we must not make the things of this world our chief concern. Note, The things of the world are meat that perishes. Worldly wealth, honor, and pleasure are meat; they feed the fancy, and many times that is all; men hunger after them as meat, and glut themselves; and a carnal heart, as long as they last, may live upon them; but they perish, wither of themselves, and are exposed to a thousand accidents; those that have the largest share of them, are not sure to have them while they live, but are sure to lose them when they die. It is therefore folly for us inordinately to labor after them. First, We must not labor in religion, nor work the works thereof, for this perishing meat; must not make religion subservient to a worldly interest, nor aim at secular advantages in sacred exercises. Secondly, We must not do all labor for this meat; that is, we must not make these things our chief good, nor make our pains about them our chief business; nor seek those things first and most, Prov. 23: 45. To excite our gracious pursuits, 'Bestow your pains to better purpose, and labor for that meat which belongs to the soul.'

This is unspeakably desirable; it endures to everlasting life; it will last as long as we must; not only it endures eternally, but will nourish us to everlasting life. The blessings of the new covenant are our preparative for, our preservative to, and the pledge and earnest of, eternal life.

It is attainable. Shall the treasures of the world be ransacked, and the fruits of the earth gathered together, to furnish us with provision that will last to eternity? No, The sea saith, It is not in me, among all the treasures hid in the sand; it cannot be gotten for gold; but it is that which the Son of man shall give; either which meat, or which life, the Son of man shall give. Observe here, who gives this meat; the Son of man, the great Householder, who is intrusted with the administration of the kingdom of God, and the dispensation of the gifts and comforts of that kingdom, and has power to give eternal life, with all the means of it, and preparations for it. We are bid to labor for it, as if it were to be got by our own industry; as the heathen said, The gods sell all advantages to the industrious. But when we have labored ever so much for it, we have not merited it as our hire, but the Son of man gives it. And what more free than gift? It is an encouragement, that He who has the giving of it, is the Son of man, for then we may hope the sons of men, that labor for it, shall not fail to have it. What authority He has to give it: for He has God the Father sealed; for He has God the Father sealed (and evidenced) to be God; so some read it; He has declared Him to be the Son of God with power. He has sealed Him, given Him authority as God's Ambassador to man, and man's Intercessor with God; and has proved his commission by miracles; having given Him authority, He has given us assurance of it; having intrusted Him with unlimited powers, He has satisfied us with undoubted proofs of them; so that, as He might go on with confidence in his undertaking for us, so may we in our resignations to Him. God the Father sealed Him with the Spirit, by the voice from heaven, by the testimony He bore to Him in signs and wonders. Divine revelation is perfected in Him, in Him the vision and prophecy is sealed up, (Dan. 9: 24.) to Him all believers seal that He is true, (ch. 3: 33.) and in Him they are all sealed, 2 Cor. 1: 22.

V. 23-69. Whether this conference was with the Capernatens, or with those who came from the other side, is not material: it is an instance of condescension, that He gave them leave to ask questions, and did not resent the interruption as an affront, no, not from his common hearers, though not his immediate followers. Those that would be apt to teach, must be swift to hear and study to answer. It is the wisdom of teachers, when they are asked even unprofitable questions, to take occasion to answer that which is profitable.

Christ having told them that they must work for the meat He spoke of, they inquire what work they must do.

Their inquiry was pertinent; What shall we do, that we may work the works of God? Some understand it as a pert question; 'What works of God can we do more and better, than those we do in obedience to the law of Moses?' I rather take it as a humble, serious question, speaking them, at least for the present, willing to know their duty; and I take it that they who asked this question, How and What, (v. 30.) and made that request, (v. 34.) were not the same persons with those that murmured, (v. 41, 42.) and strove, (v. 52.) for those are expressly called the Jews, which came out of Judea (for those were strictly called Jews) to cavil, whereas these were of Galilee, and came to be taught. This question here intimates, that they were convinced, that they who would obtain this everlasting meat, must aim to do something great. They who look high in their expectations, and hope to enjoy the glory of God, must aim high in their endeavors, and study to do the works of God, works which He requires, and will accept of, works of God distinguished from worldly

'Though the miracle of the loaves was one of the most astonishing that ever was wrought upon earth, and though this people had by the testimony of all their senses, the most convincing proof of its reality, yet we find many of them paid little attention to it, and regarded the omnipotent hand of God in it, no farther than it went to satisfy the demands of their appetite! Most men are willing to receive temporal good from the hand of God, but there are few, very few, who are willing to receive spiritual blessings.'

Dr. A. CLARKE.

'The argument of our Lord may be thus expressed: "The manna your fathers ate in the wilderness could only preserve a mortal life. That is the true bread of life, which qualifies every one who eats it for everlasting happiness. I call Myself this Bread, not only on account of my doctrine, which purifies the soul, and fits it for a state of happiness, but also because I shall give my own life to procure the life of the world."

T. H. HORN.

He hath God the Father sealed. 'It was a custom among nations contiguous to Judea, and particularly among the Egyptians, to set a seal on the victim deemed proper for sacrifice. With this custom the Jews could not be unacquainted, and it is possible that similar precautions were in use among themselves, especially as they were so strictly enjoined to have their sacrifices without spot or blemish. To this usage our Lord is here supposed to allude. Infinite justice found Jesus Christ to be without spot or blemish, and therefore, sealed pointed out and accorded Him, as a proper sacrifice and atonement for the sin of the whole world. He 9: 13, 14.'

Id.

(27.) Sealed. 'The only significations of the word thus translated which suit the context, are, 1. To approve, and confirm, as it were by the impress of a seal. So contracts, orders, &c. are sealed. This signification is frequent in the Septuagint. 2. To mark, distinguish. This is found in the purest Greek authors. Nor do these significations materially differ; since the marking of certain persons or things involves also a sort of confirmation, and is a peculiar evidence that the persons or things are the property of such a master. But the latter sense occurs not only more frequently in the New Testament, but it is even used of the sealing of persons, a phrase which seems to have an allusion to slaves or servants, on whom some certain mark, brand, or character was impressed, by means of which they might be distinguished, and the property in them preserved inviolate.'

Lampe, in BLOOMFIELD.

Verse 29.

The submission of the understanding to the teaching of God, of the conscience to his righteousness, and of the heart and will to his method of salvation and to his authority, which are implied in this commandment, render it emphatically an act of obedience. It honors God in all his perfections, more than any other good work can do; and though it does not justify, as a good work, but by receiving Christ for our righteousness, yet without it no other good work can be accepted. So that faith in Christ may especially be called 'the work of God'; and it was that act of obedience, to which the Jews were sealed in order to obtain the blessing of eternal life. 'They who seek to please God without faith, are diligent to no purpose. Should any one apply to a miraculous feeding of Israel in the wilderness before all the miracles Christ wrought; Our fathers did eat manna in the desert; and to strengthen the objection, they quote a Scripture for it; He gave them bread from heaven; (taken from Ps. 78: 24.) He gave them of the corn of heaven. What good use might be made of this story! It was a memorable instance of God's power and goodness, often mentioned to the glory of God; (Neh. 9: 20, 21.) yet see how these people perverted it, and made an ill use of it.

Christ reproved them for their fondness of the miraculous bread, and bid them not set their hearts upon meat which perisheth. 'Why,' say they, 'meat was the great good thing that God gave to our fathers in the desert; and why should not we then labor for that meat? If God made much of them, why should not we be for those that will make much of us?'

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V 22-29. If Jesus were to appear on earth, feeding and healing men by miracle, He would again be followed by admiring multitudes, who might even desire to have Him for their King, in hopes of secular advantages; and indeed many profess his truths and attend on his ordinances, nay, minister in holy things, who seek nothing more than 'the loaves and fishes.' They call Him Rabbi, but will not be taught by Him; speak of Him as their Savior, but do not rely on Him for salvation; they say, 'Lord, Lord, but will not do the things which He says.' And though He exhorts all men 'to labor, not for the meat that perisheth, but for that meat which endureth unto everlasting life,' yet most, even of those 'who profess and call themselves Christians,' labor incessantly, anxiously, and wholly, for perishing vanities, till death convinces them of their folly; others succeed them, and copy the example of their infatuation. (Note, Ps. 49: 13.) But, to rational, immortal souls, nothing is worthy of the chief regard, which will not 'endure unto everlasting life,' and secure the possessor from final misery. 'This enduring portion 'the Son of man' is authorized to bestow on whom He pleases. Let us then direct all our ear-

Christ had fed five thousand men with five loaves, and had given them that as one sign, to prove Him sent of God; but, under color of magnifying the miracles of Moses, they tacitly undervalue that miracle of Christ. Christ fed his thousands; but Moses his hundred thousands; Christ fed them but once, and then reproved those who followed Him in hope to be still fed, and put them off with a discourse of spiritual food; but Moses fed his followers forty years, and miracles were their daily bread; Christ fed them with bread out of the earth, and fishes out of the sea; but Moses fed Israel with bread from heaven, angels' food. Thus boastingly did these Jews talk of the manna which their fathers did eat; but their fathers had slighted it, as much as they did now the barley-loaves, and called it light bread, Num. 21: 5. Thus apt are we to slight the appearances of God's power and grace in our own times, while we pretend to admire the wonders which our fathers told us of. Suppose this miracle of Christ was outdone by that of Moses, yet other miracles of Christ outshone his; and besides, all true miracles prove a divine doctrine, though not equally illustrious; they were diversified according as occasion required. As manna excelled the barley-loaves, much more did the doctrine of Christ excel the law of Moses, and his heavenly institutions the carnal ordinances of that dispensation.

Christ rectifies their mistake concerning the typical manna. It was true, their fathers did eat manna in the desert. But it was not Moses that gave it: he was the instrument and they must look beyond him to God. We do not find that Moses did so much as pray for the manna; and he spake unadvisedly, Must we fetch water out of the rock? Moses gave them not either that bread, or that water. It was not given them, as they imagined, from heaven, but only from the clouds, and therefore not so much excelling that which had its rise from the earth, as they thought. Because the Scripture saith, He gave them bread from heaven, it does not follow that it was heavenly bread, or was intended to nourish souls. Misunderstanding Scripture-language occasions mistakes in the things of God.

He informs them concerning the true Manna, of which that was a type; But my Father giveth you the true Bread from heaven; that which is truly the Bread from heaven, of which that was but a figure, is now given, not to your fathers, who are dead, but to you, for whom the better things were reserved: He is now giving you that Bread from heaven, which is truly so called. As much as the physician, and ask him for what sum of money he would undertake to cure him, and the physician should answer in these words: All the money which I require is, that thou wilt confide in me, and be fully assured, that I seek nothing but thy recovery and established health: who would, from such an answer, conclude, that this confidence was a fact money, which the physician demanded from the sick man, that he might follow his salutary counsels? They are, therefore, evidently ridiculous, who, from this passage, infer that faith is a work, and that we are justified by our works.' Beza.

— Verses 30, 31.

Erasmus, Doddridge and Kuinoel think, that the same persons are not intended by the evangelist as speaking throughout this whole conversation; 'as,' says Kuinoel, 'is evident from v. 31. For those whom Jesus had addressed at v. 36, and who had, with no bad intent, proposed the question, (v. 29.) could not have sought from Him at that time a miracle to prove his Messiahship, (as the persons do at v. 30.) for they had themselves beheld a most remarkable one, and had, on that very account, declared Jesus to be the Messiah. See v. 14. These last were then probably the chief persons of the Jews then present in the synagogue: who, when Jesus had (v. 27) called Himself the Legate and Interpreter of the divine will, required of Him (as did the Pharisees and lawyers, Matt. 12: 38. 16: 1.) a miracle, as a proof of his divine mission. Indeed, their whole language plainly marks their ill will.'

throne of God is above the clouds, so much doth the everlasting Gospel excel the manna. In calling God his Father, He speaks Himself greater than Moses; for Moses was faithful but as a servant, Christ as a Son, Heb. 3:5.

This objection concerning the manna, gave occasion to Christ to discourse of Himself under the similitude of bread, and of believing under the similitude of eating and drinking. Christ is Bread; is that to the soul, which bread is to the body; it is the staff of life. The doctrine of the Gospel concerning Christ; that He is the Mediator, our Peace, our Righteousness, our Redeemer; by these things do men live. Our bodies could better live without food, than our souls without Christ. Bread-corn is bruised; (Isa. 28:28.) so was Christ; He was born at Bethlehem, the house of bread, and typified by the sheaf-bread.

He is the Bread of God, divine Bread; it is He that is of God; (v. 46.) Bread which my Father gives, (v. 32.) which He has made to be the Food of our souls; his children's Bread. The Levitical sacrifices are called the bread of God, (Lev. 21:21, 22.) and Christ is the great Sacrifice; Christ, in his words and ordinances, the Feast upon the sacrifice.

He is the Bread of life, (v. 35. and again, v. 48.) that Bread of life, alluding to the tree of life in the midst of Eden, which was to Adam the seal of that part of the covenant, Do this and live, of which he might eat, and live. Christ is the Fruit of the tree of life.

He is the living Bread; (so He explains Himself, v. 51.) I am the living Bread. Bread is itself a dead thing, and nourishes not but by the help of the faculties of a living body; but Christ is Himself living Bread, and nourishes by his own power. Manna was a dead thing; if kept but one night, it bred worms; but Christ is everliving Bread, that never waxes old. The doctrine of Christ crucified, is now as strengthening and comforting to a believer as ever, and his mediation still of as much value and efficacy as ever. He gives unto the world, (v. 33.) spiritual and eternal life; the life of the soul in communion with God here, and in the fruition of Him hereafter; a life that includes in it all happiness. The manna did not preserve life, much less restore it; but Christ gives life to those that were dead in sin. The manna was ordained only for the Israelites, but Christ is given for the life of the world; none are excluded but such as exclude themselves. Christ came to put life into the minds of men; principles productive of acceptable performances.

He is the Bread which came down from heaven; this is often repeated here, v. 33, 50, 51, 58. This denotes the divinity of Christ's person. As God, He had a being in heaven, whence He came to take our nature upon Him; I came down from heaven; whence we may infer his antiquity, He was in the beginning with God; his ability, for heaven is the firmament of power; and his authority, He came

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 30—35. Blessed be God, that He has given us the 'true Bread from heaven.' May He create in us an appetite for it; that we may intelligently and cordially say, 'Lord, evermore give us this Bread!' But, when we look around us, we see men in general hungering after and feeding on husks or ashes: they 'spend their money for that which is not bread, and their labor for that which satisfieth not.' (Note, Is. 55:1—3.) Some feed on airy speculations, and 'philosophy falsely so called;' some aim to satisfy their minds with gold, fame, or power; some feed on sensual pleasure; and numbers attempt to allay their cravings after happiness, by dissipated mirth, or the pride of life. All these are like 'a hungry man, who dreameth that he eateth, but he awaketh and his soul is empty:' for at length death comes, and their unsatisfied desires prove their eternal tormentors. Nay, many, pretending to religion, take pleasure in superstitions, enthusiasm, notions, forms, controversies, or revilings: these also 'feed upon ashes; a deceived heart hath turned them aside, that they cannot deliver their souls, nor say, Is there not a lie in my right hand?' (Note, Is. 44:19, 20.) But 'the flesh of Christ is meat indeed, and his blood is drink indeed:' here the soul, which hungers and thirsts for righteousness and true felicity, and is made sensible of its wants, finds suitable and abundant provision. Here pardon, hope, communion with God, and whatever can calm the conscience, cheer the heart, or promote holiness, is comprised in one glorious Object, a mighty Redeemer, 'God manifest in the flesh,' shedding his blood to atone for the sins of his rebellious creatures! This is that 'living Bread, which came down from heaven, that we might eat and live forever.' How adorable, how stupendous, is this love of our divine Redeemer! May this 'love of Christ constrain us ... to live no longer to ourselves, but to Him who died for us, and rose again.' (Note, 2 Cor. 5:13—15.)

SCOTT.

Verses 34, 35.

The address is such, that we cannot understand it as used in a deriding manner. 'It is very usual with the sacred writers to represent divine instructions, as the food of the soul; (Ps. 19:10. 119:103. Prov. 9:5. Job 23:12. Jer. 15:16. Heb. 5:12, 14.) yet I can recollect no instance, in which the instructor himself, is called food, or any are said to eat him; much less, in which they are exhorted to 'eat his flesh and drink his blood.' So that Dr. Clarke's criticism on this passage, is far from being satisfactory; and, however clear it may be of any such design, I fear it has misled many to a neglect of that great doctrine, the atonement of Christ, to which there seems in the context so express a reference.' Doddridge. The whole of this discourse has such an inseparable connection with the atonement of our Lord's death, and the life of faith in Him and in that atonement, that, if these subjects be kept out of sight, it is impossible to give any clear and satisfactory exposition of the passage. And this is a most conclusive proof of the doctrine, to all who revere the words of Christ: according to that form of reasoning, which is called reductio ad absurdum;—reducing an opponent to an absurdity, to escape the conclusive 'force of an argument.' (31.) As it is written, &c. Neh. 9:15. Ps. 78:24.

SCOTT.

(34.) Give us, &c.] 'These words seem not said by the same persons who had required a sign, but by others more ignorant, and of the common people: who understood Jesus to speak of corporal aliment.' Kiriakos. Doddridge understands the words as spoken by the wiser and better Jews.

ED.

Verses 36—40.

Our Lord next plainly told the Jews, that though they had seen Him and his miracles, and seemed to be his zealous followers, yet they did not truly believe in Him. But, if they forsook Him, He should not be without disciples; for all 'whom the Father had given Him, would come to Him.' In this, the Father's will, which the Son came down from heaven to perform, perfectly concurs; it is his will, that not one of those 'given to the Son' should be rejected or lost by Him, in life or death; but that every one of them should be raised up to eternal felicity, 'at the last day.' And it is equally his will, that every one, 'who beareth the Son,' who so contemplates his character and work, and discovers the glory and suitableness of his salvation, as to believe in Him, and to trust his soul in his hands, should have everlasting life, notwithstanding all possible hindrances and objections. (Marg. Ref. p.—Notes, 41—46. v. 44, 45. Heb. 6:5—6. v. 65. 10:26—31. 28:29. 17:11, 12. Ps. 40:6—8. v. 80—5—10.) These two views of the divine will, God's secret will concerning those whom He has 'chosen to salvation,' and his revealed will concerning the actual salvation of every believer, are perfectly coincident; for no one will thus to come, till divine grace has subdued, and in part changed his heart, and therefore no one who comes will ever be cast out. When an awakened sinner is willing to come to Christ, if he finds the doctrines of the divine decrees too dazzling for his feeble eyes, he should look off from them to the general invitations and promises of the Gospel; but when he can bear to look at the former, he may find in them the source and reason of his willingness, and be encouraged to hope for the completion of that work which grace has begun in his soul. But let every one beware of blaspheming or perverting these doctrines, which are so evidently contained in Scripture; and which indeed cannot be separated from our ideas of the divine sovereignty and perfections, or from a proper understanding of the entirely free grace of God, in the salvation of his people from their state of sin and death, by regeneration, conversion, faith, justification by grace, and adoption into the family of God. (37.) Give us, &c.] This expression is used by none but our Lord Himself, and only in this chapter (v. 33.) in the twenty-ninth verse of the tenth chapter, and in the seventeenth chapter of this Gospel; so that any diligent inquirer, by comparing the several verses in which it is found, may form a judgment of its real import. 'All that the Father has graciously chosen to Himself, and whom He giveth to Me in consequence of a peculiar covenant, to be sanctified and saved by Me, will certainly at length come unto Me. I have given that sense of this important text, which, on serious, and I hope, impartial consideration, appeared to me most agreeable to the words themselves, and to the general tenor of Scripture.' Mr. Le Clerc's gloss upon them 'appears to me unnatural, and Dr. Whitby's frivolous.' Doddridge. I own myself perfectly unable to understand, what the latter writer means, in his long note on this text; unless he be, that all who believe in Christ will come to Him; I, a all who come will come! Envy keeps some, covetousness others, and love of the praise of men others, from believing. And generally the unbelieving heart is an evil heart, and a reprobate mind, and a hard heart, and a foolish and slow heart. Meanwhile the better dispositions and preparations of the hearts of these here, are to be looked upon, as effects wrought by the preventing grace of God, and in that respect they are said to be drawn by the Father.' Hammond. (Note, 41—46.) It is not meant, that this learned divine maintains the same views with the author. It is well known, that he contends earnestly for the contrary system. Yet he has here, without perhaps being aware of it, expressed himself in language, suited to the views of all sober Calvinists; and has made a concession of too much importance, to be passed over in the argument; a concession, which it will be difficult, for any man, to prove either unscriptural or irrational.

affairs between the great Creator, and the whole creation. When in the world, He did not carry on any private design, nor had any separate interest, distinct from theirs for whom He acted. The scope of his life was to glorify God, and do good to men; He therefore never consulted his own safety, or quiet; but, when He was to lay down his life, though human nature started at it, He set aside the consideration of that, and resolved his will as Man into the will of God; Not as I will, but as Thou wilt.

He here declares the decree, the instructions He was to pursue.

He should be sure to save all the chosen remnant; and this is the covenant of redemption between the Father and the Son; (v. 38.) 'This is the Father's will, who hath sent Me; this is the charge I am intrusted with, that of all which He had given Me, I should lose none.'

Note, There is a certain number given to Christ, to be his care, and so to be to Him for a name and a praise; given Him for an inheritance. Let Him do all for them, which their case requires; teach them, and heal them, pay their debt, and plead their cause, prepare them for, and preserve them to, eternal life. The Father might dispose of them as He pleased; as creatures, their lives and beings were derived from Him; as sinners, they were forfeited to Him; He might, for the satisfaction of his justice, have delivered them to the tormentors; but He pitched upon them to be monuments of his mercy, and delivered them to the Savior. Those whom God chose to be the objects of his special love, He lodged as a trust in the hands of Christ.

Christ has undertaken that He will lose none of those that were thus given Him. The many sons whom He was to bring to glory, shall all be forthcoming, and none of them missing, Matt. 18: 14. None of them shall be lost for want of a price to purchase them, or grace to sanctify them. If I bring him not unto Thee, and so him before Thee, let Me bear the blame forever, Gen. 43: 9.

Christ's undertaking extends to the resurrection of their bodies; I will raise it up again at the last day; this is to crown the undertaking; the body is a part of the man, and therefore a part of Christ's purchase and charge; it per-with a divine commission. He is the divine Original of all that good which flows to us through Him. Not only that came down, (v. 51.) but that comes down; denoting a constant communication from God to believers through Christ, as the manna descended daily; see Eph. 1: 3.

He is that Bread of which the manna was a type and figure, v. 58. As the Rock that they drank of, was Christ, so was the Manna they ate of, spiritual Bread, 1 Cor. 10: 3, 4. Manna was given to Israel; so Christ to the spiritual Israel. There was manna enough for all; so in Christ a fulness of grace for all believers; he that gathers much of this manna, will have none to spare, when he comes to use it; and he that gathers little, when his grace comes to be perfected in glory, shall find, that he has no lack. Manna was to be gathered in the morning; and those that would find Christ, must seek Him early. Manna was sweet, and, as the author of the Wisdom of Solomon tells us, (ch. 16: 20,) was agreeable to every palate; and to them that believe Christ is precious. Israel lived upon manna till they came to Canaan; and Christ is our Life. There was a memorial of the manna preserved in the ark; so of Christ in the Lord's supper, as the Food of souls.

He here shows what was his errand into the world. Laying aside the metaphor, He speaks plainly, and speaks no proverb, giving us an account of his business among men, v. 38-40.

He assures us, in general, that He came from heaven upon his Father's business; (v. 38.) not to do his own will, but the will of Him that sent Him. He came from heaven, which speaks Him an intelligent, active Being, who descended into this world, a great step downward, considering the glories He came from, and the calamities He came to. 'What moved Him to such an expedition?' He tells us He came to do, not his own will, but the will of his Father, not that He had any will that stood in competition with the will of his Father, but they to whom He spake, suspected He might; 'No,' saith He, 'my own will is not the spring I act from, nor the rule I go by, but I am come to do the will of Him that sent Me.' That is, Christ did not come as a private person, that acts for himself only, but as an Ambassador, by a public commission; He came as God's Agent, and the world's Physician. He came to settle tains to the promises, and therefore shall not be lost. The undertaking is not only that He shall lose none, no person, but that He shall lose nothing, no part of the person. Christ's undertaking will never be accomplished till the resurrection, when the souls and bodies of the saints shall be re-united and gathered to Christ that He may present them to the Father; Be hold I and the children that Thou hast given Me, Heb. 2: 13. 2 Tim. 1: 12.

The original of all this, is the sovereign will of God; the counsels of his will, according to which He works all this. This was the commandment He gave his Son, when He sent Him into the world, and to which the Son always had an eye.

Public instructions were to be given to the children of men, in what way, and upon what terms, they might obtain salvation by Christ; and this is the covenant of grace between God and man. Who the particular persons were, that were given to Christ, is a secret; (the Lord knows them that are his; but, though their names are concealed, their characters are published. An offer is made of life and happiness upon gospel-terms, that by it those that were given to Christ might be brought to Him, and others left inexcusable, (v. 40.) 'This is the will, the revealed will, of Him that sent Me; the method agreed upon, on which to proceed with men, that every one, Jew or Gentile, that sees the Son, and believes on Him, may have everlasting life, and I will raise him up.' This is the Gospel, indeed, good news.

Is it not reviving to hear this? Eternal life may be had, if it be not our own fault; whereas upon the sin of the first Adam, the way of the tree of life was blocked up, by the grace of the second Adam it is laid open. The crown of glory is set before us, as the prize of our high calling, which we may run for and obtain. Every one may have it. This Gospel is to be preached, this offer made to all, and none can say, 'It belongs not to me,' Rev. 22: 17. This life is sure to all who believe in Christ, and to them only. He that sees the Son and believes on Him, shall be saved. Some understand this as a limitation of this condition of salvation to those that have the revelation of Christ made to them. Every one that has the opportunity and believes in Him, shall have everlasting life, so that none shall be condemned for unbelief, (however they may be for other sins,) but those who, like these Jews, have seen, and yet have not believed; have known Christ, and yet not trusted in Him. But I rather understand seeing here to mean the same thing with believing, for it signifies not so much the sight of the eye, as the contemplation of the mind. Every one that sees, that is, believes on Him, sees Him with an eye of faith. It is to look upon Him, as the stung Israelites upon the brazen serpent. It is not a blind faith that Christ requires, to have our eyes put out, and then follow Him, but to see Him, and see what ground we go upon in our faith. It is right, when it is not taken up upon hear-say, (believing as the church believes,) but the result of due consideration of, and insight into, the motives of credibility; Now mine eye sees Thee; we have heard Him ourselves. Those who believe in Christ, shall be raised up at the last day. He had it in charge, as his Father's will, (v. 39.) and here He solemnly makes it his own undertaking, I will raise him up, which signifies the putting of the whole man into possession of eternal life.

When his hearers heard of the Bread of God, which gives life, they prayed for it; Lord, evermore give us this Bread. I cannot think that this is spoken in derision, 'Give us such bread as this, if Thou canst; let us be fed with it; not for one meal, as with the five loaves, but evermore!' as if this were no better a prayer

(37.) I will in no wise cast out. 'The original expression here is extremely beautiful and emphatic. It represents an humble suppliant as coming into the house of some prince, or other great person, to assist himself at his feet, and to commit himself to his protection and care. He might fear that his petition might be rejected, and he thrust out of doors; but our Lord assures him to the contrary. His house and heart are large enough to receive, shelter and supply all the indigent and distressed. God only knows, how many thousand souls have been sensibly supported by these gracious words.'

The double negative is expressed in the translation by the words, 'in no wise,' which strengthens the negation. The words imply more than mere exclusion in the first instance: they rather presuppose admission, and imply the idea of subsequent expulsion, which is as expressly guarded against.

42 And they said, ^c Is not this Jesus, the son of Joseph, whose father and mother we know? how is it then that he saith, I came down from heaven?

43 Jesus therefore answered and said unto them, ^d Murmur not among yourselves.

That which offended them was, Christ's asserting his original to be from heaven. How is it that He saith, I came down from heaven? They had heard of angels coming from heaven, but never of a man; overlooking the proofs He had given them of his being more than a man.

That which they thought justified them herein was, they knew his extraction. Is not this Jesus, the son of Joseph, whose father and mother we know? They took it amiss, that He should say that He came from heaven, when He was one of them. They speak slightly of his name, Jesus; Is not this Jesus? They take it for granted that Joseph was really his father, though he was only reputed to be so. Note, Mistakes concerning Christ, as if He were a mere man, occasion the offence that is taken at his doctrine and offices. Those who set Him on a level with the other sons of men, whose father and mother we know, no wonder if they derogate from the honor of his satisfaction, and the mysteries of his undertaking, and, like the Jews here, murmur at his promise to raise us up at the last day.

Christ, having spoken of faith as the great work of God, shows what it is to believe in Christ.

To believe in Christ, is to come to Christ; he that comes to Me, is the same with him that believes in Me; (v. 35. and v. 37.) so v. 44, 45. Repentance toward God is coming to Him, (Jer. 3: 22.) as our chief God and highest End; so faith towards Christ is coming to Him as our Savior, and our Way to the Father. It denotes the outgoings of our affection toward Him; it is to come off from all things that stand in opposition to Him, or competition with Him, and to come up to his terms of salvation. When He was on earth, it was more than barely coming where He was; so it is now, more than coming to his Word and ordinances.

It is to feed upon Christ; (v. 51.) If any man eat of this Bread; the former denotes applying to Christ, this denotes applying Christ to ourselves, with appetite, that we may receive life and strength from Him. To feed on Him as the Israelites on the manna, having quitted the flesh-pots of Egypt, and living purely on the bread given them from heaven.

than that of the impatient thief, If Thou be the Christ, save Thyself and us. But I take this request, though ignorantly made, yet to be well meant; for they call Him Lord, and desire a share in what He gives, whatever He means by it. Confused notions of divine things produce in carnal hearts some kind of desires toward them; like Balaam's wish, to die the death of the righteous. Those who see the things of God, as trees walking, make, as I may call them, inarticulate prayers for spiritual blessings. They think the favor of God a good thing, and heaven a fine place, while they have no value or desire for that holiness, which is necessary both to the one and to the other. Let this be the desire of our souls; have we tasted that the Lord is gracious, been feasted with the Word of God, and Christ in the Word; let us say, 'Lord, evermore give us this bread; let the Bread of life be our daily Bread, the heavenly Manna our continual Feast.'

But when they understood, that by this Bread of life Jesus meant Himself, they despised it. Whether they were the same persons that had prayed for it, or some others, does not appear: it seems to be some others, for they are called Jews. It is said, (v. 41.) They murmured at Him. This comes in immediately after the declaration which Christ had made of God's will, and his own undertaking, which certainly were some of his most weighty and gracious words, the most faithful, and worthy of all acceptance; one would think that, like Israel in Egypt, when they heard that God had thus visited them, they should have bowed their heads, and worshipped; but, on the contrary, they murmured, quarrelled with what Christ said; and though they did not openly contradict it, they privately whisped in contempt of it, and instilled into one another's minds prejudices against it. Many that will not professedly contradict the doctrine of Christ, (their cavils are so weak and groundless, that they are either ashamed to own them, or are afraid to have them silenced,) yet say in their heart, They do not like it.

That which offended them was, Christ's ascent into heaven. How is it that He saith, I came down instead of up, and heard of angels coming from heaven, but never of His coming down? If He had given them of his being more than a

(v. 51.) If any man eat of this Bread; the Christ, this denotes applying Christ to ourselves, receive life and strength from Him. To feed on manna, having quitted the flesh-pots of Egypt, and given them from heaven.

He shows what is to be got by believing in Christ. What shall we be the better, if we feed upon Him? Want and death are the chief things we dread; may we be but assured of the comforts of our being, and the continuance of it, we have enough; now those two are here secured to true believers.

They shall never want, never hunger, never thirst, v. 35. Desires they have, but these so abundantly satisfied, that they cannot be called uneasy and painful. Those that did eat manna and drank of the rock, hungered and thirsted afterwards. Manna surfeited them, water out of the rock failed them, but there is such overflowing fulness in Christ as can never be exhausted, and such overflowing communications as can never be interrupted.

They shall never die eternally; for, he that believes on Christ, has everlasting life, (v. 47.) he has the assurance of it, the earnest of it; the promise and first-fruits. Union with Christ and communion with God in Christ, are everlasting life begun. Whereas they that did eat manna died, Christ is such Bread as a man may eat of, and never die, v. 49, 50.

Your fathers did eat manna in the wilderness, and are dead. Much good use may be made of the death of our fathers; their graves speak to us, and their monuments are our memorials, particularly of this, that the greatest plenty of the most dainty food will neither prolong life, nor put by the stroke of death. Those that did eat manna, died like other men. There could be nothing amiss in their diet, to shorten their days, nor could their deaths be hastened by the toils and fatigues of life; (for they neither sowed nor reaped;) and yet they died. Many of them died by the immediate stroke of God's vengeance for their unbelief and murmurings; for, though they did eat that spiritual meat, yet with many of them God was not well pleased, but they were overthrown in the wilderness, 1 Cor. 10: 3-5. Their manna was no security to them from the wrath of God, as believing in Christ is to us. The rest of them died in a course of nature, and their carcasses fell, under a divine sentence, in that wilderness where they did eat manna. In that very age when miracles were daily bred, was the life of man reduced to its present measure, as appears, Ps. 90: 10. Let them not boast so much of manna then.

This is the Bread that cometh down from heaven, truly divine Food; a man may eat thereof, and not die; not fall under the wrath of God; not die the second death; no, nor the first death irrecoverably; not perish, nor come short of the heavenly Canaan, as the Israelites did of the earthly, for want of faith, though they had manna.

This is further explained in the next words, If any man eat of this bread, he shall live forever, v. 53. Though he go down to death, he shall pass through it to that world where there shall be no more death. To live forever, is not to be forever, (the damned in hell shall be forever,) but to be happy forever. And because the body must needs die, and be as water spilt upon the ground, Christ here undertakes to gather it up, and even that shall live forever.

Christ here speaks of some who had seen Him, and yet believed not, v. 36. They saw his miracles, heard Him preach, and yet did not believe in Him. Faith is not always the effect of sight; the soldiers were eye-witnesses of his resurrection, and yet, instead of believing in Him, belied Him; so that it is a difficult thing to bring people to believe in Christ: and by the they empty-handed, He will in no wise cast them out. But more favor is implied than is expressed; when it is said that He will not cast them out, the meaning is, He will receive and entertain them, and give them all that which they come to Him for. As He will not refuse them at their first coming, so He will not afterward, upon every displeasure, cast them out. His gifts and callings are without repentance.

2. The Father will, without fail, bring all to Him in due time, that were given Him. In the transactions between the Father and the Son, relating to man's redemption, as the Son undertook for the justification, sanctification, and salvation of all that should come to Him, so the Father, the Fountain and Original of being, life, and grace, undertook to put into his hand all that were given Him.

He here assures us that this shall be done; (v. 37.) All that the Father giveth Me, shall come to Me. Christ had complained (v. 36.) of those, who, though they had seen Him, would not believe; and then He adds this, [1.] For their conviction and awakening, plainly intimating that their not believing on Him, if they persisted in it, would be a certain sign that they did not belong to the election of grace; for how can we think that God gave us to Christ, if we give ourselves to the flesh? 2 Pet. 1:10. [2.] For his own comfort and encouragement; Though Israel be not gathered, yet shall I be glorious. The election has obtained, and shall, though multitudes be blinded, Rom. 11:7. Though He lose many of his creatures, yet none of his charge; All that the Father giveth Him, shall come to Him, notwithstanding.

All that the Father giveth Me—every thing which the Father giveth to Me; the persons of the elect, and all that belongs to them; their services, their interests; as all that He has, is theirs, so all that they have, is his; they were given Him in recompense of his undertaking. Not only all persons, but all things, are gathered together in Christ, (Eph. 1:10.) and reconciled, Col. 1:20. The giving of the chosen remnant to Christ is spoken of, (v. 39.) as a thing done; He hath given them; here it is spoken of as a thing in the doing, He giveth them; because, when the First-begotten was brought into the world, it would seem, there was a renewal of the grant; see Heb. 10:5, 8c. God was now about to give Him the heathen, for his inheritance, (Ps. 2:8.) to put Him in possession of the desolate heritages, (Isa. 49:8.) to divide Him a portion with the great, Isa. 53:12. And though the Jews, who saw Him, believe not on Him, yet these (saith He) shall come to Me; the other sheep, which are not of this fold, shall be brought, ch. 10:15. See Acts 13:45-48.

They shall come to Me. This is a prediction, that as many as were in the counsel of God ordained to life, shall be brought to life by being brought to Christ. They are scattered among the nations, yet none of them shall be forgotten; not a grain of God's corn shall be lost, Amos 9:9. They are by nature alienated from Christ, yet they shall come. As God's omniscience is engaged to find them out, so is his omnipotence to bring them in. Not, They shall be driven to Me, but, They shall be made willing.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 36-46. Unhumbled sinners cannot understand spiritual things; (Note, 1 Cor. 2:14-16.) and therefore either object and decide, or rest in outward forms, instead of 'the power of godliness.' He alone who made the provision for our souls, can effectually teach these mysteries, and 'draw us' unto Christ that we may live by faith in Him. 'All that the Father giveth' to the Son, will be thus taught, and will come to Him; and He will surely receive and keep them, and 'raise them up at the last day.' When therefore sinners are convinced of their need of Christ and his salvation, and that they cannot believe in Him, except by the teaching and drawing of the Father; let them attend to his Word, and pray for his

Two things are to be done in order to it.

Their understandings shall be enlightened. It is written in the prophets, who speak of these things before, And they shall be all taught of God; Isa. 54:13, and Jer. 41:34. They shall all know Me. Note, In order to our believing in Christ, it is necessary that we be taught of God; that is, that there be a divine revelation made to us, of what we are to believe concerning Christ, and why we are to believe it. There are some things which even nature teaches, but to bring us to Christ there is need of a higher light. Secondly, That there be a divine work wrought in us, enabling us to receive these truths, and the evidence of them. God, in giving us reason, teaches us more than the benefits of the earth; but in giving us faith, teaches us more than the natural man. Thus all the church's children, that are genuine, are taught of God; He hath undertaken their education.

It follows, that every man that has heard and learned of the Father, comes to Christ, v. 45. It is here implied that none will come to Christ, but those that have learned of the Father. We shall never be brought to Christ, except God by his grace enlighten our minds, inform our judgments, and rectify our mistakes; and not only tell us, but teach us, the truth as it is in Jesus. This divine teaching does so necessarily produce the faith of God's elect, we may conclude that those who do not come to Christ, have never learned of the Father, or doubtless they would have come to Christ. God teaches no other lesson, Gal. 1:8, 9. God deals with men as reasonable creatures, draws them with the cords of a man, opens the understanding, and then by that influences the inferior faculties; thus He comes in 'by the door, but Satan, as a robber, climbs up another way.'

But lest any should dream of a visible appearance of God the Father to men, He adds, (v. 46.) Not that any man hath seen the Father; or can see Him, with bodily eyes, or learn of Him as Moses did, face to face; but in a spiritual way. The Father of spirits hath access to men's spirits, undiscerned. Those that have not seen his face, have felt his power. Yet there is one intimately acquainted with the Father; He who is of God, Christ Himself, hath seen the Father, ch. 1:18. Note, Jesus Christ is of God in a peculiar manner. God, of God, Light of Light; not only sent of God, but begotten of God before all worlds. It is the prerogative of Christ to have seen the Father, perfectly to know Him and his counsels. Even that illumination which is preparative to faith, is conveyed to us through Christ. Those that learn of the Father, so far as they cannot see Him themselves, must learn of Christ, who alone hath seen Him. As all divine discoveries are made through Christ, so through Him all divine powers are exerted.

Their will shall be moved. If the soul of man had its original rectitude, there needed no more to influence the will, than the illumination of the understanding; but in the soul of fallen man there is a rebellion of the will against the right dictates of the understanding; a corrupt mind, enmity itself to the divine light and law; it is therefore requisite that there be a work of grace wrought upon the will, which is here called drawing; No man can come to me, except

Spirit, and in this way expect his blessing on their souls. For every one, who willingly comes to Christ, will be made welcome, and will on no account whatever be cast out. He has spoken the word, and will make it good: it is his will, and 'the will of the Father who sent Him,' and it cannot be invalidated. Let sinners then apply with confidence; 'let the hearts of them rejoice who seek the Lord,' let them be thankful that they have discovered their danger and remedy; and let them seek further instruction, that they may enjoy the comfort, and bring forth the fruits, of 'the life of faith' in the incarnate Son of God; and so expect 'the last day,' in joyful assurance of a resurrection unto eternal life and glory.

Verses 47-51.

The Jews had insinuated, that feeding a few thousands with the five loaves was an inconsiderable thing, when compared with what Moses did, when he fed the whole camp of Israel; but our Lord here

'declares the purposes of his grace and bounty to be far more extensive, as reaching to the whole world, and giving immortal life to all that should believe in Him.'

50 This is 'the Bread which cometh down from heaven, 'that a man may eat thereof, and not die.

53 Then Jesus said unto them, 'Verily, verily, I say unto you, 'Except ye 'eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you.

bring them to Him, and so give Him possession of those to whom He had given Him a right. God, having by promise given the kingdom of Israel to David, did at length draw the hearts of the people to Him; so having sent Christ to save souls, He sends souls to Him to be saved.

Fourthly, The crown and perfection of this work; and I will raise him up at the last day. This is four times mentioned in this discourse, and doubtless it includes all the intermediate and preparatory work of grace. When He raises them up at the last day, He will bring forth the top-stone. If He undertake this, surely He can and will, do every thing, that is necessary in order to it. Let our expectations be towards a happiness reserved for the last day, when all the years of time shall be ended.

Christ, having thus spoken of Himself as the Bread of life, and of faith as the work of God, shows what of Himself is this Bread, namely, his flesh; and that to believe, is to eat of it.

the Father, who hath sent Me, draw him. The Jews murmured at the doctrine of Christ; not only would not receive it themselves, but were angry that others did; Christ overheard their whisperings, and said, 'Murmur not among yourselves; lay not the fault of your dislike of my doctrine one upon another, as if it is because you find it generally distasteful; it is owing to your own corrupt dispositions, which amount to a moral impotency; your antipathies to the truths of God and prejudices against them are so strong, that nothing less than divine power can conquer them.' This is the case of all mankind; 'No man can persuade himself to come up to the terms of the Gospel, except the Father, who hath sent Me, draw him.'

Observe, First, The nature of the work; it is drawing; which speaks not a force put upon the will, but a change wrought in it, and a new bias given to the soul, by which it inclines to God. This seems to be more than moral suasion, for that is in the power of man; yet it is not a physical impulse, for it lies out of the road of nature; but He that formed a spirit of man within Him, and fashions the hearts of men by his influence, knows how to new-mould the soul, and alter its bent and temper, without doing any wrong to its natural liberty. It is such a drawing as works not only a compliance, but a cheerful compliance; Draw us, and we will run after thee.

Secondly, The necessity of it; no man, in this weak and helpless state, can come to Christ without it. As we cannot do any natural action without the concurrence of common providence, so we cannot do any action, morally good, without the influence of special grace, in which the new man lives, and moves, and has its being, as much as the mere man has in divine providence.

Thirdly, The Author of it; the Father, who hath sent Me. The Father, having sent Christ, will succeed Him; for He would not send Him on a fruitless errand. Christ having undertaken to bring souls to glory, God promised to

The bread that I will give is my flesh; (v. 51.) the flesh of the Son of man, and his blood, v. 53. His flesh is meat indeed, and his blood is drink indeed, v. 55.

We must eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood, (v. 53.) and again, (v. 54.) Whoso eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood: and the same words, (v. 56, 57.) he that eateth Me. This is certainly a parable, or figurative discourse, wherein the actings of the soul upon things spiritual, are represented by bodily actions, which made the truths of Christ more intelligible to some, and less so to others, M. v. 4: 12.

This discourse of Christ was liable to misconstruction, that men might see, and not perceive.

It was misconstrued by the Jews, to whom it was first delivered; v. 52. They strove among themselves; they whispered in dissatisfaction; How can this man give us his flesh to eat? Christ spake of giving his flesh for us, to suffer and die; but they, without due consideration, understood it of his giving it to us, to be eaten; which gave occasion to Christ to tell them, that, however what He said was 'otherwise intended, yet even eating his flesh was no such absurd thing (if rightly understood.)

The church of Rome, by its monstrous doctrine of transubstantiation, gives the lie to our senses, contradicts the nature of a sacrament, and overthrows all convincing evidence. They, like these Jews, understand it of a corporal and carnal eating of Christ's body, like Nicodemus, ch. 3: 4. The Lord's supper was not yet instituted, and therefore it could have no reference to that; it is a spiritual eating and drinking that is here spoken of, not a sacramental.

It is misunderstood by many ignorant, carnal people, who infer that, if they take the sacrament when they die, they shall certainly go to heaven; which, as it makes many that are weak causelessly uneasy if they want it, so it makes many that are wicked causelessly easy if they have it. Let us see therefore,

What is meant by the flesh and blood of Christ. It is called, (v. 53.) The flesh of the Son of man, and his blood, his as Messiah and Mediator; which He assumed in his incarnation, (Heb. 2: 14.) and which He gave up in his death and sufferings; my flesh which I will give to be crucified and slain. It is said to be given for the life of the world, that is, instead of the life of the world, which was forfeited by sin. Christ was our Bail, and therefore his life n. 23 go for ours, that ours may be spared. Here am I, let these go their way. [2.] In order to the life of the world, to purchase a general offer of eternal life to all the world, and the special (51.) 'From the rabbinical illustrations of Lightfoot, it is plain that the metaphors employed in this discourse must have been familiar to most of the hearers, as being in frequent use among the Jewish doctors. I need only instance the following example: "Every mention of eating and drinking found in Ecclesiastes, is said of the law and good works."'

BLOOMFIELD.

Verses 52-58.

The Lord's supper was not at this time instituted: and can any one seriously think, that every man continues 'dead in sin,' and under condemnation, till he has received that sacrament? (which would absolutely and without exception, exclude from salvation all who lived previously to its institution, all infants and young persons dying at that age, and an immense majority of adult professed Christians;) or imagine, that Christ dwells in, and will save, all those who partake of that ordinance, however hypocritical? No doubt, it is the general duty of all real Christians, frequently to commemorate the death of Christ at his table; but this is merely the 'outward sign' of the blessing here intended; and those who rest in it will have only the shadow of salvation. It is also remarkable, that the church, which of all others has most exalted, and even idolized, the Lord's supper, has refused the cup, the emblem of 'the blood of Christ,' to the laity; as if they would not allow them to have even the sign of salvation! Our Lord, however, must be supposed to refer to that sacred ordinance, which He intended to appoint, as the 'memorial of his body broken and his blood shed, for the life of our souls.' and as the outward sign of the manner, in which we 'feed on Him in our hearts by faith with thanksgiving;' as a public profession of our inwardly receiving his atonement, and as a pledge to all true believers of everlasting life. (Note, Matt. 26: 26-29.) Those who suppose, that our Lord meant merely 'the sacramental eating of his flesh and blood;' whether they graft on this construction, transubstantiation, consubstantiation, or any blessing inseparably connected with the act of receiving, independent of the faith or unbelief of the receiver, doubtless pervert the words of Christ, to establish idolatry, superstition, formality, and self-righteousness.

(52.) [Strive.] 'On this dispute, it may be observed, that the principal versets, from their better education, had probably found no [670] difficulty in the metaphors employed by Jesus; they and understood them figuratively, and in the sense intended by Christ. But since they held Him in contempt, rejected his pretensions, and could not bring themselves to believe that the Messiah would die; (see ch. 2: 34.) some, in derision, misrepresented his words, took them in the literal sense, and pronounced them absurd. Others maintained that they had some sense, but were arrogant, and deserving nought but rejection. Wherefore, Jesus seeing that He was sufficiently understood, and that it was not comprehension, but candor, which they needed, was pleased not to enter into any further explanation, but (as before, at r. 44.) gravely repeats, with stronger asseveration, what He had before said.

ROSENK. and KUINOEL.

(53.) 'However you may ensure it as unintelligible and absurd, yet verily, verily, I say unto you, there is no truth more certain, or more important to you; for unless by a cordial dependence on the atonement I shall make, and by the powerful influences of divine grace upon your hearts, you eat, as it were, the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood, you have no principle of spiritual life in you, and can have no claim to heaven. These words, Eat the flesh, &c. express a lively and habitual regard to Christ, as the great author of the spiritual life. The mention of his blood naturally leads to the thought of his atonement, as we are told, We have redemption through his blood, Eph. 1: 7. Heb. 10: 19.'

* DODDRIDGE.

Except ye eat the flesh, &c.] This figurative mode of speech was naturally suggested by the occasion. The multitude had followed Christ for the sake of the loaves, expecting to be fed again, as they had been the day preceding, and being disappointed, they affect to despise the miracle, and extol Moses for having wrought a greater, in bringing bread from heaven. Our Lord then asserts his own superiority, invites them to eat, not such temporary, perishable food as the manna, but the true, living, that is, everlasting, bread from heaven, describing under that name, belief in Him, and obedience to his doctrine, as being spiritual food and nourishment to the soul. And this is the meaning of this strong figure which is contained through this whole discourse; but the conceptions of the Jews were too gross to understand it in a true sense.

delights of nature. [4.] A derivation of nourishment from Him, and a dependence upon Him for the support and comfort of our spiritual life, and the growth and vigor of the new man. To feed upon Christ is to do all in union with Him, and by virtue drawn from Him; it is to live upon Him as we do upon our meat. How our bodies are nourished by our food, we cannot describe, but that they are, we know; so with this spiritual nourishment. Our Savior was so well pleased with this metaphor, (as very expressive,) that, when afterward He instituted some outward sensible signs, by which to repreassurances of it to believers. So that the flesh and blood of the Son of man denote the Redeemer incarnate and dying; Christ and Him crucified, and redemption by Him, with all the benefits of redemption; pardon of sin, acceptance with God, adoption, access to the throne of grace, promises, and eternal life; these are called the flesh and blood of Christ. They are purchased by the breaking of his body, and the shedding of his blood. Well may the purchased privileges be denominated from the price that was paid for them, for it puts a value upon them; write upon them the price of blood. They are meat and drink to our souls. Flesh with the blood was prohibited; (Gen. 9: 4.) but the privileges of the Gospel are as flesh and blood to us, for the nourishment of our souls. He had before compared Himself to bread, which is necessary food; here to flesh, which is delicious. It is a feast of fat things, Isa. 25: 6. The soul is satisfied as with marrow and fatness, Ps. 63: 5. It is meat indeed and drink indeed; truly so, that is, spiritually; Christ is called the true Vine, or truly Meat, in opposition to the shadows with which the world shams those that feed upon it. In Christ and his Gospel is solid satisfaction; that is meat indeed, and drink indeed, which satiates and replenishes, Jer. 31: 25, 26.

What is meant by eating this flesh, and drinking this blood? It is certain that it means believing in Christ. As we partake of meat and drink by eating and drinking, so we partake of Christ and his benefits by faith: and believing in Christ includes these four things, which eating and drinking do. [1.] It implies an appetite to Christ, hungering and thirsting, (Matt. 5: 6.) earnest and importunate, not willing to take up with any thing short of an interest in Him; 'Give me Christ, or else I die.' [2.] An application of Christ to ourselves. Meat looked upon will not nourish us, but meat fed upon, and so made our own, and one with us. We must so accept of Christ as to appropriate Him to ourselves; my Lord and my God, ch. 20: 28. [3.] A delight in Christ and his salvation. The doctrine of Christ crucified must be meat and drink to us, most pleasant and delightful. We must take as great a complacency in the methods which infinite wisdom has taken to redeem and save us, as ever we did in the most needful supplies or grateful sent our communicating of the benefits of his death. He chose those of eating and drinking and made them sacramental actions.

Except ye eat of the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you. That is, 'It is a certain sign that you have no spiritual life in you, if you have no desire toward Christ, nor delight in Him.' If the soul does not hunger and thirst, it does not live; it is a sign that we are dead indeed, if we are dead to such meat and drink as this. 'It is certain that you can have no spiritual life, unless you derive it from Christ by faith; separated from Him you can do nothing.' Faith in Christ is the first living principle of grace; without it we have not the truth of spiritual life, nor any title to eternal life; our bodies may as well live without meat, as our souls without Christ.

The benefit and advantage of it are in two things.

1. We shall be one with Christ, as our bodies are with our food; (v. 56.) He that eats my flesh, and drinks my blood, or lives by faith in Christ crucified, (it is spoken of as a continued act,) dwelleth in Me, and I in him. By faith we have intimate union with Christ; He is in us, and we in Him, ch. 17: 21-23. 1 John 4: 21. Believers dwell in Christ as their strong hold or city of refuge; Christ dwells in them as the Master of the house, to rule it, and provide for it. Such is the union between Christ and believers, that He shares in their griefs, and they share in his graces and joys; He sups with them upon their bitter herbs, and they with Him upon his rich dainties. It is an inseparable union, Rom. 8: 35. 1 John 4: 13.

2. We shall live, eternally, by Him, as our bodies live by our food. As the living Father hath sent Me, and I live by the Father, so he that eateth Me, even he shall live by Me. God, as the living Father, hath life in and of himself. I am that I am, is his name forever. Jesus Christ, as Mediator, lives by the Father; He has life in Himself, (ch. 5: 26.) but He has it of the Father; He that sent Him, not only qualified Him with that life which was necessary to so great an undertaking, but constituted Him the Treasury of divine life to us; he breathed into the second Adam the breath of spiritual lives, as into the first Adam the breath of natural lives. True believers receive this divine life by virtue of their union with Christ, which is inferred from the union between the Father and the Son, as it is compared to it, ch. 17: 21. He that eateth Me, or feeds on Me, even he shall live by Me; those that live upon Christ, shall live by Him. The life of believers is had from Christ; (ch. 1: 16.) it is hail with Christ; (Col. 3: 4.) we live by Him as the

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 47-59. The Jews could not, at the time when the Lord spake to them, know his meaning; but we may know how Jesus can 'give us his flesh to eat.' The humble believer can rest in no outward emblem; but, through the sacramental bread and wine, sees the body and blood of Christ, as truly appropriated by the faith of all acceptable communicants, for every saving purpose. He is convinced, that 'except he eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood,' he has no spiritual life, nor any good hope of eternal life; and therefore his great fear is, lest he should be deceived in a matter of such importance. He is often ready to faint and be weary, through inward conflicts and outward troubles: but by again receiving Christ, as the Life and Salvation of his soul, he finds his hopes revive, his fears vanish, his strength return, and his graces invigorated; and thus he feeds daily on Christ, and proceeds in his work and warfare with patient alacrity. He finds, that meditation on the cross of Christ, and the glorious truths connected with it, give life and vigor to his repentance, faith, love, and gratitude; his heart is thus weaned from the world, and fixed on heavenly things; he is enabled to rejoice in the Lord; he 'dwells in Christ, and Christ in him,' and he learns to live by his Savior, in some measure as He lived by the Father that sent Him, and to his glory. This is the Christian's life: in proportion as he thus lives upon Christ, and thirsts and applies for the blessings procured for us by his blood, he copies more and more closely his example, and obeys his commandments, and may rejoice, under all trials, and at the approach of death, 'in the hope of the glory of God.' (Notes, Rom. 5: 3-11. Gal. 2: 17-21. 6: 11-14, v. 14. 1 Pet. 4: 1, 2.)

SCOTT.

(58.) He that eateth of this bread shall live forever. 'All that are saved owe their salvation to the atonement of Christ, and their partaking thereof, which is feeding upon his flesh and blood, is their life. Our Lord's general doctrine in this chapter seems to resolve itself into this, that, whether in the sacraments or out of the sacraments, whether before Christ or since, whether here or hereafter, no man ever was or will be accepted, but in and through the grand propitiation made by the death and blood of Christ. This appears to be the main doctrine taught by our Lord in this chapter, which He delivers so earnestly, and inculcates so strongly. Eating and drinking, by a very common figure, means receiving; and here what is the thing to be received? Christ Himself in his whole person; I am the bread of life, he that eateth Me, even he shall live by Me. But more particularly, He is to be considered as giving us his body to be broken, and his blood to be shed for our atonement. His passion is our redemption, and by his death we live. It is right to apply the general doctrine of this chapter to the particular case of the Lord's supper, because the spiritual feeding here mentioned is the thing signified and effected in the Lord's supper; but such application does not amount to interpreting this chapter of the holy sacrament. For examples, the words, Except ye eat the flesh, &c.—ye have no life in you, do not mean directly, ye have no life without the Lord's supper, but, ye have no life without participating in our Lord's passion. Nevertheless, since the Lord's supper is one way of participating in his passion, and a very important one, (a memorial of, or showing forth his death) it is very pertinent and proper, to urge the doctrine of this chapter, both for the clearer understanding of the beneficial nature of the Lord's supper, and for exciting Christians to a frequent and devout reception of it. Such is the use which some of the early fathers made of this chapter, and which the church very justly makes of it at this day.'

63 It is the Spirit that quickeneth; the flesh profiteth nothing; the words that I speak unto you, they are spirit, and they are life.

them. (2.) They think it impossible that any one else should like it; 'Who can hear it? Surely none.' Thus scoffers at religion are ready to undertake that all the intelligent part of mankind concur with them; they conclude with great assurance that no man of sense will admit the doctrine of Christ, nor any man of spirit submit to his laws; because they cannot bear to be so tied up themselves, they think none else can; 'Who can hear it? Thanks be to God, thousands have heard these sayings of Christ, and have found them not only easy, but pleasant, as their necessary food.'

Christ knew their murmurings, v. 61. Their cavils were secret in their own breasts, or whispered among themselves in a corner. Note, Christ takes notice not only of the bold and open defiance that are done to his name by daring sinners, but of the secret slights that are put upon his doctrine by carnal professors; He knows what the fool saith in his heart, and cannot for shame speak out; He observes how his doctrine is received by those to whom it is preached; who rejoice in it, and who murmur at it; who are reconciled to it, and how before it, and who quarrel with it, and rebel against it, though secretly. He knew it in Himself; not by information given Him, or any external indication of the thing, but by his own divine omniscience. He knew it, not by the prophets, by divine revelation, (that which the prophets desired to know was sometimes hid from them, as 2 Kings 4: 27.) but by a divine knowledge in Him. He is that essential Word that discerns the thoughts of the heart, Heb. 4: 12, 13. Thoughts are words to Christ; we should therefore take heed not only what we say and do, but what we think.

He knew how to answer them; 'Doth this offend you? Is this a stumbling-block to you? People by their wilful mistakes create offences to themselves; they take offence where there is none given, and make it where there is nothing to make it of. Note, We may justly wonder that so much offence should be taken at the doctrine of Christ, for so little cause. Christ speaks of it here with wonder: 'Doth this offend you? How unreasonable are your quarrels.' In answer to those who condemned his doctrine as obscure, (saying, -If you are unwilling to be understood, you ought to be neglected,) He gives them a hint of his ascension into heaven, as that which would give irresistible evidence of the truth of his doctrine; What and if ye shall see the Son of man ascend up where He was before? 'If I should tell you of members by the head, the branches by the root; because He lives, we shall live also. We shall live eternally by Him; Whoso eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood, hath eternal life; He hath it now, as v. 40. He hath that in Him, which is eternal life begun; the earnest and foretaste of it, and the hope of it; He shall live forever, v. 54. His happiness shall run parallel with eternity.

The historian concludes with an account where Christ had this discourse with the Jews, (v. 59.) In the synagogue as He taught; implying that He taught them many other things beside these, but this was new. He adds this, that He said these things in the synagogue, to show, [1.] The credit of Christ's doctrine. His truths sought no corners, but were publicly preached, as able to abide the most severe test. Christ pleaded this upon his trial; (ch. 18: 20.) I coar taught in the synagogue. [2.] To assure you that the discourse was fairly represented, He appeals to the synagogue at Capernaum, where it might be examined.

V. 60-71. By Christ's discourse, some were offended, and others edified, some driven from Him, and others brought nearer to Him.

To some it was a savor of death unto death; not only to the Jews, who were enemies to Him and his doctrine, but even to many of such as were disciples at large, who were his frequent hearers, and followed Him in public; a mixed multitude, like those among Israel, that began all the discontents.

Not a few, but many of them were offended. Of the grounds that received the seed, only one in four brought forth fruit. See what they say to it; 'This is a hard saying, who can hear it? They do not like it themselves. 'What is this? Eat the flesh and drink the blood of the Son of man! If it be understood figuratively, it is not intelligible; if literally, not practicable. What! must we turn cannibals? Can we not be religious, but we must be barbarous?' Said Averroes, -If Christians adore what they eat, my mind shall continue with the philosophers. If they had humbly begged Christ to declare unto them this parable, He would have opened it, and their understandings too, for the meek will He teach his way; but they were not willing to have Christ's sayings explained, because they would not lose this pretence for rejecting that, it would much more offend you, and you would think my pretensions too high indeed. If this be so hard a saying, how will I digest it when I tell you of my returning to heaven? See ch. 3: 12. Those who stumble at smaller difficulties, should consider how they will get over greater. This will much more offend you, for then my body will be less capable of being eaten by you in that gross sense wherein you now understand it; so Dr. Whitty. Or, 'When you see that, or hear it from those that shall see it, surely then you will be satisfied. You think I take too much upon Me, when I say, I came down from heaven; for that you quarrelled with; (v. 42.) but will you think so when you see Me return to heaven? If He ascended, certainly He descended, Eph. 4: 9, 10. Christ did often refer Himself thus to subsequent proofs, as ch. 1: 50, 51. 2: 14. Matt. 12: 40. 26: 64. Let us wait, till the mystery of God shall be finished, and then we shall see that there was no reason to be offended at any of Christ's sayings.

He gives them a key to this, and all such discourses, teaching them that they are to be understood spiritually; It is the spirit that quickens, the flesh profiteth nothing. As in the natural body, the animal spirits quicken and enliven, and without these the most nourishing food would profit nothing; (what would the body be the better for bread, if it were not quickened and animated by the spirit?) so with the soul. The bare participation of ordinances, unless the Spirit of God work with them, and quicken the soul by them, profits nothing; the word and ordinances, if the Spirit work with them, are as food to a living man, if not, they are as food to a dead man. Even the flesh of Christ, the Sacrifice for sin, will avail us nothing, unless the Spirit quicken our souls by the influences of his death, till we by his grace are planted together in the likeness of it. The doctrine of eating Christ's flesh, and drinking his blood, if it be understood literally, profits nothing, but rather leads us into mistakes and prejudices; but the spiritual sense and meaning of it quicken the soul, make it alive and lively; so it follows, The words that I speak unto you, they are spirit, and they are life. To eat the flesh of Christ is a hard saying, but to believe that Christ died for me, and to derive from that doctrine strength and comfort in my approaches to God, opposition of sin, and preparations for a future state; this is the spirit and life of that saying. The reason why men mistake Christ's sayings is, they mistake them. The literal sense of a parable does us no good, but the spiritual meaning is instructive. The flesh, that is, those that are in the flesh, (so some understand it,) profit nothing by Christ's discourses; but the Spirit, that is, those that are spiritual, are quickened and enlivened by them; for they are received, so as to correspond with the state of the receiver's mind. They found fault with Christ's sayings, whereas the fault was in themselves; it is only to sensual minds that spiritual things are senseless and sapless; spiritual minds relish them; see 1 Cor. 2: 14, 15.

He gives them an intimation, that He had expected no better from them, though they called themselves his disciples, v. 64, 65. Now was fulfilled Isa. 53: 1. Who hath believed our report, and to whom is the arm of the Lord revealed?

They did not believe his report; 'There are some of you, who say you would leave all to follow Me, who yet believe not; and this was the reason why the word preached did not profit them, it was not mixed with faith, Heb. 4: 2. They did not believe Him to be the Messiah, else they had acquiesced in the doctrine He preached, and not have quarrelled with it, though there were some things in it dark and hard to be understood. Young beginners in learning must take things upon their teacher's see cause to change our sentiments of them: but this we are sure of, that Christ knows all men, and his judgment is according to truth.

The reason why they did not believe his report was, the arm of the Lord was not revealed unto them; (v. 65.) Therefore said I unto you, No man can come to Me, except it were given unto him of my Father; referring to v. 44. Christ could not but know who believed, and who did not, because faith is the gift of God; and all his Father's gifts and works passed through his hands. There He said that none could come to Him, except the Father draw him; here He saith, Except it were given him of my Father: which shows that God draws souls by giving them a heart to come; without which, such is the moral in potency of man in his fallen state that he cannot come.

From that time many of his disciples went back, and walked no more with Him. When we at mit into our minds had thoughts of Christ, conceive a secret dislike, and be willing to hear insinuations tending to reproach, we are then entering into temptation; it is as the letting forth of water, it is looking back, which if infinite mercy prevent not, will end in drawing back; therefore take heed of the beginnings of apostasy.

Many of them went back to their houses and callings, which they had left for a time to follow Him; went back, one to his farm, and another to his merchandise; went back, as Orpah did, to their people, and to their gods, Ruth 1: 15. They had entered themselves in Christ's school, but they did not only play truant for once, but took leave of Him, and his doctrine forever. Note, The apostasy of Christ's disciples from Him, though really a strange thing, yet has been such a common thing, that we need not think strange of it. Here were many that went back. It is often so; when some backslide, they take occasion with them; the disease is infectious.

The occasion of this backsliding; from that time, when Christ preached that He is the Bread of life, and that those who by faith feed upon Him, shall live by Him, which, one would think, should have engaged them to cleave more closely to Him; from that time they withdrew. Note, The heart of man often makes that an occasion of offence, which is matter of the greatest comfort. Christ foresaw that they would take offence at what He said, and yet He said it. That which is the undoubted word and truth of Christ, must be faithfully delivered, whoever are offended at it. Men's humors must be capitulated to God's Word, and not that accommodated to men's humors.

The degree of their apostasy; They walked no more with Him, returned no more to Him, and attended no more upon his ministry. It is hard for those who have been once enlightened, and have tasted the good Word of God, if they fall away, to renew them again to repentance, Heb. 6: 4-6.

This discourse was to others a savor of life unto life. Many went back, but, thanks be to God, not all: even then the twelve stuck to Him. Though the faith of some be overthrown, the foundation of God stands sure. Observe the affectionate question which Christ put to the twelve; (v. 67.) Will ye also go away? He saith nothing to them who went back. If the unbelieving depart, let them depart; it was no great loss of those whom He never had; light come, might go; but He takes this occasion to speak to the twelve, to confirm them, and, by trying their steadfastness, the more to fix them. Will ye also go away? (1.) 'It is at your choice whether ye will or no; if ye will forsake Me now is the time when so many do: it is an hour of temptation; if you will go back, go now.' Note, Christ will detain none against their wills; his soldiers are volunteers, not pressed men. The twelve had had time to try how they liked Christ and his doctrine, and, that none of them might afterward say that they were trapped into discipleship, and, if it were to do again, they would not do it. He here leaves them at their liberty; as Josh. 24: 15. Ruth 1: 16. (2.) 'It is at your peril, if you do go away.' 'Think not that ye may go away as easily as they can. They have not been so intimate with Me, nor received so many favors from Me; they are gone, but will ye go? Remember your character, and say, Whatever others do, we will never go away. Should such a man as I flee?' Neh. 6: 11. Note, The nearer we have been to Christ, and the longer we have been with Him, the more mercies we have received from Him, and the more engagements we have laid ourselves under to Him, the greater will be our sin if we desert Him. (3.) 'I have reason to think you will not. Will ye go away? No, I have faster hold of you; I hope better things of you; (Heb. 6: 9.) for ye are they that have continued with Me,' Luke 22: 32. When the apostasy of some is a grief to us Lord Jesus, the constancy of others is so much the more his honor, and He is pleased with it accordingly. Christ and believers know one another too well to part upon every displeasure.

Christ put the question to them, as Joshua put Israel to their choice whom they should serve, with design to draw out from them a promise to adhere to him; and it had the like effect. Nay, but we will serve the Lord. Peter was upon all occasions the mouth of the rest, not so much because he had more of his Master's ear than they, but because he had more tongue of his own; and what he said was sometimes approved, and sometimes reprimanded; (Matt. 16: 17, 23.) the common lot of those who are swift to speak. This was here said admirably well, and, probably, by the direction, and with the express assent of his fellow-disciples; at least, he knew their mind, and spake the sense of them all, and did not except Judas, for we must hope the best.

Here is a good resolution to adhere to Christ, and expressed so as to intimate that they would not entertain the least thought of leaving Him; 'Lord, to whom shall we go? It were folly, unless we knew where to mend ourselves; we like our choice too well to change.' Note, Those who leave Christ, would do well to consider to whom they will go, and whether they can expect to find rest and peace any where but in Him. See Ps. 73: 27, 28. Hos. 2: 9. 'Whither shall we go? Shall we make our court to the world? It will certainly deceive us. Shall we return to sin? It will certainly destroy us. Shall we leave the Fountain of living waters for broken cisterns?' The disciples resolve to continue their pursuit of life and happiness, and will have a Guide to it, and will adhere to Christ as their Guide, for they can never have a better. 'Shall we go to the heathen philosophers? They are become vain in their imaginations, and professing themselves to be wise in other things, are become fools in religion. Shall we go to the scribes and Pharisees? They have made void the commandments of God by others fastened upon the hard sayings, and therefore forsook Him. Though we cannot account for every mystery in Christ's doctrine, we know, in the general, that it is the Word of eternal life, and therefore must live and die by it: for if we forsake Christ, we forsake our own mercies.

Therefore said I unto you.] 'For this reason I told you, (v. 44.) That no man can come unto Me, except it be given him of my Father, because I know that the prejudices of corrupt nature lie strongly against such a doctrine as I publish, and that nothing but divine grace will subdue them. Except it be given him of my Father—to be drawn by the Father, and to have faith given him by the Father, are evidently synonymous terms which plainly vindicates the interpretation given above.'

'Sinners hate the doctrine contained in the two preceding verses. They see how it throws them into the hands of God. It is because they see it in a light that disturbs their sins and their hopes, that they hate it, and oppose it when it is preached. This was the case when it was preached by our Savior. On one occasion, when He preached it with great clearness and power, many of them who had for a considerable time followed Him, went back, and walked no more with Him.'

We know, and are sure, that Thou art that Christ. If He be the promised Messiah, He must bring in an everlasting righteousness, (Dan. 9:24.) and therefore has the words of eternal life, for righteousness reigns to eternal life, Rom. 5:21. Observe, First, The doctrine they believed; that this Jesus was the Messiah promised to the fathers, and expected by them, and that He was not a mere man, but the Son of the living God, Thou art my Son, Ps. 2:7. In times of temptation to apostasy, it is good to have recourse to our first principles, and if we faithfully abide by that which is past dispute, we shall be the better able both to find and to keep the truth in doubtful matters. Secondly, Their faith rose to a full assurance; We are sure. We have known it by experience; the best knowledge. We should take occasion from others' wavering to be so much the more established, especially in that which is the present truth. When we have so strong a faith in the Gospel of Christ, as boldly to venture our souls upon it, knowing whom we have believed, then, and not till then, we shall be willing to venture every thing else for it.

The melancholy remark which our Lord Jesus made upon this reply of Peter; Have not I chosen you twelve, and one of you is a devil? And the evangelist tells us whom He meant; He spake of Judas Iscariot. Peter had undertaken for them all, that they would be true to their Master. Now Christ does not condemn his charity, (it is always good to hope the best,) but tacitly corrects his confidence. We must not be too sure concerning any. God knows them that are his, we do not. Observe here, Hypocrites and betrayers of Christ are no better than devils. Judas not only had a devil, but he was a devil. One of you is a false accuser: so it sometimes signifies; (1 Tim. 3:11.) and it is probable that Judas, when their traditions. Shall we go to Moses? He will send us back to Thee. Therefore, if ever we find the way to happiness, it must be in following Thee.' Note, Christ's religion appears to great advantage, when compared with other institutions, for then it will be seen how far it excels them all. Let them who find fault with this religion, before they quit it, find a better. A divine Teacher we must have; can we find a better than Christ? A divine revelation we cannot be without; if the Scripture be not such, where else may we look for it?

Here is a good reason for this resolution. Thou hast the words of eternal life. They did not fully understand Christ's discourse, for as yet the doctrine of the cross was a riddle to them; but in the general, they were satisfied that He had the words of eternal life, that is, First, That the word of his doctrine showed the way to eternal life, and directed us what to do, that we might inherit it. Secondly, That the word of his doom and determination must confer eternal life. His having the words of eternal life, is the same with his having power to give eternal life to as many as were given Him, ch. 17:2. He had in the foregoing discourse assured eternal life to his followers; these disciples fastened upon that saying, and therefore resolved to stick to Him, when the he sold his Master to the chief priests, represented Him to them as a bad man, to justify himself in what he did. But I rather take it as we read it, he is a devil incarnate; a fallen apostle, as the devil a fallen angel. He is Satan, an adversary, an enemy to Christ. He is Abaddon, and Apollyon, a son of perdition. He was of his father the devil, and his lusts, was in his interests; as Cain, 1 John 3:12. Those whose bodies were possessed by the devil, are never called devils, but demoniacs; but Judas, into whose heart Satan entered, and filled it, is called a devil.

Many that are seeming saints, are real devils. Judas had as fair an outside as many of the apostles; his venom was, like that of the serpent, covered with a fine skin. He cast out devils, and appeared an enemy to the devil a kingdom, and yet himself a devil all the while. Not only he will be one shortly, but is one now. It is strange, and to be wondered at: Christ speaks of it with wonder: Have not I? It is sad, and to be lamented, that ever Christianity should be made a cloak to diabolism.

The disguises of hypocrites, however they may deceive men, cannot deceive Christ. He can call those devils, that call themselves Christians, like the prophet's greeting to Jeroboam's wife, when she came to him in disguise; (1 Kings 14:6.) Come in, thou wife of Jeroboam. Christ's divine sight, far better than any double sight, can see spirits.

There are those who are chosen by Christ to special services, who yet prove false to Him; I have chosen you to the apostleship, for it is expressly said, Judas was not chosen to eternal life, (ch. 13:18.) and yet one of you is a devil. Note, Advancement to places of honor and trust in the church, is no certain evidence of saving grace. We have prophesied in thy name.

In the most select societies on this side heaven, it is no new thing to meet with those that are corrupt. Of the twelve that were chosen to an intimate conversation with an incarnate Devil, as great an honor and privilege as ever men were chosen to, one was an incarnate devil. The historian lays an emphasis upon this, that Judas was one of the twelve that were so dignified and distinguished. Let us not therefore reject and unchurch the twelve, because one of them is a devil, nor say that they are all cheats and hypocrites, because one of them was so; let those that are so, hear the blame, and not those who, while they are undiscovered, incorporate with them. There is a society within the veil, into which no unclean thing shall enter; a church of first-born, in which are no false brethren.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 60-71. Many, who are called disciples, dispute the words of Christ: many attend to the general doctrines of the Gospel; but when ministers apply them to their consciences and experience, are ready to exclaim, 'It is a hard saying, who can hear it?' They form gross conceptions of spiritual things, and argue against their own mistakes and misrepresentations: so that those preachers, who imitate their Master, need not wonder, if their faithful doctrine drives away numbers who for a time seemed zealously attached to them. We must, however, speak the words of Christ, 'which are spirit and life,' and not like the dead notions of moralists and speculators: (Notes, Jer. 23. 28, 29. Matt. 7. 28, 29. Heb. 4: 12, 13.) and we must leave it to Him, to 'quicken whom He will' by His Spirit, and to determine who are, and who are not, true believers.—Our main business is with ourselves: when many turn back, and walk no more with Christ. He seems to say to us, 'Will ye go away also?' But the truly broken-hearted, who can rest satisfied with nothing short of eternal life, will answer, 'Lord, to whom shall I go?' Even when discouraged, and harassed with doubts and fears, he still knows it is vain to think of returning to the world, of seeking salvation by 'the works of the law,' of resting in forms and notions, or of going after false teachers; and still believes, and desires to be fully assured, that Jesus has 'the words of eternal life.' This faith, in its feeblest exercise, is essentially different from that of the most specious hypocrite, who ever followed the steps of the traitor Judas: such are often near to Christ in external profession and office, yet like Satan in the temper of their hearts and secret conduct, but they are known and will be detected by the heart-searching Judge, however they may impose upon their brethren. May we then be now searched and proved by Him; may our hearts be made sound in his statutes; as those, whom He has chosen unto salvation, through sanctification of the Spirit unto obedience, and the belief of his truth.' (Notes, Ps. 119: 80. 139: 23, 24. 2 Thes. 2: 13, 14.)

Devil.] 'Rather, a disaffected person, a betrayer. So also Anthony, Bloomfield. A spy. Campbell Hostile. Kuinoel. According to Mr Locke, our Lord intimates that this was the reason why He had not more plainly declared Himself to be the Messiah, because He knew Judas would have accused Him of rebellion against the Romans. (For the word translated devil does sometimes signify a false accuser; see 1 Tim. 3: 11. 2 Tim. 3: 3. and Tit. 2: 3.) But I can see no proof that Judas from the beginning, intended to betray Christ. It is more probable, he at first engaged with Him in expectation of secular advantage; and finding those views disappointed, he might now begin to form that detestable scheme which he afterwards executed. If this was the occasion, (as I think probable) one would imagine that such an intimation of his secret wickedness must have struck him to the heart.'

CHAP. VII.

Jesus, when counselled by a unbelieving brethren to shew Himself at Jerusalem at the feast of tabernacles, assigning his reason, refuses to accompany them; but afterwards goes up privately, 1-10. The Jews seek Him, and form different opinions of Him, 11-43. He teaches in the temple; declares that his doctrine is of God, and answers objections, 44-52. Some seek to take Him; others believe; and the Pharisees send officers to apprehend Him, 50-52. He foretells his departure to the Father, when the Jews would in vain seek Him, 53-54. He invites those who are thirsty, to come to Him and drink; referring to the Holy Spirit, which would be given to believers, 37-39. Divergent opinions of Him, 40-44. certain, (but they were such as pretended to have an interest in Him,) interposed to advise Him in Him to make a more public appearance, 'Depart hence, and go into Judea, where Thou wilt make a better figure than here.' Two reasons they give for this advice.

(1.) It would encourage those in and about Jerusalem, who had a respect for Him; for expecting his temporal kingdom, the royal seat of which they concluded must be at Jerusalem, they would have disciples there particularly countenanced, and thought the time wasted, and his miracles turning to no account, unless they at Jerusalem saw them. Or, 'that thy disciples, all of them in general, who will be gathered at Jerusalem to keep the feast, may see thy works, and not, as here, a few at one time, and a few at another.'

(2.) That it would be for the advancing of his own name; There is no man that does any thing in secret, if he himself seeks to be known openly. They take it for granted, that Christ sought to make Himself known, and therefore thought it absurd for Him to conceal his miracles; 'If Thou do these things, if Thou be so well able to gain applause by thy miracles, venture abroad, and shew Thyself to the world.' Supported by these, Thou canst not fail of acceptance; therefore it is time to set up for an interest, and think of being great.

Now one would not think there were any harm in this, yet the evangelist notes it as an evidence of their infidelity, for neither did his brethren believe in Him; (p. 5.) if they had, they would not have said this. Observe, [1.] To be of the kindred of Christ, was no saving honor; they that hear his Word, and keep it, are the kindred He values. Grace runs in no blood in the world, if not in that of Christ's family. [2.] It was a sign that Christ did not aim at CHAP. VII. v. 1-13. I. The reason given why Christ spent more of his time in Galilee than in Judea was, the Jews, the people in Judea and Jerusalem, sought to kill Him, for curing the impotent man on the sabbath-day, ch. 5: 17. They thought either of a popular tumult, or a legal prosecution; in consideration of this, He kept at a distance, very much out of the lines of Jerusalem's communication. It is not said, He durst not, but, He would not walk in Jewry; it was not through fear, but in prudence, because his hour was not yet come.

Note, 1. Gospel-light is justly taken away from those that endeavor to blow it out. Christ will withdraw from those that drive Him from them, and hide his face from those that spit in it, and justly shut up his bowels from those that spurn at him. In times of imminent peril, it is not only allowable, but advisable, to withdraw for safety, and to choose service in those places which are least perilous, Matt. 16: 23. Then, and not till then, we are called to expose our lives, when we cannot save them without sin. 2. If the providence of God casts persons of merit into places of obscurity, it must not be thought strange; it was the lot of our Master Himself; He who was fit to have sat in the highest of Moses' seats, willingly walked in Galilee among ordinary people. Observe, He did not sit still in Galilee, nor bury Himself alive there, but walked; went about doing good. When we cannot do what and where we would, we must do what and where we can.

II. The feast of tabernacles was one of the three solemnities which called all the males to Jerusalem. (See Lev. 23: 34, &c. and the revival of it after a long disuse, Neh. 8: 14.) It was intended to be a memorial of the tabernacle-state of Israel in the wilderness, and a figure of the tabernacle-state of God's spiritual Israel in this world. This feast, instituted so many hundred years before, was still religiously observed. Note, Divine institutions are never antiquated, nor go out of date; nor must wilderness-mercies ever be forgotten. But it is called the Jews' feast, because it was now shortly to be abolished, as a mere Jewish thing, and left to them that served the tabernacle.

III. Christ's brethren, or his kindred, whether his mother or his supposed father, is not mentioned to have an interest in Him,) his conduct. Observe their ambition in urging Him to make a more public appearance, 'Depart hence, and go into Judea, where Thou wilt make a better figure than here.' Two reasons they give for this advice.

(1.) It would encourage those in and about Jerusalem, who had a respect for Him; for expecting his temporal kingdom, the royal seat of which they concluded must be at Jerusalem, they would have disciples there particularly countenanced, and thought the time wasted, and his miracles turning to no account, unless they at Jerusalem saw them. Or, 'that thy disciples, all of them in general, who will be gathered at Jerusalem to keep the feast, may see thy works, and not, as here, a few at one time, and a few at another.'

Now one would not think there were any harm in this, yet the evangelist notes it as an evidence of their infidelity, for neither did his brethren believe in Him; (p. 5.) if they had, they would not have said this. Observe, [1.] To be of the kindred of Christ, was no saving honor; they that hear his Word, and keep it, are the kindred He values. Grace runs in no blood in the world, if not in that of Christ's family. [2.] It was a sign that Christ did not aim at any secular interest, for then his kindred would have struck in with Him, and He would have secured them first. [3.] There were those who were akin to Christ according to the flesh, who did believe in Him, (three of the twelve were his brethren,) and yet others, as nearly allied to Him as they, did not believe on Him. Many that have the same advantages, do not make the same use of them.

But what was there amiss in this advice? 1. It was presumption for them to prescribe to Christ; it was a sign that they did not believe Him able to guide them, when they did not think Him sufficient to guide Himself. 2. They discovered a great carelessness of his safety, when they would have Him go where they knew the Jews sought to kill Him. They that believed in Him, and loved Him, dissuaded Him from Judea, ch. 11: 8. 3. Some think they hoped that if his miracles were wrought at Jerusalem, the rulers would try them, and discover some cheat in them, which would justify their unbelief. So Dr. Whitby. 4. Perhaps they were weary of his company in Galilee, (for are not all these that speak, Galileans?) and this was, in effect, a desire that He would depart out of their coasts. 5. They causelessly insinuate that He neglected his disciples, and denied them such a sight of his works as was necessary to the support of their faith. 6. They tacitly reproach Him as mean-spirited, that He durst not enter the lists with great men, nor trust Himself upon the stage of public action, which, if He had any thing of courage and a great soul He would do; thus Christ's humility, and the small figure which his religion has usually made in the world, have often been turned to the reproach of Him and it. 7. They seem to question the truth of the miracles He wrought. If they will bear the test of a public scrutiny in the courts above, produce them there. 8. They think Christ altogether such as themselves, subject as they to the politics of the world, and as desirous to make a fair show in the flesh; whereas He sought not honor from men. 9. Self was at the bottom of all; they hoped, if He would make Himself as great as He might, they, being his kinsmen, should share in his honor, and have respect paid them for his sake. Note, 1. Many go to public ordinances, worship at the feast, only to show themselves, and all their care is to make a good appearance to the world. 2. Many that seem to seek Christ's honor, do really seek their own, and make it serve a turn for themselves.

The prudence and humility of our Lord appeared in his answer to the advice his brethren gave Him. Though there were many base insinuations in it, He answered them mildly. Note, Even that which is said without reason, should be answered without passion; we should learn of our Master to reply with meekness even to that which is most impertinent and impertinent; and where it is easy to find much amiss, to seem not to see it, and wink at the affront.

They expected Christ's company with them to the feast, perhaps hoping He would bear their charges.

He shows the difference between Himself and them, in two things.

[1.] His time was set, not theirs. My time is not yet come, but your time is always ready. It was an indifferent thing to them when they went, for they had nothing of moment to do, to God for the fruits of the vine, as well as of other trees, which were gathered about this time, and also to implore his blessing upon those of the ensuing year.

Verse 3.

His brethren.] The Hebrews gave the name of brethren to all the relatives of a particular family. See Gen. 31: 32, 46. Ed.

It is astonishing that these near relatives of Christ, who must have had so many opportunities of seeing the glories both of his character and miracles, (which last they here expressly acknowledge,) should continue in unbelief. But they unhappily laid it down as a first principle, that the Messiah must be a temporal Prince; and finding this mark of his mission wanting, and seeing (more strongly than others) not so intimately conversant with Him could do) his mission to be such a scheme, they would yield to no other proofs, and are, I fear, or the fatal list of those who perished, as thousands now do, by opposing hypothesis to fact.

NOTES.

CHAP. VII. v. 1. 'For the narration of the remarkable, various and important discourses spoken by our Lord in this his fifth journey, we are solely indebted to John, who has dwelt so much more upon it than the other evangelists, and has used so much the greater diligence in describing it; since it was, beyond all the rest, suited to his purpose, and exhibited the clearest indication how anxiously Jesus, in the days of his flesh, sought to convince the Jews of the sublime excellence and supreme dignity of his person and office.'

evil had He done? Had He, like Alexander, under color of conquering it, laid it waste? 'I testify of it, that the works of it are evil.' Note, First, The works of an evil world are evil works; as the tree is, so are the fruits; it is a dark world, and apostate, and its works works of darkness and rebellion. Secondly, Our Lord Jesus, by Himself and by his ministers, did and will discover and testify against the evil works of this wicked world. Thirdly, It is a great provocation to the world to be convicted of the evil of its works. It is for the honor of piety, that those who are impious and vicious, do not care for hearing of it, for their own consciences make them ashamed for the turpitude, and afraid of the punishment of sin. Fourthly, Whatever is pretended, the real cause of the world's enmity to the Gospel is, the testimony it bears against sinners. Christ's witnesses torment them that dwell on the earth, and therefore are treated barbarously, Rev. 11: 10. But it is better to incur the world's hatred by testifying against its wickedness, than gain its good will by going down the stream with it.

He dismissed them with a design to stay behind in Galilee; (v. 8.) Go ye up to this feast, I go not up yet. [1.] He allows their going to the feast, though carnal and hypocritical. Note, even those who go not to holy ordinances with right affections and intentions, must not be discouraged from going; who knows but they may be wrought upon there? [2.] He denies them his company, because they were carnal and hypocritical. Those who go to ordinances for ostentation, for some secular purpose, go without Christ. How sad the condition of that man, though he reckon himself akin to Christ, to whom He saith, 'Go hear the Word, go receive the sacrament, and I go not up with thee. Go thou and appear before God, but I will not appear for thee,' as Exod. 33: 1, 3. But if the presence of Christ go not with us, to what purpose should we go up? Go ye up, I go not up. When we are going to, and coming from, ordinances, it concerns us to be careful what company we have, less the coal of good affections be quenched by corrupt communication. He does not say, I will not go up at all, but not yet. There may be reason for deferring a particular duty, which yet must not be wholly omitted. See Num. 9: 11. The reason is, My time is not yet full come. Note, Our Lord Jesus is very exact in knowing and keeping his time, either where they were, to detain them there, or where they were going, to hasten them thither; but every minute of Christ's time was precious, and its own business allotted to it. He had some work to be done in Galilee; in the Harmony of the Gospels, betwixt this motion by his kindred and his going up to this feast, comes in his sending forth his seventy disciples; (Luke 10: 1, &c.) his time is not yet, for that must be done first. Those who live useless lives have their time always ready, they can come and go when they please; but those whose time is filled up with duty, will often find themselves straitened, and they have not yet time for that which others can do at any time. Those who are made the servants of God, as all men are, and have made themselves the servants of all, as useful men have, must not expect to be masters of their own time. The confinement of business is a thousand times better than the liberty of idleness. Or, it may be meant of the time of his appearing at Jerusalem; Christ knew that the best time for it would be about the middle of the feast. We, who are short-sighted, are apt to prescribe to Him, and to think He should deliver his people, and show Himself now, just now; the present time is our time, but He is fittest to judge; it may be, his time is not yet come; his people are not yet ready for deliverance, nor his enemies ripe for ruin; let us therefore wait with patience for his time, for all He doeth will be most glorious in its season.

[2.] His life was sought, not theirs, v. 7. They, in showing themselves to the world, did not expose themselves; 'The world cannot hate you, for ye are of the world, and in with its interests; the world will love its own.' Unholy souls, whom the holy God cannot love, the world in wickedness cannot hate; but He, in showing Himself to the world, laid Himself open to danger; for Me it hateth. Christ was not only sought, (the world knew Him not,) but hated, as if He had been hurtful; thus was He requited for his love to the world: reigning sin is a rooted antipathy and enmity to Christ.

But why did the world hate Christ? What had He done? Had He, like Alexander, under color of conquering it, laid it waste? 'I testify of it, that the works of it are evil.' Note, First, The works of an evil world are evil works; as the tree is, so are the fruits; it is a dark world, and apostate, and its works works of darkness and rebellion. Secondly, Our Lord Jesus, by Himself and by his ministers, did and will discover and testify against the evil works of this wicked world. Thirdly, It is a great provocation to the world to be convicted of the evil of its works. But it is better to incur the world's hatred by testifying against its wickedness, than gain its good will by going down the stream with it.

Note, even those who go not to holy ordinances with right affections and intentions, must not be discouraged from going; who knows but they may be wrought upon there? Verse 4.

'They seem to have said, "It is too little to employ Thyself in working in Galilee, in the country, and in small villages, among an ignorant, and credulous people, from whom Thou canst not get much credit; go to Jerusalem, the capital, and among the learned doctors, in the presence of the whole nation assembled at this feast, work thy miracles, and get Thyself a name."'

Verse 7.

To the world. (8: 23, 26. 9: 39. 15: 18, 19. 17: 6, 9, 11, 14.) In these, and many other places, 'the world' especially means, unholy professed worshippers of God, and in particular marks out the chief priests, scribes, and Pharisees. And are not nominal Christians, of the and as it was the time fixed, so it was the best time.

He, saying these things to them, abode still in Galilee; for, (1.) He would not be influenced by those who advised Him to seek honor from men, nor go along with them; He would not seem to countenance the temptation. (2.) He would not depart from his own purpose. He had said, upon a clear foresight, that He would not go up yet, and therefore abode still in Galilee. It becomes the followers of Christ thus to be steady, and not to use lightness.

1. He would not go up with his brethren, lest they should make a noise and disturbance, under pretence of showing Him to the world; whereas it agreed both with the predication and with his spirit, not to strive or cry or let his voice be heard in the streets, Iss. 42: 2. But He went up after them. We may join in religious worship with those whom yet we should decline an intimate acquaintance with; for the blessing of ordinances depends upon the grace of God, and not upon the grace of our fellow-worshippers. His carnal brethren went up first, and then He went. Note, In the performances of religion, it is possible that formal hypocrites may get the start of those that are sincere. Many come first to the temple, who are brought thither by vain glory, and go thence unjustified, as Luke 10: 10. It is not who comes first, that will be the question, but, Who comes fittest? If we bring our hearts with us, it is no matter who gets before us.

(2.) How He went; as if He were hiding Himself; not openly, but as it were in secret, rather for fear of giving offence, than of receiving injury. He went, because it was an opportunity of honoring God and doing good; but in secret, because He would not provoke the government. Note, Provided the work of God be done effectually, it is best done when done with least noise. The kingdom of God needs not come with observation, Luke 17: 20. We may do the work of God privately, and yet not do it deceitfully.

There was great expectation of Him at Jerusalem, v. 11—13. Having formerly come to the feasts, and signalized Himself by miracles, He had made Himself the subject of much discourse.

The Jews sought Him at the feast, and said, Where is He? [1.] The common people longed to see Him, that they might have their curiosity gratified with the sight of his person and miracles. They did not think it worth while to go to Him into Galilee, though, if they had, they would not have lost their labor, but they hope the feast will bring Him to Jerusalem. If an opportunity of acquaintance with Christ come to their door, they like it well enough. They sought Him at the feast. When we attend upon God in his holy ordinances, we should seek Christ in them. Those who would see Christ at a feast, must seek Him there. Or, [2.] Perhaps it was his enemies waiting an opportunity to seize Him, and, if possible, stop his progress. They said, Where is He? Where is that fellow? Thus scornfully do they speak of Him. Or it intimates how full their hearts were with thoughts of Him, and their town with talk of Him; they needed not name Him. When they should have welcomed the feast as an opportunity of serving God, they were glad of it as an opportunity of persecuting Christ. Thus Saul hoped to slay David at the new moon, 1 Sam. 20: 27. Those who seek opportunity to sin in solemn assemblies for religious worship, profane God's ordinances to the last degree, and defy Him upon his own same character, 'the world,' at this day, as much as either Jews, Gentiles, or Mohammedans? SCOTT.

'By this verse is meant a sort of universal hatred, such as that encountered by Christ, and for a long time by the Christians; and merely to be attributed to the delivering of doctrines and precepts which will not square with the inclinations of most men.' GROTIIUS. 'You have no reason to fear any injury or assault, as the world can not hate you, because it is on principles of carnal wisdom that you act and so exhibit nothing that may draw upon you any particular opposition; but Me it hates, not on account of any ill action I have committed, but because, from zeal for truth, and a desire of its reformation, I leave my testimony concerning it, that its deeds are evil.' DODGE.

10 But when his brethren were gone up, *then went he also up unto the feast, ^{not} openly, but as it were in secret.

[Practical Observations.]

11 Then *the Jews sought him at the feast, and said, Where is he?

12 And there was much *murmuring among the people concerning him: for *some said, He 'is a good man: others said, Nay; but he *deceiveth the people.

13 Howbeit, no man *spake openly of him, for fear of the Jews.

14 ¶ Now about *the midst of the feast, Jesus went up into *the temple and taught.

Others said, Nay, but He deceiveth the people; if that had been true, He had been a very bad man. The doctrine He preached, was sound; his miracles real; his conversation manifestly holy and good; and yet it must be taken for granted, notwithstanding, that there is some cheat at the bottom, because it is the interest of the chief priests to run Him down. Such murmuring as there was among the Jews concerning Christ, there is still among us: the Socinians say, He is a good Man, and further they say not; the Deists will not allow this, but say, He deceived the people. Thus some diminish Him; others abuse Him, but great is the truth.

They were frightened by their superiors from speaking much of Him; (v. 13.) No man spake openly of Him, for fear of the Jews. Either, First, They durst not openly speak well of Him. Because nothing could justly be said against Him, they would not suffer any thing to be said of Him. It was a crime to name Him. The Gospel is the same to the plain and to the polite. That which is observable here is, ■ was about the middle of the feast; the fourth or fifth day of the eight.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-10. No external evidences can overcome the obstruction of the human heart, or secure the sinner's conversion: we need not then be disconcerted by the opposition of our relations, when we remember that the brethren of Jesus 'did not believe in Him.'—Worldly men commonly judge of others by themselves; and so ascribe their most unexceptionable actions to ostentation, or some selfish motive; knowing that their own most specious conduct springs from no higher principles. They often attempt to give friendly counsel to those who are employed in the service of God: yet they can only propose such things, as apparently conduce to their present advantage, and really tend to their injury. (Note, 1 Kings 22: 13, 14.) But the spiritual man sees a variety of reasons for his conduct, and for the time and manner of his proceedings, of which others ground; it is like striking within the verge of the court.

The people differed much in their sentiments concerning Him; There was much murmuring among the people concerning Him. The enmity of the rulers against Christ, and their inquiries after Him, made Him so much the more talked of among the people. This the Gospel of Christ has got by opposition, it has been more inquired into; and by being every where spoken against, has come to be every where spoken of, and by that means has been spread the further, and the merits of his cause have been the more searched into. This murmuring was not against Christ, but concerning Him; some murmured at the rulers, because they did not encourage Him; others, because they did not silence Him. Some murmured that He had so great an interest in Galilee; others, that He had so little in Jerusalem. Note, Christ and his religion have been, and will be, the subject of much controversy, Luke 12: 51, 52. If all would agree to entertain Christ as they ought, there would be perfect peace; but when some receive the light, and others resolve against it, there will be murmuring. The bones in the valley, while they were dead and dry, lay quiet; but when it was said unto them, Live, there was a noise and a shaking, Ezek. 37: 7. But the noise and encounter of liberty and business are preferable, surely, to the silence and agreement of a prison.

The sentiments of the people concerning Him.

Some said, He is a good Man. This was a truth, but far short of being the whole truth. He was not only a good Man, He was the Son of God. Many who have no ill thoughts of Christ, have yet low thoughts of Him, and scarcely honor Him, even when they speak well of Him, because they do not say enough; yet indeed it was his honor, and the reproach of those who persecuted Him, that even they who would not believe Him to be the Messiah, could not but own He was a good Man.

Others said, He deceiveth the people; if that had been true, He had been a very bad man. The doctrine He preached, was sound; his miracles real; his conversation manifestly holy and good; and yet it must be taken for granted, notwithstanding, that there is some cheat at the bottom, because it is the interest of the chief priests to run Him down. Such murmuring as there was among the Jews concerning Christ, there is still among us: the Socinians say, He is a good Man, and further they say not; the Deists will not allow this, but say, He deceived the people. Thus some diminish Him; others abuse Him, but great is the truth.

They were frightened by their superiors from speaking much of Him; (v. 13.) No man spake openly of Him, for fear of the Jews. Either, First, They durst not openly speak well of Him. While any one was at liberty to reproach Him, none durst vindicate Him. Or, Secondly, They durst not speak at all of Him openly. Because nothing could justly be said against Him, they would not suffer any thing to be said of Him. It was a crime to name Him. Thus many have aimed to suppress truth, under color of silencing disputes about it, and would have all talk of religion hushed, in hopes thereby to bury in oblivion religion itself.

V. 14-36. Christ went up into the temple, and taught, according to his custom when at Jerusalem. His business was to preach the Gospel, and He did it in every place of concourse. The Gospel is the same to the plain and to the polite. That which is observable here is, ■ was about the middle of the feast; the fourth or fifth day of the eight.

Whether He did not come till the middle of the feast, or whether He came at the beginning, but kept private, is not certain. But, Query, Why did He not go to the temple sooner, to preach? Answer, 1. Because the people would have more leisure to hear Him, and, it might be hoped, would be better disposed, when they had spent some days in their booths, as they did at the feast of tabernacles. 2. Because He would choose to appear, when his friends and his enemies had done looking for Him; and so give a specimen of his method of coming at midnight, Matt. 25: 6. But why did He appear thus publicly now? To shame his persecutors, the chief priests and elders, (1.) By showing that, though they were bitter against Him, yet He did not fear their power. See Isa. 50: 7, 3. (2.) By taking their work out of their hands. Their office was to teach the people in the temple, and particularly at the feast of tabernacles, Neh. 8: 17, 18. But they either did not teach them at all, or taught for doctrines the commandments of men, and therefore He goes up to the temple, and teaches the people. When the shepherds of Israel made a prey of the flock, it was time for the chief Shepherd to appear, as was promised, Ezek. 34: 22, 23. Mal. 3: 1.

Concerning his doctrine.

The Jews admired it; (v. 15.) They marvelled, saying, How knows this man letters, having never learned? Our Lord Jesus was not educated in the schools of the prophets, or at the feet of the rabbins; not only did not travel for learning, as the philosophers did, but did not make any use of the academies in his own country. Moses was taught the learning of the Egyptians, but Christ was not taught so much as the learning of the Jews; having received the Spirit without measure, He needed not receive any knowledge from man, or by man. At the time of Christ's appearing, learning flourished in the Roman empire, and in the Jewish church, more than in any age before or since, and in such a time of inquiry Christ chose to establish his religion, not in an illiterate age, lest it should look like a design to impose upon the world; yet He Himself studied not the learning then in vogue. Christ had letters, though He had never learned them; was mighty in the Scriptures, though He never had a doctor of the law for his tutor. It is necessary that Christ's ministers should have learning; and since they cannot expect to have it as He had it, by inspiration, they must take pains to get it in an ordinary way. Christ's having learning, though He had not been taught it, made Him great and wonderful; the Jews speak of it here with wonder. Some, it is likely, took notice of it to his honor; He that had no human learning, and yet so far excelled all that had, certainly must be endued with a divine knowledge. Others, probably, mentioned it in diminution and contempt of Him; Whatever He seems to have, He cannot really have any true learning, for He was never at the university. And some perhaps suggested that He had got his learning by magic arts, or some unlawful means; since they know not how He could be a scholar, they will think Him a conjuror.

have no capacity to judge. (Note, 1 Cor. 2: 14-16.) He knows himself to be surrounded with enemies, who hate him, in proportion as his conversation, or more public testimony exposes the wickedness of men; protests against the corrupt maxims, and fashions of the world; and shows the evil even of their boasted morality. He is therefore aware that he needs 'the wisdom of the serpent,' as well as 'the harmlessness of the dove;' he consults the Word of God, and prays for the teaching of his Spirit; is decided against carnal advice, and leaves worldly counsellors to possess that 'friendship of the world which is enmity against God;' that he may follow the dictates of heavenly wisdom, and the counsel of an enlightened conscience. My doctrine is not mine, but his that sent Me. They were offended, because He undertook to teach, though He had never learned. In answer, He tells them, that his doctrine was such as was not to be learned, for it was not the product of human thought, but was a divine revelation. As God equal with the Father, He might truly have said, My doctrine is mine, and his that sent Me; but being now in his estate of humiliation, Mediator, God's Servant, it was more congruous to say, My doctrine is not mine, originally, as Man and Mediator, but his that sent Me; it does not lead ultimately to Myself, but to Him that sent Me. God had promised concerning the great Prophet, that He would put his words into his mouth, (Deut. 18:18), to which Christ seems here to refer. Note, It is the comfort of those who embrace Christ's doctrine, and the condemnation of those who reject it, that it is divine; of God, and not of man.

The most competent judges of the truth and divine authority of Christ's doctrine are those that with an upright heart endeavor to do the will of God; (v. 17.) If any man be willing to do the will of God, have his will melted into the will of God, he shall know of the doctrine, whether it be of God, or, whether I speak of Myself. Observe here,

The question concerning the doctrine of Christ, is, whether it be of God, or no; a divine revelation, or an imposture. Christ Himself was willing to have his doctrine inquired into, much more should his ministers; and we are concerned to examine what grounds we go upon, for if we be deceived, we are miserably deceived.

They are likely to succeed in this search, that do the will of God, at least are desirous to do it. Now see, 1. Who they are, that will do the will of God; they are impartial in their inquiries concerning the will of God, not biassed by any lust or interest; and such as are resolved, when they find out what the will of God is, to conform to it. They are such as have an honest principle of regard to God, and are truly desirous to please Him. 2. Whence it is that such a one shall know of the truth of Christ's doctrine. Christ has promised to give knowledge to such; He hath said, He shall know and He can give understanding. Those who improve the light they have, shall be secured from destructive mistakes. They are prepared to receive that knowledge. He that is inclined to submit to the rules of the divine law, is disposed to admit the rays of divine light. To him that has shall be given; those have a good understanding, that do his commandments, Ps. 111:10. Those who resemble God, are most likely to understand Him.

It appeared that Christ, as a Teacher, did not speak of Himself, because He did not seek Himself, v. 18.

See here the character of a deceiver; He seeketh his own glory, which is a sign that He speaks of Himself, as the false christs and false prophets did. They speak of themselves, and have no commission from God; no warrant but their own will, no inspiration but their own imagination, their own politics and artifice. Ambassadors speak not of themselves; those ministers disclaim that character, who glory in this, that they speak of themselves. By this, their pretensions are disproved, they consult purely their own glory; self-seekers are self-speakers. They who speak from God, will speak for God; they who aim at their own preferment and interest, make it appear that they had no commission from God.

See the contrary character Christ gives of Himself and his doctrine; He that seeks his glory that sent Him, as I do, makes it to appear that He is true. He was sent of God. Those teachers only, who are sent of God, are to be received by us. Those who bring a divine message, must prove a divine mission. He sought the glory of God. It was both the tendency of his doctrine, and the tenor of his whole conversation, to glorify God. This was a proof that He was true, and that there was no un-

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 11—18. The servants of Christ must follow Him 'through evil report and good report.' The most faithful preachers must be content to be called 'deceivers of the people;' though others will allow them to be good men; and some perhaps think better of them than they deserve, which none ever could do of their Lord and Master. But in general they, who count them deceivers, will speak openly their sentiments; while many who favor them will be afraid of reproach, by avowing their regard.—Any plausible objection, the result of ignorance and indolent mistake, will often more than counterbalance the fullest proof of a man's being employed by God; for the partial judges will only hear evidence on one side of the question. Some prejudice, concerning the family, country, or education of the faithful teacher, is employed by Satan, to stop the ears of his servants against the truth: and the charge of ignorant and illiterate is adjoined, against the most scriptural preachers, by such as have not yet learned 'the first principles of the oracles of God;' however accomplished they may be, in that 'wisdom of the world which is foolishness with Him.' But every faithful minister, wherever educated, may humbly adopt the words of Christ. His doctrine is not his own invention, nor does it spring, either from his learning or his ignorance: it is from God, from his Word through the teaching of His Spirit; who commands it to be preached for the glory of his name. All therefore, who presume to engage in this work, should daily study and pray over the Scriptures, in order to possess a well-grounded confidence, that the subjects of their instructions are agreeable to 'the oracles of God.' They ought likewise to 'take heed to themselves, as well as to their doctrine;' that they may always have 'rejoicing in the testimony of their consciences,' as not seeking their own glory, the applause of hearers, or any filthy lucre, (as all do, who speak of themselves,) but the glory of God. The it will appear, that 'there is no unrighteousness in them,' nor any reason to suspect them of bad motives, in their ministry. But, amidst the various opinions and controversies about religion; which agitate the world, what a blessed encouragement it is to remember, that 'if any man,' of any nation, 'will do he will of God, he shall know of the doctrine, whether it be of God, or whether men speak of themselves!' The Word of the Lord is passed, and cannot be recalled; and all, who desire, and seek diligently to know the will of God, in order to reduce it to practice, shall be guided through every uncertainty, and just every precipice of error, into the ways of truth and peace; and they only shall be given up to strong delusions, 'who hate the truth because they have pleasure in unrighteousness.' (Note, 2 Thes. 2:8—12.)

Verse 15.

'No one, (says Kypke) will rashly venture to affirm that Christ was never under the instruction of any Master, nor imbued with any literature whatsoever. For this would be contrary to the sure oracles of sacred writ, and to the custom of the Jews; from which we can scarcely suppose his parents would have deviated, or have omitted to put their son under the instruction of some one.'

BLOOMF.

'There is no reason to believe that our Lord adorned his discourse with quotations from, or references to, the writers most celebrated for their learning, or showed any extraordinary acquisitions in history, antiquities, &c. The evangelists have given us no specimen of this kind; and it is certain that foreign literature was then in great contempt among the Jews, the words undoubtedly refer to our Lord's thorough acquaintance with the Scriptures, and the judicious and masterly manner in which He taught the people out of them, with far greater majesty, and nobler eloquence than the scribes could attain by a learned education.'

Verse 17.

He shall know of the doctrine, &c. 'This sentence clearly shows us, that they best understand the will of God, who are most careful to practice it; so likewise that the best way to know what God is, is transcribe his perfections in our lives and action; to be holy, just, good and merciful, as He is; also that a hearty desire and endeavor to do the will of God is the best security and preservative against dangerous errors and mistakes in matters of religion.'

TILLOTSON.

'A sincere desire to know the truth, with an honest disposition to conform our wills to it when known, is the best preservative against error in religion, and carries with it a well-grounded assurance of the divine aid, to assist persons so disposed in their inquiries after truth.'

a clearer light and better law; why then do you aim to kill Me for introducing it?

Here the people rudely interrupted Him, and contradicted what He said; Thou hast a devil; who goes about to kill Thee? This speaks. [1.] The good opinion they had of their rulers, who, they think, would never attempt so atrocious a thing as to kill Him; such a veneration they had for their elders and chief priests, that they would swear for them they would do no harm to an innocent man. Probably, the rulers had their emissaries among the people, who suggested this to them; many deny that wickedness which at the same time they are contriving. [2.] The ill opinion they had of our Lord. 'Thou hast a devil, art possessed with a lying spirit, and art a bad man for saying so;' or rather, 'Thou art melancholy, and a weak man;' frightenest Thyself with causeless fears. Not only open frenzies, but silent melancholies, were then commonly imputed to the power of Satan. 'Thou art crazed, hast a distempered brain.' Let us not think it strange if the best men be put under the worst characters.

To this calumny, our Savior returns no direct answer, but seems as if He took no notice of it. Note, Those who would be like Christ, must put up with affronts, and pass by indignities done them; must not regard them, much less resent them, and least of all revenge them. I, as a deaf man, heard not. When Christ was reviled, He reviled not again.

He appeals to their own sentiments of this miracle; (v. 21.) 'I have done one work, and ye all marvel. Ye cannot but marvel at it as altogether supernatural.' Or, 'Though I have done but one work that you have any color to find fault with, yet you marvel, as if I had been guilty of some enormous crime.'

He appeals to their own practice in other instances; 'I have done one work on the Sabbath, with a word's speaking, and ye all make strange of it, that a religious man should dare to do such a thing, whereas ye yourselves many a time do a more servile work on the Sabbath, in the case of circumcision; if it be lawful for you, nay, your duty, to circumcise a child on the Sabbath; when it happens to be the eighth day, as, no doubt, it is, much more was it lawful and good for me to heal a diseased man on that day.' Observe,

The origin of circumcision; Moses gave you circumcision, the law concerning it. Here, circumcision is said to be given, and they are said to receive it; it was not imposed upon them as a yoke, but conferred as a favor. Note, The ordinances of God, particularly those which ^aare seals of the covenant, righteousness in Him. False teachers are most unrighteous; unjust to God whose name they abuse, and unjust to the souls of men whom they impose upon. There cannot be a greater piece of unrighteousness than this. But Christ made it appear that He was true, that He was really what He said He was; that there was no falsehood in his doctrine, or fraud in his dealings with us.

They discourse concerning the crime that was laid to his charge for curing the impotent man, and bidding him carry his bed on the sabbath-day, for which they had formerly persecuted Him; and which was still the pretence of their enmity.

He argues against them by way of recrimination, convicting them of far worse practices. How could they censure Him for a breach of the law of Moses, when they themselves were such notorious breakers of it? Did not Moses give you the law? It was their privilege that they had the law; no nation had such a law; but it was their wickedness that they rebelled against it. Many that have the law given them, do not keep it. Their neglect of the law was universal; None of you keepeth it; neither those in posts of honor, nor those who were in posts of subjection, who should have been most obedient. They boasted of the law, pretended a zeal for it, were enraged at Christ for seeming to transgress it, yet none of them kept it; like those who say that they are for the church, and yet never go to church. It aggravated their wickedness in persecuting Christ for breaking the law, that they themselves did not keep it; 'None of you keepeth the law, why then go ye about to kill Me for not keeping it?' Note, Those are commonly most censorious of others, who are most faulty themselves. Hypocrites, who are forward to pull a mote out of their brother's eye, are not aware of a beam in their own.

Why go ye about to kill Me? Some make this to be the instance of their not keeping the law; 'Ye keep not the law; if ye did, ye would not go about to kill Me.' Those that support themselves and their interest by persecution and violence, whatever they pretend, are not keepers of the law of God. Some understand this as a reason why it is time to supersede the law of Moses by the Gospel, because the law was found insufficient to restrain sin; 'Moses gave you the law, but you are not kept by it from the greatest wickedness; there is therefore need of are gifts, and are to be received as such. 2 Moses is said to give it, because it was a part of that law given by Moses; yet as Christ said of the manna, (ch. 6: 32.) Moses did not give it them, but God; nay, and it was not of Moses first, but of the fathers, v. 22. Though it was incorporated into the Mosaic institution, yet it was ordained long before, for it was a seal of the righteousness of faith, and therefore commenced with the promise, four hundred and thirty years before, Gal. 3: 17. The church-membership of believers and their seed was not of Moses or his law, and therefore did not fall with it; but was of the patriarchal church, a part of that blessing of Abraham, which was to come upon the Gentiles, Gal. 3: 14. Observe,

Secondly, The respect to the law of circumcision above that of the Sabbath, in the Jewish church. The Jewish casuists frequently notice it.—Circumcision and its cure drive away the Sabbath; so that if a child was born one sabbath-day, it was without fail circumcised the next. If then, when the sabbath-rest was more strictly insisted on, yet those works were allowed which were to keep up religion, much more are they allowed now under the Gospel, when the stress is laid more upon the sabbath-work.

The inference Christ draws from hence in justification of Himself, and of what He had done. A man-child on the sabbath-day receives circumcision, that the law of circumcision might not be broken; or, as the margin reads it, without breaking the law, namely, of the Sabbath. Divine commands must be construed so as to agree with each other. 'Now, if this be allowed, how unreasonable are ye, who are angry with Me because I have made a man every whit whole on the sabbath-day!' (The etymon of the word translated angry means gall.) They were angry at Him with the greatest indignation; it was anger with gall in it. Note, It is very absurd and unreasonable for us to condemn others for that which we justify ourselves in. Observe the comparison between their circumcising a child, and his healing a man on the sabbath-day. 1. Circumcision was but a ceremonial institution; it was of the fathers indeed, but not from the beginning; but Christ did a good work by the law of nature, a more excellent law than that which made circumcision a good work. 2. Circumcision was a bloody ordinance, and made sore; but what Christ did, made whole. The law works pain, and if that work may be done on the sabbath-day, much more a gospel-work, which works peace. 3. When they had circumcised a child, their care was only to heal up that part which was circumcised, which might be done, and yet the child remain under other illnesses; Christ had made this man every whit whole.—I have made the whole man healthful and sound. The whole body was healed, for the disease affected the whole body; and the cure left no relics of the disease behind; nay, Christ not only healed his body, but his soul too, by that admonition, Go and sin no more, and so in fact made the whole man sound. Circumcision indeed was intended for the good of the soul, but they had perverted it, and turned it into a carnal ordinance; but Christ accompanied his outward cures with inward grace, and so made them sacramental, and healed the whole man.

He concludes the argument with this rule, Judge not according to the appearance, but judge righteous judgement. This may be applied, in particular, to this work. Be not partial in your judgment; judge not, knowing faces, as the Hebrew phrase is, Deut. 1: 17. It is contrary to the law of justice, as well as charity, to censure those who differ in opinion from us, in taking that liberty which yet in those of our own party, we allow of; as it is to commend that in some as necessary strictness, which in others we condemn as persecution. Or, (2.) In general, to Christ's person and preaching, which they were prejudiced against. Those things that are designed to impose upon men, commonly ^aappear best, when judged of according to the outward appearance; they appear pear most plausible at the first glance. This gained the Pharisees such a reputation, that they appeared right unto men; (Matt. 23: 27, 28.) and men judged of them by that appearance, and so were sadly mistaken in them. 'But,' saith Christ, 'be not too confident that all are real saints, who are seeming ones.' With reference to Himself, his outward appearance was far short of his real dignity, for He took upon Him the form of a servant, (Phil. 2: 7.) was in the likeness of sinful flesh, (Rom. 8: 3.) had no form or comeliness, Isa. 53: 2. So that they who undertook to judge Him by his outward appearance, were not likely to judge righteous judgment. The Jews expected the outward appearance of the Messiah to be attended with secular grandeur; and judging of Christ by that rule, their judgment was a continual mistake, for his kingdom was not to be of this world, nor with observation. If a divine power accompanied Him, and God bare Him witness, and the Scriptures were fulfilled in Him, they ought to receive Him. See Isa. 11: 3. and 1 Sam. 16: 7. Christ and his doctrine desire nothing but righteous judgment; if truth and justice may pass the sentence, Christ and his cause will carry the day. We must not judge any by outward appearance, their titles, their figure, and show, but by their intrinsic worth, and the gifts and graces of God's Spirit.

The inhabitants of Jerusalem seem to have been most prejudiced against Him, v. 25. One would think that they who lived at the fountain-head of knowledge and religion, would have been most ready to receive the Messiah; but it proved quite contrary; those that have the means of knowledge and grace, if not made better by them, are commonly made worse; and our Lord has often met with the least welcome from those, from whom one would expect the best. It was not without some just cause, that it came into a proverb, The nearer the church, the further from God.

These people of Jerusalem showed their ill-will to Christ, by reflecting on the rulers, because they let Him alone; Is not this He whom they seek to kill? The people that came out of the country to the feast, did not suspect any design against Him, and therefore said, Who goes about to kill Thee? v. 20. But they of Jerusalem knew the plot, and irritated their rulers to put it in execution. 'Is not this He whom they seek to kill? Why do they not do it? Who hinders them? They say that they have a mind to get Him out of the way, and yet, lo, He speaketh boldly, and they say nothing to Him; do the rulers know indeed that this is the very Christ?' v. 26. Here they slyly insinuate two things, to exasperate the rulers against Christ, when indeed they needed no spur. 1. That by conniving at his preaching, they brought their authority into contempt. 'Must a man that is condemned by the sanhedrim, be permitted to speak boldly, without a check? This makes their sentence but a vain menace; if our rulers will suffer themselves to be thus trampled upon, they may thank themselves if none stand in awe of them and their laws.' Note, The worst persecutions have been carried on under color of the support of authority and government. 2. That hereby they brought their judgment into suspicion; Do they know that this is the Christ? It is ironical. 'How came they to change their mind? What new discovery have they made? They give people occasion to think that they believe Him to be the Christ, and should act vigorously against Him, to clear themselves from the suspicion.' Thus the rulers, who had made the people enemies to Christ, made them seven times more the children of hell than themselves, Matt. 23: 15. When the profession of Christ's name is out of fashion, and consequently out of repute, many are strongly tempted to persecute and oppose, only that they may not be thought to incline to religion. For this reason apostates, and the degenerate offspring of good parents, have been sometimes worse than others, to wipe off the stain of their profession. It was strange that the rulers, thus irritated, did not seize Christ; but his hour was not yet come; and God can tie men's hands, though He do not turn their hearts.

In their exception against his being the Christ, there appeared more malice than matter, v. 27. 'If the rulers think Him to be the Christ, we neither can nor will believe Him to be so, for we know this Man, whence He is; but when Christ comes, no man knows whence He is.' Here is a fallacy in the argument, for the propositions are not both adapted to the same view of the subject. 1. If they speak of his divine nature, it is true, that when Christ comes, no man knows whence He is, for He is a Priest after the order of Melchizedek, without descent, and his goings forth have been of old from everlasting, Mic. 5: 2. But then it was not true, that as for this Man they knew whence He was, for they knew not his divine nature, nor how the Word was made flesh. 2. If they speak of his human nature, it was true that they knew whence He was, who was his mother, and where He was bred up; but then it was false, that ever it was said of the Messiah, that none should know whence He was, for 'was known before where He should be born Matt. 2: 4, 5. Observe, How they despised Him, because they knew whence He was. Familiarity breeds contempt, and we are apt to disdain the use of those of whom we know the rise. Christ's own received Him not, because He was their own, for which very reason they should the rather have loved Him, and been thankful that they were honored with his appearance. (2.) They endeavored to fasten true ground of their prejudice upon the Scriptures. Therefore people err concerning Christ, because they know not the Scripture.

Christ's answer to this objection. He spake freely and boldly, cried in the temple, as He taught; He spake thus louder than the rest of his discourse. First, To express his earnestness, being grieved for the hardness of their hearts; there may be vehemency in contending for the truth, where yet there is no intemperate passion. We may instruct gainsayers with warmth, and yet with meekness. Secondly, The priests, and those that were prejudiced against Him, did not come near enough to hear his preaching, and therefore He must speak louder what He will have them to hear. Whoever has ears to hear, let him hear this.

Christ's answer to their cavil, is, 1. By way of concession; granting that 'ye both know Me, and ye know whence I am. Ye know I am of yourselves.' It is no disparagement to the doctrine of Christ, that it is level to the capacities of the meanest; plain truths discovered even by nature's light, of which we may say, 'We know whence they are.' 'Ye know Me, ye think ye know Me; but ye are mistaken; ye take Me to be the carpenter's son, and born at Nazareth; but it is not so.'

2. By way of negation, denying that what they did see in Him, and know of Him, was all that was to be known; and therefore if they looked no further than that, they judged by the outward appearance only. They knew whence He came perhaps, but He will tell them from whom He came. (1.) He did not come of Himself; not as a private person, but with a public character. (2.) That He was sent of his Father; this is twice mentioned, He hath sent Me. And again, 'He hath sent Me, to say what I say, and do what I do.' This He was well assured of, and knew that his Father would bear Him out; and if we are assured of it too, we may with confidence go to God by Him. (3.) He was from his Father, not only from Him as a servant from his master, but by eternal generation, as a son from his father, by essential emanation, as the beams from the sun. (4.) That the Father who sent Him is true; He had promised to give the Messiah, and though the Jews had forfeited the promise, yet He has performed it; He had promised that the Messiah should be successful in his undertaking; and though the generality of the Jews reject Him and his Gospel, yet He is true, and will fulfil the promise in the calling of the Gentiles. (5.) These unbelieving Jews did not know the

4. Christ's discourse had, of his hearers; Many of the people believed on Him. As He was set for the fall of some, so for the rising of others. Even where the Gospel meets with opposition, there may be great good done, 1 Thess. 2:2.

They that believed, were not a few, but more than one would have expected, when the stream ran so strong the other way. But these many were of the people, the rabble some would have called them. We must not measure the prosperity of the Gospel by its success among the great; nor must ministers say that they labor in vain, though none but the poor receive the Gospel, 1 Cor. 1:26.

Secondly, The miracles which He did, induced them to believe. They were not only the accomplishment of the Old-Testament prophecies, (Isa. 35:5, 6,) but an argument of a divine power. He that had an ability to do what none but God can do, an ability to overrule the powers of nature, no doubt had authority to enact what none but God can enact, a law that shall bind conscience, and a covenant that shall give life.

How weak their faith was; they do not positively assert, as the Samaritans did, This is indeed the Christ, but they only argue, When Christ comes, will He do more miracles than these? They take it for granted that Christ will come, and when He comes, will do many miracles. 'Is not this He then? In Him we see, though not all the worldly pomp we have fancied, yet all the divine power of the Messiah; and therefore why may not this be He?' They believe it, but have not courage to own it. Note, Even weak faith may be true faith, and so accepted by the Lord Jesus, who despises not the day of small things.

The Pharisees and chief priests had information brought them by their spies, that the people murmured such things concerning Him; that there were many who had a respect for Him. Though the people did but whisper these things, yet the Pharisees were enraged at it. The equity of that government is justly suspected by others, which is a suspicious of itself, as to take notice of, or be influenced by, the secret and uncertain mutterings of the common people. The Pharisees valued themselves upon the respect of the people, and were sensible that if Christ did thus increase, they must decrease.

The project they laid hereupon was, to take Him into custody; They sent officers to take Him, not to take up those who murmured concerning Him, and frighten them; the most effectual way to disperse the flock, is to smite the shepherd. The Pharisees seem to have been the ringleaders, but they had no power, and therefore got the chief priests, the judges of the ecclesiastical court, to join with them. The Pharisees were the great pretenders to learning, and the chief priests to sanctity. As the world by wisdom knew not God, but the greatest philosophers were guilty of the greatest blunders in natural religion; so the Jewish church by their wisdom knew not Christ, but their greatest rabbins were the greatest fools concerning Him, nay, his most inveterate enemies. Those wicked rulers had church-officers, whom they employed to take Christ, and who were ready to go on their ill errand. If Saul's footmen will not go, he has a herdsman that will turn and fall upon the priests of the Lord, 1 Sam. 22:18.

The discourse of our Lord Jesus hereupon; Yet a little while I am with you, and then I go to Him that sent Me; ye shall seek Me, and shall not find Me; and where I am, thither ye cannot come. These words, like the pillar of cloud and fire, have a bright and a dark side.

They have a bright side towards our Lord Himself, and speak abundance of comfort to Him and all his followers, that are exposed to dangers, for his sake. Three things Christ here comforted Himself with.

1. That He had but a little time to continue in this troublesome world. He sees that He is never likely to have quiet among them; but his warfare will shortly be accomplished, and then He shall be no more in this world, ch. 17:11. Whosoever we are with in this world, friends or foes, it is but for a little while. And it is matter of comfort to those who are in the world, but not of it, and therefore are hated by it and sick of it, that they shall not be in it long. We must be a while with those that are briars and thorns; but it is but a little while. Our days being evil, it is well they are few.

2. When He should quit this troublesome world, He should go to Him that sent Him, I go; not, 'I am driven away by force', but, 'I voluntarily go'; having finished my embassy, I return to Him on whose errand I came. When I have done my work with you, and not till then, I go to Him that sent, and will receive Me, as ambassadors are when they return. Their rage would not only hinder Him from, but would hasten Him to, the glory and joy that were set before Him. Let those who suffer for Christ, comfort themselves with this, that they have a God, and are going to be forever with Him.

3. Though they persecuted Him here, wherever He went, none of their persecutions could follow Him to heaven; Ye shall seek Me, and shall not find Me. It appears by their enmity to his followers when He was gone, that, if they could, they would have persecuted Him; 'But ye cannot come into that temple, as into this.' Where I am, that is, where I then shall be; but He expresses it thus, because even when He was on earth, by his divine nature and affections He was in heaven, ch. 3:13. Or it denotes, that He shall be so soon there, that He was as good as there already. Note, It adds to the happiness of glorified saints, that they are out of the reach of the devil and all his instruments.

Thirdly, These words have a dark side toward the Jews that hated and persecuted Christ. They now longed to be rid of Him, Away with Him from the earth; but,

1. According to their choice, so should their doom be. They were industrious to drive Him from them; their sin shall be their punishment; He will not trouble them long, yet a little while, and He will depart. It is just with God to forsake those that think his presence a burthen. They that are weary of Christ, need no more to make them miserable, than to have their wish.

2. They would certainly repent their choice when too late. (1.) They should in vain seek the Messiah; 'Ye shall seek Me, and shall not find Me.' Ye shall expect the Christ to come, but your eyes shall fail with looking for Him. They who rejected the true Messiah, were justly abandoned to a miserable and endless expectation of one that never should come. Or, it may refer to the final rejection of sinners at the great day: those who now seek Christ, shall find Him; but the day is coming, when those who now refuse Him, shall seek Him, and shall not find Him. See Prov. 1:28. They will in 33 Then said Jesus unto them. Yet a little while am I with you, and then I go unto him that sent me.

34 Ye shall seek me, and shall not find me; and where I am, thither ye cannot come.

35 Then said the Jews among themselves, Whither will he go, that we shall not find him? will he go unto the dispersed among the Gentiles, and teach the Gentiles?

36 What manner of saying is this that he said, 'Ye shall seek me, and shall not find me; and where I am, thither ye cannot come?'

[Practical Observations.]

37 ¶ In the last day, that great day of the feast, Jesus stood and cried, saying, 'If any man thirst, let vain cry, Lord, Lord, open to us. Perhaps these words might be fulfilled in some of the Jews, who possibly might be convinced, and not converted, who would wish to see Christ, and hear Him preach again; but the day of grace is over; (Luke 17: 22.) yet that is not all. (2.) They should in vain expect a place in heaven; Where I am, thither ye cannot come. Not only because they are excluded by the sentence of the Judge, and the sword at every gate to keep the way of the tree of life, but because they are disabled by their own infidelity; Ye cannot come, because ye will not. Those that hate to be where Christ is, in his Word and ordinances on earth, are unfit to be where He is in his glory in heaven; for indeed it would be no heaven to them, such are the antipathies of an unsanctified soul to its felicities.

They said among themselves, Whither will He go? See here.

First, Their wilful blindness. He had expressly said whither He would go—to his Father in heaven, yet they ask, Whither will He go? and what manner of saying is this? None so blind as those that will not see. Christ's sayings are plain to him that understandeth, and difficult only to those that are minded to quarrel.

Secondly, Their daring contempt of Christ's threatenings. Instead of trembling at that terrible word, Ye shall seek Me, and not find Me, which speaks the utmost degree of misery, they banter, and make a jest of it, as those sinners that mock at fear, and are not affrighted, Isa. 5: 19, Amos 5: 18. Let Him make speed. But be ye not mockers, lest your bands be made strong.

Thirdly, Their inveterate rage against Christ. All they dreaded in his departure was, that He would be out of the reach of their power; 'Whither will He go, that we shall not find Him?' If He be above ground, we will have Him; we will leave no place unsearched; as Ahab in quest of Elijah, 1 Kings 18: 10.

Fourthly, Their proud disdain of the Gentiles; meaning either the Jews that were scattered abroad among the Greeks, (James 1: 1. 1 Pet. 1: 1. will He make an interest among those silly people?) or, the Gentiles dispersed over the world, in distinction from the Jews, who were incorporated into one church and nation; will He make his court to them?

Fifthly, Their jealousy of the least intimation of favor to the Gentiles; 'Will He go and teach the Gentiles?' Perhaps they had heard of some respect showed by Him to the Gentiles, as in his sermon at Nazareth, and in the case of the centurion, and the woman of Canaan, and there was nothing they dreaded more than the comprehension of the Gentiles. So common is it for those who have lost the power of religion, to be very jealous for the monopoly of the name. They now made a jest of his going to teach the Gentiles; but not long after He did it in good earnest by his apostles and ministers and gathered those dispersed people, sorely to the grief of the Jews, Rom. 10: 19. So true is that of Solomon, The fear of the wicked it shall come upon him.

V. 37—44. It is probable that these are only short hints of what He enlarged upon; but they are the substance of the whole Gospel.

He made this invitation on the last day of the feast of tabernacles. The eighth day was a holy convocation, Lev. 23: 36. On this day Christ published this gospel-call. Much people were gathered together, and it might be hoped that some would accept it, Prov. 1: 21. Numerous assemblies give opportunity of doing the more good. The people were now returning to their homes, and He would give them this to carry away with them, as his parting word. When a great congregation is to be dismissed, as here, it is affecting to think, that, if all probability they will never come together again in this world, and therefore if we can say any thing to help them to heaven, that must be the time. It is good to be lively at the close of an ordinance. Christ made this offer on the last day of the feast; [1.] To those who had turned a deaf ear to his preaching on the foregoing days of this week; He will try them once more, and if they will yet hear his voice, they shall live. [2.] To those who perhaps might never have such another offer made them; it would be half a year before there would be another feast, and in that time they would many of them be in their graves. Behold, now is the accepted time.

Jesus stood, and cried: which denotes his great earnestness and importunity. His heart was upon it, to bring souls to Himself. The erection of his body, and the elevation of his voice, were indications of the intenseness of his mind. Love to souls will make preachers lively. He stood, and cried, that He might the better be heard; for this is what every one that hath ears, is concerned to hear. Gospel-truth seeks no corners, because it fears no trials. The heathen oracles were delivered by them that peeped and muttered; but the oracles of the Gospel were proclaimed by One that stood, and cried. How sad the case of man, that he

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 19—36. Unbelievers may be very zealous for their own views of religion, and vehemently persecute those who dissent from them; while they are acting in opposition to the precepts of Scripture, and indulging the most diabolical tempers; and when the least check is given them, they revile others, as if all, not of their party, were unworthy of regard. Such men, in their zeal for doctrines, (perhaps true in themselves, though held in a perverted manner,) overlook the genuine tendency of them; and are full of pride and rage, in disputing for the most humiliating and conciliatory truths! If external ordinances be their idol, they pervert them to purposes opposite to their true intention; and they condemn, in others, things of the same nature with those which they allow in themselves, or undeniably better. It behoves us to consider matters more candidly and impartially; that we may not judge according to appearance, but judge righteous judgment. We should also guard against the folly of opposing our preconceived opinions to such instructions as appear to be from God.

Verse 34.

Ye shall seek Me, and shall not find Me. [Not as if the Jews would seek Jesus, as their helper after the destruction of Jerusalem, (according to Chrysostom, Theophylact and Euthymius,) or as if they should be brought to repentance by the miracles wrought by the apostles, (according to Augustine and Bede,) or as if it were indicated that the Jews would in vain endeavor to seek Jesus for the purpose of destroying Him after his resurrection, (according to Rupertus,) but because they would seek the Messiah in their own way, according to their own conceptions; which implies the same as to seek Jesus; since besides Him no other Messiah was to be expected. They would seek Him by the scrutiny of the times, by a vain expectation, animating them to bear the utmost extremities of the siege, since they supposed that the temple was not to be destroyed before the Lord of the temple should come, and by following after false Christs. But by all these attempts they would not find Him; not in word, because the veil of Moses was upon their hearts; not by vain confidence, since they could not escape the destined destruction; not by seeking after false Christs, since they would be miserably deceived by them.] Lampe. The dispersed among the Gentiles. [Grotius, Wetstein, Rosenmueller and Kuinoel understand the Jews dispersed among the Gentiles, as in 2 Macc. 1: 27. That the Jews were at that time dispersed over the whole world, is well known, especially from Philo Judæus and Josephus. These foreign Jews (says Kuinoel) are mentioned in contempt for the Jews of Palestine, and especially Jerusalem, used to arrogate an infinite superiority over them; from their own residence in the holy land, the sacred city, and their consequent more accurate knowledge and observance of the law.]

To come to Christ, is to believe on Him, as the Scripture hath said; to receive and entertain Him as offered to us in the Gospel. We must not frame a Christ according to our fancy, but believe in a Christ according to the Scripture.

See how thirsty souls, that come to Christ, shall be made to drink. Israel, that believed Moses, drank of the rock that followed them, the streams followed; but believers drink of a Rock, Christ in them; He is in them a Well of living water, ch. 4: 14. Provision is made for their continual, perpetual comfort. Running water the Hebrew language calls living, because still in motion. The graces and comforts of the Spirit are compared to it, because they are the quickening principles of spiritual life, and the earnest and beginnings of eternal life. See Jer. 2: 13. Rivers of living water, denote both plenty and constancy. The comfort flows plentifully and constantly as a river; strong as a stream, to bear down the oppositions of doubts and fears. There is a fulness in Christ of grace for grace. These flow out of his heart and soul. That is the subject of the Spirit's working, and the seat of his government. There gracious principles are planted; and out of the heart, in which the Spirit dwells, flow the issues of life, Prov. 4: 23. There divine comforts are lodged, and the joy that a stranger doth not intermeddle with. He that believeth hath the witness in himself, 1 John 5: 10.

Where there are springs of grace and comfort in the soul, they will send forth streams. Out of his belly shall flow rivers. First, Grace and comfort will evidence themselves. Good affections will produce good actions, and a holy heart will be seen in a holy life; the tree is known by its fruits, the fountain by its streams. Secondly, They will communicate themselves for the benefit of others; a good man is a common good. His mouth is a well of life, Prov. 10: 11. It is not enough that we drink waters out of our own cistern, we must let our fountains be dispersed abroad, Prov. 5: 15, 16.

Those words, as the Scripture hath said, seem to refer to some promise in the Old Testament to this purport, and there are many; as that God would pour out his Spirit, (Prov. 1: 23. Joel 2: 28. Isa. 44: 3. Zech. 12: 10.) that the dry land should become springs of water, (Isa. 41: 18.) that there should be rivers in the desert, (Isa. 43: 19.) that gracious souls should be like a spring of water, (Isa. 58: 11.) and the church a well of living waters, Cant. 4: 15. And here may be an allusion to the waters issuing out of Ezekiel's temple, Ezek. 47: 1. Compare Rev. 22: 1. and see Zech. 14: 8. The Jews, on the last day of the feast of tabernacles, had a solemnity, which they called the pouring out of water. They fetched a golden vessel of water from the pool of Siloam, brought it into the temple with sound of trumpet and other ceremonies, and, upon the ascent to the altar, poured it out before the Lord with all possible expressions of joy. Some of their writers make the water to signify the law, and refer to Isa. 12: 3. 55: 1. Others, the Holy Spirit. Our Savior might here allude to this custom. Believers shall have the comfort, not of a vessel of water from a pool, but of a river flowing from themselves. The joy of the law, and the pouring out of the water, which signified that, are not to be compared with the joy of the Gospel in the wells of salvation.

Thus spake He of the Spirit; not of any outward advantages accruing to must be importuned to be happy, and how wonderful the grace of Christ, that He will importune him! Ho every-one, Isa. 55: 1.

The invitation itself is, (1.) Very general; if any man thirst, high or low, rich or poor, young or old, bond or free, Jew or Gentile. (2.) Very gracious; 'If any man thirst, let him come to Me, and drink.' If any man desires to be eternally happy, let him apply himself to Me, and I will make him so.

The persons invited are such as thirst, which may be understood as regarding, First, The indigence of their cases; either as to their outward condition; if any man be destitute of the comforts of this life, or fatigued with the crosses of it, let his afflictions draw him to Christ, for that peace which the world can neither give nor take away; or, as to their inward state; if any man want spiritual blessings, he may be supplied with Me.' Or, Secondly, If any man hunger and thirst after righteousness, that is, truly desire the good will and the good work of God.

Let him come to Me, not to the ceremonial law, which would neither pacify the conscience nor purify it, and therefore could not make the comers thereunto perfect, Heb. 10: 1. Nor let him go to the heathen philosophy, that does but lead men into a wood, and leave them there; but let him go to Christ, admit his doctrine, submit to his discipline, believe in Him; come to Him as the Fountain of living waters, the Giver of all comfort.

Let him come and drink, he shall have what he comes for, and more; shall have that which will not only refresh, but replenish, a soul that desires to be happy.

He that believeth on Me, out of his belly shall flow—is a gracious promise!

believers, (as perhaps some misunderstood Him,) but of the gifts and comforts of the Spirit. Scripture is the best interpreter of Scripture.

It is promised to all that believe on Christ, that they shall receive the Holy Ghost. Some received miraculous gifts; (Mark 16: 17, 18.) all his sanctifying graces. The gift of the Holy Ghost is one of the great blessings promised in the new covenant, (Acts 2: 39.) and, if promised, no doubt performed.

The Spirit dwelling and working in believers, is as a fountain of running water, out of which streams flow, cooling and cleansing as water, mollifying and moistening as water, making them fruitful, and others joyful; see ch. 3: 5. When the apostles spake so fluently of the things of God, as the Spirit gave them utterance, (Acts 2: 4.) and afterward preached and wrote the Gospel of Christ with such a flood of divine eloquence, this was fulfilled, Out of his belly shall flow rivers.

This effusion of the Spirit was yet the matter of promise; for the Holy Ghost was not yet given, because Jesus was not yet glorified.

Jesus was not yet glorified. It was certain that He should be glorified, and He was ever worthy of all honor; but He was as yet in a state of humiliation. He had never forfeited the glory He had before all worlds, nay, He had merited further glory, and beside his hereditary honors, might claim the achievement of a mediatorial crown; and yet all this is in reversion. Jesus is now upheld, (Isa. 42: 1.) is now satisfied, (Isa. 53: 11.) is now justified, (1 Tim. 5. 16.) but He is not yet glorified. If Christ must wait for his glory, let not us think [it] much to wait for ours.

The Holy Ghost was not yet given:—for the Holy Ghost was not yet. The Spirit of God was from eternity; in the beginning He moved upon the face of the waters. He was in the Old-Testament prophets and saints; and Zachary and Elisabeth were both filled with the Holy Ghost. This therefore must be understood of that general effusion of the Spirit promised, Joel 2: 28, and accomplished, Acts 2: 1. The Holy Ghost was not yet given in that visible manner. If we compare the clear knowledge and strong grace of the disciples of Christ themselves, after that day of Pentecost, with their darkness and weakness before, we shall understand in what sense the Holy Ghost was not yet given: the earnest and first-fruits of the Spirit were given, but the harvest was not yet come. The dispensation of the Spirit did not yet commence. The Holy Ghost was not yet given in such ways as should water even the Gentile world; not in the gifts of tongues, to which perhaps this promise principally refers.

The reason why the Holy Ghost was not yet given, was, Jesus was not yet glorified. The death of Christ is sometimes called his glorification; (ch. 13: 31.) for in his cross He conquered and triumphed. Now the gift of the Holy Ghost was purchased by the blood of Christ; and therefore till the price was paid, (though many other gifts were bestowed upon its being secured to be paid,) the Holy Ghost was not given. There was not so much need of the Spirit while Christ was Himself here upon earth, as when He was gone. The giving of the Holy Ghost was to be both an answer to Christ's intercession, (ch. 14: 16.) and an act of his dominion; and therefore till He enters upon both these, the Holy Ghost is not given. The conversion of the Gentiles was the glorifying of Jesus. When certain Greeks began to inquire after Christ, He said, Now is the Son of man glorified, ch. 12: 23. The time was not yet come, when the Gospel should be propagated in the nations, and therefore there was as yet no occasion for the gift of tongues, that river of living water. But observe, though the Holy Ghost was not yet given, He was promised, it was the great promise of the Father, Acts 1: 4.

Verse 38.

As the Scripture hath said. [Two passages seem especially referred to, 1s. 55: 1. and 58: 11. Belly.] The original word denotes the mind's heart or rather by synecdoche, the whole man, and therefore the phrase is equivalent to "from him." The metaphor, however strong, was probably well understood by those to whom it was addressed, since it is found in the Jewish writings. Nor is it unknown to the classical writers.

good word, that give Him no more. These said, This is the prophet, and this is the Christ, but could not persuade themselves to leave all and follow Him; and so this their testimony to Christ was but a testimony against themselves.

Others were prejudiced against Him. No sooner was this truth started, that Jesus is the Christ, than it was argued against; and his rise and origina. (as they took it for granted) out of Galilee, was thought enough to answer all arguments for his being the Christ. Shall Christ come out of Galilee? Has not the Scripture said that Christ comes of the seed of David?

They were so far in the right, that the Messiah was to be a Rod out of the stem of Jesse, (Isa. 11: 1.) that out of Bethlehem should arise the Governor, Mic. 5: 2. This even the common people knew by the traditional expositions. Perhaps these people, who had these Scriptures so ready to object against Christ, were not alike knowing in other parts of Holy Writ, but had these put into their mouths by their leaders. Many that espouse some corrupt notions, and spend their zeal in defence of them, seem to be very ready in the Scriptures, when indeed they know little more than those Scriptures which they have been taught to pervert.

It was a culpable ignorance of our Lord Jesus, to speak of it as certain and past dispute, that Jesus was of Galilee. By inquiring of Himself, or his mother, or his disciples, or by consulting the genealogies of the family of David, or the register at Bethlehem, they might have known, that He was a native of Bethlehem; but this they willingly are ignorant of. Gross falsehoods in matters of fact concerning persons and things, are often taken up by prejudiced and partial men, and great resolves founded upon them, even in the same place and age wherein the persons live, and the things are done, while the truth might easily be found out.

Others were enraged against Him, and would have taken Him, v. 44. Though what He said was most gracious, they were exasperated against Him for it. Thus did our Master suffer ill for saying and doing well. They would have taken Him; they hoped somebody would seize Him, and if they had thought no one else would, they would have done it themselves. But no man laid hands on Him, being restrained by an invincible power, because his hour was not come. As the malice of Christ's enemies is always unreasonable, so sometimes the suspension of it is unaccountable.

V. 45-53. The chief priests and Pharisees are here in a close cabal, contriving how to suppress Christ; though this was the great day of the feast, they attended not the religious services, but left that to the vulgar, to whom it was common to turn over the business of devotion, while they sought themselves better employed in the affairs of church policy. They

Though the gifts of Christ's grace are long deferred, they are well secured: and while we are waiting for the good promised, we have the promise to live upon, which shall speak and shall not lie.

This discourse occasioned differences; There was a division among the people because of Him. There was a schism; diversities of opinions, managed with heat and contention, and such as set them at variance. Think we that Christ came to send peace, that all would unanimously embrace his Gospel? No, the effect of the preaching of his Gospel would be division; while some are gathered to it, others will be gathered against it; and this will put things into a ferment, as here; but this is no more the fault of the Gospel, than it is the fault of a wholesome medicine, that it stirs up the peccant humors in the body, in order to discharge them.

Some were well affected to Him; Many of the people, when they heard this saying, heard Him with such compassion and kindness invite sinners, and with such authority engage to make them happy, could not but think highly of Him. Some of them said, Of a truth this is that Prophet which Moses spake of to the fathers, who should be like unto him: or, This is the prophet, who, according to the received notions of the Jewish church, is to be the forerunner of the Messiah; or, This is truly a prophet, divinely inspired and sent of God. Others went further, and said, This is the Christ, not the prophet of the Messiah, but the Messiah Himself. The Jews had at this time a more than ordinary expectation of the Messiah, which made them ready to say upon every occasion, Lo, here is Christ, or, Lo, He is there; and this seems to be only the effect of some such confused and floating notions, which caught at the first appearance, for we do not find that these people became his disciples; a good opinion of Christ is far short of lively faith: many give Christ a sat in the council-chamber, expecting Christ to be brought a prisoner to them having issued warrants for his apprehension. Here we are told,

Their officers returned without Him.

1. They reproved the officers for not executing the warrant; Why have ye not brought Him? He appeared publicly, the people were many of them disgusted, and would have assisted them in taking Him; this was the last day of the feast, and they would not have such another opportunity; 'Why then did you neglect your duty?' It vexed them that their own creatures, who depended on them, and on whom they depended, into whose minds they had instilled prejudices against Christ, should thus disappoint them. Note, Mischievous men first that they cannot do the mischief they would. Ps. 112: 10. Neh. 6: 16.

2. The reason which the officers gave, Never man spake like this Man. This was a very great truth, that never any man spake with that wisdom, power, that convincing clearness, and that charming sweetness, wherewith Christ spake; none of the prophets, not Moses himself. The very officers that were sent to take Him, were taken with Him. Though it is probable that they had no quick sense of reason or eloquence, and, it is certain, had no inclination to think well of Jesus, yet so much self-evidence was there in what Christ said, that they could not but prefer Him before all those that sat in Moses' seat. Thus Christ was preserved, by the power God has upon the consciences even of bad men. Their masters could not endure to hear any thing that tended to the honor of Christ, and yet could not avoid hearing this. Providence ordered it, that this should be said to them, that it might be a vexation in their sin, and an aggravation of it. Their own officers are witnesses against them, who could not be suspected to be biased in favor of Christ. This testimony should have made them reflect; 'Do we know what we are doing, when hating and persecuting one that speaks so admirably well?'

The Pharisees endeavor to secure their officers to their interest, and to prejudice them against Christ, to whom they saw them begin to be well affected; to prevent which, they suggest two things:

(1.) That if they embrace the Gospel of Christ, they will deceive themselves; Are ye also deceived? Christianity has, from its first rise, been represented to the world as a great cheat, and they that embrace it as men deceived, when they began to be undecided. They that looked for a Messiah in external pomp, thought them deceived who believed in a Messiah that appeared in poverty and disgrace; but the event declares, that none were ever more shamefully deceived, or put a greater cheat upon themselves, than those who promised themselves wealth and secular dominion with the Messiah. Observe the compliment the Pharisees put upon these officers; 'Are ye also deceived?' What! men of your sense! men that know better than to be imposed upon by every pretender and upstart teacher? They endeavor to prejudice them against Christ, by persuading them to think well of themselves.

(2.) Most men, even in religion, are willing to be governed by the example of those of the first rank; these officers, therefore, are desired to consider, that if they become disciples of Christ, they go contrary to those who were persons of quality and reputation; 'Have any of the rulers, or of the Pharisees, believed on Him?' You know they have not, and you ought to be bound by their judgment, and to believe and do in religion according to the will of your superiors; will you be wiser than they? Some of the rulers did embrace Christ, (Matt. 9: 18. ch. 4: 53.) and more believed in Him, but wanted

Verse 41.

'Probably it was but little known at Jerusalem, at that juncture, that Jesus was born at Bethlehem. The length of time; the Magi going some another way, not through Jerusalem; the slaughter of the children at Bethlehem, in which it might be thought that Jesus Himself had perished, and his private manner of living from his birth to his ministry, had all contributed to obliterate or weaken the memory of that remarkable event; so that it is probable there were few or none then living at Jerusalem who had charged their memories with so obscure a fact as Jesus' being born there, and his mother entering among the descendants of David.'

Verse 42.

Hath not the Scripture said? 'Here there was a reference to several passages of Scripture, which they explained of the Messiah and his birth. See Is. 11: 1. Jer. 23: 5. Mic. 5: 2. Ps. 89: 36' ly great. Note, As the wisdom of God has often chosen things which are chosen.

They reproach them as ignorant of the Word of God; They know not the law; as if none knew the law but those that knew it from them, and no scripture-knowledge were current but what came out of their mint; and as if none knew the law, but such as observed their canons and traditions. Perhaps many whom they thus despised, knew the law, and the prophets too, better than they. Many a plain, unlearned disciple of Christ, by meditation, experience, prayer, and especially obedience, attains to a more clear, and useful knowledge of the Word of God, than some great scholars. Thus David came to understand more than the ancients, and all his teachers, Ps. 119:99, 100. If the common people did not know the law, yet the chief priests and Pharisees, of all men, should not have upbraided them with it: for whose fault was it but theirs, who should have taught them better, but instead of that, took away the key of knowledge? Luke 11:52.

How magisterially they pronounce sentence upon them; they are cursed; hateful to God and all wise men: as execrable people. Their saying they were cursed, did not make them so, for the curse causeless shall not come. It is a usurpation of God's prerogative, as well as great uncharitableness, to say of any particular persons, much more of any body of people, that they are reprobates. We are unable to try, and therefore unfit to condemn, and our rule is,

Verse 48. Reproach. 'The sanhedrim, whose duty it was to take care that no false doctrines should be promulgated, and to hold inquiry concerning those who were making innovations in the church.' Kunsel. 'Thus they argue from the two-fold authorities, both judicial and magistral.' Grotius. 'Instead of arguments, they bring forward the authority of those who have the reputation of learning, as men who impugn the truth usually do.'

Verse 49. This people. 'Rather, this rabble. It expresses the Hebrew phrase, "son of the earth," common among the rabbins, who, to the question, Who is a "son of the earth," a plebeian? answer variously. He that doth not repeat the Kischma morning and evening, together with his other prayers. He who wears not phylacteries. He who wears no fringes on his garments. He who hath children, but doth not bring them up in the study of the law. [That is, the Jewish scriptures, including the oral traditions, and the interpretations of the doctors.] He who, although he study the law, yet doth not minister unto the learned. In such contempt were these "sons of the earth" held by the wise, that they gave them the appellation of dogs, would not eat with them, and excluded them from all the more honorable offices of life. This arrogance may be compared with the contempt so decidedly shown by the Gentiles towards those, who had not been initiated into their mysteries.' Lampe. 'How forcible, in this light, is the message of our Lord to John, giving a distinctive mark of his dispensation. The poor have the Gospel preached to them.'

Ed.

Bless, and curse not. Some think they mean more than, they are apt to be deceived, and made fools of; but they use this odious word, cursed, to express their own indignation, and to frighten their officers; thus the language of hell calls every thing that is displeasing, cursed, and damned. For aught that appears, those officers had their convictions stifled by these suggestions, and never inquire further after Christ; one word from a ruler or Pharisee will sway more with many than reason, and the interests of the soul.

Even in their corrupt sanhedrim, God left not Himself quite without witness: nor was the vote against Christ unanimous.

He that appeared against them was Nicodemus, that came to Jesus by night, being one of them, v. 50. Though he had been with Jesus, and taken Him for a Teacher, yet he retained his place in the council. Some impute this to his weakness and cowardice, and think it was his fault that he did not quit his place; but Christ had never said to him, Follow Me, else he would have left all to follow Him; it seems rather to have been his wisdom not to throw up his place; because there he might serve Christ and his interest, and stem the tide of the Jewish rage, which perhaps he did more than we are aware of. He might there be as Hushai among Absalom's counsellors, instrumental to turn their counsels into foolishness. Though we must in no case deny our Master, yet we may wait for an opportunity of confessing Him to the best advantage. God has his remnant among all sorts; and many times finds, or puts, or makes, some good in the worst places. There was Daniel in Nebuchadnezzar's court, and Nehemiah in Artaxerxes's. Though at first he came to Jesus by night, for fear of being known; yet, when there was occasion, he boldly appeared in defence of Christ, and opposed the whole council that were set against Him. Thus many believers, who at first were ready to flee at the shaking of a leaf, have at length, by divine grace, grown courageous, and able to laugh at the shaking of a spear. Let none justify the disguising of their faith by the example of Nicodemus, unless, like him, they be ready, upon the first occasion, openly to appear in the cause of Christ, though they stand alone, for so Nicodemus did here, and ch. 19:39.

He alleged against their proceedings, (v. 51.) Doth our law judge any man before it hear him, and know what he doeth? No, nor Joth the law of any civilized nation all w it. [1.] He argues from the principles of their own law, and an incontestable rule of justice. Had he urged the excellency of Christ's doctrine, or the evidence of his miracles, or repeated to them his discourse with Joth, (ch. 3:) it had been but to cast pearls before swine, who would trample them under their feet, and would turn again, and rend him; therefore he waives them.

[2.] Whereas they had reproached the people, especially the followers of Christ, as ignorant of the law, he here tacitly retorts the Verse 52. 'Many still lose their souls nearly in the same way. They suffer themselves to be led away by common report; and, getting prejudiced against the truth, refuse to give it a fair hearing, or to examine for themselves. It is on this ground that delusion and irreligion have established themselves, and still maintain their posts.' Dr. A. CLARKE.

Out of Galilee ariseth no prophet. Now Galilee had produced four, or, perhaps, five great prophets, as Jonas, (2 Kings 14:25.) Nahum, Habakkuk, Amos, and, as some indeed maintain, Elisha. In view of these facts, Doddridge, and Campbell attribute this false assertion to the ignorance or forgetfulness of the priests, or the hurry of anger. Perhaps, says Bloomfield, we may suppose them speaking of what had been usually the case at a comparatively recent date, (as the prophets of the Old Testament had all lived from four to eight hundred years before) namely, since the country had borne the name of Galilee. But see Isa. 9:1.

Verse 53. And every man, &c. 'By this it seems to be hinted, says Lampe, that the meeting was broken up, without any thing being concluded upon: probably on account of the evening sacrifice. For at the time of evening sacrifice, says Lightfoot, it was usual to break up all meetings, and adjourn all business. So Cocceius informs us, that the greater council sat only to the sixth hour of the day, yet the great sanhedrim sat to the time of the evening sacrifice.' BLOOMFIELD.

CHAP. VIII.

Jesus teaches at the temple, 1, 2. The Pharisees lay a snare for Him, in respect of a woman taken in adultery; but He turns it to their confusion, and warns the woman to sin no more, 3-11. He declares Himself to be the Light of the world, 12; justifies his doctrine, shews that his Father bore witness to Him, and predicts the doom of unbelievers, 13-28. Many believe, whom He exhorts 'to continue in his word,' promising them liberty by the knowledge of the truth, 30-32. He refutes the cavils, and detects the vain confidence of the Jews who opposed Him; shewing that they are the slaves of sin, and the children of the devil, 33-47. Being reviled, as a Samaritan and possessed, He refutes the charge, promises life to believers, asserts his dignity, and adds, 'Before Abraham was, I AM,' 48-58. He withdraws from those who attempt to stone Him, 59.

JESUS *went unto the mount of Olives.

must be known in judgment; and the scale of justice be used before the sword of justice.

Now we may suppose that the motion Nicodemus made was, that Jesus should be desired to give them an account of Himself and his doctrine, and that they should favor Him with an impartial hearing; but, though none of them could gainsay his maxim, none of them would second his motion.

What was said to this objection. Here is no direct reply given; but, when they could not resist the force of his argument, they fell foul upon him, and what was to seek in reason, they made up in railing and reproach. Note, It is a sign of a bad cause, when men cannot bear to hear reason, and take it as an affront to be minded of its maxims. Whoever are against reason, give cause to suspect that reason is against them. See how they taunt him; Art thou also of Galilee? v. 52. Some think he was well enough served for continuing among them, and for his speaking no more on the behalf of Christ, than what he might have said on behalf of the greatest criminal—that he should not be condemned unheard. Had he said, 'As for this Jesus, I have heard Him myself, and know He is a Teacher from God, and you, in opposing Him, fight against God,' as he ought to have said, he could not have been worse abused, than he was for this feeble effort of his tenderness for Christ.

How false the grounds of their arguing are, for, [1.] They suppose that Christ was of Galilee, which was false, and, if they would have inquired, they might have found it so. [2.] They suppose that because most of his disciples were Galileans, all were; whereas He had abundance of disciples in Judea. [3.] They suppose that out of Galilee no prophet had risen, and for this appeal to Nicodemus; this was false too; Jonah was of Gath-hepher, Nahum an Elkoshite, both of Galilee. Thus do they make lies their refuge.

Their arguings upon these grounds were a shame to rulers and Pharisees. Is a man of worth and virtue ever the worse for the obscurity of his country? The Galileans were the seed of Abraham; barbarians and Scythians are charge upon themselves, and shows how ignorant they were of some of the first principles of the law; so unfit were they to give law to others.

[3.] The law is here said to judge, and hear, and know, when magistrates that govern, and are governed by it, judge, and hear, and know; for they are the mouth of the law.

[4.] It is highly fit that none should come under the sentence of the law, till they have first by a fair trial undergone its scrutiny. Judges, when they receive the complaints of the accuser, must always reserve in their minds room for the defence of the accused, for they have two ears to remind them to hear both sides; this is said to be the manner of the Romans, Acts 25: 16. The method of our law is Oyer and Terminer, first to hear, and then to determine.

[5.] Persons are to be judged, not by what is said of them, but by what they do; our law will not ask what men's opinions are of law, or outcries against them, but, What have they done? What overt acts can they be convicted of? Sentence must be given, according to what is alleged and proved. Facts, and not faces, and the scale of justice be used before the sword the seed of Adam; and have we not all one Father? Supposing no prophet had risen east of Galilee, yet it is not impossible that any should arise thence. If Elijah was the first prophet of Gilead, (as perhaps he was,) and if the Gileadites were called fugitives, must it therefore be questioned whether he were a prophet or no?

Hereupon they broke up the assembly in confusion, and every man went to his own house. They met to take counsel together against the Lord and his Anointed, but imagined a vain thing; all the politics of the cabal were broken to pieces with one plain, honest word. They were not willing to hear Nicodemus, because they could not answer him. As soon as they perceived they had one such man among them, they saw it was to no purpose to go on with their design, and therefore put off the debate to a more convenient season, when he was absent. Thus the counsel of the Lord is made to stand in spite of the devices of men.

CHAP. VIII. v. 1-11. Though Christ was abused in the foregoing chapter, both by rulers and people, He is still at Jerusalem, in the temple; how often would He have gathered them!

He went unto the mount of Olives; whether to some friend's house, or to some booth pitched there, now at the feast of tabernacles, is not certain; whether He rested there, or continued all night in prayer to God, we are not told. But He went out of Jerusalem, perhaps, because He had no friend that had either kindness or courage to give Him a night's lodging; while his persecutors had houses of their own, (ch. 7: 53.) He could not so much as borrow a place to lay his head on, but must go a mile or two out of town. He retired, (as some think,) because He would not expose himself to the peril of a popular tumult in the night. It is prudence to go out of the way of danger, whenever we can without going out of the way of duty. In the day-time, when He had work to do in the temple, He willingly exposed Himself, and was under special protection, Isa. 49: 2. But in the night, when He had not work to do, He withdrew into the country.

What a diligent preacher Christ was; Early in the morning He came again and taught. Though He had been teaching the day before, He taught again to-day. Christ was a constant Preacher, in season and out of season. Three things are taken notice of concerning Christ's

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 37-53. Still the divine Redeemer proclaims aloud to every man, 'Let him, who is athirst, come to Me, and drink.' Happy then is he, whom nothing can satisfy, except the enjoyment of God! Let him come unto Jesus, that this thirst may be allayed, and let him not fear a repulse.—From our smitten Rock the waters of life flow abundantly, to follow the true Israelites through this wilderness. The miraculous operations of the Spirit we do not now expect; but for his more ordinary and valuable sanctifying influences we may confidently pray: these will not only be 'in us a well of water springing up into everlasting life,' but they will flow forth in our words and works, to refresh our fellow-pilgrims in the desert, and be the means of quickening such as were dead in sin. (Notes, P. O. Ez. 47: 1-12).—From our Redeemer these holy streams have flowed, through apostles, evangelists, and a succession of believers, down to this distant age, and this remote corner of the earth! may we communicate them to those around us, and to such as shall succeed us, till the whole world be replenished.—But alas! how few are athirst! Even they, who are for a time impressed, and who speak highly of the words of Jesus, as more excellent than those of all other teachers, 'speaking as never man spake,' often speedily lose their convictions, and go on in their sins; while infidels and Pharisees consider all as deluded, who coincide not with them in opinion. Frequently they revile, as ignorant enthusiasts, or nypocrites, such as are far more serious, and impartial in searching for the truth, than themselves, and whose words and works are scriptural and exemplary: but it seems enough for them to answer, 'Have any of the rulers and Pharisees believed in Him?' Whereas the opinions of men of this description have more generally been a criterion of error, than the test of truth. But if a few of their own description are convinced of the truth, and dare avow it, they likewise are treated with obloquy, as weak, deluded persons, who have suffered themselves to become dupes. Thus the wicked from age to age proceed in precisely the same track: yet the Lord gradually brings forward the weak and timid disciples, and makes use of them to disconcert the designs of his enemies; for 'his counsel shall stand, and He will do all his pleasure.'

CHAP. VIII. v. 1, 2. It is probable that our Lord went every evening to Bethany, to the house of Martha, where He was more retired than He could have been in the city.

SCOTT.

(11-12.) The genuineness of the first eleven verses of this chapter is much controverted, as it is wanting in several MSS. and ancient versions, and is found in considerable variations in those in which it is retained. It is found, however, in the greater part of the MSS. extant, of various recensions; and the learned Mr. Nolan has shown it to be probable, that it was omitted for certain reasons by Eusebius, in that edition of the Greek Testament which he was commanded by Constantine to prepare for public use; and likewise in subsequent editions, under the influence of his name and authority. The subject of the story, says that eminent critic, forms as convincing a proof in support of its genuineness, as it does in the subversion of the contrary notion, that it is an interpolation. There could be no possible inducement for fabricating such a passage, while there is an obvious motive for removing it from the canon. It has, besides, internal evidence of authenticity, in the testimony of the Vulgate, in which it is uniformly found, and external, in the express acknowledgment of its genuineness by Chrysostom, Jerome, Augustine, and Ambrose; and Augustine has specified the reason of its having been withdrawn from the text of the evangelist. Add to this, that the plain and simple style is that of the evangelist, and that every circumstance is completely in character, exactly what might be expected from the scribes and Pharisees, and from our Lord: while his answer, though perfectly suited to the purpose, would scarcely have ever been thought of by human ingenuity.

2 And ^{early} in the morning he came again into the temple, and all the people came unto him: and he sat down, and taught them.

3 And the Scribes and Pharisees brought unto him a woman taken in adultery; and, when they had set her in the midst, perhaps taken, during the time of the feast of tabernacles, when, it may be, their dwelling in booths, and their feasting, might, by wicked minds, which corrupt the best things, be made occasions of sin. Those that were taken in adultery were, by the Jewish law, to be put to death, which the Roman powers allowed, and therefore she was brought before the ecclesiastical court. Observe, She was taken in her adultery. Those that promise themselves secrecy in sin, deceive themselves. The scribes and Pharisees set her in the midst of the assembly, as if they would leave her wholly to the judgment of Christ, He having sat down, as a Judge upon the bench.

They prefer an indictment against her; (v. 4.) Master, this woman was taken in adultery. Here they call him Master, whom but the day before they called a deceiver; in hopes with their flatteries to insnare him, as Luke 20: 20. But though men may be imposed upon with compliments, He that searches the heart, cannot.

A buttery, even in the patriarchal age, before Moses, was looked upon as an iniquity to be punished by the judges, Job 31: 9, 11. Gen. 38: 24. The Pharisees, by their prosecution of this offender, seemed to have great zeal against the sin, when it appeared afterward that they themselves were not free from it; ay, they were full of all uncleanness, Matt. 23: 27, 28. Note, It is common for those that are indulgent to their own sin, to be severe against the sins of others.

The proof of the crime was, she was taken in the act, so that there was no room left to plead not guilty; had she not been taken in this act, she might have gone on till her heart had been perfectly hardened; but it is a mercy to sinners, to have their sin brought to light, that they may do no more presumptuously. Better our sin should shame than damn us; and be set in order for our conviction, than for our condemnation.

They produce the statute in this case made and provided, and upon which she was indicted, v. 5. Moses commanded that such should be stoned. Moses commanded that they should be put to death, (Lev. 20: 10. Deut. 22: 22.) but not stoned, unless the adulteress was espoused, not married, or was a priest's daughter, Deut. 22: 21. Note, Adultery is an exceeding sinful sin; it is the rebellion of a vile lust, not only against the command, but against the covenant of God. It is the violation of a divine institution in innocency, by the indulgence of one of the basest lusts of man in his degeneracy.

They pray his judgment in the case; 'But what sayest Thou, who pretendest to be a Teacher come from God, to repeal old laws and enact new?' If they had asked this question in a sincere desire to know his mind, it had been very commendable. Administrators of justice should look up to Christ for direction; but this they said tempting Him, that they might have to accuse Him, v. 6. If He should confirm the sentence of the law, they would censure Him as inconsistent with Himself, (He having received publicans and harlots,) and with the character of the Messiah, who should be meek, and proclaim a year of release; and perhaps would accuse Him to the Romans for countenancing the Jews in the exercise of judicial power. But, [2.] If He should acquit her, and give his opinion that the sentence should not be executed,

(1.) The time; early in the morning. Though He lodged out of town, and perhaps had spent much of the night in prayer, yet He came early. When a day's work is to be done for God and souls, it is good to begin betimes. (2.) The place; in the temple; not so much because it was a consecrated place, (for then He would have chosen it at other times,) as because it was now a place of concourse. And He would hereby countenance assemblies for religious worship, and encourage people to come to the temple, for He had not yet left it desolate. (3.) His posture; He sat down, and taught, as one having authority, and as one that intended to abide by it for some time.

All the people came unto Him; and perhaps many of them were country-people, who were this day to return home from the feast, and were desirous to hear one sermon more from Christ. They came to Him, though He came early. They that seek Him early shall find Him. Though the rulers were displeased at those that came to hear Him, yet they would come; and He taught them, though they were angry at Him too. Though there were few or none among them that were persons of figure, Christ bid them welcome.

The scribes and Pharisees would not only not hear Christ patiently themselves, but disturbed Him when the people were attending on Him, and contrived to pick a quarrel with Him, to bring Him into a snare, v. 3-6.

They brought Him a woman taken in adultery; perhaps taken, during the time of the feast of tabernacles, when, it may be, their dwelling in booths, and their feasting, might, by wicked minds, which corrupt the best things, be made occasions of sin. Those that were taken in adultery were, by the Jewish law, to be put to death, which the Roman powers allowed, and therefore she was brought before the ecclesiastical court. Observe, She was taken in her adultery. Those that promise themselves secrecy in sin, deceive themselves. The scribes and Pharisees set her in the midst of the assembly, as if they would leave her wholly to the judgment of Christ, He having sat down, as a Judge upon the bench.

They prefer an indictment against her; (v. 4.) Master, this woman was taken in adultery. Here they call him Master, whom but the day before they called a deceiver; in hopes with their flatteries to insnare him, as Luke 20: 20. But though men may be imposed upon with compliments, He that searches the heart, cannot.

A buttery, even in the patriarchal age, before Moses, was looked upon as an iniquity to be punished by the judges, Job 31: 9, 11. Gen. 38: 24. The Pharisees, by their prosecution of this offender, seemed to have great zeal against the sin, when it appeared afterward that they themselves were not free from it; ay, they were full of all uncleanness, Matt. 23: 27, 28. Note, It is common for those that are indulgent to their own sin, to be severe against the sins of others.

The proof of the crime was, she was taken in the act, so that there was no room left to plead not guilty; had she not been taken in this act, she might have gone on till her heart had been perfectly hardened; but it is a mercy to sinners, to have their sin brought to light, that they may do no more presumptuously. Better our sin should shame than damn us; and be set in order for our conviction, than for our condemnation.

They produce the statute in this case made and provided, and upon which she was indicted, v. 5. Moses commanded that such should be stoned. Moses commanded that they should be put to death, (Lev. 20: 10. Deut. 22: 22.) but not stoned, unless the adulteress was espoused, not married, or was a priest's daughter, Deut. 22: 21. Note, Adultery is an exceeding sinful sin; it is the rebellion of a vile lust, not only against the command, but against the covenant of God. It is the violation of a divine institution in innocency, by the indulgence of one of the basest lusts of man in his degeneracy.

(3-11.) Our Lord did not mean, that no man ought to act as judge or witness in a criminal cause, who is not wholly exempt from sin in his own conduct; because that would dissuail civil government, which is the ordinance of God. But He knew the concealed iniquities of these men; and by thus appealing to conscience in respect of themselves, He made them sensible of the impropriety of their taking an active part in this prosecution. There is no decisive proof that she was a true penitent; for our Lord, in saying, 'Neither do I condemn thee,' spoke only of condemnation to death according to the judicial law; (Marg. Ref. 1.-o.-Notes, 18: 33-36. Luke 12: 13, 14.) and the expression 'Sin no more,' was a direct and strong condemnation of ed, (as they expected He would,) they would represent Him, First, As an enemy to the law of Moses, and as one that usurped an authority over it, and would confirm that prejudice against Him, which his enemies were so industrious to propagate, that He came to destroy the law and the prophets. Secondly, As a friend to sinners, and, consequently, a favorer of sin; if He should seem to connive at wickedness, and let it go unpunished, they would represent Him as being a patron of offences, if He were a protector of offenders; than which no reflection could be more invidious upon One that professed the strictness, purity, and business of a prophet.

He seemed to turn a deaf ear; He stooped down, and wrote on the ground. It is impossible to tell what He wrote; but it is the only mention made in the gospels of Christ's writings; Eusebius indeed speaks of his writing to Abgarus, king of Edessa. Grotius says, It was some weighty saying, and that it was usual for wise men, when they were very thoughtful, to do so. Jerome and Ambrose suppose He wrote, Let the names of these wicked men be written in the dust. Others this, The earth accuses the earth, but the judgment is mine. Christ by this teaches us to be slow to speak, when difficult cases are proposed, not quickly to shoot our bolt; and when provocations are given us, or we are bantered, to pause and consider before we reply; think twice before we speak once; The heart of the wise studies to answer. Some Greek copies give this account of the reason of his writing on the ground, as though He heard them not. He did, as it were, look another way, to show that He was not willing to take notice of their address, saying in effect, Who made Me a judge or a divider? It is safe, in many cases, to be deaf to that which it is not safe to answer, Ps. 38: 13. Christ would not have his ministers be entangled in secular affairs; let them rather employ themselves in lawful studies, and fill up their time with writing on the ground, (which nobody will heed,) than busy themselves in that which does not belong to them. But when Christ seemed as though He heard them not, He made it appear that He not only heard their words, but knew their thoughts.

When they importunately or rather impertinently pressed Him, He turned the conviction of the prisoner upon the prosecutors.

They continued asking Him, and his seeming not to take notice of them, made them the more vehement, for they thought they had run Him aground, and that He could not avoid contradicting either the law of Moses, if He should acquit the prisoner, or his own doctrine of mercy, if He should condemn her; and therefore they pushed their appeal with vigor; where as they should have construed his disregard of them as a check to their design, and an intimation to them to desist, as they tendered their own reputation.

At last, He put them all to shame and silence with one word; He lifted up Himself, awaking as one out of sleep, (Ps. 78: 65.) and said unto them, He that is without sin among you, let Him first cast a stone at her.

Christ avoided the snare which they had laid for Him, and saved his own reputation. He neither reflected upon the law, nor excused the prisoner's guilt; nor did He on the other hand encourage the prosecution, or countenance their heat; see the good effect of consideration. When we cannot make our point by steering a direct course, it is good to fetch a compass.

In the net which they spread is their own foot her conduct.' (Marg. Ref. p.-Note, 5: 10-14.) No conclusive argument can hence be drawn, concerning the punishment of adultery under the Christian dispensation; and doubtless it is absurd, that this crime should escape almost without legal sentence, when theft in many cases is punished with disproportionate severity. (3.) In adultery. (Matt. 5: 27, 28. 19: 18. Mark 10: 19. Luke 16: 18. 18: 20. Rom. 2: 22. Jam. 2: 11. Rev. 2: 22.) Where the law of Moses is referred to, the word always signifies the woman to be the wife of another man; and never denotes the case of a married man lying with a woman neither married nor betrothed to another. But the New Testament rule considers this also as adultery.

6 This they said, tempting him, that they might have to accuse him. But Jesus stooped down, and with his finger wrote on the ground, ^a as though he heard them not.

7 So when they continued asking him, he lifted up himself, and said unto them, ^b He that is without sin among you, let him first cast a stone at her.

8 And again he stooped down, and wrote on the ground.

9 And they which heard it, being convicted by their own conscience, ^c went out one by one, beginning at the eldest, even unto the last: and Jesus was left ^d alone, and the woman standing in the midst.

brought this woman to Christ. It was a received opinion among the Jews, that if the husband who brought his wife to that trial, had himself been at any time guilty of adultery, the bitter water had no effect upon the wife. 'According to your own tradition will I judge you; if you are without sin, stand to the charge, and let the adulteress be executed; but if not, though she be guilty, while you that present her are equally so, according to your own rule she shall be free.'

In this He attended to the great work which He came into the world about, and that was to bring sinners to repentance; not to destroy, but to save. He aimed to bring not only the prisoner to repentance, by showing her his mercy, but the prosecutors, too, by showing them their sins; they thought to insnare Him, He sought to convince and convert them. Thus the blood-thirsty hate the upright, but the just seek his soul.

taken. They came with a design to accuse Him, but were forced to accuse themselves. Christ owns it was fit the prisoner should be prosecuted, but appeals to their consciences, whether they were fit to be the prosecutors.

He refers to that rule which the law of Moses prescribed, in the execution of criminals, that the hand of the witnesses must be first upon them, (Deut. 17:7,) as in the stoning of Stephen, Acts 7:58. The scribes and Pharisees were the witnesses against this woman. Christ puts it to them, whether, according to their own law, they would dare to be the executioners. Durst they take away that life with their hands, which they were now taking away with their tongues; would not their own consciences fly in their faces if they did?

He builds upon an uncontested maxim in morality, that it is absurd for men to be zealous in punishing others, while they are as guilty themselves, and they are not better than self-condemned, who judge others, and yet themselves do the same thing; 'If there be any of you that has not some time or other been guilty of fornication or adultery, let him cast the first stone at her.' Not that magistrates, who are conscious of guilt themselves, should therefore connive at others' guilt. But, (1.) Whenever we find fault with others, we ought to reflect upon ourselves, and to be more severe against sin in ourselves than in others. (2.) We ought to be favorable, though not to the sins, yet to the persons, of those that offend, and to restore them with a spirit of meekness, considering ourselves, and our own corrupt nature. We either are, or have been, or may be, what he is.

Let this restrain us from throwing stones at our brethren, and proclaiming their fault. Let him that is without sin, begin such discourse as that, and then those that are truly humbled for their own sins, will blush at it, and be glad to let it fall. (3.) Those that are any way obliged to admonish upon the faults of others, are concerned to look well to themselves, and keep themselves pure, Matt. 7:5. The snuffers of the tabernacle were of pure gold.

Perhaps He refers to the trial of the suspected wife by the husband, with the waters of jealousy. The man was to bring her to the priest, (Num. 5:15.) as the scribes and Pharisees

Having given them this startling word, He left them to consider of it, and again stooped down and wrote on the ground, v. 8. As when they made their address, He seemed to slight their question, so now that He had given them an answer, He slighted their resentment of it; not caring what they said to it; the matter was lodged in their own breasts, let them make the best of it there. Or, He would not seem to wait for an answer, lest they should on a sudden justify themselves, and think themselves bound in honor to persist; but gives them time to pause, and to commune with their own hearts. God saith, I hearkened and heard, Jer. 8:6. Some Greek copies here read, He wrote on the ground, the sins of every one of them; this He could do, for He sets our iniquities before Him; and this He will do, for He will set them in order before us too; He seals up our transgressions, Job 14:17. But He does not write men's sins in the sand; they are written as with a pen of iron and the point of a diamond, (Jer. 17:1.) never to be forgotten till forgiven.

The scribes and Pharisees were thunderstruck with the words of Christ; they let fall their persecution of Christ, whom they durst no further tempt; and their prosecution of the woman, whom they durst no longer accuse; They went out one by one. Perhaps his writing on the ground frightened them, as the handwriting on the wall frightened Belshazzar. They concluded He was writing bitter things against them, writing their doom. Happy they who have no reason to be afraid of Christ's writing! What He said frightened them; by sending them to their own consciences; He had shewn them to themselves, and they were afraid, if they should stay till He lifted up Himself again, his next word would show them and shame them before men, and therefore they thought it best to withdraw. They went out one by one, that they might go out softly, and not disturb Christ; they got them away by stealth, as people being ashamed steal away when they flee in battle, 2 Sam. 19:3. The order of their departure is taken notice of, beginning at the eldest, either because they were most guilty, or first aware of the danger they were in of being put to the blush. And if the eldest retreat ingloriously, no marvel if the younger follow them.

They which heard it were convicted by their own consciences. Conscience is God's deputy in the soul, and one word from Him will set it on work, Heb. 4:12. Those that had been old in adulteries, and long fixed in a proud opinion of themselves, were startled by the word of Christ; even scribes and Pharisees, who were most conceited of themselves, by the power of Christ's word are made to retire with shame.

The folly of sinners under convictions, appears in these scribes and Pharisees. It is folly for those that are under convictions, to make it

(6.) But Jesus stooped down, &c.] 'By this posture, Jesus intended to signify, that He was little attentive to the business which these crafty persons were bringing forward, and that He did not care to answer their questions, because they were proposed with an insidious intent; and since He saw that the discussion of the subject would little tend to edification. Thus Euripides says, Silence is the answer of the wise. It plainly appears, that Christ traced no significant characters; yet this action was pregnant with meaning. For writing on the earth importeth to undertake a useless labor. Christ therefore meant to hint that fully to answer their question, and change their opinions, would be as useless a labor as that of writing with his finger on the floor.' Kypke, in Bloomfield. Doddridge thinks there was 'language in the action.' It is hardly necessary to remark, how common this mode of expressing one's self is, at the present day, among the imaginative people of the East; especially where despotic power makes other language dangerous.

As to what Jesus wrote, Doddridge says, 'To be willing to be ignorant of what our great Master has thought fit to conceal, is no inconsiderable part of Christian learning.'

'Schottgen observes it was customary with the Jews, when any iniquitous inquiry was brought forward, (to which they did not choose to answer) to write something down, and thus seem to be otherwise employed.'

(7.) Without sin.] 'Not free from all sin, but from enormous sin; such as adultery, or any similar offence: for the Pharisees, &c., were undoubtedly guilty of gross immorality, and the whole land of Judea was defiled with such crimes. It is not unreasonable to suppose that the judges were more or less involved in immorality. See the passages cited from the Talmudists to prove the lasciviousness of several eminent rabbins. Josephus, too, bears ample testimony to the vices of his generation, which, says he, equalled those of Sodom. This corruption of the priests had been prophesied by Mal. 2:14-17. 3:15. and from various passages of the New Testament we find how exactly the prediction was accomplished.'

(8.) And again He stooped, &c.] 'That He might thereby give them an opportunity of withdrawing with less confusion.' JEROME

(9.) Conscience.] 'The original word, like the Latin, conscientia, is generally employed to denote the innate light of reason, by which any man possesses in himself the seeds and the rule of truth and falsehood, is conscious of his own essence, essence, relation, &c. But it is used more especially by the philosophers, and by the sacred writers, to denote the faculty consequent upon it, by which a man may exercise right judgment on the virtue or vice of his actions, and the happiness or misery thence resulting. Hence the office of reproach, rebuke, conviction, is well attributed to it.' Lampe. Some think 'there is an innate faculty which views all actions in the point of right or wrong, and indicates determinate actions as being just or unjust; which disposes mankind to look and to wish for justice, and which receives positive civil or religious legislation.' This faculty they call 'conscientiousness' &c.

Ed. Beginning from the eldest, &c.] 'That is, as it may be more strictly translated, from the more honorable to the lowest in dignity. So the word translated last means at Mark 9:35. and 1 Cor. 4:9. Whether, however, it be explained senior in age, or superior in station, or both, I see no reason why the phrase should be interpreted so rigorously as to induce the supposition that each particular person went out according to seniority. It merely denotes that all (her accusers) went out, one after another, from the first to the last, of every age and station.' So Markland and Doddridge.

BLOOMFIELD.

10 When Jesus had lifted up himself, and saw none but the woman, he said unto her, Woman, where are those thine accusers? hath no man condemned thee?

11 She said, No man, Lord. And Jesus said unto her, Neither do I condemn thee: go, and sin no more.

tions, and the woman standing in the midst of the assembly that were attending on Christ's preaching, where they set her, v. 3. She did not seek to escape, though she had opportunity for it; but her prosecutors had appealed to Jesus, and to Him she would go, on Him would wait for her doom. Note, Those whose cause is brought before our Lord Jesus, will never have occasion to remove it into any other court, for He is the refuge of penitents. The law which accuses us, and calls for judgment against us, is by the Gospel made to withdraw, its demands are answered, its clamors silenced, by the blood of Jesus. Our cause is lodged in the gospel-court; we are left with Jesus alone, for to Him all judgment is committed; let us therefore secure our interest in Him, and we are made forever. Let his Gospel rule us, and it will infallibly save us.

Here is the conclusion of the trial, and the issue it was brought to; (v. 10, 11.) Jesus lifted up Himself, and saw none but the woman. Though Christ may seem to take no notice of what is said and done, but leave it to the contending sons of men to deal it among themselves, yet, when the hour of his judgment is come, He will no longer keep silence. When David had appealed to God, he prayed, Lift up Thyself, Ps. 7: 6. and 94: 2. The woman, it is likely, stood trembling at the bar, as one doubtful of the issue. Christ was without sin and might cast the first stone; but though none more severe than He against sin, for He is infinitely just and holy, none more compassionate than He to sinners, for He is infinitely gracious and merciful, their principal care to avoid shame, as Judah, (Gen. 38: 23.) lest we be ashamed. Our care should be more to save our souls, than to save our credit. Saul evidenced his hypocrisy, when he said, I have sinned, yet now honor me, I pray thee. There is no way to get the honor and comfort of penitents, but by taking the shame of penitents. It is folly for those that are under conviction, to contrive how to get rid of it. The scribes and Pharisees had the wound opened, and now they should have been desirous to have it searched, and then it might have been healed; but that they dreaded. It is folly for those that are under convictions to get away from Christ, for He is the only one that can heal the wounds of conscience, and speak peace to us. Those that are convicted by their consciences, will be condemned by their Judge, if they be not justified by their Redeemer; and will they then go from Him? To whom will they go?

When the self-conceited prosecutors fled, the self-condemning prisoner stood her ground, with a resolution to abide by the judgment of Jesus; Jesus was left alone, free from their molestations, and this malefactor finds Him so, now that she stands upon her deliverance.

Here is the method of the courts of judicature observed:

First, The prosecutors are called; Where are those thine accusers? Hath no man condemned thee? Christ knew where they were, but He asked, that He might shame them, and encourage her. St. Paul's challenge is like this, Who shall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect? Where are these their accusers? The accusers of the brethren shall be cast out, and all indictments quashed.

Secondly, They do not appear when the question was asked; Hath no man condemned thee? She said, No man, Lord. She speaks respectfully to Christ, calls Him Lord, but says nothing in answer to that question which concerned them, Where are those thine accusers? She does not insult over them as witnesses against themselves, not against her. If we hope to be forgiven by our Judge, we must forgive our accusers; and if their accusations, how invidious soever, were the happy occasion of awakening our consciences, we may easily forgive them this wrong. True penitents find it enough to give account of themselves to God, and will not undertake to give account of other people.

Thirdly, The prisoner is therefore discharged; Neither do I condemn thee; go, and sin no more. 1. Consider this, as her discharge from the temporal punishment; 'If they do not condemn thee to be stoned to death, neither do I.' Not that Christ came to disarm the magistrate of his sword of justice, or that it is his will that capital punishments should not be inflicted; so far from that, public justice is established by the Gospel, and made subservient to Christ's kingdom; By Me kings reign. But Christ would not condemn this woman, (1.) Because it was none of his business; He was no judge or divider, and therefore would not intermeddle in secular affairs. His kingdom was not of this world. (2.) Because she was prosecuted by those that were more guilty than she, and could not for shame insist upon their demand against

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

7. -11. In the conduct of our Lord we see an example of strict attention to retired devotion, connected with the greatest diligence in public usefulness: but we must be very careful in redeeming our time, and moderate in animal recreation, if we would tread in his steps; and not allow these distinct, and too often detached, parts of our duty, to entrench on each other.—Even Jesus Himself could scarcely be more active in doing good, than his enemies were, and always have been, in devising evil; for malice will convert any thing into an occasion of mischief. The ministers of the Gospel, therefore, want divine wisdom; for they will be encountered by subtle, as well as powerful opponents; yet their enemies are seldom more dangerous, than when they assume the appearance of friendship; and, in the language of respect, attempt to inveigle them to meddle with matters not belonging to them, or to interfere in the concerns of rulers. (P. O. Matt. 22: 15-22).—Adultery most certainly merits far severer punishment than it generally meets with; and we may sometimes state the law of God respecting these things: but we should not leave our employment to direct magistrates, unless called to that service. If any persuade us openly to intermeddle out of our line of duty, we should look upon it as a temptation, that they may accuse us, either as unobedient men, enemies to civil liberty, or as turbulent innovators, disaffected to the authority which God has placed over us. We should, therefore, generally act as though we heard them not; and answer repeated solicitations by some serious address to conscience; thus 'studying to be quiet, and mind our own business.'—The prosecution of criminals is in itself a good work: yet it is frequently conducted by such persons and from such motives, that the accusers are, in the sight of God, the most atrocious. From regard to society they cannot be wholly excluded: nor should we require too much of those, who concur in the necessary but painful employment, of bringing offenders to justice: yet he, who prosecutes another for a capital offence, and is himself living in the practice of habitual wickedness, has need to tremble at the prospect of more terrible vengeance from God, than that which he calls for upon a fellow-criminal from human justice. He should therefore pause, and prepare for his awful employment, by self-examination, prayer, and amendment of life: lest he bring upon himself swift destruction. Were such barriers placed around our courts of justice, were such rules proclaimed in them, and adhered to, how would they be thinned! While many, convicted by conscience, would go out one by one, perhaps beginning at the eldest and greatest persons, the prosecution might be left unfinished, and the criminals escape. Nay, if solemn religious ordinances could be fenced against those, who are habitually practising secret iniquity, it is to be feared that the small number of our communicants would often be diminished. These reflections may convince us, what little reason men have to object to the doctrine of free salvation: they only, who have sinless obedience, ought to cast a stone at the preachers of unmerited forgiveness, and eternal life the free gift of God, through faith in Christ: all else should thankfully receive their message. The same considerations may also show us the readiest way of dealing with objectors: address their consciences, call their sins to remembrance; it may render those silent, from fear of detection and recollection of guilt, whom no arguments can reach. Though we must not excuse crimes, nor object to merited punishment, yet we should hence learn to be gentle and compassionate, even in performing the severest offices; and ever to show a disposition to forgive, and be kind to the vilest, as we hope for mercy from God to our own souls. We should, however, strongly urge the admonition, 'Sin no more!' otherwise an escape from temporal punishment can only give an opportunity of 'treasuring up wrath against the day of wrath.'

SCOTT.

(11.) 'We are not to suppose that our Lord meant to excuse guilt, or to find fault with the law of Moses, which was the law of God. By that law, adultery was to be punished with death. But the sentence could not be passed without accusers and witnesses, who were all fled. Proper magistrates must pass it; and, had they done so, Christ would not have interposed to hinder the execution of justice. But they not having condescended her, whose proper office it was, no more would Christ, whose office it was not. With respect to the law, He left all as it was;

He neither condemned nor absolved the woman. But, as the Publisher of the Gospel, and the Author of salvation, He directed her how to obtain the pardon of Heaven, and eternal life; namely, by her truly repenting of her sin, as never to return to it again.' HORSB.
'The above story is admirably suited to the scope and intent of the evangelist, since it contains various criteria of the true Messiah. See Ps. 82, 1, 4, 8. Mal. 3: 5. Ps. 35: 4.'

15 Go to go and sin no more, Rom. 6: 1, 2. Will not Christ condemn thee? Go to them and sin no more

V. 12-20. That these disputes were the same day that the adulteress was discharged, is probable, for the evangelist mentions no other day, and takes notice (v. 2.) how early Christ began that day's work. The Pharisees that accused the woman were absconded, yet there were others (v. 13.) to confront Christ, who had impudence enough to keep them in countenance, though some of their party were put to a shameful retreat; nay, perhaps that made them the more industrious to quarrel with Him, to retrieve, if possible, the reputation of their party.

In these verses, the doctrine is, that Christ is the Light of the world; (v. 12.) Then spake Jesus again unto them; though He had spoken a great deal unto them, and what He had said was opposed, yet He speaketh once, yea, twice. He spake again to them, saying, I am the Light of the world. Note, Jesus Christ is the Light of the world. One of the rabbies saith, Light is the name of the Messiah, as it is written, (Dan. 2:22.) And light dwelleth with Him. God is Light, and Christ is the Image of the invisible God. He was expected to be a Light to lighten the Gentiles, (Luke 2:32.) and so the Light of the world, not of the Jewish church only. The visible light of the world is the sun, and Christ is the Sun of righteousness. One sun enlightens the whole world, so does one Christ. Christ's being the Light, speaks, (1.) What He is in Himself—most excellent and glorious. (2.) What He is to the world—the Fountain of light. What a dungeon would the world be without the sun? So would it be without Christ, by whom light came into the world, ch. 3: 19.

The inference is, he that followeth Me, as a traveller follows the light in a dark night, shall not walk in darkness, but shall have the light of life. If Christ be the Light, then,

(1.) It is our duty to follow Him, and in every thing take directions from Him, in the way to happiness. Many follow false lights, that lead them to destruction; Christ is the true Light. It is not enough to look at and gaze upon her. This law appointed the witnesses to be first upon the criminal, and afterward all the people, so that if they do not condemn her, the prosecution drops. The justice of God, in temporal judgments, sometimes takes notice of a comparative righteousness, and spares those who are otherwise obnoxious, when the punishing of them would gratify those that are worse, Deut. 32: 26, 27. Christ dismissed her with this caution, Go, and sin no more. Impunity emboldens malefactors, and therefore those who have found means to escape the law, need to double their watch, lest Satan get advantage; for, the fairer the escape, the fairer the warning to go and sin no more. They who help to save the life of a criminal, should, as Christ here, help to save the soul.

2. As her discharge from eternal punishment. For Christ to say, I do not condemn thee, is to say, I do forgive thee; and the Son of man had power on earth to forgive sins, and could upon good grounds give this absolution; for as He knew the hearts of the prosecutors, and therefore said that which would confound them, so He knew the repentance of the prisoner, and therefore said that which would comfort her, as He did to that women who was likewise looked upon with disdain by a Pharisee; (Luke 7: 48.) Thy sins are forgiven thee, go in peace. So here, Neither do I condemn thee. Note, (1.) They are truly happy, whom Christ doth not condemn, for his discharge is a sufficient answer to all other challenges. (2.) Christ will not condemn those, who, though they have sinned, will go and sin no more, Ps. 85: 8. Isa. 55: 7. He will not take advantage against us for former rebellions, if we will return to our allegiance. (3.) Christ's favor in the remission of the sins that are past, should prevail with us to go and sin no more, Rom. 6: 1, 2. Will not Christ condemn thee?

it, we must follow it, believe in it, and walk in it, for it is a light to our feet, not our eyes only.

(2.) Those who follow Christ, shall not walk in darkness. They shall not be left destitute of those instructions which are necessary to keep them from destroying error, and those directions which are necessary to keep them from damning sin. They shall have the light of life, that knowledge and enjoyment of God, which will be to them the light of spiritual life in this world, and of everlasting life in the other. Follow Christ, and we shall undoubtedly be happy in both worlds. Follow Christ, and we shall follow Him to heaven.

The objection which the Pharisees made against this doctrine, was very frivolous; (v. 13.) Thou bearest record of thyself, thy record is not true. Self commendation is commonly concluded to be the language of self-love, such as we are all ready to condemn in others, but few are willing to own in themselves. But in this case the objection was unjust, for, 1. They made that his crime, and a diminution to the credibility of his doctrine, which, in the case of one who introduced a divine revelation, was necessary. Did not Moses and all the prophets bear witness of themselves; when they avouched themselves to be God's messengers? Did not the Pharisees ask John Baptist, What sayest thou of thyself? 2. They overlooked the testimony of all other witnesses, which corroborated the testimony He bore of Himself. Had He only borne record of Himself, his testimony had indeed been suspicious; and the belief of it might have been suspended; but his doctrine was attested by more than two or three credible witnesses.

Christ does not retort upon them, as He might, ('You profess yourselves to be devout and good men, but your witness is not true;') but plainly vindicates Himself, and though He had waived his own testimony, (ch. 5: 31.) yet here He abides by it, that it did not derogate from his other proofs, but was necessary to show the force of them. He is the Light of the world, and it is the property of light to be self-evidencing. First principles prove themselves.

He urges three things, to prove that his testimony, though of Himself, was true and cogent.

1. That He was conscious of his own authority, and satisfied in Himself concerning it. He did not speak in uncertainty, nor propose a disputable notion, which He Himself hesitated about, but declared a decree, and gave such an account of Himself as He would abide by; I know whence I come, and whither I go. He was fully apprized of his own undertaking from first to last; knew what his success would be; knew what He was before his manifestation to the world, and what He should be after; that He came from the Father, and was going to Him, (ch. 16: 28.) came from glory, and was going to glory, ch. 17: 5. This is the satisfaction of all good Christians, that though the world know them not, yet they know whence their spiritual life comes, and whither it tends.

2. That they were very incompetent judges of Him, and of his doctrine.

(1.) They were willingly and resolutely ig-

Verse 12.

After this interruption, our Lord proceeded to instruct the multitudes; and the sun being perhaps at this time just risen, he thence took occasion to declare Himself to be 'the Light of the world.' (Marg. Ref. r.—1. 4-9. 12: 34-36, 44-50. Mal. 4: 2, 3.)

SCOTT. I am the Light. 'He who followeth my commandments shall not live in darkness, ignorance, and vice, and the misery consequent upon it; but he shall enjoy the light of knowledge and happiness.' Verses 13-18.

THOR. harras' witness of Thyself, &c. 'Therefore, by thine own confession, (ch. 8: 31.) thy testimony is not to be admitted as true. Jesus answered, I know, &c. I speak from my own certain knowledge, and have already shown that I come with a divine commission; and therefore you ought to admit my testimony; for the most evident demonstrations of my divine origin have been given you, both in the nature of my doctrine, and in the miracles which I have wrought among you; but you are so perverse, that as often as I have hinted or declared it, you know not yet from whence I come, and whither I am going; which is not to be ascribed to the want of sufficient evidence, but merely to the force of your own prejudices; for you judge according to the maxims of the flesh and sense, and will believe nothing in opposition to these principles, which you have so rashly imbibed. (The same carnal prejudices still prevail in the minds of the Jews, and prevent their reception of Christ; they laying it down as a first principle, that he is to be a great temporal Prince and Deliverer. And the admission of false principles, which are constantly taken for granted, and never examined, will, I fear, be attended with fatal consequences to thousands more.) But if I should judge, the Savior continues, my judgment is true and right; for I am not alone, (do not bear witness alone of myself) in what I say, but I and my Father, that sent Me, as we are in other respects inseparably united, do evidently concur together in the testimony that I give. And it is written in your own law, that the testimony of two men is true, and must be admitted. (Deut. 17: 6. and 19: 15.) Now I am (one) who bear this witness of Myself, in a fact, the truth of which I cannot but certainly know, and the Father who sent Me is another, who also bears his testimony to Me; thereby asserting the truth of every doctrine I teach. But the sentence I might pass.

That which makes his judgment unexceptionable is,

[1.] His Father's concurrence with Him; I am not alone, but I and the Father. He had the Father's concurring counsels to direct; as He was with Him in the world, in executing those counsels, Isa. 11: 2. All the counsels of peace (and of war too) were between them both, Zech. 6: 13. He had also the Father's concurring power to confirm what He did; see Ps. 89: 21, &c. Isa. 42: 1. He did not act separately, but in his own name and his Father's, ch. 6: 17, and 14: 9, 10.

[2.] His Father's commission to Him; 'It is the Father that sent Me.' Note, God will go along with them that He sends; see Exod. 3: 10, 12. Come, and I will send thee, and certainly, I will be with thee. Now, if Christ had a commission from the Father, and the Father's presence with Him, in all his administrations, no doubt his judgment was true and valid; no exception lay against it, no appeal lay from it.

Look upon Him as a Witness, and now He appeared no otherwise, (having not as yet taken the throne of judgment,) and as such his testimony was true: this He shows, v. 17, 18.

(15.) Flesh. ^aYe judge from passion and prejudice.

^a This word in the New Testament is frequently used to denote the inferior powers of the soul, the passions and appetites; and it is in this meaning opposed to 'spirit,' which denotes the superior faculties of reason and conscience. CAMPBELL.

I judge no man. ^aOn the connection of this clause with the preceding, commentators are not agreed; and from its extreme brevity, it is impossible to determine it with certainty. Lampe understands, 'I as yet judge,' &c. Kuinoel explains, 'I judge no man thus, i. e. after the flesh and outward appearance; and therefore ought not to be so judged by you.' So Morus and Rosenm.

^a (16.) I am not alone in my testimony, for my Father and I have such a mutual in-being, as to be inseparable one from the other; so that I am never alone. His Father is in Him, and He is in the Father; (ch. 14: 10, 11,) and so the Father is no more alone without the Son, than the Son is without the Father. (Prov. 8: 22, 23, 30, and John 1: 2.) His Father and He were not one and another God, but one in Godhead, though distinct persons, and therefore inseparable from each other; and though the Son came from the Father in a certain dispensation, for the assumption of human nature, and acting in office upon earth, as God is sometimes said to come from heaven for particular manifestations of Himself; yet Christ did not leave the Father, or the Father leave Him, any more than God leaves heaven when He is said to come down to this earth; and that our Lord here speaks of Himself, norant; Ye cannot tell whence I come, and whither I go. To what purpose is it to talk with those who know nothing, nor desire to know? He had told them of his coming from heaven and returning to heaven, but it was foolishness to them, they received it not. They took upon them to judge of that which they did not understand. They that despise Christ's dignities, speak evil of what they know not, Jude 8, 10.

(2.) They were partial, (v. 15.) ye judge after the flesh. When fleshly wisdom gives the rule of judgment, and outward appearances only are given in evidence, men judge after the flesh; and when secular interest turns the scale in spiritual matters, when we judge in favor of the carnal mind, and a carnal world, we judge after the flesh; and the judgment cannot be right, when the rule is wrong. The Jews judged of Christ and his Gospel by outward appearances, and because He appeared so mean, thought it impossible He should be the Light of the world; as if the sun, under a cloud, were no sun.

(3.) They were unjust and unfair toward Him, intimated in this, 'I judge no man;' I neither make nor meddle with your political affairs, nor does my doctrine or practice at all interfere with your civil rights or powers; He thus judged no man; now if He did not rear after the flesh, it was unreasonable to judge Him after the flesh; and to treat Him as an offender against the government. Or, 'I judge no man;' that is, 'not now in my first coming, that is deferred till I come again,' ch. 3: 17. The first coming of Christ was for the purpose of administering, not justice, but medicine.

His testimony of Himself was sufficiently supported by the testimony of his Father, with Him, &c. for Him, (v. 16.) And if I judge, my judgment is true. He did in his doctrine judge, (ch. 9: 39,) though not politically.

As a Judge, his own judgment was valid; if I, who have authority to execute judgments, I to whom all things are delivered, I who am the Son of God, and have the Spirit of God, if I judge, my judgment is of incontestable rectitude and authority, (Rom. 2: 2.) and then you would be condemned; but the judgment-day is not yet come, you are not yet to be condemned, but spared, and therefore now I judge no man.

First, He quotes a maxim of the Jewish law (v. 17.) that the testimony of two men is true. Not as if it were always true in itself, for many a time had been joined in hand to bear false testimony, 1 Kings 21: 10. But it is allowed as sufficient evidence, upon which to ground a verdict, and if nothing appear to the contrary, it is taken for granted to be true. Reference is here had to that law, (Deut. 17: 6.) At the mouth of two witnesses shall he that is worthy of death, be put to death. And see Deut. 19: 15. Num. 35: 30. It is in favor of life that, in capital causes two witnesses were required, as with us in case of treason. See Heb. 6: 18.

Secondly, He applies this to the case in hand, (v. 18.) I am one that bear witness of Myself; and the Father that sent Me bears witness of Me. Though in human courts, where two witnesses are required, the criminal is not admitted to be a witness for himself; yet in a matter purely divine, which can be proved only by divine testimony, and God Himself must be the Witness, if the formality of two or three witnesses be insisted on, there can be no other than the eternal Father, the eternal Son, and the eternal Spirit. Now, if the testimony of two distinct persons, that may deceive, or be deceived, is conclusive, much more ought the testimony of the Son of God concerning Himself, backed with the testimony of his Father concerning Him, to command assent; see 1 John 5: 7, 9-11. This proves, not only that the Father and the Son are two distinct Persons, (for their respective testimonies are here spoken of as the testimonies of two several Persons,) but these two are one, not only in their testimony, but in power and glory, and therefore the same in substance. St. Austin here takes occasion to caution his hearers against Sabellianism on the one hand, which confounded the Persons in the Godhead, and Arianism on the other, which denied the Godhead of the Son and Spirit. The Son is one Person, and the Father another; they do not, however, constitute two Beings, but the Father is the same Being that the Son is, that is, the only true God.

Christ here speaks of Himself and the Father as Witnesses to the world, giving evidence to the reason and conscience of men. These Witnesses to the world now, will be Witnesses against those that perish in unbelief, and their word will judge men.

This was the sum of the first conference between Christ and these carnal Jews; in the conclusion of which, we are told how their tongues were let loose, and their hands tied.

Though in what He said there appeared nothing of human artifice, but a divine security, yet they set themselves to cross questions with Him. None so incurably blind, as those that will not see.

They evaded conviction with a cavil; Then said they unto Him, Where is thy Father? They might easily have understood, by this and his other discourses, that when He spoke of his Father, He meant no other than God; yet they pretend to understand Him, of a common person; and since He appealed to his testimony, as not being alone, with regard to his divine nature, seems evident; because, in the next foregoing verse but one, He had spoke of Himself, in that high consideration of Him, saying, I know whence I came, but ye cannot tell whence I came; whereas, with respect to his human nature, He had before allowed that they knew whence He was. (Ch. 7: 28.) GUYSE.

Verse 19.

Where is thy Father? ^aSome of the ancients thought it a sarcasm on the birth of Christ. Others think they were not ignorant that Jesus treated of his heavenly Father, (as in 27:) maliciously dissembling their knowledge; and that they wished, by his more explicit declaration, to convict Him of blasphemy. They asked Him, says Kuinoel, jeeringly, Where is this father, that we may interrogate him? We do not see this other witness. To which Jesus indignantly replies, 'Your very question betrays the malignity of your hearts, and shows that you neither know, nor care to know, either Me or my Father. If you would know Me as a Teacher sent from heaven, you would know that it is God who beareth witness of Me, though not in a visible way, yet by miracles.' Thus, says Lampe, He skillfully casts back their stigma.

Here our Lord plainly intimates that his Father and He were distinct persons, as they were two witnesses, and yet were one in essence and divine perfections, as the knowledge of Him includes the knowledge of the Father. GUYSE.

20 These words spake Jesus in the treasury, as he taught in the temple: and no man laid hands on him; for his hour was not yet come.

21 ¶ Then said Jesus unto them, I go my way, and ye shall seek me, and shall die in your sins: whither I go, ye cannot come.

22 Then said the Jews, Will he kill himself? because he saith, Whither I go, ye cannot come.

Christosom proved hence the Godhead of Christ, and his equality with his Father. We cannot say, 'He that knows a man, knows an angel,' or, 'He that knows a creature, knows the Creator;' but we may say, 'He that knows Christ, knows the Father.' Secondly, By Him we shall be instructed in the knowledge of God, and introduced into an acquaintance with Him. If we knew Christ better, we should know the Father better; but where the Christian religion is slighted, natural religion will soon be laid aside. Deism makes way for atheism. Those become vain in their imaginations concerning God, that will not learn of Christ.

Their hands were tied, though their tongues were thus let loose; such was the power of Heaven to restrain the malice of hell. These words spake Jesus, bold words, words of conviction and reproof, in the treasury, an apartment of the temple, where, to be sure, the chief priests, whose gain was their godliness, were mostly resident, attending the business of the revenue. Christ taught in the temple, sometimes in one part, sometimes in another, as He saw occasion. Now the priests, who had so great a concern in the temple, and looked upon it as their demesne, might easily, with the assistance of their janizaries that were at their beck, either have seized Him, and exposed Him to the rage of the mob, and that punishment which they called the beating of the rebels; or, at least have silenced Him, as Amos, though tolerated in the land of Judah, was forbidden to prophesy in the king's chapel, Amos 7:12,13. Yet even in the temple, where they had Him in their reach, No man laid hands on Him, for his hour was not yet come. See here, (1.) The restraint laid upon his persecutors by an invisible power. God can set bounds to the wrath of men, as He does to the waves of the sea; let us not therefore fear danger in the way of duty. God hath Satan and all his instruments in a chain. (2.) The reason of this restraint; His hour was not yet come. The frequent mention of this, intimates how much the time of our departure out of the world depends upon the decree of God. It will come, it is not yet come, but is at hand. Our enemies cannot hasten it any sooner, nor our friends delay it any longer, than the time appointed of the Father; which is very comfortable to every good man, who can say with pleasure, My times are in thy hands; and better there than in our own. His hour was not yet come, because his work was not done, nor his testimony finished. To all God's purposes there is a time.

V. 21-30. Christ here warns the unbelieving Jews, to consider what would be the consequence of their infidelity, before it was too late; for He spake words of terror as well as words of grace. Observe here,

Jesus said again unto them that which might be likely to do them good. He continued to teach, in kindness to those few who received his doctrine, which is an example to ministers to go on with their work, notwithstanding opposition, because a remnant shall be saved. Here Christ changes his voice; He had poured to them in the offers of his grace, and they had not danced; now He murmurs to them in the denunciations of his wrath, to try if they would lament. He said, I go my way, and ye shall seek Me, and shall die in your sins. Whither I go, ye cannot come. Every word is terrible, and speaks spiritual judgments, the sorest of all; worse than war, pestilence, and captivity, which the Old-Testament prophets denounced.

Four things are here threatened against the Jews:

1. Christ's departure from them; I go my way, that is, 'It shall not be long before I go.' They said to Him, Depart from us, we desire not the knowledge of thy ways; and He takes them at their word; but woe to those they had Him call his witness. Where is thy Father? Thus, as Christ said to them, (v. 15.) they judge after the flesh. Perhaps they hereby intend a reflection upon the meanness and obscurity of his family; Where is thy father, that he should be fit to give evidence in such a case as this? Thus they turn it off with a taunt, when they could not resist the wisdom and spirit with which He spake.

He evaded the cavil with a further conviction; He did not tell them where his Father was; but charged them with wilful ignorance; 'Ye neither know Me, nor my Father. It is to no purpose to discourse to you about divine things, who talk of them as blind men do of colors. Poor creatures! ye know nothing of the matter.'

He charges them with ignorance of God; Ye know not my Father. In Judah was God known, (Ps. 76:1.) they had some knowledge of Him as the God that made the world, but their eyes were darkened that they could not see the light of his glory in the face of Jesus Christ. The little children of the Christian church know Him as a Father; (1 John 2:13.) but these rulers of the Jews did not, because they would not.

He shows them the cause of their ignorance of God; If ye had known Me, ye should have known my Father also. The reason why men are ignorant of God is, they are unacquainted with Christ. Did we know Christ, First, In knowing Him we should know the Father, of whose Person He is the express image, ch. 14:9.

Secondly, By knowing Him we should know the Father, of whose Person He is the express image, ch. 14:9.

Thirdly, By knowing Him we should know the Father, of whose Person He is the express image, ch. 14:9.

Fourthly, By knowing Him we should know the Father, of whose Person He is the express image, ch. 14:9.

From whom Christ departs. The glory, our defence, is departed, when Christ goes. John frequently warned them of his departure before He left them; He bid often farewell, as you loath to depart, who would have them stir up themselves to take hold on Him.

2. Their enmity to the true Messiah, and their insatiable inquiries after another Messiah, when He was gone, which were both their sins and their punishments; Ye shall seek Me, which speaks either, (1.) Their enmity to the true Christ; 'Ye shall seek to ruin my interest, by persecuting my followers.' This was a continual vexation and torment, and made them incurably ill-natured, and brought wrath upon them to the uttermost. Or, (2.) 'Ye shall continue your expectations of the Messiah, and be the self-perplexing seekers of a Christ to come when He is already come;' like the Sodomites who, being struck with blindness, wearied themselves to find the door, Rom. 9:31,32.

3. Their final impenitency; Ye shall die in your sins. All the Greek copies have it in the singular number,—in your sin, so all the Latin versions; and Calvin has a note upon it, that here it is meant especially of the sin of unbelief,—in this sin of yours. Note, Those are forever undone, who die in unbelief. Or it may be understood in general, Ye shall die in your iniquity, as Ezek. 3:19, and 33:9. Many that have long lived in sin, by a timely repentance, through grace, are saved from dying in sin; but for those who go out of this world under the guilt of sin unpardoned, and the power of sin unbroken, there remaineth no relief; Job 20:11. Ezek. 32:27.

4. Their eternal separation from Christ and all happiness in Him; Whither I go, ye cannot come. When Christ left the world, He went to a state of perfect happiness; He went to paradise, and took the penitent thief with Him, that did not die in his sins; but the impenitent not only shall not come to Him, but they cannot; it is morally impossible, for heaven would not be heaven to those that die unsanctified, and unmeet for it. Ye cannot come, because ye have no right to enter into that Jerusalem, Rev. 22:14. Whither I go, ye cannot come, to fetch me thence, so Whither; and the same is the comfort of all Christians, that, when in heaven, they will be out of the reach of their enemies' malice.

Instead of trembling at this word, they turned it into ridicule; (v. 22.) Will He kill Himself? See here, 1. What slight thoughts they had of Christ's threatenings; they could make themselves merry with them, as those that mocked the messengers of the Lord, and turned the burden of the word of the Lord into a by-word, and precept upon precept, line upon line, into a merry song, Isa. 31:13. But be ye not mockers, lest your bands be made strong. 2. What ill thoughts they had of Christ's meaning, as if He had a design upon his own life, to avoid the indignities done Him, like Saul. This is indeed (say they) to go whither we cannot follow Him, for we will never kill ourselves. Thus they make Him not only such a one as themselves, but worse; yet in the calamities brought by the Romans upon the Jews, many of them in despair did kill themselves. They had put a much more favorable construction upon this word of his; (ch. 7:34,35.) Will He go to the dispersed Gentiles? Indulged malice grows more and more malicious.

1. He had said, Whither I go, ye cannot come, and here He gives a reason; (v. 23.) Ye are from beneath, I am from above; ye are of this world, I am not of this world. Ye are of those things which are beneath; noting, not so much their rise from beneath, as their affection to these lower things; 'Ye are in with these things; how can ye come where I go, when your spirit and disposition are so directly contrary to mine? The Spirit of Jesus was—not gospel-promise, If we believe that Christ is He, and receive Him, we shall not die in our sins. The law saith absolutely to all, as Christ said, (v. 21.) "Ye shall die in your sins, for we are all guilty before God; but the curse of the law is annulled to all that submit to the grace of the Gospel; believers die in Christ, in his love, and so are saved from dying in their sins.

(1.) The question which the Jews put to Him; (v. 25.) Who art Thou? This they asked tauntingly. He had said, Ye must believe that I am He. By his not saying expressly who He was, He plainly intimated that in his person He could not be described by any, and in his office such a one as was expected by all that looked for redemption in Israel; yet this awful manner of speaking, they turned to his reproach, as if He knew not what to say of Himself; "Who art Thou, that we must with implicit faith believe that Thou art some mighty HE; we know not who, or what; nor are worthy to know."

(2.) He refers Himself to what He had always said; "Do you ask who I am? Even the same that I said unto you from the beginning." The original here is a little intricate, which some read thus; I am the Beginning, which also I speak unto you. Christ is called the Beginning; (Col. 1:18. Rev. 1:8. 21:6. 3:14.) and so it agrees with v. 24. I am He. Compare Isa. 41:4. I am the First, I am He. But most interpreters agree with our version. Do you ask, who I am?

1. I am the same that I said to you from the beginning of time in the Old Testament, the Seed of the woman, that should break the serpent's head, the Mediator of the covenant, and the Faith of the patriarchs.

2. From the beginning of my public ministry. He had declared Himself to be the Son of God, (ch. 5:17.) the Christ, (ch. 4:26.) the Bread of life, and had proposed Himself as the Object of that faith which is necessary to salvation, and to this He refers for an answer to their question. Christ is one with Himself; what He had said from the beginning, He saith still. His is an everlasting Gospel.

He refers Himself to his Father's judgment, and the instructions He had from Him; (v. 26.) "I have many things more than you think of, to say, and of this world, but from above. He was dead to wealth, the ease of the body, and the praise of men, and was wholly taken up with heavenly things; and none shall be with Him but those who are born from above, and have their conversation in heaven. How contrary to their spirit! "ye are from beneath, and of this world." The Pharisees were of a carnal spirit; and what communion could Christ have with them?

2. He had said, Ye shall die in your sins, and here He insists on it; "Therefore I said, Ye shall die in your sins, because ye are from beneath" and He gives this further reason for it, If ye believe not that I am He, ye shall die in your sins, v. 24. See here, (1.) What we are required to believe, that I am He, that I am, which is one of God's names, Exod. 3:14. It was the Son of God that there said, I will be what I will be; for the deliverance of Israel was but a figure of good things to come, but now He saith, "I am He; He that should come, the Messias. I do not only call Myself so, but I am He." True faith does not amuse the soul with empty words, but affects it with the doctrine of Christ's mediation, as a real thing that has real effects. (2.) How necessary it is that we believe this; if not, we shall die in our sins; for the matter is so settled, that without this faith, we cannot be saved from the power of sin while we live, and therefore shall certainly continue in it to the last. Nothing but the doctrine of Christ's grace and the Spirit of Christ's grace will be powerful enough, to turn us from sin to God; and that Spirit and doctrine is given, to be effectual to those only who believe in Christ: so that if Satan be not by faith dispossessed, He has a lease of the soul for life; if Christ do not cure us, our case is desperate, and we shall die in our sins. Without faith we cannot be saved from the punishment of sin, for the wrath of God remains upon them that believe not, Mark 16:16. Unbelief is the damning sin; it is a sin against the remedy. This implies the great in them to judge of you. But why should a trouble myself any further with you? I know that He who sent Me, is true, and who will sustain Me, for I speak to the world (to which I am sent as an Ambassador) those things and those only, which I have heard of Him." Here,

He suppresses his accusations of them. He had many things to charge them with, but for the present He had said enough. Note, Whatever discoveries of sin are made to us, He that searches the heart, has still more to judge of us, 1 John 3:20. How much soever God reckons with sinners in this world, there is still a further reckoning behind, Deut. 32:34. Let us learn hence not to be forward to say all we can, even against the worst of men; we may have many things to say by way of censure, which yet it is better to leave unsaid, for what is it to us?

He enters his appeal against them to his Father; He that sent Me. Here two things comfort Him.

1. That He had been true to his Father. I speak to the world (for his Gospel was to be preached to every creature) those things which I have heard of Him. Being given for a Witness to the people, (Isa. 55:4.) He was Amen, a faithful Witness, Rev. 3:14. He did not conceal his doctrine, but spake it to the world; being of common concern, it was to be of common notice; nor did He alter it, nor vary from the instructions He received.

2. That his Father would be true to Him, that He would make his mouth like a sharp sword; true to his purpose concerning Him which was a decree, (Ps. 2:7.) true to the threatenings of his wrath against those that should reject Him. Though He should not accuse them to his Father, yet the Father, who sent Him, would undoubtedly reckon with them, and would be true to what He had said (Deut. 18:19.) that whosoever would not hearken to that Prophet whom God would raise up, He would require it of Him. Christ would not accuse them; "For, He that sent Me is true, and will pass judgment on them." Thus He binds them over to the judgment-day, when it will be too late to dispute what they will not now be persuaded to believe. "I as a deaf man heard not, for Thou wilt hear." Ps. 38:14, 15.

Upon this part of our Savior's discourse, the evangelist has a melancholy remark; (v. 27.) They understood not that He spake to them of the Father. See here, 1. The power of Satan to blind the minds of them who believe not. Though Christ spake so plainly of God as his Father in heaven, yet they did not understand whom He meant, but thought He spake of some father He had in Galilee. Thus the plainest things are riddles to those who are resolved to hold fast their prejudices; day and night are alike to the blind. 2. The reason why the threatenings of the Word make so little impression upon the minds of sinners is, they understand not whose the wrath is, that is revealed in them. When Christ told them of the truth of Him that sent Him, as a warning to them to prepare for his judgment, which is according to truth, they slighted the warning, because they understood not whose judgment it was, that they made themselves obnoxious to.

He refers Himself to their own convictions hereafter, v. 28, 29. He finds they will not understand Him, and therefore adjourns the trial till further evidence should come in; they that will not see, yet shall see, Isa. 26:11. Now observe here,

Verse 24.

Some think that in the expression, "I am He," (the latter word is not in the original,) our Lord meant to avow Himself the great I AM, who spake to Moses. Another passage, indeed, in this chapter, is unequivocal to this purpose; (Note, 54-59, v. 58.) but the expression is sometimes applied to others, exactly as in this place; (9:9. Gr.) and it would weaken the argument to adduce it in proof of the doctrine; like a suspicious witness to a fact, which is otherwise sufficiently attested.

SCOTT.

That I am He, &c. "There is evidently an ellipsis here, to be supplied by comparing it with verse 12. Compare John 13:19. Mark 8:6. and Acts 13:25. The repetition of the threatening here, from verse 21. is a very awful rebuke to the folly of their answer, verse 24. as if our Lord had said, "It very ill becomes you to trifle and amuse yourselves with such silly and spiteful turns, when your life, even the life of your souls, is at stake; and to talk of my killing Myself, when by your unbelief and impenitency you are plunging yourselves into eternal death." Thus do those passages in our Lord's discourses, which, to a careless reader, might seem flat tautologies, appear, on an attentive review, to be animated with a most penetrating spirit, and to be full of divine dignity. A remark which will frequently occur, especially in reading those important discourses of Christ, which John has, through the infinite goodness of God to his church, recorded, after they had been omitted by the other evangelists.

they that put Him to death, thought thereby forever to have sunk Him, but it proved to be his advancement, ch. 12:24. When the Son of man was crucified, the Son of man was glorified. Christ had called his dying his going away, here his being lifted up; thus the death of the saints, as it is their departure out of this world, so it is their advancement to a better. He speaks of those H: is now talking with, as the instruments of his death; when ye have lifted up the Son of man: not that they were to be the priests to offer Him up, (that was his own act, He offered up Himself,) but they would be his betrayers and murderers; see Acts 2:23. They lifted Him up to the cross, but He lifted up Himself to his Father. With what mildness Christ speaks to those who, He certainly knew, would put Him to death, to teach us not to hate or seek the hurt of any, though they hate us, and seek our hurt!

Christ speaks of his death, as that which would be a powerful conviction of the infidelity of the Jews; When ye have lifted up the Son of man, then shall ye know this. And why then? 1. Because unthinking people are often taught the worth of mercies by the want of them, Luke 17:22. 2. The guilt of their sin in putting Christ to death, would so awaken their consciences, that they would inquire after a Savior, and then would know that Jesus was He. And so it proved, when, being told that with wicked hands they had crucified and slain the Son of God, they cried out, What shall we do? and were made to know assuredly, that this Jesus was Lord and Christ, Acts 2:

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 12-29. Every action of Jesus, as well as his doctrine, shows Him to us, as 'the Light of the world.' Let us then no longer look to mere philosophy for illumination; let us not implicitly follow any man: on the contrary, let us follow Jesus, that we 'may not walk in darkness, but have the light of life.' If we have begun to attend on Him for instruction, He has already, in some things, 'made darkness light before us,' and our path will shine more and more unto the perfect day. But unbelievers 'know not whence He came, and whither He is gone;' they judge after the flesh: yet they presume to judge Him, before whose righteous tribunal they must shortly stand: whereas, they are incompetent to decide upon the principles and conduct of his meaneft disciple. Such men often oppose precepts to doctrines: yet those precepts, properly explained, condemn their conduct, and bear witness to the doctrines which they oppose: yea, in every way God testifies to his Son, that salvation is by faith in Him alone. Those who know not his glory and grace, know not 'the Father that sent Him:' but, by the knowledge of the Son, believers attain to the knowledge of the Father.—The Redeemer has left this earth, where He was so hated and despised: yet none who truly 'seek Him, shall die in their sins,' or be excluded from that place, 'whither, as our Forerunner He is for us entered:' but those who conti-

When ye have lifted up.] ⁴ When ye have crucified Me, and thus atoned up the measure of your iniquities, ye shall know that I am the Christ, by the signs that shall follow: and ye shall know that what I spoke is true, by the judgments that shall follow. To be lifted up, is a common mode of expression among the Jewish writers for to die, or to be killed.

'He is now adduces the reason why the prediction contained in the words of verse 23 will, He trusts, have its fulfilment, 'Is with Me, 'co-operates with Me, assists Me.' Bloomfield The sense is com-

[1.] What they should ere long be convinced of; 'Ye shall know that I am He, that Jesus is the true Messiah. Whether you will own it or no, before men, you shall be made to know it in your consciences, the convictions of which, though you may stifle, you cannot baffle: that I am He, not what you represent me to be, but He that should come!' Two things they should be convinced of, in order to this. First, That He did nothing of Himself, not of Himself as Man, of Himself without the Father, with whom He was one. He does not hereby derogate from his own inherent power, but only denies their charge against Him as a false Prophet, of whom it is said, that they prophesied out of their own hearts. Secondly, That as his Father taught Him, so He spake these things, that He was not self-taught, but taught of God. The doctrine He preached was the counterpart of the counsels of God; I speak those things, not only which He taught me, but as He taught me, with the same divine power and authority.

[2.] When they should be convinced of this; When ye have lifted up the Son of man, upon the cross, as the brazen serpent under the pole, (ch. 3:14.) as the sacrifices under the law, (for Christ is the great Sacrifice,) which, when they were offered, were said to be lifted up; hence the burnt-offerings, the most ancient and honorable of all, were called elevations, and in many other offerings they used the significant ceremony of heaving the sacrifice up, and moving it before the Lord; thus was Christ lifted up. Or it notes that his death was his exaltation;

37. 3. There would be such signs and wonders attending his death and resurrection on, as would give a stronger proof of his being the Messiah than any that had been yet given; and multitudes were hereby brought to believe that Jesus is the Christ, who had before opposed Him. 4. By the death of Christ, the pouring out of the Spirit was purchased, who would convince the world that Jesus is He, ch. 16:7, 8. 5. The judgments which the Jews brought upon them selves, by putting Christ to death, were a sensible conviction to the most hardened among them, that Jesus was He; Christ had often foretold that desolation as the just punishment of their unbelief, and when it came to pass, they could not but know that the great Prophet had been among them, Ezek. 33:33.

What supported our Lord Jesus in the mean time, v. 29. He that sent Me, is with Me, for the Father hath not left Me alone, to manage for Myself, nor deserted the business or Me, in the prosecution of it, for I do always those things that please Him.

Here is, First, The assurance which Christ had of his Father's presence with Him, which includes both a divine power to enable Him for his work, and a divine favor to encourage Him in it. He that sent Me is with Me, Isa. 42:1. Ps. 89:21. This greatly emboldens our faith in Christ, that He had his Father with Him, to confirm the word of his Servant, Isa. 44:26. The King of kings accompanied his Ambassador, to attest his mission, and assist his management, and never left Him solitary or weak; it also aggravated the wickedness of those that opposed Him, and was an intimation to them, that by resisting Him, they were found fighters against God.

Secondly, The ground of this assurance; For I do always those things that please Him. That is, 1. That great affair which our Lord Jesus was continually engaged in, the Father that sent Him was well pleased with. His whole undertaking is called the pleasure of the Lord (Isa. 53:10.) because of the counsels of the eternal Mind about it, and the complacency of the eternal Mind in it. 2. His management of that affair was in nothing displeasing to his Father; in executing his commission He observed all his instructions; no mere man since the fall could say such a word as this, (for in many things we offend all,) but our Lord never offended his Father in any thing, but fulfilled all righteousness; and this was necessary to the validity of the sacrifice He was to offer up; for nue to deride his warnings, and thus prove themselves 'earthly, sensual, and devilish,' will perish as 'vessels of wrath fitted for destruction.'—But some will say, 'Who is Jesus?' What are 'we to believe concerning Him?' We allow Him to have been a Teacher of most excellent morality, a bright Example; we admit that He was the chief of men, or even of all creatures; and would even grant Him to be something more than a creature, if we could do it without acknowledging Him as "God over all, blessed for evermore;" and will not this suffice? Let Jesus Himself answer this question. Is this to honor Him, even as we honor the Father? Does this answer to his being 'the Light of the world,' 'the Life of men,' 'the Resurrection of the dead,' 'One with the Father,' the everlasting I AM? He, who said such things of Himself in the vale of humiliation, will not retract them on the throne of glory; and they who do not believe in Him, as being all this, and more than words can express, will perish in their sin; whatever they object to the bigotry of those who warn them of their danger. For Jesus has much to say and to judge of them: and all shall know, by their conversion, or in their condemnation, that He always spake and did those things which pleased the Father, even when He claimed the highest honors.

God's ministers to preach the Gospel, though it be with much contention, for they shall not labor in vain. For those endeavors, which are openly cavilled at by men of corrupt minds. Austin has an affectionate ejaculation in his lecture upon these words, I wish that when I speak, many may believe, not on me, but with me on Him.

V. 31-37. We have in these verses, a comfortable doctrine laid down concerning the spiritual liberty of Christ's disciples, intended to encourage those Jews which believed. Christ, knowing that his doctrine began to work upon some of his hearers, and perceiving that virtue had gone out of Him, turned his discourse from the Pharisees, and addressed Himself to weak believers; when He had denounced wrath against those that were hardened in unbelief, He spake comfort to those few feeble Jews which believed in Him. See here, 1. How graciously the Lord Jesus looks to those that tremble at his word; He has something to say to those who have hearing ears, and will not pass by those who set themselves in his way, without speaking to them. 2. How carefully He cherishes the beginnings of grace, and meets those that are coming toward Him. These Jews that believed, were yet but weak; but Christ did not therefore cast them off, for He gathers the lambs in his arms.

What He said to them, He saith to all that should at any time believe.

If ye continue in my word, then are ye my disciples indeed. When they believed on Him, as the great Prophet, they gave up themselves to be his disciples. Now, at their entrance into his school, He lays down this rule, that He would own none for his disciples, but those that continued in his word.

It is implied that there are many who profess themselves Christ's disciples, who are his disciples only in name. It highly concerns those that are not strong in faith, to see to it that they be sound in the faith, that, though they be not disciples of the highest form, they be disciples indeed. Those who seem willing to be Christ's disciples, ought to be told that they had as good never come to Him, unless they abide by Him. Let those who have thoughts of covenanting with Christ, have no thoughts of reserving a power of revocation. Children are sent to school, and bound apprentices only for a few years; but these only are Christ's, who are willing to be bound to Him for life. They only that continue in Christ's word, shall be accepted as his disciples, that adhere to his word in every instance without partiality, and abide by it to the end without apostasy. It is to dwell in Christ's word, as a man does at home, his centre, rest, and refuge. Our converse with the Word and conformity to it must be constant. If we continue disciples to the last, then, and not otherwise, we approve ourselves disciples indeed.

Here are two promises made to those who thus approve themselves disciples indeed, v. 32.

[1.] 'Ye shall know the truth, all that is needful and profitable for you to know, and shall be more confirmed in the belief of it.' Note, First, Even true believers and disciples indeed, may be much in the dark concerning many things which they should know. God's children are but children, and understand and speak as children. Did we not need to be taught, we should not need to be disciples. Secondly, It is a very great privilege to know if He had in any thing displeased the Father, and so had had any sin of his own to answer for, the Father could not have been pleased with Him as a Propitiation for our sins, but such a Priest and such a Sacrifice became us as was spotless. God's servants may expect God's presence with them, when they do those things that please Him, Isa. 56:4, 5.

As He spake these words, many believed on Him. Note, 1. Though multitudes perish in unbelief, there is a remnant according to the election of grace, who believe to the saving of the soul. If the whole body of Israel be not gathered, there are those of them, in whom Christ will be glorious, Isa. 49:5. This the apostle insists upon, to reconcile the Jews' rejection with the promises made to their fathers. There is a remnant, Rom. 11:5. 2. The words of Christ, and particularly his threatening words, are made effectual by the grace of God, to bring souls to believe in Him. When Christ told them that if they believed not, they should die in their sins, and never get to heaven, they thought it was time to look about them, Rom. 1:16, 19. 3. Sometimes there is a wide door opened, and an effectual, even where there are many adversaries. Christ will carry on his work, though the heathen rage. The Gospel gains great victories, sometimes, where it meets with great opposition. Let this encourage the Gospel, though it be with much contention, for they shall not labor in vain. For those endeavors, which are openly cavilled at by men of corrupt minds. Austin has an affectionate ejaculation in his lecture upon these words, I wish that when I speak, many may believe, not on me, but with me on Him.

If we continue disciples to the last, then, and not otherwise, we approve ourselves disciples indeed.

Here are two promises made to those who thus approve themselves disciples indeed, v. 32.

[1.] 'Ye shall know the truth, all that is needful and profitable for you to know, and shall be more confirmed in the belief of it.' Note, First, Even true believers and disciples indeed, may be much in the dark concerning many things which they should know. God's children are but children, and understand and speak as children. Did we not need to be taught, we should not need to be disciples. Secondly, It is a very great privilege to know the truth; the particular truths which we are to believe, in their mutual dependences and connections, and the grounds and reasons of our belief; to know what is truth, and what proves it to be so. Thirdly, It is a gracious promise of Christ to all who continue in his word, that they shall know the truth as far as is needful and profitable for them. Christ's scholars are sure to be well taught.

[2.] The truth shall make you free. The truth which Christ teaches, tends to make men free, Isa. 61:1. Justification makes us free from the guilt of sin, by which we were bound over to the judgment of God, under amazing fears; sanctification makes us free from the bondage of corruption, by which we are restrained from that service which is perfect freedom, and constrained to that which is perfect slavery. Gospel-truth frees us from the yoke of the ceremonial law, and the more grievous burthens of the traditions of the elders. It makes us free from our spiritual enemies, free in the service of God, free to the privileges of sons, and free of the Jerusalem which is from above. The knowing and believing this truth does actually make us free from prejudices, mistakes, and false notions, than which nothing more enslaves and entangles the soul, free from the dominion of lust and passion; and restores the soul to the government of itself, by reducing it into obedience to its Creator. The mind, by admitting the truth of Christ in light and power, is vastly enlarged, and has scope and compass given it, is raised above things of sense, and never acts with so true a liberty as when it acts under a divine command, 2 Cor. 3:17. The enemies of Christianity pretend to free-thinking, whereas those are the freest reasonings, that are guided by faith, and those are men of free thought, whose thoughts are captivated and brought into obedience to Christ.

The Jews took offence at this doctrine. Though it brought liberty to the captives, yet they cavilled at it, v. 33. The Pharisees, who grudging this comfortable word to them that believed, thought themselves reflected upon and affronted by the gracious charter of liberty granted; and therefore, with much pride and envy, answered Him, 'We Jews are Abraham's seed, therefore free-born, and have not lost our birth-right-freedom, we were never in bondage to any man; how sayest Thou then, to us Jews, Ye shall be made free?'

They were grieved at the inuendo, ye shall be made free; as if the Jewish nation were in some sort of bondage, which reflected on the Jews in general; and as if all that did not believe in Christ continued in that bondage, which reflected on the Pharisees in particular. Note, The privileges of the faithful are the envy and vexation of unbelievers, Ps. 112:10.

See what it was that they alleged against it; 'We are Abraham's seed, and Abraham was a prince, and a great man.' It is common for a sinking, decaying family to boast of its ancestors, and to borrow honor from that name to which they repay disgrace. But this was not all. Abraham was in covenant with God, and his children by his right, Rom. 11:29. That covenant, no doubt, was a free charter, and invested them in privileges not consistent with a state of slavery, Rom. 9:4. Therefore they think they had no occasion, with so great a sum, as they reckoned faith in Christ to be, to obtain this freedom, when they were thus free-born. Note, It is the common fault and folly of those that have pious parentage and education, to (30.) Many believed on Him.] 'Believed Him to be the Messiah. Though, as it should seem, their faith was but weak; and, therefore, though their hearts had been strongly impressed, (perhaps most of all on the heavenly temper and holy composure of Christ, unruined by the aims and insults of his enemies;) yet there was need that such impressions should be strengthened, which the wisdom of Christ effected, by turning his discourse especially to them, and addressing them as already of the number of his disciples.'

'The same sun that hardens the clay, softens the wax. This discourse, which proved the savor of death unto death to the obstinate Pharisee, becomes the savor of life unto life, to many of the simple-hearted people.'

'It is observable, that in the series of this discourse, Christ advances no new proof of his mission; so that probably these people were wrought upon by what they observed in the temper and conduct of Christ; bearing the perverseness of his enemies with so much patience, speaking of an ignominious and painful death with such holy composure, and expressing so genuine and lively a sense of his heavenly Father's approbation, and so sweet a complacency. And, perhaps, would ministers generally allow themselves to open with freedom the native workings of a heart deeply impressed with the Gospel, the secret charm might subdue those, whose subtlety and prejudice might be proof against the most conclusive abstract reasoning.'

Verse 31.

If ye continue in my word. 'Or, in this doctrine of mine. It is not enough to receive God's truth; we must retain, and walk in it. And it is only when we receive the truth, love it, keep it, and walk in it, that we are genuine disciples of Christ.'

33 They answered him, ^o We be Abraham's seed, and were never in bondage to any man: now sayest thou, 'Thou shalt be made free?'

34 Jesus answered them, ^v Verily, verily, I say unto you, ^o Whosoever committeth sin, is the servant of sin.

35 And ^v the servant abideth not in the house forever; ^o but the son abideth ever.

Jews, who were very jealous for the honor of their liberty, and of the Romans, who would not be thought to enslave the nations they conquered. How foolish the application. Christ had spoken of a liberty wherewith the truth would make them free, a spiritual liberty, the enfranchising of the mind, and the enlarging of that from the captivity of error and prejudice; and yet they plead against the offer of spiritual liberty, that they never were in corporal thraldom; as if, because they were never in bondage to any man, they were never in bondage to any lust. Note, Carnal hearts are sensible of no other grievances than those that molest the body, and distress their secular affairs. Talk to them of encroachments upon civil liberty and property; tell them of waste committed upon their lands, or damage done to their houses, and they understand you, and can give you a sensible answer; but discourse to them of the bondage of sin, a captivity to Satan, and liberty by Christ; tell them of wrong done to their souls, and the hazard of their eternal welfare, and you bring certain strange things to their ears; they say of it, as those did, (Ezek. 20:49.) Doth he not speak parables? This here was much like the blunder Nicodemus made about being born again.

Our Savior shows that, notwithstanding their civil liberties, and their visible church-membership, it was possible that they might be in bondage; (v. 34.) Whosoever committeth sin, though of Abraham's seed, and never in bondage to any man, is the servant of sin. Christ does not upbraid them with the falsehood of their plea, or their present bondage, but explains what He had said for their edification. Ministers should with meekness instruct those that oppose them, that they may recover themselves; not with passion provoke them to entangle themselves yet more.

The preface is very solemn; Verily, verily, I say unto you; which our Savior often used, to command a reverent attention. The style of the prophets was, Thus saith the Lord, for they were faithful as servants; but Christ, being a Son, speaks in his own name, I say unto you, I the Amen, the faithful Witness. 'I say it to you, who boast of your relation to Abraham, as if that would save you.'

The truth is of universal concern, though delivered upon a particular occasion; Whosoever committeth sin, is the servant of sin, and sadly needs to be made free. A state of sin is a state of bondage.

See who it is on whom this brand is fastened—on him that committeth sin. There is not a just man upon earth, that lives, and sins not; yet every one that sins, is not a servant of sin, for then God would have no servants; but he that makes choice of sin, prefers the way of wickedness before the way of holiness; (Jer. 44:16, 17.) that makes a covenant, a marriage with sin; that makes contrivances of sin, provision for the flesh, and devises iniquity, and that makes a custom of sin, walks after the flesh, and makes a trade of sin.

Verses 35, 36.

And the servant abideth not, &c.] 'And the servant of sin, though the natural seed of Abraham, like Ishmael, shall be cast out of God's house and family, and from all its privileges, as Ishmael was, and as all the carnal, unbelieving Jews shall be: but the Son of God, likewise, by way of eminence, the Seed of Abraham, and the Son of the promise, in whom all nations shall be blessed, continues as the First-born, Lord and Heir of his own house forever; and every one that claims under Him, as Abraham's seed, through faith in Him, according to the promise, shall abide in the family as a son, and inherit the noblest freedom with Him. The sense of the 35th verse, considered as a general maxim, is obvious enough with respect to the privilege of a son above a servant; and yet it is very difficult to fix its determinate meaning, as it stands here in connection with the context; and particularly with the servant of sin, mentioned in the foregoing verse, and with the Son, spoken of in the following verse. But what I have given above seems its most easy and consistent sense: for it keeps up the same idea of the servant of sin, and of the Son, as mentioned in the preceding and following verses, and at the same time shows the difference between the servants of sin; and the true children of God, (who are Abraham's seed, through faith in Christ,) with respect to the bondage of the one and the freedom of the other; it likewise keeps up the view of Christ's answer to the vain plea of the carnal Jews, that they were Abraham's seed; and agrees with the apostle's representation of Ishmael's being cast out, as the son of the bond-woman, who should not be heir with the son of the free woman; and with his representation of Isaac, as the son of the promise, who was therein a type of Christ, and of all true believers in Him. (Gal. 4:23-31.) And this sense of the word lies in a plain and natural connection with the next verse, (36.) If, therefore, I who am the Son of God, and Lord of mine own house, shall bestow the noble freedom upon you which I speak of, ye shall be eminently free in your own spirits—free from the guilt and dominion of sin; free from the curse of the law; free from the prevailing blindness and prejudices of your own minds and hearts, and from the tyranny of Satan; free in your access to God, communion with Him, and actions for Him, free from the sting of death, and the victory of the grave; and at length from every kind of evil, and in full possession of all the glory of your adoption so that all other freedom is as nothing compared with this, and is mere slavery without it. Guise. Dr Doddridge saw the above ingenious and pious paraphrase, and note of Dr. Gr. free is given an excellent illustration of the passages.

See what the brand is, which Christ fastens upon them that thus committeth sin—He gives them a mark of servitude. They are servants of sin; under an arrest, concluded under sin, and are subject to the power of sin. He is a servant of sin, he makes himself so, and is so accounted; he has sold himself to work wickedness; his lusts give law to him, he is not his own master. He does the work of sin, supports its interest, and accepts its wages, Rom. 6:16. He shows them that being in a state of bondage, their having a room in the house of God would not entitle them to the inheritance of sons: for (v. 35.) the servant, though he be in the house for a while, abideth not in the house forever; services (we say,) are no inheritances, they are not for a perpetuity; but the son of the family abideth ever. This points primarily at the rejection of the Jewish church and nation. Israel had been God's son, his first-born; but they degenerated into a servile disposition, were enslaved to the world and the flesh, and therefore though, by virtue of their birthright, they thought themselves secure of their church-membership, Christ tells them that having thus made themselves servants, they should not abide in the house forever. Jerusalem, by opposing the Gospel of Christ, which proclaimed liberty, and adhering to the Sinai-covenant, which gendered to bondage, came to be in bondage with her children, (Gal. 4:24, 25.) and therefore was unchurched, her charter taken away, and she cast out as the son of the bond-woman, Gen. 21:10. Chrysostom gives this sense of this place, 'Think not to be made free from sin by the rites and ceremonies of the law of Moses, for Moses was but a servant, and had not that perpetual authority in the church, which the Son had; but if the Son make you free, it is well,' v. 36. But, it looks further, to the rejection of all that are the servants of sin, and receive not the adoption of the sons of God; though those unprofitable servants may be in God's house awhile, as retainers to his family, yet there is a day coming, when the children of the bond-woman and of the free shall be distinguished. True believers only, who are the children of the covenant, are accounted free, and shall abide forever in the house, as Isaac: they shall have a nail in the holy place on earth, (Ezra 9:8.) and mansions in the holy place in heaven, ch. 14:2.

He shows them the way of deliverance out of bondage into the glorious liberty of the children of God, Rom. 8:21. The case of those that are the servants of sin, is sad, but it is not helpless, nor hopeless. As it is the privilege of all the sons of the family, and their dignity above the servants, that they abide in the house forever; so the Son, the First-born among many brethren, the Heir of all things, has a power both of manumission and of adoption; (v. 36.) If the Son shall make you free, you shall be free indeed.

Note, Jesus Christ in the Gospel offers us our freedom; He has authority and power to make free. [1.] To discharge prisoners; this He does by making satisfaction for our guilt; on which the gospel-offer is grounded; moreover He makes satisfaction for our debts, for ple indeed, but [signifies] really. It notes, [1.] The certainty of the promise; the liberty which the Jews boasted of, was an imaginary liberty, they boasted of a false gift; but the liberty which Christ gives, is certain; it is real, and has real effects; the servants of sin promise themselves liberty, and fancy themselves free, when they have broken religion's bands asunder; but they cheat themselves, none are free indeed but those whom Christ makes free. [2.] It notes the excellency of the freedom; it deserves the name, in comparison with which all other liberties are slavery. It is a glorious liberty. It is substance; (Prov. 8:21.) while the things of the world are shadows, things that are not.

He applies this to the cavilling Jews. In answer to their boasts of relation to Abraham; (v. 37.) 'I know very well that ye are Abraham's seed, but now ye seek to kill me, and therefore have forfeited the honor of relation to Abraham, because my word hath no place in you.'

'I know that ye are Abraham's seed, and it is your honor.' He grants them what was true, and in what they said that was false, (that they were never in bondage to any.) He does not contradict them, for He studied to profit them, and therefore said that which would please them; I know that ye are Abraham's seed. They boasted of their descent from Abraham, as that which aggrandized their names, and made them honorable; whereas really it did but aggravate their crimes, and make them exceeding sinful. Out of their own mouths will He judge vain-glorious hypocrites, who boast of their parentage and education; 'Are you Abraham's seed? Why then did you not tread in the steps of his faith and obedience?'

But ye seek to kill me. They had attempted it several times, and were now designing it, which quickly appeared, (v. 59.) when they took up stones to cast at Him. Christ knows all the wickedness, not only which men do, but which they design, and endeavor to do. To seek to kill any innocent man, is a crime black enough, but to compass and imagine the death of the King of kings, was a crime of which we want words to express the heinousness.

Why were Abraham's seed so inveterate against Abraham's promised Seed,

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 30-36. Many profess Christianity without saving faith: when we see men convinced that the doctrines, termed evangelical, are divine truths, we should warn them of the temptations and dangers to which they will be exposed, that they may guard against them.—By 'continuing in the Word' of Christ, with obedient faith, we prove that we are his 'disciples indeed,' and 'have not received the seed in stony ground.' Thus we attain a more satisfactory knowledge of the truth: and this teaches us the nature, Author, and means of liberty; and leads us to pursue, and at length to enjoy, that blessing. But as men impose on themselves, through self-flattery, in respect of their secular concerns, no wonder, if they mistake their character and state, in relation to God and the eternal world. (Note, Jer. 17:9,10.) He 'who committeth sin is the slave of sin;' and many declaim and dispute about liberty of every kind, nay, fight for it, who are themselves slaves to in whom they and all the families of the earth should be blessed? Our Savior here tells them 'My word hath no place in you, you have no inclination to it, no relish of it, other things are more taking, more pleasing.' Or, 'It does not take hold of you, it makes no impression upon you.' Some of the critics read it, My word does not penetrate into you; it descended as the rain, but it came upon them as the rain upon the rock, which runs off, and did not soak into their hearts, as the rain upon the ploughed ground. The Syriac reads it, 'Because ye do not acquiesce in my word; you are not persuaded of the truth of it, nor pleased with the goodness of it.' Our translation is very significant, It has no place in you. They sought to kill Him, and so effectually to silence Him, not because He had done them harm, but because they could not bear the convincing power of his word. Note, [1.] The words of Christ ought to have in us, the innermost and uppermost place; a dwelling place, not as a stranger or sojourner; a working place, it must have room to operate, to work sin out of us, and to work grace in us; it must have a ruling place, be upon the throne, dwell in us richly. [2.] There are many that make a profession of religion, in whom the Word of Christ has no place; they will not allow it a place, for they do not like it; Satan does all he can to displace it; and other things possess the place it should have in us. [3.] Where the Word of God has no place, no good is to be expected, for room is left there for all wickedness. If the unclean spirit find the heart empty of Christ's Word, he enters in, and dwells there.

V. 38-47. Christ and the Jews are still at issue; He sets Himself to convince and convert them, while they set themselves to contradict Him.

He traces the difference between his sentiments and theirs to a different rise and original; (v. 38.) I speak that which I have seen with my Father, and ye do what ye have seen with your father. Here are two fathers spoken of, God and the devil, and without controversy these are contrary the one to the other.

Christ's doctrine was from heaven, copied out of the counsels of infinite wisdom, and the intentions of eternal love. I speak that which I have seen. The discoveries Christ has made us, are not grounded upon hearsay, but upon ocular inspection; so that He was thoroughly apprized of the nature and truth of all He said. He that is given to be a Witness to the people, is an Eye-witness. It is what I have seen with my Father. The doctrine of Christ is not a plausible hypothesis, supported by probable arguments; but an exact counterpart of ambition, avarice, lust, anger, or some other groveling or malignant tyrant. How highly soever we value freedom, personal or political, civil or religious; (and when freedom is soberly ascertained, it can scarcely be too highly prized;) we must recollect that it is a mere shadow to the slave of sin and Satan; and we may well weep to see men, laden with heavy chains, glorying in their liberty, till death terminates their delusion, and makes them know they must be slaves forever. From this awful state no philosophy, no inventions of superstition, no ordinances, can deliver any man: nay, God may outwardly be served from slavish fear, or mercenary hope, and no liberty be obtained or enjoyed; but 'if the Son make us free, we shall be free indeed,' and forever. While, therefore, men stand up for freedom, let every one, who would be truly wise, come to Christ for that real liberty, to which He calls us by his Gospel. (Note, Matt. 11:28-30.)

SCOTT.

Verses 37-44.

My word hath no place in you. 'Ye hear the truths of God, but ye do not heed them. The word of life has no influence over you; and now can it, when you seek to kill me, because I proclaim this truth to you? It is a dismal omen, when a person is regardless of the truth of God, it is more so to be provoked against it; but to persecute and endeavor to destroy those who preach it, is the last degree of perverseness and obduracy.' Quesnel, 'From this whole period, it is manifest that the whole tendency of our Savior's discourse is to show the Jews that they are the seed of that serpent, which was to bruise the heel of the Messiah; & see what could that mean, (verse 44.) Ye are of your father the devil.' Lightfoot. And in verse 43, Ye do not understand my speech, because ye cannot hear my word; that is, ye cannot hear my doctrine; it comes too close to you; it searches your hearts, detects your hypocrisy, and exposes your iniquitous intentions and designs; and as ye are determined not to leave your sins, so ye are purposed not to hear my doctrine.'

DR. A. CLARKE.

'The two sins for which Christ principally reproves the Jews in the 44th verse, are, their attempt to take his life, and their contempt of the truth. By both these He shows that they resemble, or are under the influence of, the evil spirit.' Gratius. Oh, how tremendous a thing it is to have the devil for our father! How careful, therefore, should we be to avoid that which will subject us to this vile relation.'

of the family,) thy father was an Amorite, and thy mother a Hittite, Ezek. 6:3. As it is common for families that are sinking to boast of their pedigree, so churches that are corrupt and depraved, value themselves upon their antiquity, and the eminence of their first planters. They designed to cast an odium upon Christ, as if He reflected upon the patriarch Abraham, as one they had learned evil from. See how they sought an occasion to quarrel with Him.

Christ overthrows this plea, and discovers the vanity of it by a plain and cogent argument; 'Abraham's children will do the works of Abraham, but ye do not his works; therefore ye are not Abraham's children.'

The proposition is plain; 'If ye were Abraham's children, such as could claim an interest in the covenant, then ye would do the works of Abraham, for to those only of Abraham's house, who kept the way of the Lord, as Abraham did, would God perform what He had spoken;' Gen. 18:19. Those only are reckoned the seed of Abraham, who tread in the steps of his faith, Rom. 4:12. Though the Jews had their genealogies exact, they could not but by them make out their relation to Abraham, so as to take the benefit of the old entail, (according to the form of the gift,) unless they walked in the same spirit; good women's relation to Sarah is proved only by this—whose daughters ye are as long as ye do well, 1 Pet. 3:6. Note, Those who would approve themselves Abraham's seed must not only be of his faith, but do Abraham's works, (James 2:21, 22,) must, as He did, follow God wherever He leads them, resign their dearest comforts to Him, be strangers and sojourners in this world, keep up the worship of God in their families, and always walk before God in their uprightness, for these were the works of Abraham.

The assumption is evident likewise; But ye do not do the works of Abraham, for ye seek to kill Me, v. 40.

He shows them what work they were now about; they sought to kill Him; and three things are intimated, as an aggravation of their intention. 1. They were so unnatural as to seek the life of a man, like themselves, bone of their bone, and flesh of their flesh, who had given them no provocation. Ye imagine mischief against a man, Ps. 62:3. 2. They were so ungrateful as to seek the life of one who had told them the truth, had done them the greatest kindness; had not only not imposed upon them with a lie, but had instructed them in the most important truths; was He therefore become their enemy? 3. They were so ungodly as to seek the life of one who told them the truth, which He had heard from God, who was a Messenger sent from God to them, so that their attempt against Him was an act of malice against God Himself. This was their work, and they persisted in it.

He shows them this did not become the children of Abraham: for this did not Abraham. He was famous for his humanity, witness his rescue of the captives, and for his piety, witness his obedience to the heavenly vision in man's instances, and some tender ones. Abraham believed God, these were obstinate in unbelief; Abraham followed God, these fought against Him; so that he would be ignorant of them, and would not acknowledge them, they were so unlike him. Isa. 63:16. See Jer. 22:15-17. He would not have done thus, if he had lived now, or I had lived then: some read it. We should thus reason ourselves out of any way of wickedness; would Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob have done so? We cannot expect to be ever with them, if we be never like them.

The conclusion follows of course; v. 41. 'Whatever your pretensions be, you are not Abraham's children, but father yourselves upon another family; (v. 41.) there is a father whose deeds you do, whose spirit ye are of, and whom you resemble.' He does not yet say plainly that He means the devil, till they by their cavils forced Him so to explain Himself; which reaches us to treat even bad men with civility, and not to be forward to say that of them, or to them, which, though true sounds harsh. He tried incontestable truths in the eternal Mind. It was not only what He had heard from his Father, but what He had seen with Him; when the counsel of peace was between them both. Moses spake what he heard from God, but he might not see the face of God; Paul had been in the third heaven, but what he had seen there, he could not, must not, utter; for it was Christ's prerogative to have seen what He spake, and to speak what He had seen.

Their doings were from hell; 'Ye do that which ye have seen with your father.' Ye do, by your own works, father yourselves, for it is evident whom ye resemble, and therefore easy to find out your original.' As a child that is trained up with his father, learns his father's words and fashions, and grows like him, by an affected imitation as well as by natural image, so these Jews, by their malicious opposition to Christ and the Gospel, made themselves as like the devil, as if they had industriously set him before them for their pattern.

He takes off and answers their vain-glorious boasts of relation to Abraham and to God, as their Fathers, and shows the vanity and falsehood of their pretensions.

They said, Abraham is our father, v. 39. In this they intended to make themselves look great. They had forgotten the mortification given them by that acknowledgment prescribed them, (Deut. 26:5.) a Syrian ready to perish was my father; and the charge exhibited against their degenerate ancestors, (whose steps they trod in, and not those of the first founder whether their own consciences would infer from what He said, that they were the devil's children; and it is better to hear it now that we are called to repent, to change our father, and our family, by changing our spirit and way, than hear it in the great day from Christ.

So far were they from owning their unworthiness of relation to Abraham, that they pleaded relation to God Himself as their father; 'We are not born of fornication, we are not bastards, but legitimate sons; we have one Father, even God.'

Some understand this literally. They were not the sons of the bond-woman, as the Ishmaelites were; nor begotten in incest, as the Moabites and Ammonites; (Deut. 23:3.) nor were they a spurious brood in Abraham's family, but Hebrews of the Hebrews; and being born in lawful wedlock, might call God Father who instituted that honorable estate in innocence; for a seed, not tainted with divorces or the plurality of wives, is called a seed of God, Mal. 2:15.

Others take it figuratively. They began to be aware now, that Christ spake of a spiritual, not a carnal father, of the father of their religion; and so,

[1.] They deny themselves to be a generation of idolaters; 'We are not the children of idolatrous parents, nor have been bred in idolatrous worship.' Idolatry is often spoken of as spiritual whoredom, and idolaters as children of whoredoms, Hosea 2:4. Isa. 57:3. Now if they mean that they were not the posterity of idolaters, the allegation was false, for no nation was more addicted to idolatry than the Jews before the captivity; if they mean no more than that they themselves were not idolaters, what then? A man may be free from idolatry, and yet perish in another iniquity, and he shut out of Abraham's covenant. If thou commit no idolatry, (apply it to this spiritual fornication,) yet if thou kill, thou art become a transgressor of the covenant. A rebellious, prodigal son will be disinherited, though he be not born of fornication.

[2.] They boast themselves to be true worshippers of the true God. We have not many fathers, as the heathen had, gods many, and lords many, no, the Lord our God is one Lord and one Father. Note, Those flatter themselves, and put a damning cheat upon their souls, who imagine that their professing true religion, and worshipping the true God, will save them, though they worship not God in spirit and in truth, nor are true to their profession.

Our Savior gives a full answer to this fallacy, (v. 42, 43,) and proves, by two arguments, that they had no right to call God Father.

First, They did not love Christ; If God were your Father, you would love Me. He had proved their relation to Abraham, by their going about to kill Him; (v. 40,) but here He disproves their relation to God, by their not loving Him. A man may pass for a child of Abraham, if he do not appear an enemy to Christ by gross sin; but he cannot approve himself a child of God, unless he be a faithful friend and follower of Christ. Note, All that have God for their Father, have a true love to Christ, an esteem of his Person, a grateful sense of his love, sincere affection to his cause and kingdom, complacency in the salvation wrought by Him, in the method and terms of it, and a care to keep his commandments, which is the surest evidence of love to Him. We are here upon trial how we will conduct ourselves to our Maker, and accordingly it will be with us in the state of retribution. God has taken various methods to prove us, and this was one; He sent his Son into the world, with sufficient proofs of his mission, concluding that all that called Him Father, would kiss his Son, and bid Him welcome, see 1 John 5:1. By this our adoption will be proved—Did we love Christ, or no? If any man do not love him so far from being a child of God, that he is anathema, 1 Cor. 16:22.

Our Savior proves that if they were God's children, they would love Him, for, saith He, I proceeded forth, and came from God.

1. He was the Son of God; I proceeded forth from God; this means his origin from the them *If God were your Father, ye would love me: for I proceeded forth and came from God: neither came I of myself, but he sent me.

43 Why do ye not understand my speech? even because ye cannot hear my word.

44 Ye are of your father the devil, and the lusts of your father ye will do: he was a murderer from the beginning, and abode not in the truth, because there is no truth in him. * When he speaketh a lie, he speaketh of his own; for he is a liar, and the father of it.

strangers, and rude ones too, ridiculed it.

The reason why they did not understand Christ's speech made the matter much worse: Ye cannot hear my word, that is, 'cannot persuade yourselves to hear it attentively, and without prejudice, as it should be heard.' The meaning of this cannot, is an obstinate will not; as the Jews could not hear Stephen, (Acts 7: 57.) nor Paul, Acts 22: 22. Note, The rooted antipathy of men's hearts to the doctrine of Christ, is the reason of their ignorance and errors. They do not like it nor love it, and therefore will not understand it; like Peter, who pretended he knew not what the damsel said, (Matt. 26: 70.) when in truth he knew not what to say to it. Ye cannot hear my words, for ye have stopped your ears, (Ps. 58: 4, 5.) and God, in a way of righteous judgment, has made your ears heavy, Isa. 6: 10.

Having thus disproved their relation to Abraham and to God, He comes next to tell them plainly whose children they were. If they be not God's children, they are the devil's, for God and Satan divide the world; the devil is therefore said to work in the children of disobedience, Eph. 2: 2. All wicked people are the devil's children, (2 Cor. 6: 15.) the serpent's seed, (Gen. 3: 15.) children of the wicked one, Matt. 13: 38. They partake of his nature, bear his image, obey his commands, and follow his example. Idolaters said to a stock, Thou art my father, Jer. 2: 27.

This is a high charge, and sounds harsh and horrid, that any of the children of men, especially the church's children, should be called children of the devil, and therefore our Savior proves it, by a general argument; The lusts of your father ye will do. 'You do the lusts which he would have you fulfil; you gratify him, and comply with his temptations, and are led captives by him at his will: you do those lusts which the devil himself fulfils.' Fleshly lusts and worldly lusts the devil tempts men to; but, being a spirit, he cannot fulfil them himself. The peculiar lusts of the devil are spiritual wickednesses, the lusts of the intellectual powers, corrupt reasonings, pride and envy, wrath and malice; to good, and enticing others to evil; these are lusts which the devil fulfils, and those who are under the dominion of these lusts, resemble the devil, as the child does the parent. The more of contemplation, and contrivance, and secret complicity in sin, the more it resembles the lusts of the devil. (2.) You will do the devil's lusts. The more there is of the will in these lusts, the more there is of the devil in them. When sin is committed of choice, and not by surprise, with pleasure, and not with reluctance, when it is persisted in with daring presumption and desperate resolution, like theirs that said, We have loved strangers, and after them we will go, then the sinner will do the devil's lusts. 'The lusts of your father ye delight to do,' so Dr. Hammond; and they are rolled under the tongue as a sweet morsel.

By particular instances, they manifestly resembled the devil—murder and lying. The devil is an enemy to life, because God is the God of life, and life is the happiness of man; an enemy to truth because God is the God of truth, and truth is the bond of society.

He was a murderer from the beginning, not from his own beginning, for he was created an angel of light, but from the beginning of apostasy, which was soon after the creation of man. He was a man-slayer; he was a hater of man, and so in disposition a murderer of him. He has his name Satan, from Sin—hatred. He maligned God's image upon man, envied his happiness, and desired his ruin, was an avowed enemy to the race. He was man's tempter to that sin which brought death into the world, and so was effectually the murderer of all mankind, which in Adam had but one neck. He was a murderer of souls, deceived them into sin, and by it slew them; (Rom. 7: 11.) poisoned man with forbidden fruit, and made him his murderer. Thus he was not only at the beginning, but from the beginning, which intimates that thus he has been ever since; as he began, so he continues, the murderer of men by his temptations. The great tempter is the great destroyer. The Jews called the devil, the angel of death. He was in the first murder that ever was committed. Cain was of that wicked one, and slew his brother, 1 John 3: 12. If the devil had not been very strong in Cain, he could not have killed his own brother. Cain killing his brother by instigation of the devil, the devil is called the murderer, which does not speak Cain's personal guilt the less, but the devil's the more, whose torments, we have reason to think, will be the greater when the time comes, for all that wickedness which he has drawn men into. See what reason we have to stand upon our guard against the woles of the devil, (for he is a murderer, and aims to do mischief, even when he speaks fair.) and to wonder that he, who is the murderer of the children of men, should yet be, by their own consent, so much their master.

These Jews were murderers like him; murderers of souls, which they led blindfold into the ditch, and made the children of hell; sworn enemies to Christ, and now ready to be his betrayers and murderers, for the same reason that Cain killed Abel. They were that seed of the serpent, that were to bruise the heel of the Seed of the woman; Now ye seek to kill Me.

He was a liar. A lie is opposed to truth, (1 John 2: 21.) and, accordingly, the devil is here described to be an enemy to truth, and therefore to Christ.

First, He is a deserter from the truth; he abode not in the truth, did not continue in the rectitude of his nature, but left his first state; his apostasy was founded in a lie. The angels were the hosts of the Lord; those that fell, were not true to their Sovereign, they were not to be trusted, being charged with folly and defection, Job 4: 18. By the truth here, we may understand the revealed will of God concerning the salvation of man by Christ, the truth of which Christ was now preaching, and the Jews opposed; herein they did like their father the devil, who, seeing the honor put upon the first Adam, and foreseeing the greater honor intended in the second Adam, would not be reconciled to that counsel of God, but, from a spirit of pride and envy, set himself to resist it, and to thwart its designs; and so did these Jews, as his children and agents.

Secondly, He is destitute of truth; There is no truth in him. His interest in the world is supported by lies, and you can confide in nothing he says or does. The notions he propagates concerning good and evil, are false, his proofs are lying wonders, his temptations cheats; he has great knowledge of the truth, but having no affection to it, but on the contrary, being a sworn enemy to it, he is said to have no truth in him.

He is a friend and patron of lying; When he speaketh a lie, he speaketh of his own. Three things are here said of the devil, with reference to the sin of lying.

(43.) Ye cannot hear. "Canno bea w hear." So the same word is used, 6: 60.

their tongues to use deceit, Rom. 3:13. He is the father of lies, who begat them, trained them up in the way of lying, whom they resemble and obey, and with whom all liars shall have their portion forever. Christ having thus proved all murderers and liars to be the devil's children, leaves it to the consciences of his hearers to say, Thou art the man.

But He comes in the following verses to assist them in the application of it to themselves; He does not call them liars, but shows them that they were no friends to truth, and therein resembled him who abode not in the truth, because there is no truth in him.

He charges upon them,

That they would not believe the Word of truth. Two ways it may be taken, (1.) 'Though I tell you the truth, yet you will not believe that I do so.' Though He gave abundant proof of his commission from God, and his affection to men, they would not believe that He told the truth. Now was truth fallen in the street, and could not enter, Isa. 59:14, 15. The greatest truths with some gained no credit; for they rebelled against the light, Job 24:13. Or, (2.) Because I tell you the truth, (so we read it,) therefore ye believe Me not. They would not receive Him as a Prophet, because He told them unpleasing truths, concerning themselves and their own case, showed them their faces in a glass that would not flatter them. Miserable is the case of those to whom the light of divine truth is a torment.

To show them the unreasonableness of their infidelity, He condescends to put the matter to this issue, v. 46. He and they being contrary, either He was in an error, or they were.

[1.] If He were in an error, why did not they convince Him? The falsehood of prebending prophets was discovered either by the ill tendency of their doctrines, (Deut. 13:2.) or by the ill tenor of their conversation; Ye shall know them by their fruits; but (saith Christ) which of you, of the sanhedrim, who judge of prophets, convinceth Me of sin? They accused Him of gluttony, drunkenness, blasphemy, sabbath-breaking, confederacy with Satan, &c. But they were malicious calumnies, and such as every one, that knew Him, knew to be utterly false. When they had done their utmost, by artifice, subornation and perjury, to prove some crime upon Him, the very judge that condemned Him, owned he found no fault in Him.

The sin He here challenges them to convict Him of, is, First, An inconsistent doctrine. They had heard his testimony; could they show any thing in it absurd or unworthy to be believed, any contradiction, either of Himself or of the Scriptures, or any corruption of truth or manners; ch. 18:20. Or, Secondly, An incongruous conversation. 'Which of you can justly charge Me with any thing, in word or deed, unbecoming a prophet?' See the conde-

First, That he is a liar; his oracles, his prophecies, and the images in which he was worshipped, were teachers of lies; he tempted our first parents with a downright lie; all his temptations are carried on by lies, calling evil good, and good evil, and promising impunity to sin; he knows them to be lies, and suggests them with an intention to deceive, and so to destroy. When he contradicted the Gospel in the scriptures and Pharisees, it was by lies, and when afterward he corrupted it in the man of sin, it was by strong delusions, and a complicated lie.

Secondly, When he speaks a lie, he speaks of his own. It is an idiom of his own, not of God; his Creator never put it into him. When men speak a lie, Satan fills their hearts to lie; (Acts 5:3.) but when the devil speaks a lie, it is of his own framing, the motives to it are from himself, which speaks the desperate depth of wickedness in it, to which those apostate spirits are sunk; as in their first defection they had no tempter, so their sinfulness is still their own.

Thirdly, That he is the father of it. He is the father of every lie, not only which he himself suggests, but of all lies; when men speak lies, they come originally from him, and bear his image. He is the father of every liar; so it may be understood. God made men with a disposition to truth, it is congruous to reason and natural light, to the order of our faculties, and the laws of society; but the devil has so corrupted the nature of man, that the wicked are said to be estranged from the womb, speaking lies; (Ps. 58:3.) he has taught them with scension of our Lord, that He demanded not credit any further than the allowed motives of credibility support his demands. See Jer. 2:8. 31. Mic. 6:3. Ministers may from hence learn, 1. To walk so circumspectly, as that it may not be in the power of their most strict observers to convince them of sin, that the ministry be not blamed. The only way to not be convicted of sin is, not to sin. 2. To be willing to admit a scrutiny; though we are confident in many things that we are in the right, yet we should be willing to have it tried. See Job 6:24.

[2.] If they were in error, why were they not convinced by Him? 'If I say the truth, why do you not believe Me?' If you cannot convince Me of error, you must own that I say the truth, and why do you not give Me credit? 'Why will you not deal with Me upon trust?' Note, If men would but inquire into the reason of their infidelity, they would find themselves reduced to such absurdities as they could not but be ashamed of; for it will be found that the reason why we believe not in Christ, is, we are not willing to part with sin, deny ourselves, and serve God; we are not of the Christian religion, because we would not be of any, and unbelief of our Redeemer resolves itself into a downright rebellion against our Creator.

Another thing charged upon them is, they would not hear the words of God; (v. 47.) which further shows how groundless was their claim of relation to God. Here is a doctrine laid down; He that is of God, heareth God's words; that is, he is willing and ready to hear them, is desirous to know the mind of God, and cheerfully embraces whatever he knows to be so. God's words have such an authority over, and agreeableness with, all that are born of God, that they meet them, as the child Samuel did, with, Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth. Let the Word of the Lord come. He apprehends and discerns them, so hears them, as to perceive the voice of God in them, which the natural man does not, 1 Cor. 2:14. He that is of God, is soon aware of the discoveries He makes of Himself, of the nearness of his name; (Ps. 75:1.) as they of the family know the master's tread, and the master's knock, and open to him immediately, (Luke 12:36.) as the sheep know the voice of their shepherd, ch. 10:4; 5. Cant. 2:8.

Ye therefore hear Him not; that is, 'Ye heed not, understand not, believe not, the words of God, nor care to hear them, because ye are not of God.' Your being thus deaf and dead to the words of God, is a plain evidence that ye are not of God. It is in his Word that God manifests Himself; we are therefore reckoned to be well or ill affected to God, according as we are well or ill affected to his Word; see 2 Cor. 4:4. 1 John 4:6. Or, their not being of God, was the reason why they did not profitably hear the words of God which Christ spake; they did not understand and believe Him, not because the things themselves were obscure, or wanted evidence, but because the hearers were not of God. If the Word of the kingdom do not bring forth fruit, the blame is to be laid upon the soil, not upon the seed, as appears by the parable of the sower, Matt. 13:13, &c.

V. 48-50. The malice of bell breaks out in the base language which the unbelieving Jews gave to our Lord. Hitherto they had cavilled at his doctrine; but, having showed themselves

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 37-47. Immense numbers boast of being Christians, as absurdly as the Jews did that they were 'Abraham's children;' and they suppose that God is their Father, because they have been baptized, even as the Jews did because of circumcision. But which do they resemble most, the primitive Christians, or those who sought to murder Christ? Are they born again, and made partakers of a divine and holy nature? Do they love all things, love Jesus and his service? If there is nothing of this kind in them, but things of a contrary nature, let them not deceive themselves: they are the children of him whose works they do; and the pride, rebellion, dissimulation, malice and malignity, of numbers called Christians, show them to be the offspring of the apostate, 'murderer,' and 'liar.' Such affronting applications of evangelical truth induce men to complain that they cannot understand the words of Christ: no evidence can convince them, that those doctrines are true, which reduce them to the alternative of renouncing every sin, or of perishing in hell. The unexceptionable conduct of those, who speak the words of God, will not procure them credit, 'because they tell them the truth;' but if any imprudent report be spread, or new heresy started, the same persons will embrace it with implicit and absurd credulity! The reason is evident, 'they are not of God, and therefore cannot hear his words.'

They undertook to justify this character, and applied it to the present occasion; Say we not well that Thou art so? One would think that his excellent discourses should have altered their opinion of Him; instead of that, their hearts were more hardened, and their prejudices confirmed. They value themselves on their enmity to Christ, as if they had never spoken better than when they spake the worst they could of Christ. Those have arrived at the highest pitch of wickedness, who avow their impiety, repeat what they should retract, and justify themselves in that, for which they ought to condemn themselves. It is bad to say and do ill, but it is worse to stand to it. When Christ spake against the sins of great men, and thereby incensed them against Him, they who were sensible of no interest but what is secular and sensual, concluded Him beside Himself, for they thought that none but a madman would lose his preferment, and hazard his life, for his religion and conscience. The meekness and mercifulness of Heaven shines in Christ's reply to this calumny, v. 49, 50.

He denies their charge against Him; I have not a devil; as Paul, (Acts 26: 25.) I am not mad. The imputation is unjust; 'I am neither actuated by a devil, nor in compact with one,' this He evidenced by what He did against the devil's kingdom. He takes no notice of their calling Him a Samaritan, because it was a personal reflection, and not worth taking notice of; but saying He had a devil, reflected on his commission, and therefore He answered that. Augustine gives this descent upon his not saying any thing to their calling Him a Samaritan—that He was indeed that good Samaritan spoken of in the parable, Luke 10: 33.

He asserts the sincerity of his intentions; I honor my Father. They suggested that He took undue honors to Himself, and derogated from the honor due to God, both which He denies here, in saying that He made it his business to honor his Father, and Him only. It also proves that He had not a devil, for, if He had, He would not honor God. Note, They who can truly say that they make it their constant care to honor God, are sufficiently armed against the censures and reproaches of men.

He complains of the wrong they did Him by their calumnies; Ye do dishonor Me. By this it appears that, as Man, He had a sense of the indignity done Him; reproach was a sword in his bones; and yet He underwent it for our salvation. It is the will of God, that all men should honor the Son, yet there are many that dishonor Him; such a contradiction is there in the carnal mind to the will of God. Christ honored his Father as never man did, and yet was Himself dishonored as never man was; for though God has promised that those who honor Him, He will honor, He never promised that men should honor them.

Verse 51.

"The particular scope of Jesus Christ in this passage was, to prove that He was not possessed of an evil spirit, since the keeping of his word would procure eternal life for all who obey Him; while Satan, on the contrary, leads men into sin, whose wages is death, or everlasting perdition. Hence we may infer, that that doctrine which produces uneasy when He complained (v. 43, 47.) that they would not hear Him, they fall to downright railing, v. 45. They were not the common people, but scribes and Pharisees, men of consequence, who, when they saw themselves convicted of obstinate infidelity, scornfully turned off the conviction with this, Say we not well, that Thou art a Samaritan, and hast a devil?

(1.) That He was a Samaritan, that is, an enemy to their church and nation, one that they could not endure. Thus they exposed Him to the ill-will of the people, with whom you could not put a man into a worse name, than to call him a Samaritan. If He had been a Samaritan, He had been punishable, by the beating of the rebels, (as they called it,) for coming into the temple. They had often called Him a Gallilean—a mean man; but, as if that were not enough, though it contradicted the other, they will have Him a Samaritan—a bad man. The Jews to this day call the Christians, in reproach, Cuthæi—Samaritans. Note, Great endeavors have in all ages been used to make good people odious by putting them under black characters, and it is easy to run that down with a crowd and a cry, which is once put into an ill name. Perhaps because Christ inveighed against the pride and tyranny of the priests and elders, they hereby suggest that He aimed at the ruin of their church, in aiming at its reformation, and was falling away to the Samaritans.

(2.) That He had a devil. Either, [1.] That He was in league with the devil; having reproached his doctrine as tending to Samaritanism, here they reflect upon his miracles as done in combination with Beelzebub. Or rather, [2.] That He was a melancholy man, whose brain was clouded, or a mad man, whose brain was heated, and that which He said was no more to be believed than the extravagant rambles of a man in a delirium. Thus, ^fdivine revelations of things which are above the discovery of reason, have been often branded with the charge of enthusiasm, and the prophet was called a mad fellow, 2 Kings 9: 11. Hos. 9: 7. The inspiration of the pagan oracles and prophets was indeed a frenzy, and those that had it were for the time beside themselves, but that which was truly divine was not so. Wisdom is justified of her children, as wisdom indeed.

Augustine gives this descent upon his not saying any thing to their calling Him a Samaritan—that He was indeed that good Samaritan spoken of in the parable, Luke 10: 33.

He asserts the sincerity of his intentions; I honor my Father. They suggested that He took undue honors to Himself, and derogated from the honor due to God, both which He denies here, in saying that He made it his business to honor his Father, and Him only. It also proves that He had not a devil, for, if He had, He would not honor God. Note, They who can truly say that they make it their constant care to honor God, are sufficiently armed against the censures and reproaches of men.

He complains of the wrong they did Him by their calumnies; Ye do dishonor Me. By this it appears that, as Man, He had a sense of the indignity done Him; reproach was a sword in his bones; and yet He underwent it for our salvation. It is the will of God, that all men should honor the Son, yet there are many that dishonor Him; such a contradiction is there in the carnal mind to the will of God. Christ honored his Father as never man did, and yet was Himself dishonored as never man was; for though God has promised that those who honor Him, He will honor, He never promised that men should honor them.

See here, his contempt of worldly honor; I seek not mine own glory. He did not aim at that in what He had said of Himself, or against his persecutors; He did not court applause nor covet preferment, but industriously declined both. He did not seek his own glory distant from his Father's, nor had any separate interest of his own. For men to search their own glory is not glory indeed, (Prov. 25: 27.) but their shame, to be so much out in their aim. This comes in here as a reason why Christ made so light of their reproaches; 'You do dishonor Me, but cannot disturb, shall not disquiet Me, for I seek not mine own glory.' Note, Those who are dead to men's praise, can safely bear their contempt.

His comfort under worldly dishonor; There is One that seeketh and judgeth. In two things Christ made it appear that He sought not his own glory: He did not court men's respect, but was indifferent to it, and in reference to this He saith, 'There is One that seeketh my interest in the esteem and affections of the people, while I am in no care about it.' Note, God will seek their honor, that do not seek their own; for before honor is humility. He did not revenge men's affronts, and in reference to this He saith, 'There is One that judgeth, that will vindicate my honor, and reckon with those that trample upon it.' Probably, He refers here to the judgments that were coming upon the Jews for the indignities they did to the Lord Jesus. See Ps. 38: 13-15. I heard not, for Thou wilt hear. If we undertake to judge for ourselves, whatever damage we sustain, our amendments is in our own hands; but if we be, as we ought to be, humble appellants, we shall find, to our comfort, there is One that judgeth.

V. 51-59. The doctrine of the immortality of believers, is ushered in with the usual solemn preface, Verily, verily, I say unto you.

The character of a believer; he keeps the sayings of Jesus, that Word of mine which I have delivered to you; this we must not only receive, but keep. We must keep it in mind and memory, in love and affection, so as in nothing to violate it; keep it without spot, (1 Tim. 6: 14.) as a trust committed to us, keep in it as our way, and to it as our rule.

The privilege of a believer; He shall by no means see death forever: so the original. Not as if the bodies of believers were secured from death; even the children of the Most High must die like men, and the followers of Christ have been, more than other men, in deaths oft, killed all the day long; how then is this promise made good? Ans. (1.) The property of death is so altered to them, that they do not see the terror of death, it is quite taken off; their sight does not terminate in death, as theirs who live by sense; they look so clearly, so comfortably, through and beyond death, and are so taken up with their state on the other side, that they overlook death, and see it not. (2.) The power of death is so broken, that though there is no remedy, but they must see death, they shall not be always shut up under its arrests, the day will come when death shall be swallowed up in victory. (3.) They shall not be hurt of the second death. That is the death especially meant here, that which is forever, which is opposed to everlasting life; they shall never enter into condemnation; shall have their everlasting lot where they cannot die any more, Luke 20: 36. Though now they cannot avoid seeing and tasting it too, they shall shortly be where it will be seen no more forever, Exod. 14: 13.

The Jews, instead of laying hold on this promise of immortality, lay hold on this occasion to reproach Him that makes them so kind an offer. Observe here,

Their railing; 'Now we know that Thou hast a devil, that Thou ravest, and sayest that Thou knowest not what.' See how these swine trample under foot the pearls of gospel-pro-

Now, they say, it is undeniably plain that words would procure eternal life for all who obey Him; while Satan, on the contrary, leads men into sin, whose wages is death, or everlasting perdition. Hence we may infer, that that doctrine which produces thered to his people. It was their honor that they died in faith, but die they must. Why should a good man be afraid to die, when Abraham is dead, and the prophets are dead? They have tracked the way through that dark valley, which should reconcile us to death, and help to take off the terror of it. Now they think Christ talks madly, when He saith, If a man keep my sayings, he shall never taste death. Tasting death means the same thing with seeing it; and well may death be represented as grievous to several of the senses, which is the destruction of them all.

[1.] They understood Christ of an immortality in this world. In the sense that Christ spake, it was not true that Abraham and the prophets were dead, for God is still the God of Abraham, and the God of the holy prophets; (Rev. 22: 6.) now God is not the God of the dead, but of the living; therefore Abraham and the prophets are still alive, and, as Christ meant it, they had not tasted death.

[2.] They thought none could be greater than Abraham and the prophets, whereas they could not but know that the Messiah would be greater than Abraham or any of the prophets; nay, they borrowed their greatness from Him. It was the honor of Abraham, that he was the father of the Messiah, and the honor of the prophets, that they testified beforehand concerning Him; so that He obtained a far more excellent name than they. Therefore, instead of inferring from Christ's making Himself greater than Abraham, that He had a devil, they should have inferred from his proving Himself so, (by doing works which neither Abraham nor the prophets ever did,) that He was the Christ; but their eyes were blinded.

They scornfully asked, Whom makest Thou Thyself? As if He had been guilty of vain-glory: whereas He was so far from making Himself greater than He was, that He drew a veil over his glory, and made Himself less than He was, and was the greatest Example of humility.

Christ still vouchsafes to reason with them, that every mouth may be stopped. He could have struck them dumb or dead upon the spot, but this was the day of his patience.

In his answer, He insists not upon his own testimony concerning Himself, but weaves it as not sufficient or conclusive; (v. 54.) My honor is nothing, if I glorify Myself. Note, Self-honor is no honor; and the affectation of glory is the forfeiture of it; it is not glory, (Prov. 25: 27.) but so great a reproach, that there is no sin which men are more industrious to hide than this; he that most affects praise, would not be thought to do it. Honor of our own creating has nothing in it, and therefore is called vain-glory. Self-admirers are self-deceivers. Our Lord Jesus was not one that honored Himself, as they represented Him. He was crowned by Him who is the Fountain of honor, and glorified not Himself to be made a High-Priest, Heb. 5: 4, 5.

But He refers Himself to his Father, God; and to their father, Abraham.

To his Father, God; It is my Father that honoreth Me. By this He means, [1.] That He derived from his Father all the honor He now claimed; He had commanded them to believe in Him, to follow Him, and to keep his Word, all which put an honor upon Him, but it was the Father that laid help upon Him, that lodged all fulness in Him, that sanctified and sealed Him, and sent Him into the world: and this justified Him in all demands of respect. [2.] He depended upon his Father for all the honor He further looked for; He courted not, but despised, the applauses of the age; for his eye and heart were upon the glory promised, which He had with the Father before the world was. He aimed at an advancement with which the Father was to exalt Him, a name He was to give Him, Phil. 2: 8, 9. Note, Christ, and all that are his, depend upon God for their honor; and he that is sure of honor where He is known, cares not though he be slighted where he is in disguise.

He here takes occasion to show the reason of their incredulity,—and that was, their unacquaintance with God: 'But why should I talk to you of my Father, when you say of Him that He is your God, yet you have not known Him?'

Ye say that He is the God ye have chosen, and are in covenant with; ye say that ye are Israel; but all are not so indeed, that are of Israel, Rom. 9: 6. Note, Many pretend to have an interest in God, who yet have no just cause to say so. They who called themselves the temple of the Lord, having profaned the temple of Jacob, dia ba, trust in lying words. What will it [702]

mises. If now at last they had evidence to prove Him mad, why did they say, (v. 48.) before they had that proof, Thou hast a devil? But this is the method of malice, first to fasten an invidious charge, and then to fish for evidence of it. If He had not abundantly proved Himself a Teacher from God, his promises of immortality to his followers might justly have been ridiculed, and charity itself would have imputed them to a crazed fancy; but his doctrine was evidently divine, his miracles confirmed it, and the Jewish religion taught them to expect such a Prophet; for them therefore thus to reject Him, was to abandon that promise to which their twelve tribes hoped to come, Acts 26: 7.

In short, they looked upon Him as guilty of an insufferable piece of arrogance, in making Himself greater than Abraham and the prophets: Abraham is dead, and the prophets are dead too; very true, for these Jews were the genuine offspring of those that killed them. It is true, Abraham and the prophets were great in the favor of God, and in the esteem of all good men. It is true, they kept God's sayings, and were obedient to them; and yet it is true, they died; every one in his own order was gathered to his people.

avail us to say, He is our God, if we be not his people, nor such as He will own?

Christ mentions their profession of relation to God, as an aggravation of their unbelief. All people will honor those whom their God honors; but these Jews, who said that the Lord was their God, studied how to disgrace one whom their God put honor upon. Note, The profession we make of a covenant relation to God, and an interest in Him, if it be not improved by us, will be improved against us.

Yet ye have not known Him. (1.) Ye know Him not at all. These Pharisees were so taken up with the study of their traditions, that they never minded the most needful and useful knowledge; like the false prophets of old, who caused people to forget God's name by their dreams, Jer. 23: 27. Or, (2.) Ye know Him not aright; and that is as bad as not knowing Him at all, or worse. Men may be able to dispute subtly concerning God, and yet may think Him such a one as themselves, and not know Him. Ye say that He is yours, and it is natural to us to desire to know our own, yet ye know Him not. Note, There are many who claim kindred to God, who yet have no acquaintance with Him. It is only the name of God which they have learned to talk of; but his attributes, perfections, and relations to his creatures, they know nothing of: we speak thus to their shame. 1 Cor. 15: 34. Multitudes satisfy, but deceive themselves, with a titular relation to an unknown God.

This Christ charges upon the Jews here, [1.] To show how groundless their pretensions of relation to God were. 'Ye say that He is yours, but ye give yourselves the lie, for it is plain that you do not know Him;' and a cheat is effectually convicted, if it be found that he is ignorant of the persons he pretends alliance to. [2.] To show the reason why they were not wrought upon by Christ's doctrine and miracles. They knew not God, and therefore perceived not his image nor his voice in Christ. Note, The reason why men receive not the Gospel of Christ, is, they have not the knowledge of God. Men submit not to the righteousness of Christ, because they are ignorant of God's righteousness, Rom. 10: 3. They that know not God, and obey not the Gospel of Christ, are put together, 2 Thess. 1: 8.

He gives them the reason of his assurance, that his Father would honor Him and own Him; But I know Him; and again, I know Him; which speaks not only his acquaintance with Him, but his confidence in Him, to stand by Him, and bear Him out in his whole undertaking; as was prophesied concerning Him; (Isa. 60: 7, 8.) 'I know that I shall not be ashamed, for He is near that justifies;' and as Paul, 'I know whom I have believed,' (2 Tim. 1: 12.) I know Him to be faithful, and powerful, and engaged in the cause which I know to be his own.' Observe,

He professes his knowledge of his Father, with the greatest certainty, as neither afraid, nor ashamed to own it; If I should say I know Him not, I should be a liar like unto you. He would not deny his relation to God, to avoid reproaches, and prevent further trouble; nor retract what He had said, nor confess himself deceived or a deceiver; if He should, He would be found a false witness. Note, They who disown their religion and relation to God, as Peter, are liars, as much as hypocrites are, who pretend to know Him when they do not. See 1 Tim. 6: 13, 14. Mr. Clark observes well upon this, that it is a great sin to deny God's grace in us.

He proves his knowledge of his Father; I know Him, and keep his sayings; or word. Christ, as Man, was obedient to the moral law, and, as Redeemer, to the mediatorial law; and in both He kept his Father's word, and his own word with the Father. Christ requires of us, (v. 51.) that we keep his sayings; and has set before us a copy of obedience, without a blot; well might He who learned obedience, teach it; see Heb. 5: 8, 9. Christ by this evidences that He knew the Father. Note, The best proof of our acquaintance with God is our obedience to Him. Those only know God aright, that keep his pious desire of Abraham; he longed to see Christ's day, and he saw it. Though he saw it not so distinctly as we under the Gospel, yet he saw more afterward than he did at first. Note, To him that has, and to him that asks, shall be given; to him that improves what he has, and that prays for more of the knowledge of Christ, God will give more. But how did Abraham see Christ's day? (1.) Some understand it of the sight he had of it in the other world. The separate soul of Abraham, when the veil of flesh was rent, saw the mysteries of the kingdom of God in heaven. Calvin mentions this sense of it, and does not much disallow it. Note, The longings of gracious souls after Jesus Christ will be fully satisfied when they come to heaven. But, (2.) It is more commonly understood of some sight he had of Christ's day in this world. They that received not the promises, saw them afar off, Heb. 11:13. Balaam saw Christ, but not now, not nigh. There is room to conjecture that Abraham had some vision of Christ and his day, for his own private satisfaction, which, like that of Daniel's, must be shut up, and sealed, unto the time of the end, Dan. 12:4. Christ knew what

Before Abraham was, I am.] 'Before Abraham was born, I had a glorious existence with the Father, and am still invariably the same, and one with Him. (Heb. 13:8.) I have long, with Chrysostom and many others, looked on this text as, at least, a strong intimation of the Deity of Christ, nearly parallel to Heb. 1:12. Doddridge, 'Had the existence of our blessed Savior been measured by time, as is that of all created beings, He must have said, Before Abraham was, I was; but his words are, Before Abraham was, I am: thus using the same expression of Himself which the eternal God does, at Exodus 3:14, and hereby demonstrating Himself to be the same God who there said, "I AM THAT I AM."'

What now could tempt our Savior to use and apply this expression to Himself? He knew it had never been applied to any but God, and would have been, in the man so appearing, in the highest degree, committing "the robbery" of making himself equal with God. Besides, they are a mere socialism, and, according to analogy of language, express nothing. No idea belongs to them; for a man cannot in his mind carry the present time back, and make it an antecedent to the time already past; and therefore to say, before such a thing was, I am, is conflicting ideas together, which can have no place in the mind or understanding. If, therefore, we admit the expression to have any meaning, it is a ruled case, 1 John 2:3. Hereby we know that we know Him, (and do not only fancy it,) if we keep his commandments.

Christ refers them to their father Abraham, to whom they boasted so much of a relation.

Christ asserts Abraham's prospect of Him, and respect to Him; (p. 56.) Your father Abraham rejoiced to see my day, and he saw it, and was glad. And by this He proves that He was not at all out of the way, when He made Himself greater than Abraham.

The ambition he had to see his day; he rejoiced, he leaped at it. The word, though it commonly signifies rejoicing, must here signify a transport of desire rather than of joy, for otherwise the latter part of the verse would be a tautology; he saw it, and was glad. He reached out, or stretched himself forth, that he might see my day; as Zaccheus, that ran before and climbed the tree, to see Jesus. The notices he had received of the Messiah, had raised in him an expectation of something great, of which he earnestly longed to know more. The dark intimation of that which is considerable, puts men upon inquiry, and makes them earnestly ask, Who? Where? When? and How? Thus the prophets of the Old Testament, having a general idea of a grace that should come, searched diligently; (1 Pet. 1:10.) and Abraham was as indigent herein as any of them. God told him of a land that He would give his posterity, and of wealth and honor; (Gen. 15:14.) but he never leaped thus to see that day. He could not look with so much indifference upon the promised Seed as he did upon the promised land; in that he was, but to the other he could not be contentedly, a stranger. Note, Those who rightly know any thing of Christ, cannot but be earnestly desirous to know more of Him. Those who discern the dawning of the Sun of righteousness, cannot but wish to see his rising. The mystery of redemption angels desire to look into, much more should we, who are more immediately concerned in it. Abraham desired to see Christ's day, though at a great distance; but this degenerate seed of his discerned not his day, nor bid it welcome. The appearing of Christ, which gracious souls love and long for, carnal hearts dread and loathe.

He saw it, and was glad. God gratified the Abraham saw, better than Moses did. But there are divers things recorded, in which Abraham saw more of that which he longed to see, than he did when the promise was first made to him. He saw in Melchizedek, one made like unto the Son of God, and a priest forever; he saw an appearance of Jehovah, attended with two angels, in the plains of Mamre. In his intercession for Sodom, he saw a specimen of Christ's intercession; in the casting out of Ishmael, and the covenant with Isaac, he saw a figure of the gospel-day, which is Christ's day, for these things were an allegory. In offering Isaac, and the ram instead of Isaac, he saw a double type of the great Sacrifice; and his calling the place Jehovah-jireh—It shall be seen, intimates, that he saw something more in it than others did; and in making his servant put his hand under his thigh, when he swore, he had a regard to the Messiah.

Abraham entertained these discoveries of Christ's day, and bid them welcome; he saw, and was glad. He was glad of what he saw of God's favor to himself, and of what he foresaw of the mercy God had in store for the world. Perhaps this refers to Abraham's laughing when God assured him of a son by Sarah; (Gen. 17:16, 17.) for that was not a laughter of distrust as Sarah's, but of joy; in that promise he saw Christ's day, and it filled him with joy unspeakable. Thus he embraced the promises. Note, A believing sight of Christ and his day will put gladness into the heart. No joy like the joy of faith; we are never acquainted with true pleasure, till we are acquainted with Christ.

The Jews cavil at this, and reproach Him for it; (p. 57.) Thou art not yet fifty years old, and hast Thou seen Abraham? They suppose that if Abraham saw Him and his day, He also had seen Abraham, which yet was not a necessary inuendo, but this turn of his words would best serve to expose Him; yet it was true that Christ had seen Abraham. They suppose it a very absurd thing for Him to pretend to have seen Abraham, who was dead so many ages before He was born. The state of the dead is an invisible state; but they understood that, corporally, which Christ spake spiritually. This gave them occasion to despise his youth; as if He were but of yesterday, and knew nothing Thou art not yet fifty years old. They might as well have said, Thou art not forty; for He was now but thirty-two, or thirty-three. Irenæus, with this passage, supports the tradition which he says he had from some that had conversed with St. John, that our Savior lived to be fifty years old. See what little credit is to be given to tradition; and as to this, the Jews spake at random; some year they would mention, and therefore pitched upon one that they thought He was far enough short of; He did not look to be forty, but they were sure He could not be fifty, much less contemporary with Abraham. Old age is reckoned to begin at fifty, (Num. 4:47.) so that they mean no more than, 'Thou art not to be reckoned an old man; meaning, we must allow the "I am" to belong to Christ, in its proper and peculiar use, as signifying eternity and permanency of duration.'

Bp. SHERLOCK.

To their inquiry, He answered, with his usual most solemn asseveration, 'Before Abraham was, I AM.' The use of the present tense in this connection, and the construction of the passage, require us to understand it as a declaration, that, as the great I AM, who appeared to Moses, He possessed an 'eternal and independent' existence, before Abraham was brought into being, yea, from eternity. (Marg. Ref. z. a.—Notes, Ex. 3:14. A. b. 1:10-12. 13:8. Rev. 1:8.) I indeed the words do not admit of any other construction, which can render them intelligible as a man of ordinary capacity. Thus the Jews evidently understood them; and therefore they were about to stone Jesus for blasphemy. 'Christ here only signifies, that He was before Abraham, in the decree of God.' Grotius.—'But, 1. Christ answers to 'the objection of the Jews; which had no respect to the priority of these two persons in the decree of God; but as to actual existence (2. In this sense even Judas, and all the murderers of our Lord, might before Abraham have a being.' Walby. Some enser but injudicious Calvinists use language similar to this, about justification, and other Christian privileges; and they are justly censured even by their brethren; because the purpose of God, and its accomplishment, are perfectly distinct, and should never be thus confounded. But one would not have expected such crude language from the very learned anti-Calvinist, Grotius! SCOTT.

CHAP. IX.

Jesus gives sight to one who was born blind, 1-7. The man makes his inquiring neighbors to what means his eyes were opened, 8-12. He is brought to the Pharisees, who strictly examine both him and his teacher, 13-23. They are offended at him, for contending that Jesus is a prophet, and disdainfully excommunicate him, 24-31. Jesus makes Himself known to him as 'the Son of God'; and he believes in Him and worships Him, 35-38. Christ declares the design of his coming to be, that the blind might see, and the seeing be made blind; with reference to the miracle, and to the proud and willful blindness of the Pharisees, 39-41.

AND as Jesus passed by, ^a he saw a man which was blind from his birth.

worlds, Prov. 8: 23, ch. 1: 1. Secondly, As Mediator. He was the appointed Messiah, long before Abraham; the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world, (Rev. 13: 8.) the channel of conveyance of life, and love, from God to man. This supposes his divine nature, that He is the same in Himself from eternity, (Heb. 13: 8.) and that He is the same to man ever since the fall; He was made of God Wisdom, Righteousness, Sanctification, and Redemption, to Adam, Abel, Enoch, Noah, and Shem, and all the patriarchs that lived and died by faith in Him before Abraham was born. Abraham was the root of the Jewish nation, the rock out of which they were hewn. If Christ was before Abraham, his doctrine and religion were no novelty, but were, in the substance of them, prior to Judaism, and ought to take place of it.

This word ended the dispute abruptly; they could bear to hear no more from Him, and He needed to say no more to them, having witnessed this good confession, which was sufficient to support all his claims. One would think that Christ's discourse, so full of grace and glory, would have captivated them all; but their inveterate prejudice against the doctrine and law of Christ, so contrary to their pride and worldliness, baffled all conviction. Now was fulfilled that prophecy, (Mal. 3: 1, 2.) that when the Messenger of the covenant should come to his temple, they would not abide the day of his coming, because He would be like a refiner's fire.

They were enraged at Christ for what He said; They took up stones, to cast at Him, v. 59. Perhaps they looked upon Him as a blasphemer, and such were indeed to be stoned; (Lev. 24: 16.) but they must be first legally tried and convicted; farewell justice and order, if every man pretend to execute a law at his pleasure. Besides, they had said but just now, that He was a distracted man, and if so, it was against all reason and equity to punish Him as a malefactor, for what He said. They took up stones. Lightfoot will tell you how they came to have stones so ready in the temple; they had workmen at this time repairing the temple, and the pieces of stone which they hewed off, served for this purpose. See here the desperate power of sin and Satan over the children of disobedience. Who would think that there could be such wickedness in men; such daring rebellion against one that proved Himself the Son of God. Thus every one has a stone to throw at his holy religion. Acts 28: 22.

He made his escape out of their hands.

Jesus hid Himself—He was hid, either by the crowd of those who wished well to Him, to shelter Him; (He that ought to have been upon a throne, high and lifted up, is content to be lost in a crowd;) or perhaps He concealed Himself behind some of the walls or pillars of the temple; (In the secret of his tabernacle He shall hide me, Ps. 27: 5.) or by a divine power, casting a mist before their eyes, made Himself invisible to them. When the wicked rise, a man is hidden, a wise and good man, Prov. 28: 12, 28. Not that Christ was afraid, or ashamed to stand by what He said, but his hour was not yet come, and He would countenance the flight of his ministers and people in times of persecution, when called to it. The Lord hid Jeremiah and Baruch, Jer. 36: 26.

He departed, went out of the temple, going through the midst of them, undiscovered, and so passed by. This was not a cowardly, inglorious flight, nor such as argued guilt or fear. It was foretold concerning Him, that He should not fail or be discouraged, Isa. 49: 4. But, (1.) It was an instance of his power over his enemies, and that they could do no more against Him than He gave them leave to do; by which it appears, that when afterward He was taken in their pits, He offered Himself, ch. 10: 19. They now thought they had Him sure, and yet He passed through the midst of them, either their eyes being blinded, or their hands tied, and thus He left them, like a lion disappointed of his prey. It was an instance of his prudent provision for his own safety, when He knew that his work was not done, nor his testimony finished; thus He gave an example to his own rule, When they persecute you in one city, flee to another; nay, if occasion be, to a wilderness, for so Elijah did, (1 Kings 19: 3, 4.) and the woman, the church, Rev. 12: 6. When they took up loose stones to throw at Christ, He could have commanded the fixed stones, which did cry out of the wall against them, to avenge his cause, or the earth to open and swallow them up; but He chose to accommodate Himself to the state He was in, to make the example imitable by the prudence of his followers, without a miracle. It was a righteous deserting of those who (worse than the Gadarenes, who prayed Him to depart) stoned Him from among them. Christ will not long stay with those who bid Him be gone. Christ visited the temple after this; as one loath to depart, He bid oft farewell; but at last He abandoned it forever, and left it desolate. Christ now went through the midst of the Jews, and none of them courted his stay, or stirred up themselves to take hold on Him, but were content to let Him go. Note, God never forsakes any til they have first provoked Him to withdraw, and will have none of Him. Calvin observes, that these chief priests, when they had driven Christ out of the temple, valued themselves on the possession they kept of it; 'But,' (says he) 'those deceive themselves, who are proud of a church or temple which Christ has forsaken.' When Christ left them, it is said that He passed by unobserved; so that they were not aware of Him. Note, Christ's departures from a church, or a particular soul, are often secret, and not soon taken notice of. As the kingdom of God comes not, so it goes not with observation. See Judg. 16: 20. Samson wist not that the Lord was departed from him. Thus it was with these forsaken Jews—God left them, and they missed Him not.

CHAP. IX. v. 1-7. The first words set me to refer to the last of the foregoing chapter, and countenance their opinion, who place this story immediately after that. There it was said, He passed by, and here, without so much as repeating his name, (though our translators supply it,) and as He passed by. 1. Though the Jews had abused Him, and gave Him the highest provocation, yet He did not slip any opportunity of doing good among them, nor take up a resolution, never to favor them. The cure of this blind man was a kindness to the public, enabling him to work for his living, who, before was a burthen to the neighborhood. It is noble, and Christ-like, to serve the public, even when we are slighted by it. 2. Though He was in flight from danger, and for his life, He stayed to show mercy to this poor man. We make more haste than good speed, when we outrun opportunities of doing good. 3. When the Pharisees drove Christ from them, He went to this

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 49-59. Calumny and reproach must be the recompense of those, who stand up for 'the truth as it is in Jesus' and they may expect to be called the enemies of mankind, of their country, nay, of the church and religion; for, the more they honor God, the more the ungodly and hypocritical will dishonor them. Nor ought we to be disconcerted, at being branded with opprobrious terms, by such men, as said to Jesus, 'Thou art a Samaritan, and hast a devil.' We must, amidst all, still direct men to Jesus, 'not seeking our own glory,' but leaving the matter to Him 'who seeketh and judgeth:' for we are assured, that they who 'keep his saying shall not see death forever.' We should steadfastly profess what we believe concerning God and religion, whatever wrong constructions may be put upon our words, by those who falsely claim Him as their God, yet know Him not; and if we be heirs of Abraham's faith, we shall trust Him for temporal protection, and exult in expectation of that day, when the Savior, who said, 'Before Abraham was, I AM,' shall appear in his glory to the confusion of his enemies, and the salvation of all who believe in Him; while they shout in triumphant strains, 'Lo, this is our God, we have waited for Him, and He will save us. This is the Lord, we have waited for Him, we will be glad and rejoice in his salvation.' (Notes, Is. 25: 9. 1 Tim. 4: 6-8. Tit. 2: 11-15. Heb. 9: 27, 28. 2 Pet. 3: 10-15.) SCOTT.

NOTES.

CHAP. IX. v. 1-7. Though the first words of this chapter seem connected with the conclusion of the foregoing, yet it is generally thought that some months had intervened; for the events before recorded [704]

ed took place at the feast of tabernacles, but those of this chapter are supposed to have occurred at the feast of dedication, about a quarter of a year afterwards. (Note, 10: 22-24.) This question seems in part to have arisen from the opinion, that men in this world fare better

2 And his disciples asked him, saying, Master, who did sin, this man, or his parents, that he was born blind?

3 Jesus answered, Neither hath this man sinned, nor his parents: but that the works of God should be made manifest in him.

4 Matt. 16:14. 170:18-19, 2:3-6, 21:27, 22:5, 24:23, 42:7, Ec. 9:1, 3, Luke 13:2-5, Act. 28:4. 11:14, 40, 14:11-13, Matt. 11:5, Acts 4:21.

its structure exceeding nice and fine. In the formation of animals, it is said to be the first part discernible. What a mercy is it that there was no miscarriage in ours. Christ cured many that were blind by disease or accident; but this man was born blind. [1.] That He might give an instance of his power in desperate cases, to relieve when none else can. [2.] That He might give a specimen of the work of his grace upon the souls of sinners, which gives sight to those that were by nature blind.

(2.) The compassion of Jesus toward him was very tender. He saw him; that is, took cognizance of his case, and looked upon him with concern. When God is about to work deliverance, He is said to see the affliction; so Christ saw this man. Others saw him, but not as He did. He could not see Christ, but Christ saw him, and anticipated both his prayers and expectations. Christ is often found of those that seek Him not, nor see Him, Isa. 65: 1. And if we know or apprehend any thing of Christ, it is because we were first known of Him, (Gal. 4: 9.) and apprehended by Him, Phil. 3: 12.

When Christ and his disciples departed out of the temple, his disciples went along with Him, for they continued with Him in his temptations, and followed Him whithersoever He went; and they lost nothing by their adherence to Him, but gained experience abundantly. Observe,

1. When Christ looked upon this blind man, they had an eye to him too; Christ's compassions should kindle ours. It is probable that Christ told them that this man was born blind, or they knew it by common fame; but they did not move Christ to heal him, instead of that, they started a very odd question concerning him, Rabbi, who sinned, this man or his parents, that he was born blind? This question was, (1.) Uncharitably censorious. They take it for granted that this calamity was the punishment of some uncommon wickedness; and that this man was a sinner above all that dwelt at Jerusalem, Luke 13: 4. For the barbarous people to infer, Surely this man is a murderer; was not so strange; but it was incredible in them who had read that all things come alike to all, and knew that it was adjudged in Job's case, that the greatest sufferers are not therefore to be looked upon as the greatest sinners. Repentance calls our own afflictions punishments, but charity calls the afflictions of others trials, unless the contrary is very evident. (2.) It was unnecessarily curious. Concluding this calamity to be inflicted for some heinous crime, they ask, Who were the criminals, this man, or his parents? And what was this to them? Or what good would it do them to know it? We are apt to be more inquisitive concerning other people's sins than our own; whereas it is more our concern to know wherefore God contendeth with us, than wherefore He contends with others: for to judge ourselves is our duty, but to judge our brother is our sin.

Some think that the disciples were tainted with the Pythagorean notion of the pre-existence of souls, and their transmigration from one body to another. [1.] Was this man's soul condemned to the dungeon of this blind body, to punish it for some great sin committed in another body? The Pharisees seem to have had the same opinion of his case, when they said, Thou wast altogether born in sin; (c. 34.) as if all those, and those only, were born in sin, whom nature had stigmatized. Or, [2.] Whether he was punished for the wickedness of his parents, which God sometimes visits upon the children. It is a good reason why parents should take heed of sin, lest their children smart for them when they are gone. Let not us thus be cruel to our own, as the ostrich in the wilderness. Perhaps the disciples asked this, because Christ had intimated to another patient that his impotency was the cause of his sin, ch. 5: 14. 'Master,' say they, 'whose sin is the cause of this impotency?' The equity of God's dispensations is always certain, for his righteousness is as the great mountains, but not always to be accounted for, for his judgments are a great deep.

or worse, according to their behavior in some pre-existent state, of which they have no recollection! Many of the Jews at that time had imbibed this absurd sentiment from the heathen; for, not being satisfied with the scriptural account of the entrance of sin and death into the world, they had recourse to this notion to solve the difficulties which they met with in the dispensations of Providence, from observing the extraordinary calamities attendant on some men, more than on others, through the whole course of their lives. As far as I can recollect, this is the only instance, in which sight was miraculously given to one born blind; and indeed opening the eyes of the blind, strict speaking, was a miracle peculiar to our Lord Himself, and is repeatedly mentioned in the prophet's of his coming. It is neither included in the commission given to the apostles and seventy disciples; nor was it performed, either by the apostles, or by any of the ancient prophets. The removal of Saul's temporary blindness by Ananias, I think, the only exception. The same is observable also of opening the ears of the deaf, and the mouths of the dumb. (Notes. Ez. 4: 11, 12. Ps. 146: 8. Is. 29: 17-19, 35: 5-7. Matt. 9: 32, 33.)

A miracle ought to be independent of second causes, or performed without any natural instrument. Read v. 10, 11. In proof of this being the design of these external applications, notice that they were used in no instance, except those of blindness and deafness, when a defect of the senses rendered such means necessary, to convey such assurance of Jesus having been the author of the miracle. If these remarks are just, they exhibit one of those numberless cases, where incidents apparently minute and objectionable, when well considered, display the miraculous nature of the facts, and the admirable propriety of our Lord's conduct in every circumstance; and every such instance confirms strongly the conclusion, that our Lord's miracles were not delusive visions, but plain proofs of a divine power, exhibited with the sobriety and dignity becoming his divine character.

(2.) In the rabbinical commentary on Eccl. 13: 3. "And the days approach, in which thou shalt say, I have no pleasure in them," the gloss is: "These are the days of the Messiah, in which there shall be neither merit nor demerit, i. e. no merit of the parents imputed for good, nor demerit imputed for evil." This, it seems, was the common opinion. But, if so, may we not be allowed to express the question of the disciples thus: "Master, we know that Thou art the Messiah, and that these are the days of the Messiah; and we have learned from our schools that there is now to be no imputation of merit or demerit from the parents; when, therefore, has the man been born blind, but to carry in these times the mark of imputation of blame? Is it from his parents? This is inconsistent with the common opinion. It seems, therefore, that he bears the guilt of his own blame. Is it so or not?"

LIGHTFOOT.

Who did sin? The notion that this blindness was the effect of sin, is a very reasonable one; taking the word sin in the sense of transgression or of disobedience to a law of God. And though the disciples may have had only what is called moral dereliction in view, we may well take occasion to reflect on the evils which result from wilful ignorance of or disobedience to not only the moral and religious, but the physical, and especially the organic laws of God, by impressing which on the constitution of nature, He has indicated his will to us, and placed us under the necessity of obeying them if we would be happy. How often do we find persons, who sincerely desire to obey all moral and religious laws, yet neglecting to inquire into, or obey the organic laws, so necessary to their health, comfort and usefulness, through this neglect may bequeath a legacy of misery to their offspring, and is seen to fill the world with disease and wretchedness. Yet, perhaps, these very persons and their friends often wonder that the best of people are so frequently tried with sickness, while the notoriously wicked seem to enjoy every moment of life; not reflecting that obedience to certain conditions of life, is followed by health and bodily comfort in all, while the contrary course is as inevitably punished, men receiving in themselves that recompense of their error which was meet. (Rom. 1: 27.) without exception of persons, or of moral, intellectual, or religious character.

works. God has a sovereignty over all his creatures, a property in them, and may make them serviceable to his glory as He thinks fit; and if God be glorified, by us or in us, we were not made in vain.

This man was born blind, and it was worth while for him to continue thus long dark, that the works of God might be manifest in him. That is, 1st. That the attributes of God might be manifested in him: his justice in making sinful man liable to such calamities; his power and goodness in supporting a poor man under such a tedious affliction; especially, that his power and goodness might be manifested in curing him. Note, The difficulties of Providence may be resolved into this—God intends to show Himself, to declare his glory, to make Himself to be taken notice of. Those who regard Him not in the ordinary course of things, are sometimes alarmed by things extraordinary. How contentedly then may a good man lose his comforts, sure that thereby God will be one way or other a gainer in his glory! 2dly. That the counsels of God concerning the Redeemer might be manifested. He was born blind, that our Lord might have the honor of curing him, and therein prove Himself the Light of the world. The fall of man was permitted, and the blindness that followed it, that the works of God might be manifest. It was a great while since this man was born blind, yet it never appeared till now why he was so. Note, The intentions of Providence commonly do not appear till a great while after the event. The sentences in the book of Providence are sometimes long; you must read a great way before you can apprehend their sense.

(2.) He gives the reason of his own readiness to heal him, v. 4, 5. It was in pursuance of his undertaking; I must work the works of Him that sent Me, while it is day; the night cometh, the period of that day, when no man can work. This is not only a reason why Christ was constant in doing good to men, but why particularly He did this, though it was the Sabbath, on which works of necessity might be done, and He proves this to be a work of necessity.

It was his Father's will; I must work the works of Him that sent Me. Note, 1st. The Father, when He sent his Son into the world, gave Him work to do; He did not come into the world to take state, but to do business; whom God sends He employs, for He sends none to be idle. 2dly. The works Christ had to do, were the works of Him that sent Him, appointed by Him, done for Him: He was a Worker together with God. 3dly. He was pleased to lay Himself under the strongest obligations to do the business He was sent about; I must work. He engaged his heart, in the covenant of redemption, as Mediator, Jer. 30: 21. Shall we be willing to be loose, when Christ was willing to be bound? 4thly. Christ, having laid Himself under obligations to do his work, wrought with the utmost vigor and industry. He worked the works He had to do; made a business of that which was his business. It is not enough to look at our work, and talk over it, we must work it.

Now was his opportunity; while it is day; while the time lasts, appointed to work in, and the light lasts, given to work by. Christ Himself had his day, 1st. All the business of the mediatorial kingdom was to be done within the limits of time, and in this world; for when time shall be no more, the kingdom shall be delivered up to the Father, and the mystery of God finished. 2dly. All the work He had to do in his own person on earth, was to be done before his death; the time of his living in this world, is the day here spoken of. Note, During the day of life we must be busy, not waste day-time, nor play by day-light, it will be time enough to rest when our day is done, Ps. 104: 22, 23.

The night comes when no man can work. Note, The consideration of our death should quicken us to improve all opportunities, both of doing and getting good. The night comes, it will come certainly, may come suddenly, is

2. Christ was always apt to teach, and to rectify his disciples' mistakes.

[1.] 'Neither has this man sinned, nor his parents; but he was born blind, that now the works of God should be made manifest in him,' v. 3. Here Christ, who perfectly knew the secrets of the divine counsels, has told two things concerning such calamities.

[1.] They are not always inflicted as punishments of sin. The sinfulness of the race of man does indeed justify God in the miseries of human life; so that they who have the least share of them, must say that God is kind; and they who have the largest share, must not say that He is unjust; but many are more miserable than others in this life, who are not more sinful. This man was a sinner, and his parents sinners; but God had not an eye to any uncommon guilt in inflicting this upon him. Note, We must take heed of judging any to be great sinners, merely because they are great sufferers, lest we be found, not only persecuting those whom God has smitten, (Ps. 69: 26.) but accusing those whom He has justified, and condemning those for whom Christ died, Rom. 8: 33, 34.

[2.] They are sometimes intended purely for the glory of God, and the manifesting of his glory to his creatures, a property in them, and may make them serviceable to his glory as He thinks fit; and if God be glorified, by us or in us, we were not made in vain.

coming nearer and nearer. We cannot compute how high our sun is, it may go down at noon; nor can we promise ourselves a twilight between the day of life and the night of death. When the night comes we cannot work, because the light afforded us to work by is extinguished; the grave is a land of darkness, and our work cannot be done in the dark. And besides, our allotted time will then be expired; when our Master tied us to duty, He tied us to time; when night comes, call the laborers; we must then show our work, and receive according to the things done. In the world of retribution we are no longer probationers. Christ uses this as an argument with Himself, to be diligent, though He had no opposition from within to struggle with; much more need have we of these and like considerations to quicken us.

His business in the world was to enlighten it; As long as I am in the world, and that will not be long, I am the Light of the world. So ch. 9: 12. He is the Sun of righteousness, that has not only light in his wings for those that can see, but healing, or beams, for those that are blind, therein far exceeding that great light which rules by day. Christ would therefore cure this representative of a blind world, because He came not only to give light, but sight. This gives us great encouragement to come to Him, as a quickening Light. To whom should we look but to Him? Which way turn our eyes, but to the light? We partake of the sun's light, and so we may of Christ's grace, without money, and without price. What Christ saith of Himself, He saith of his disciples; Ye are lights in the world; if so, Let your light shine. What were candles made for but to burn?

The circumstances of the miracle are singular, and significant. When He had thus spoken for the instruction of his disciples, He addressed Himself to the blind man. He did not defer it till He could do it more privately, for greater safety, or more publicly, for greater honor, or till the Sabbath was past, when it would give less offence; what good we have opportunity of doing, we should do quickly; He that will never do a good work till there is nothing to be objected against it, will leave many a good work forever undone, Eccl. 11: 4.

Christ spit on the ground, and made clay of the spittle. He could have cured him with a word, but He chose this way, to show that He is not tied to any method. There was no water near; and He would teach us not to be nice or curious, but, when we have occasion, to take up with that which is at hand, if it will serve. Christ's making use of his own spittle intimates that there is healing virtue in every thing that belongs to Christ; clay made thus was more precious than the balm of Gilead.

He anointed the eyes of the blind man with the clay. Or, as the margin reads it, He spread, daubed the clay on his eyes, like a tender physician; did it with his own hand, though the patient was a beggar. And this, (1.) To magnify his power in making a blind man see, by a method, one would think more likely to make a seeing man blind. Note, The power of God often works by contraries; and He makes men feel their own blindness before He gives them sight. (2.) To give an intimation that it was the same hand that at first made man out of the clay; for by Him God made the worlds, both the great world, and man, the little world. (3.) To typify the healing and opening the eyes of the mind by the grace of Christ. The design of the Gospel is to open men's eyes, Acts 26: 18. The eye-salve that does the work, is of Christ's preparing; made up of his blood: we must come to Christ for eye-salve, Rev. 3: 18. He only is able, and He only is appointed, to make it, Luke 4: 18. The means used in this work

(5.) I am the light, &c. 'That is, the enlightener of the world. See on 1. 9, and Matt. 17: 2. The word is usually explained teacher; but by *ael, it is interpreted author of felicity. I prefer, with Schleusner, to understand both teacher and restorer of happiness to the human race; as it is a common metaphor of knowledge, so is it also of happiness, see Esth. 8: 16. Ps. 97: 11. "Light is sown for the righteous." Is. 60: 1. "Unto the righteous there is set up light in the darkness," especially when considered as flowing from that religious knowledge which Christ came especially to impart.' BLOOMFIELD.

(6.) That spittle was beneficial in certain disorders of the eyes, appears to have been a general opinion among the Jews, Romans, and Greeks; and travellers find traces of this belief even to the present day in the East. Some kinds of clay also were by the ancients thought beneficial.

Siloam. The evangelist notices the signification of the name. Christ is often called the Sent of God; the Messenger of the covenant; (Mal. 3:1.) so when Christ sent him to Siloam, He did in effect send him to Himself, for Christ is all in all, to souls. Christ, as a Prophet, directs us to Himself as a Priest. Go, wash in the Fountain opened, a Fountain, not a pool.

The patient went his way, probably led by some friend, or perhaps was so well acquainted with Jerusalem, that he could find the way himself; nature often supplies the want of sight with uncommon sagacity; and he washed his eyes. Probably the disciples, or some stander by, informed him that He who bid him do it, was Jesus, of whom he had heard so much, else he would not have gone on that looked so like a fool's errand. In confidence of Christ's power, as well as in obedience to his command, he went, and washed.

He came seeing. There is more glory in this concise narrative, He went, and washed, and came seeing, than in Caesar's I came, I saw, I conquered. When the clay was washed from his eyes, all the other impediments were done away; so when the pangs and struggles of the new birth are over, and the terrors of conviction past, the bands of sin fly off, and a glorious light and liberty succeed. See here the power of Christ. What cannot He do, who could not only do this, but do it thus? With a lump of clay laid on either eye, and washed off again, He couched those cataracts, which the most skillful oculist, with the finest instrument and the most curious hand, could not remove. No doubt, this is He that should come, for by Him the blind receive their sight. It is an instance of the virtue of faith and obedience. This man le. Christ do what He pleased, and did what He appointed, and so was cured. They that would be healed by Christ, must be ruled by Him. He came back from the pool to his neighbors and acquaintance, wondering, and wondered at. This represents the benefit of attending on ordinances, according to Christ's appointment; we go to the pool of Siloam weak, and come away strengthened; go doubting, and come away satisfied; go mourning, and come away rejoicing; go trembling, and come away triumphing; go blind, and come away seeing, and singing, Isa. 52: 8.

V. 12-13. Such a wonderful event as giving sight to a man born blind, could not but be the talk of the town, and many heeded it no more than they do other town-talk, that is but nine days' wonder; but here we are told what the neighbors said of it; for the confirmation of the fact. What was not believed at first without scrutiny, may afterward be admitted without scruple.

(7.) Siloam.] 'From the fountain Siloam there were two canals conveyed into two pools, the upper, situated at the extreme boundary of Jerusalem, and formed by Solomon, and the lower, (appropriated to the use of those who inhabited the lower city,) which was constructed after the time of Solomon. Which of these pools is to be here understood cannot be determined.

BLOOMFIELD.

The neighbors, knowing he had been blind, could not but be amazed; and said, Is not this he that sat and begged? It seems, he was a common beggar, disabled to work for his living; and so discharged from the obligation of the law, that if any would not work, neither should he eat. When he could not labor, his parents not being able to maintain him, he begged. Note, Those who cannot otherwise subsist, must not be ashamed to beg; let no man be ashamed of any thing but sin. Some beggars are objects of charity, and should be distinguished; we must not let the bees starve, because of the drones or wasps among them.

It was well ordered by Providence, that he on whom this miracle was wrought should be a common beggar, generally known; thus the truth of the miracle was the better attested, and there were more to witness against those infidel Jews, who would not believe he had been blind, than if he had been maintained in his father's house. It was the greater instance of Christ's condescension, that He seemed to take more pains about the cure of a common beggar than of others. When it was for the advantage of his miracle, that they should be wrought on those that were remarkable, He pitched upon those that were made so by their poverty and misery, not by their dignity.

In answer to this inquiry, some said, This is the very same man; and these are witnesses to the truth of the miracle, for they had long known him. Others, who could not think it possible a man should thus on a sudden receive sight, for that reason, and no other, said, He is not he, but is like him, and so, by their confession, if it be he, it is a great miracle. Hence the wisdom and power of Providence in ordering such a universal variety of faces, so that no two are so like, but that they may be distinguished; which is necessary to society, commerce, and the administration of justice. The grace of God makes such wonderful change upon some who before were very wicked, that one would not take them to be the same persons.

The man himself said, I am the very man that so lately sat and begged; I was blind, and an object of charity, but now see, and am a monument of the mercy of God. We do not find that the neighbors appealed to him, but he, hearing the debate, interposed, and put an end to it. It is a piece of justice we owe to our neighbors, to rectify their mistakes, and to set things before them, as far as we are able, in a true light. Those who are enlightened by the grace of God, should be ready to own what they were before that change, 1 Tim. 1: 13, 14.

They will now turn aside, and see this great sight, and inquire further concerning it. Our Lord did not sound a trumpet when He did these alms, nor perform his cures upon a stage; yet, like a city on a hill, they could not be hid.

How were thine eyes opened? The works of the Lord being great, they ought to be sought out, Ps. 111: 2. It is good to observe the method of them, and they will appear the more wonderful. To apply it spiritually, it is strange that blind eyes should be opened, but more strange when we consider how they are opened; how weak the means, how strong the opposition that is conquered.

In answer to this, He gives them a plain and full account of the matter; v. 11. Note, Those who have experienced special instances of God's goodness, should be ready to communicate their experiences, for the glory of God, and the instruction and encouragement of others. See David's collection of his experiences, his own and others', Ps. 34: 4-6. It is a debt we owe to our Benefactor, and to our brethren, God's favors are lost upon us, when they are lost with us, and go no further.

Where is He? Some perhaps asked this

Verse 9.

[Practical Observations.]

13 They brought to the Pharisees him that aforetime was blind.

14 And it was the sabbath-day when Jesus made the clay, and opened his eyes.

15 Then again the Pharisees also asked him how he had received his sight. He said unto them, He put clay upon mine eyes, and I washed, and do see.

16 Therefore said some of the Pharisees, 'This man is not of God, because he keepeth not the sabbath-day. Others said, How can a man that is a sinner do such miracles? And there was a division among them.

5:11-13, 7:11, Ex. 2:18-20, 8:2-9, 11:6-12, 12:1-2, 13:1-14, 15:16-18, 22:1-23, Matt. 12:1-14, Mark 2:23-28, 3:1-6, Luke 6:1-11, 13:10-17, 14:1-5, 8:2-9, 10:11-28, 27, 24:30-33, 32, 5:36, 14:11, 15:24, 7:12, 43, 10:19, Luke 13:51-53, Acts 14:4.

cuted, was not what they represented Him, but one that gave considerable proofs of a divine mission. What hath convinced us of the truth and excellency of religion, and removed our prejudices against it, we should offer to others for their conviction.

It would seem rather, that they did it to exasperate the Pharisees against Christ; there was no need, for they were bitter enough of themselves. They brought him with such a suggestion as that, (ch. 11: 47, 43.) If we let Him thus alone, all men will believe on Him. Note, Rulers of a persecuting spirit, shall never want ill instruments to blow the coals, and make them worse.

Good was never maligned but under the imputation of evil. The crime objected here was, It was the sabbath-day when Jesus made the clay, and opened his eyes. The profanation of the Sabbath is certainly wicked; but the traditions of the Jews had made that to be a violation of it, which was far from being so. Many a time this matter was contested between Christ and the Jews, that it might be settled for all ages. But it may be asked, 'Why would Christ not only work miracles on the sabbath-day, but work them in such a manner as He knew would give offence to the Jews? When He had healed the impotent man, why should He bid him carry his bed? Could He not have cured this blind man without clay?' I answer, 1. He would not question out of curiosity; 'Where is He, that we may see Him?' A man that did such cures as these, might well be a show, which one would go a good way for the sight of. Others, perhaps, asked out of ill will; 'Where is He, that we may seize Him?' A proclamation was out for his discovery, and apprehension; (ch. 11: 57.) and the unthinking crowd, in spite of reason and equity, will have ill thoughts of persons in an ill name. Some, we hope, asked this question out of good will.

In answer to this he could say nothing; I know not. As soon as Christ had sent him to the pool, He withdrew, and did not doubt the effect, or wait for the man's thanks. Humble souls take more pleasure in doing good than in hearing of it again; it will be time enough to hear of it in the resurrection of the just. The man had never seen Jesus; for by the time he had gained his sight, he had lost his Physician; and he asked, it is probable, Where is He? None of all the new objects that presented themselves, could be so grateful to him as one sight of Christ, but as yet he knew no more of Him than that He was called Jesus—a Savior. In the work of grace wrought on the soul we see the change, but not the hand that makes it; for the way of the Spirit is like that of the wind, of which thou hearest the sound, but canst not tell whence it comes, or whither it goes.

V. 13—34. One would have expected such a miracle would have settled the reputation of Christ, and silenced opposition, but it had the contrary effect; instead of being embraced as a prophet for it, He is prosecuted as a criminal, v. 13.

They brought him to the sanhedrim, which consisted chiefly of Pharisees, at least the Pharisees in the sanhedrim were most active against Christ.

Some think they did it with a good design, to show them that this Jesus, whom they perseseem to yield to the usurped power of the scribes and Pharisees; their government was illegal, their impositions arbitrary, and their zeal for the rituals consumed the substantial of religion; therefore Christ would not give place to them by subjection, no, not for an hour. Christ was made under the law of God, but not under their law. 2. He did it, that He might, both by word and action, expound the fourth commandment, and vindicate it from their corrupt glosses, and so teach us, both, that a weekly Sabbath is to be perpetually observed in the church, one day in seven; (for what need was there to explain that law, if it must soon be abrogated?) and that it is not to be so ceremonially observed by us as it was by the Jews. Works of necessity and mercy are allowed, and the sabbath-rest to be kept, not so much for its own sake, as in order to the sabbath-work. 3. Christ chose to work his cures on the sabbath-day, to dignify the day, and to intimate that spiritual cures should be wrought mostly on the Christian Sabbath. How many blind eyes have been opened by the preaching of the Gospel, on the Lord's day; how many impotent souls cured!

In the trial of this matter by the Pharisees, and much passion, prejudice, and ill-humor, and so little reason appear, that the discourse is nothing but cross questions. One would think they should have been so taken up in admiring the miracle, and congratulating the happiness of the poor man, that they could not have been peevish with him. But their enmity to Christ had divested them of all humanity. See how they teased this man.

They doubted whether he had been born blind, and demanded proof of it. Men that seek occasion to quarrel with the clearest truths, may find it if they please; and they that resolve to hold fast deceit, will never want a handle. This was not a prudent caution, but a prejudiced infidelity. It was a good way they took, to call the parents. This they did, in hopes to disprove the miracle. 'These parents were poor and timorous, and if they had said they could not be sure this was their son, and that it was only some weakness in his sight he had been born with, which, if they had been able to get help for him, might have been cured long since, or had otherwise prevaricated, for fear of the court, the Pharisees had robbed Christ of the honor of this miracle, which would have lessened the reputation of all the rest. But God so over-ruled their counsel, that it turned to the more effectual proof of the miracle, and left them under a necessity of being either convinced or confounded.

They asked them in an imperious way, 'Is this your son? Dare you swear it? Do you say he was born blind? Or did he pretend to be so, to have an excuse for begging?' How

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—12. It becomes us to be very cautious how we ascribe the calamities of others to their peculiar sinfulness: (Notes, Job 2: 12, 13, 4: 1. Luke 13: 1—5.) for the Lord may have far other reasons for afflicting them; and those whom He most loves are often sharply tried, in order to the display of his grace in supporting them. But we can never do wrong in applying to Jesus to solve our difficulties; for He is 'the Light of the world,' from whom we must derive all our instruction in the concerns of eternity.—Let us also learn to copy his perseverance in doing good, amidst discouragements and injuries; and let every one seize the present hour, to ensure his own salvation, and to do the work of God; remembering how speedily 'the night cometh, in which no man can work.' (Note, Ec. 9: 10.)—Those who confide in their own understandings, and 'trust in their own hearts,' are incompetent judges of the Lord's works and ways; for He generally employs such means as men despise: thus the captious and scornful exclude themselves; while the humble believe, and obtain the blessing.—Those calamities, which are generally thought to be tokens of divine displeasure, and inseparable from misery, often prove occasions of special good, and evidences of the Lord's favor. The man born blind rejoices, and will rejoice forever, in having, by means of that heavy affliction, been brought to know and love Jesus; in the honor of his Savior, thus displayed; and in the benefits, which multitudes, in every subsequent age, have derived from the narrative.—But, on the other hand, what numbers make so perverse and mischievous a use of their limbs and faculties, even to the end of life, that they might wish forever, they had been born, and lived all their days, blind, deaf, dumb, lame, nay, even idiots or lunatics!—They whose eyes are opened, whose hearts are cleansed, by his grace, are the same men, yet 'new creatures'; and being known in the identity of their persons, and the newness of their characters, they live monuments to the Redeemer's glory, and continually recommend his grace to all who desire the same salvation. (P. O. Mark 6: 14—29. Note, 2 Cor. 6: 17.) SCOTT.

Whitby, in Scott.

Verse 14. It is said, that anointing the eyes with any kind of unguent, or even with spittle, on the sabbath-day, was forbidden by a tradition of the elders; if so, our Lord might use this method of opening the man's eyes, as a protest against their absurd and frivolous traditions. (Marg. Ref. 1.—Note, 7: 19—24.)

Verse 15, 16. (Note, 10—12.) (16.) Division.] The council was divided into two parties, which contended with each other, continuing in the same place. It is probable, that Nicodemus and Joseph of Arimathea, with some others who privately favored our Lord, embraced this opportunity of checking the violent proceedings of his enemies.

SCOTT.

17 They say unto the blind man again, 'What sayest thou of him, that he hath opened thine eyes?' He said, 'He is a prophet.'

18 But the Jews did not believe concerning him, that he had been blind, and received his sight, until they called the parents of him that had received his sight.

19 And they asked them, saying, 'Is this your son, who ye say was born blind?' how then doth he now see?

20 His parents answered them, and said, 'We know that this is our son, and that he was born blind.'

ed upon as really against Him, Luke 11:23. Mark 8:33.

That they might not be further urged in this matter, they refer themselves and the court to him; He is of age, ask him, he shall speak for himself. This implies that while children are not of age, it is incumbent on their parents to speak for them to God in prayer, to the church in baptism; but when they are of age, they should be asked whether they be willing to stand to what their parents did for them, and speak for themselves. This man, though born blind, seems to have been of quick understanding, which enabled him to speak for himself better than his friends could for him; thus God often by a kind providence makes up in the mind what is wanting in the body, 1 Cor. 12:23, 24. His parents' turning over to him, was only to save themselves from trouble; whereas they that had so great an interest in his mercies, had reason to embark with him in his hazards for the honor of Jesus, who had done so much for them.

The reason why they were so cautious; they feared the Jews. Near is my friend, my child, and perhaps my religion, but nearer is myself. But Christianity teaches another lesson, 1 Cor. 10:24. Esth. 8:6.

It was lately enacted, That if any man did confess that Jesus was Christ, he should be put out of the synagogue. Observe,

1. The crime designed to be prevented by this statute, was embracing Jesus as the promised Messiah. They themselves did expect a Messiah, but could by no means bear to think this Jesus should be He, nor admit the question whether He were or no; his precepts were all so contrary to their traditional laws. The spiritual worship He prescribed, overthrew their formalities; nor did any thing more effectually destroy their narrow-spiritedness than that universal charity He taught; humility, mortification, repentance, self-denial, sounded harsh in their ears. His promises and appearances were contrary to their traditional hopes. They expected a Messiah in outward splendor, that should not only free the nation from the Roman yoke, but make all the members of the sanhedrim princes and peers; and now to hear of a Messiah, whose outward circumstances were mean, whose first appearance and principal residence were in Galilee, a despised province, who never made his court to them, whose followers were neither sword-men, nor gown-men, nor men of honor, but fishermen, who promised no redemption but from sin, no consolation of Israel but what is spiritual and divine, and at the same time bid his followers expect the cross, and count upon persecution; this was such a reproach to all the ideas they had formed, such a blow to their power, and such a disappointment to their hopes, that they could never be reconciled to it, nor so much as give it a patient hearing; but, right or wrong, it must be rushed.

(2.) The penalty to be inflicted for this crime. If any should own himself a disciple of Jesus, he should be taken as an apostate from the Jewish church, a rebel and traitor against the government, and should therefore be put out of the synagogue, as unworthy of the honors, and incapable of the privileges of their church; he should be excommunicated. Nor was this merely an ecclesiastical censure, which a man might slight; it was an outlawry, which excluded a man from civil commerce, and deprived him of liberty and property. Note, 1st. Christ's religion, from its rise, has been opposed by penal laws made against the professors of it; as if men's consciences would otherwise then doth he now see? That is impossible, and therefore you had better unsay it.' Those who cannot bear the light of truth, do all they can to eclipse, and hinder the discovery of it. Thus the managers of evidence, or mismanagers, lead witnesses out of the way, teach them how to conceal the truth, and so involve themselves in a double guilt, like that of Jeroboam, who sinned, and made Israel to sin.

They fully attest what they could safely say in this matter, on their own knowledge; (v. 20.) We know that this is our son, and that he was born blind. It had cost them many a sad thought, and troublesome hour. How often they had looked on him, and lamented their child's blindness more than all the burthens of their poverty, and wished he had never been born. Those who are ashamed of their children, or relations, because of their bodily infirmities, may take a reproof from these parents, who freely owned, This is our son, though he was born blind, and lived upon alms.

They cautiously decline giving evidence concerning his cure; partly, because they were not themselves eye-witnesses of it; and partly, because it was a tender point, and would not bear to be meddled with.

1. Observe how warily they express themselves; (v. 21.) 'By what means he now seeth, we know not, or who has opened his eyes, we know not, otherwise than by hear-say.' See how the wisdom of this world teaches men to trim the matter in critical junctures. Christ was accused as a sabbath-breaker, and an impostor. Now these parents, though not eye-witnesses of the cure, were yet fully assured of it, and were bound in gratitude to bear testimony to the honor of Jesus; but they had not courage to do it, and then thought it might serve to atone for their not appearing in favor of Him, that they said nothing to his prejudice; whereas in the day of trial, he that is not apparently for Christ, is justly looked naturally embrace it, this unnatural for: has been put upon them. 2dly. The church's artillery, when it has fallen into ill hands, has often been turned against itself, and ecclesiastical censures have been made to serve a secular interest. It is no new thing to see those cast out of the synagogue, that were the greatest blessings of it, and to hear those that expelled them say, The Lord be glorified, Isa. 66:5.

Of this edict it is said, 1. That the Jews had agreed, or conspired it. Their consultation herein, was a conspiracy against the crown and dignity of the Lord and his Anointed. 2. That they had already agreed it. Though He had been but a few months in any public character among them, and, one would think, in so short a time could not have made them jealous of Him, yet thus early were they aware of his growing interest, and already agreed to do their utmost to suppress it. He had lately made his escape out of the temple, and when they saw themselves baffled in their attempts to take Him, they presently took this course, to make it penal for any body to own Him. Thus unanimous and thus expeditious are the enemies of the church, and their counsels; but He that sits in heaven, laughs at them, and has them in derision, and so may we.

The parents of the blind man declined saying any thing of Christ, because they feared the Jews. Christ had incurred the frowns of the government, to do their son a kindness, but to say would not incur them, to do Him honor. Note, The fear of man brings a snare, (Prov. 29:25.) and often makes people disown Christ, his truths and ways, and act against their consciences.

2. They inquired of him concerning the manner of the cure, v. 16, 16.

The same question which his neighbors had put to him, now again the Pharisees asked him, how he had received his sight. This they inquired, not with any desire to find out the truth, but with a desire to find occasion against Christ; for should the man relate the matter fully, they would prove Christ a sabbath-breaker; should he vary from his former story, they would have some color to suspect the whole.

He here repeats the same answer, in effect, he had before given his neighbors. He does not speak of the making of the clay; he had not seen it made. That circumstance was not essential, and might give the Pharisees most occasion against him, and therefore he waives it. In the former account he said, I washed, and received sight; but lest they should think it was only a glimpse for the present, which imagination might fancy itself to have, he now says, 'I do see: it is a complete and lasting cure.'

The remarks made on this were different, and occasioned a debate in the court.

Some took occasion to condemn Christ. This Man is not of God, as He pretends, because He keepeth not the Sabbath. The doctrine on which this censure is grounded, is true—that those pretenders to prophecy are not sent of God, those pretenders to sainthood not born of God, who do not keep the Sabbath. They that are of God, will keep the commandments of God; and this is his commandment, that we sanctify the Sabbath. They that are of God, keep up communion with God, delight to hear from Him, and speak to Him, and therefore will observe the Sabbath, appointed for intercourse with heaven. The Sabbath is called a sign, for the sanctifying of it is a sign of a sanctified heart, and the profaning of it a sign of a profane heart. But, the application of it to our Savior is very unjust, for He did religiously observe the sabbath-day, and never violated it. He did not keep the Sabbath according to the tradition of the elders and the superstitions of the Pharisees, but according to the command of God, and therefore He was of God, and his miracles proved Him to be Lord also of the sabbath-day. Note, Much uncharitable judging is occasioned by making the rules of religion more strict than God has made them, and adding men's fancies to God's appointments. We ourselves may fear such and such things on the Sabbath, as we find 22 These words spake his parents, because they feared the Jews: for the Jews had agreed already, that if any man did confess that he was Christ, he should be put out of the synagogue.

23 Therefore said his parents, 'He is of age, ask him.'

[Practical Observations.]

24 Then again called they the man that was blind, and said unto him, 'Give God the praise: we know that this man is a sinner.'

serve their inquiry concerning its Author.

They ask the man, 'What sayest thou of Him, seeing that He has opened thine eyes?' What idea hast thou of Him that did it? Should he speak slightly of Christ, as he might be tempted to do, now he was in their hands, as his parents had done; should he say, 'I know not what to make of Him, He may be a conjuror for aught I know, or some mountebank,' they would have triumphed in it. Nothing confirms Christ's enemies in their enmity to Him, so much as the slights put on Him by those that have passed for his friends. But if he should speak honorably of Him, they would prosecute him upon their new law; would make him an example, and so deter others from applying to Him for cures, which, though they came cheap from Christ, yet they would make them pay dear for. Or perhaps Christ's friends proposed to have the man's own sentiments concerning his Physician, and were willing to know, since he appeared to be a sensible man, what he thought of Him. Note, Those whose eyes Christ has opened, know best what to say of Him, and have great reason, on all occasions, to say well of Him. What think we of Christ?

This question the man makes a short, plain, direct answer; 'He is a prophet, inspired of God to preach, and work miracles, and delivers to the world a divine message.' There had been no prophets for three hundred years; yet they did not conclude they should have no more, for they knew that He was yet to come, who should seal up vision and prophecy, Dan. 9:24. It would seem, this man had no thoughts He was the Messiah, but one of the same rank with the other prophets. The woman of Samaria concluded He was a prophet, before she had any thought of his being the Messiah; (ch. 4:19,) so this blind man thought well of Christ, according to the light he had, though he did not think well enough of Him; but, being faithful in what he had already attained to, God revealed even that unto him. This blind beggar had a clearer judgment of the things pertaining to the kingdom of God, and saw further into the proofs of a divine mission, than the masters in Israel, that assumed authority to judge of prophets.

Having in vain attempted to invalidate the evidence of the fact, and finding that indeed a notable miracle was wrought, and they could not deny it; they renewed their attempt to banter it, and to shake the good opinion the man had of a distraction to us, and we do well; but we must not therefore tie up others to the same strictness. Every thing that we take for a rule of practice, must not be made a rule of judgment.

Others spake in his favor, and very pertinently urged, How can a man that is a sinner, do such miracles? It seems that even in this council of the ungodly there were some capable of free thought, and witnesses for Christ, even in the midst of his enemies. The matter of fact was plain, that this was a miracle; the more it was searched into, the more it was cleared; and this brought his former works to mind, and gave occasion to speak magnificently of them,—so great signs, so many, so evident. And the inference from it is very natural; such things could never be done by a man that is a sinner, that is, not by any mere man, by his own power; or rather, not by one that is an impostor, and in that sense a sinner; such a one may indeed show some signs, and lying wonders, but not such signs as Christ wrought. How could a man produce such divine credentials, if he had not a divine commission? Thus there was a schism, so the word is; a warm debate arose, and the house divided upon it. Thus God defeats the counsels of his enemies by dividing them; and by such testimonies as these against the malice of persecutors, their designs against the church are sometimes rendered ineffectual, and always inexcusable.

After their inquiry concerning the cure, ob-

Him: Give God the glory, we know that this man is a sinner. Two ways this is understood; either,

[1.] By way of advice, to take heed of ascribing his cure to a sinful man; thus, under color of zeal for the honor of God, they rob Christ of his honor, as those do, who will not worship Christ as God, under pretence of zeal for this great truth, that there is but one God; whereas this is his declared will, that all men should honor the Son, even as they honor the Father; and in confessing that Christ is Lord, we give glory to God the Father. When God makes use of men that are sinners, as instruments of good to us, we must give God the glory, for every creature is what He makes it to be; and yet there is a gratitude owing to the instruments. It was a good word, Give God the praise, but here it was ill used; and there seems to be this further in it, 'This man is a sinner, a bad man, therefore give the praise so much the more to God, who could work by such an instrument.'

[2.] Or by way of adjuration; 'We know, (though thou dost not, who hast but lately come into a new world) that this man is a great impostor, that cheats the country; therefore give God praise,' (as Joshua said to Achan) 'by making confession of the fraud we are confident there is in this matter; in God's name, man, tell the truth.' Thus is God's name abused in papal inquisitions, when by oaths, they extort accusations of themselves from the innocent, and of others from the ignorant. How basely they speak of the Lord Jesus; 'We know that this man is a sinner, a man of sin. In which we may observe, 1st. Their insolence and pride. They would not have it thought, when they asked, that they needed information; nay, they know very well, He is a sinner, and nobody can convince them of the contrary. He had challenged them to their faces, (ch. 8:46.) to convince Him of sin, and they had nothing to say; but now behind his back they speak of Him as a malefactor, convicted upon notorious evidence. False accusers make up in confidence what is wanting in proof. 2dly. The indignity hereby done to Jesus. When He became Man, He took upon Him the form, not only of a servant, but of a sinner, (Rom. 8:3.) and passed for a sinner. Nay, He was represented as a sinner of the first magnitude; and, being made sin for us, He despised even this shame.

A debate arose between the Pharisees and this man concerning Christ. They say, He is a sinner; he says, He is a prophet. As it is an encouragement to persons concerned for the cause of Christ, to hope it will never want witnesses, when they find a poor blind beggar picked up from the way-side, and made a witness for Christ, to the faces of his enemies; so it is an encouragement to those who are called out to witness for Christ, to find with what prudence and courage this man managed his defence. It shall be given you in that same hour what ye shall speak. Though he had never seen Jesus, he had felt his grace.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V 13—23. How perfect in wisdom and holiness was our Redeemer, when enemies, powerful, vigilant, and malignant, as he were, could find no flaw, and were driven to the necessity of renewing against Him the repeatedly refuted charge of breaking the Sabbath! May we thus be enabled 'by well-doing to put to silence the ignorance of foolish men,' (Note, 1 Pet. 2:13—17.)—The most illiterate and poor, who are simple-hearted, readily draw proper conclusions from the evidences afforded them of the truth of the Gospel; but they whose interests and inclinations lie another way, though 'ever learning, are never able to come to the knowledge of the truth.'—Religious persecutions can only render men cowards or hypocrites, and suppress investigation, or an avowal of sentiments; and even the censures of the church have too often been levelled against her best friends. But no terror should induce us to conceal our obligations to the Lord; and what men generally term prudence and caution, in this case, is unbelief, and base fear of the cross; if not being fatally ashamed of Christ and his cause. (Note, Mark 8:38.)

SCOTT.

Verse 22.

Put out of the synagogue.] There were three sorts of excommunication. The slightest, which continued only thirty days, excluded the person from all approach nearer than four cubits, even from his wife and children, but not from the synagogue. If he only kept at the specified distance. The second, (that meant here probably,) was a severer kind of excommunication, involving exclusion from all sacred meetings, was accompanied with curses and maledictions, and forbade every kind of intercourse with the person. The third, and heaviest, was a perpetual exclusion from all sacred meetings, and implied excommunication from the Jewish people.

BLOOMFIELD.

Verse 24.

Give God the glory.] The best commentators unite in regarding this phrase as a Hebrew formula, employed in order to excite any one to speak the whole truth. So Josh. 7:9. 1 Sam. 6:5. ar. 1 k:6. and many other passages of the Old Testament, as also Ladv. 9:8. Thus it means 'Confess the truth, dissemble nothing.' And this may be accounted for, as Lampe suggests, on the principle that a lie is a denial of the omniscience, holiness, truth and justice of God; and he who wilfully conceals the truth, or declares a falsehood, insults all those attributes of the Deity.

BLOOMFIELD.

A sinner.] The original word refers here not so much to his breaking the Sabbath, as to his being an imitator.

lured. Thus eager disputants, that resolve they will have the last word, by such vain repetitions, to avoid the shame of being silenced, make themselves accountable for many idle words. Unreasonable men commonly make out with railing what is wanting in reason.

If we take our measures of credit and disgrace from the sentiment, or clamors rather, of a blind world, we shall glory in our shame, and be ashamed of our glory.

Verse 29.

Their partiality here was inexcusable; for if they believed the mission of Moses, on evidence of miracles, credibly attested indeed, but performed two thousand years before they were born, it was much more reasonable, on their own principle, to believe the mission of Jesus, on

This poor man sticks to the certain matter of fact, of which they endeavor to shake the evidence. That which is doubtful, is best resolved into that which is plain, and therefore he adheres to that which, to his own satisfaction, was past dispute; 'Whether He be a sinner or no, I will not now stand to dispute; the matter is plain, and, though I should altogether hold my peace, would speak for itself; or, as it might better be rendered, 'If He be a sinner, I know it not, I see no reason to say so; for this one thing I know, and can be more sure of than you can be of that which you are so confident of, that whereas I was blind, now I see.' Here, 1st. He tacitly reproves their great assurance of the ill character they gave Jesus; 'You say you know Him to be a sinner; I, who know Him as well, cannot give Him any such character.' 2dly. He boldly relies upon his experience of the power and goodness of Jesus, and resolves to abide by it. There is no disputing against experience, nor arguing a man out of his senses; here is an eye-witness of the power and grace of Christ, though he had never seen Him. Note, As Christ's mercies are most valued by those that have felt the want of them, so the most powerful and durable affections to Christ are those that arise from experimental knowledge of Him, 1 John 1:1. Acts 4:20.

He does not here give a nice account of the method of cure, nor pretend to describe it philosophically, but, in short, Whereas I was blind, now I see. Thus, in the work of grace in the soul, though we cannot tell when, and how, by what instruments, and by what steps the change was wrought, yet we may take the comfort of it, if we can say, through grace, 'Whereas I was blind, now I see.' I did live a worldly, sensual life, but, thanks be to God, it is now otherwise. Eph. 5:8.

What did He to thee? How opened He thine eyes? They asked these questions, First, Because they wanted something to say, and would rather speak impertinently, than seem to be silent.

For this they scorn and revile him, v. 23. When they could not resist the wisdom and spirit by which he spake, they broke out into a passion, and began to call names, and give him ill language. See what Christ's faithful witnesses must expect from adversaries: let them count upon all manner of evil to be said of them, Matt. 5:11. Unreasonable men commonly make out with railing what is wanting in reason.

1st. They taunted this man for his affection to Christ; Thou art his disciple, as if that were reproach enough. They do what they can to put Christ's religion in an ill name, and represent the profession of it as contemptible. If we take our measures of credit and disgrace from the sentiment, or clamors rather, of a blind world, we shall glory in our shame, and be ashamed of our glory.

2dly. They gloried in their relation to Moses, 'We are Moses' disciples, and neither need we desire any other teacher.' Note, Carnal professors of religion are apt to trust to, and be proud of, the dignities and privileges of their profession, while strangers to the principles and power of religion. These Pharisees had boasted of their parentage, We are Abraham's seed; here of good education, We are Moses' disciples, as if these would save them. It is sad to see how much one part of religion is opposed, under color of zeal for another part; there was a perfect harmony between Christ and Moses; Moses prepared for Christ, and Christ perfected Moses, so that they might be disciples of Moses, and become the disciples of Christ too; yet they here put them in opposition, nor could they have persecuted Christ, but under the umbrage of the abused name of Moses. Thus they who gain say the doctrine of free grace, value themselves as promoters of man's duty, We are Moses' disciples; while, on the other hand, they that cancel the obligation of the law, value themselves as the asserters of free grace, as if none were the disciples of Jesus, but they; whereas, if we rightly understand the matter, we shall see God's grace and man's duty meet together, and befriend each other.

3dly. They gave some sort of reason for their adhering to Moses against Christ; We know that God spake unto Moses; as for this fellow, we know not whence He is. But did they not know that among other things which God spake to Moses, this was one, that they must expect another Prophet, and a further revelation of the mind of God? yet, when our Lord, pursuant to what God said to Moses, did appear, and gave proofs of his being that Prophet, under pretence of sticking to the old religion and the established church, they not only forfeited, but forsook, their own mercies.

They allege, in defence of their enmity to Christ, what none of his followers ever denied, We know that God spake unto Moses. We know it too; more plainly to Moses than to any other of the prophets; but what then? Does it therefore follow that Jesus is an impostor? Moses was a prophet, it is true, and might not Jesus be a prophet too? Moses spake honorably of Jesus, (ch. 5:46.) and Jesus spake honorably of Moses; (Luke 16:29.) they were both faithful in the same house of God, Moses as a servant, Christ as a Son; therefore their pleading Moses' warrant in opposition to Christ's, was an artifice to make unthinking people believe it was as certain, that Jesus was a false Prophet, as that Moses was a true one; whereas they were both true.

They urge their ignorance of Christ, to justify their contempt of Him; As for this fellow. Thus scornfully do they speak of Jesus, as not worthy to charge their memories with; they expressed themselves with as much disdain of the Shepherd of Israel, as if He had not been worthy to be set with the dogs of their flock. They looked upon themselves to have the key of knowledge, none must preach without a license from them; they expected that all who set up for teachers, should apply to them, which this Jesus had never done, and therefore they concluded Him one that came not in by the door; they knew not whence, or what He was, and therefore concluded Him a sinner; whereas those we know little of, we should judge charitably of; but proud and narrow souls think none good but such as are in their interest. It was not long ago, that the Jews had made the contrary to this, an objection against Christ; (ch. 7:27.) We know this man whence He is, but when Christ comes, no man knows whence He is. Thus they could with the greatest assurance either affirm or deny the same thing, according as it would serve. They knew not whence He was; whose fault was that? (1.) It is certain that they ought to have inquired; at least equal miracles, wrought daily among them, when they might in many instances have been eye-witnesses to the facts, and one of which, notwithstanding all their malice, they were here compelled to own, or at least found themselves utterly unable to dispute.

30 The man answered and said unto them, Why, herein is a marvellous thing, that ye know not from whence he is, and yet he hath opened mine eyes.

31 Now we know that God heareth not sinners; but if any man be a worshipper of God, and doeth his will, him he heareth.

32 Since the world began was it not heard, that any man opened the eyes of one that was born blind.

33 If this man were not of God, he could do nothing.

ele. When they said, We know not whence He is, they meant, 'We know not any proof that his doctrine and ministry are from heaven.' Now this is strange, (saith the poor man,) 'that the miracle wrought upon me has not convinced you; that you, whose studies give you advantages above others, of discerning the things of God, should thus shut your eyes against the light.' It is a marvellous work, and a wonder, when the wisdom of the wise thus perisheth, (Isa. 29:14.) that they deny the truth of that, which they cannot gainsay the evidence of. Note, (1.) The unbelief of those who enjoy the means of knowledge and conviction, is indeed a marvellous thing, Mark 6:6. (2.) Those who have themselves experienced the grace of the Lord Jesus, especially wonder at the wilfulness of those who reject Him, and, having such good thoughts of Him themselves, are amazed that others have not so too. Had Christ opened the eyes of the Pharisees, they would not have doubted his being a Prophet.

They had determined concerning Jesus, that He was not of God, (v. 16.) but a sinner, v. 24. In answer to which, the man here proves, not only that He was not a sinner, (v. 31.) but that He was of God, v. 33. Though he could not read a letter, he was well acquainted with the Scripture and the things of God; he had wanted the sense of seeing, yet had well improved that of hearing, by which faith cometh; yet that would not have served him, without an extraordinary presence of God, and special aids of his Spirit, on this occasion. See his great zeal for the honor of Christ, whom he could not endure to hear evil spoken of; his boldness, and courage, not terrified by proud adversaries. Those who are ambitious of the favors of God, must not be afraid of the frowns of men. 'See here (saith Whitby) a blind man and unlearned, judging more rightly of divine things than the whole council of the Pharisees. Whence we learn, that we are not always to be led by the authority of councils, popes, or bishops; and that it is not absurd for laymen, sometimes, to vary from their opinions; these overseers being sometimes guilty of great oversights.'

The man's argument may be reduced into form, somewhat like that of David, Ps. 66:18, 19. The proposition in David's argument is, If I regard iniquity in my heart, God will not hear me; here it is to the same purport, God heareth not sinners; the assumption there is, But verily God hath heard me; here it is, Verily God hath heard Jesus; the conclusion there is, to the honor of God, Blessed be God; here, to the honor of the Lord Jesus, He is of God.

He lays it down for an undoubted truth, that none but good men are the favorites of heaven; Now we know, you as well as I, that God heareth not sinners, but if any man be a worshipper of God, and does his will, him He heareth.

The assertions, rightly understood, are true. 1st. Be it spoken to the terror of the wicked, God heareth not sinners, such sinners as the Pharisees meant, when they said of Christ, He is a sinner, one that, under the umbrage of God's name, advanced the devil's interest. This speaks no discouragement to repenting sinners, but to those that go on still in their trespasses, that make their prayers not only consistent with, but subservient to, their sins, the Messiah was to appear about this time, and it concerned them to examine every indication; out these priests, like those, Jer. 2:8. said not, Where is the Lord? (2.) It is certain that they might have known whence He was, not only, by searching the register; but, by inquiring into his doctrine and miracles, might have known He was sent of God, and had a better commission than they could give Him. See the absurdity of infidelity; men will not know the doctrine of Christ, because they are resolved they will not believe it, and then pretend they do not believe it, because they do not know it. Such ignorance and unbelief, which support one another, aggravate one another.

The poor man, finding he had reason on his side, grows bold.

He wonders at their obstinate infidelity; (v. 30.) not at all daunted by their frowns, he bravely answered, 'Why, herein is a marvellous thing, strange, wilful ignorance, that you know not from whence He is, and yet He has opened mine eyes.' Two things he wonders at:

1. That they should be strangers to a man so famous. He that could open the eyes of the blind, must certainly be a considerable man; the Pharisees were inquisitive men, had a large correspondence, thought themselves the eyes of the church, and yet that they should talk, as if they thought it below them to take cognizance of such a man as this, is strange indeed. Many who pass for learned and knowing men, who understand business, and can talk sense in other things, are yet ignorant, to a wonder, of the doctrine of Christ, and have not so much as a curiosity, to acquaint themselves with that which angels desire to look into.

2. That they should question the divine commission of one that had wrought a divine miracle.

as the hypocrites do; God will not give an answer of peace to their prayers.

2dly. Be it spoken to the comfort of the righteous. Here is, 1. The character of a good man; he is one that worships God and doeth His will; is constant in his devotions at set times, and regular in his conversation at all times. He makes it his business to glorify his Creator by the solemn adorations of his name, and a strict obedience to his will and law; both go to gether. 2. The unspeakable comfort of such a man; him God hears; hears his complaints, and relieves him; his appeals, and right him; his praises, and accepts them; his prayers, and answers them, Ps. 34:15.

The application of these truths is very pertinent to prove that He whose word cured one born blind, was not a bad man, but, having manifestly such an interest in the holy God, as that He heard Him always, was certainly holy.

He magnifies the miracle Christ had wrought, to strengthen the argument; (v. 32.) Since the world began, was it not heard, that any man opened the eyes of one that was born blind. [1.] It was a true miracle, above the power of nature, it was never heard that any man, by natural means, had cured one born blind; no doubt this man and his parents had been very inquisitive into cases of this nature, whether any such had been helped, and could hear of none which enabled him to speak this with the more assurance. Or, [2.] It was an extraordinary miracle; neither Moses, nor any of the prophets ever did this; wherein divine power and divine goodness seem to strive which should outshine. Moses wrought miraculous plagues, but Christ miraculous cures. Note, 1st. The wondrous works of the Lord Jesus were such, as had never been done before. 2dly. It becomes those who have received mercy from God, to magnify the mercies; not that glory may redound to themselves, and they may seem to be favorites of heaven, but that God may have so much the more glory.

He therefore concludes, If this man were not of God, He could do nothing, no such thing as this; and therefore, no doubt, He is of God, notwithstanding his non-conformity to your traditions of the Sabbath. Note, What Christ did on earth sufficiently demonstrated what He was in heaven; for if He had not been sent of God, He could not have wrought such miracles. The man of sin comes with lying wonders, not real miracles; a false prophet might, by divine permission, give a sign or wonder; (Deut. 13:1, 2.) yet it would carry with it its own confutation, for it is to enforce a temptation to serve other gods, which was to set God against Himself. It is true, likewise, many wicked people have, in Christ's name, done many wonderful works, which does not prove them to be of God, but Him in whose name they were wrought. We may each of us know by this, whether we are of God: What do we? What do we for God, for our souls, in working out our salvation; what do we more than others?

The Pharisees, finding themselves unable either to answer his reasonings, or to bear them, fell upon him, and with great pride and passion broke off the discourse.

Having nothing to reply to his argument, they reflected on his person, Thou wast altogether born in sin, and dost thou teach us? They take that ill, which they had reason to take kindly, and are cut to the heart with rage, by that which should have pricked them to the heart with repentance.

They despised him; and what a severe censure they passed on him; 'Thou wast not only born in sin, as every man is, but wholly corrupt, and bearing about with thee in thy body, as well as in thy soul, the marks of that corruption; thou wast one whom nature stigmatized.' Had he continued blind, it had been barbarous to upbraid him with it, as more deeply tainted with sin than others; but it was most unjust to take

Thus a simple man, guided by the Spirit of truth, and continuing steadfast in his testimony, utterly confounded the most eminent Jewish doctors. When they had no longer either reason or argument to oppose to him, as a proof of their discomfiture, and a monument of their reproach and shame, they had recourse to the secular arm, and thus silenced, by political power, a person whom they had neither reason nor religion to withstand. They have adorne many followers.

our duty to go out of, and that unjustly, though cast out with an anathema, and all the hughar ceremonies of hell, bomb, and candle, is what we have no reason at all to dread. The curse causess shall not come. If they cast Christ's followers out of their synagogues, as He foretells, (ch. 16: 2.) there is no harm done, when they are become synagogues of Satan.

V. 35-33. When Jesus heard that they had cast him out, (for it is likely the town rang of it, and every body cried shame upon them for it,) then He found him, which implies his seeking him that He might comfort him, 1. Because he had, to the best of his knowledge, spoken well, and boldly, in defence of Jesus. Note, Christ will be sure to stand by his witnesses, and own those that own Him and his truth. Earthly princes neither do, nor can, take cognizance of all that vindicate them and their administration; but our Lord knows all the faithful testimonies we bear to Him at any time, and a book of remembrance is written, and it shall redound not only to our credit hereafter, but our comfort now. 2. The Pharisees had cast him out, and abused him. Beside the common regard which the Judge of the world has to those who suffer wrongfully, (Ps. 103: 6.) there is particular notice taken of those that suffer in the cause of Christ and conscience. Here was one poor man suffering for Christ, and He took care, that as his afflictions abounded, his consolations should much more abound. Note, (1.) Though persecutors may exclude good men from their communion, they cannot exclude them from communion with Christ, nor put them out of the way of his visits. Happy they who have a Friend from whom men cannot debar them! (2.) Christ will graciously find and take up those, who, for his sake, are unjustly rejected and cast out by men. He will be a hiding-place to his out-casts, and appear to the joy of those whom their brethren hated and cast out.

Christ brings him acquainted with the consolation of Israel. He had well improved the knowledge he had, and now Christ gives him further instruction; for he that is faithful in a little, shall be intrusted with more, Matt. 13: 12.

Our Lord examines his faith; 'Dost thou believe on the Son of God? Dost thou give credit to the promises of the Messiah? Art thou ready to receive and embrace Him when manifested to thee?' This was that faith of the Son of God, they lived by, who lived before his manifestation. The Messiah is here called the Son of God, and so the Jews had learned to call Him from the prophecies, Ps. 2: 7. 89: 27. See ch. 1: 49. Thou art the Son of God, that is, the true Messiah. They that expected the temporal kingdom of the Messiah, delighted rather in calling Him the Son of David, which gave more countenance to that expectation, Matt. 22: 42. But Christ, that He might give us an idea of his kingdom, as divine, calls Himself the Son of God, and rather Son of man in general, than of David in particular. The desires and expectations of the Messiah, in the Old-Testament saints, were graciously interpreted, and accepted, as their believing on the Son of God. This faith Christ here inquires after; Dost thou believe? Note, The great thing which is now required of us, (1 John 3: 23.) and will shortly be inquired after concerning us, is, our believing on the Son of God, and by this we must stand or fall forever.

The poor man solicitously inquires concerning the Messiah, professing his readiness to embrace Him; Who is He, Lord, that I might believe in Him? Some think he did know that Jesus was the Son of God, but did not know which was Jesus, and therefore, supposing this that talked with him to be a follower of Jesus, desired Him to do him the favor to direct him to Him; not that he might satisfy his curiosity with the sight of Him, but that he might the more firmly believe in Him, and know whom he had believed. See Cant. 6: 6, 7. 3: 2, 3. Christ only can direct us to Himself. Others think he did know that this person who talked with him, was Jesus, that cured him, whom he believed a great and good man, and a prophet, but did not yet know that He was, or was to be, the Son of God, and the true Messiah. 'Lord, I believe there is a Christ to come; thou who hast given me bodily sight, O tell me, who and where He is.' Christ's question intimated that the Messiah was now among them, which he presently takes the hint of, and asks, Where is He? The question was rational and just; Who is He, Lord, that I might believe on Him? For how could he believe in one of whom he had not heard? The work of ministers is to tell us unto the Son of God is, that we may believe on Him, ch. 20: 31.

Jesus graciously reveals Himself to him. Thou hast both seen Him, and it is He that talketh with thee. Thou needest not go far to find out the Son of God, Behold the Word is nigh thee. We do not find that Christ did thus expressly, and in so many words, reveal Himself to any other, as to this man here, and to the woman of Samaria, I that speak unto thee am He; He left others to find out by arguments who He was, but, to these weak and foolish things of the world, He chose to manifest Himself, so as not to the wise and prudent.

Thou hast seen Him; and he was much indebted to the Lord Jesus for opening his eyes, that he might see Him. Now he was sensible, more than ever, what unspeakable mercy it was to be cured of blindness, that he might see a sight, which rejoiced his heart more than that of the light of this world. Note, The greatest comfort of bodily eye-sight, is, its serviceableness to our souls. How contentedly might this man have returned to his former blindness, like old Simeon, now that his eyes had seen God's salvation! This intimates that spiritual sight is given principally for this end, that we may see Christ, 2 Cor. 4: 6. Can we say, that by faith we have seen Christ, in his beauty and glory, in his ability and willingness to save, so seen Him as to be satisfied concerning Him, to be satisfied in Him? Let us give Him the praise, who opened our eyes.

It is He that talketh with thee. He was not only favored with a sight of Christ, but admitted into fellowship with Him. Great princes are willing to be seen by those whom yet they will not vouchsafe to talk with. But Christ, by his Word and Spirit, talks with those whose desires are toward Him, and in talking with them manifests Himself to them, as He did to the two disciples, when He talked their hearts warm, Luk. 24: 32. Observe, This poor man was solicitous in inquiring after the Savior, when at the same time he saw Him, and was talking with Him. Note, Jesus Christ is often nearer the souls that seek Him, than they themselves are aware of. Doubting Christians are sometimes saying, Where is the Lord? and fearing that they are ast out from his sight, when, at the same time, it is He that talks with them, and puts strength into them.

The poor man readily entertained this surprising revelation, and, in a transport of joy and wonder, said, Lord, I believe; and worshipped him.

Lord, I believe Thee to be the Son of God. He would not dispute any thing that He said, who had shewed such mercy to him, nor doubt of the truth of a doctrine which was confirmed 19 ¶ And Jesus said, For judgment I am come into this world; that they which see not might see, and that they which see might be made blind.

40 And some of the Pharisees which were with him heard these words, and said unto him, "Are we blind also?"

41 Jesus said unto them, "If ye were blind, ye should have no sin: but now ye say, We see; therefore your sin remaineth."

rule of government now, and of judgment shortly. 2. To put a difference between men, by revealing the thoughts of many hearts, and laying open men's true characters, by this test, whether they were well or ill affected to Him. 3. To abolish the Jewish ceremony, and take down that fabric, which, though erected by the hand of God Himself, yet was antiquated, and by incurable corruptions was become rotten and dangerous; and to erect a new building by another model, institute new ordinances and offices, to abrogate Judaism and enact Christianity; for this judgment He came into the world, and it was a great revolution.

This great truth He explains by a metaphor borrowed from the miracle lately wrought: That they which see not might see: and that they which see might be made blind. Such a difference of Christ's coming is often spoken of; to some his Gospel is a savor of life unto life, to others of death unto death.

(1.) This is applicable to nations; that the Gentiles, who had long been by such signs. Believing with the heart, he thus confesses with the mouth; and now the bruised reed was become a cedar.

He worshipped Him, not only gave Him the civil respect due to a great man, and the acknowledgments owing to a kind benefactor, but herein gave Him divine honor, and worshipped Him as the Son of God manifested in the flesh. None but God is to be worshipped; so that in worshipping Jesus, he owned Him to be God. Note, True faith will show itself in a humble adoration of the Lord Jesus. They who believe in Him, will see all the reason in the world to worship Him. We never read any more of this man; but, it is very likely, from henceforth he became a constant follower of Christ.

V. 39-41. Christ having spoken comfort to the poor man that was persecuted, here speaks conviction to his persecutors, a specimen of the distributions of trouble and rest at the great day; 2 Thess. 1:6, 7. Probably, this was not immediately after his discourse with the man, but He took the next opportunity that offered itself to address the Pharisees.

Here is the account Christ gives of his design in coming into the world: 'For judgment I am come, to administer the affairs of the kingdom of God, and am invested with judicial power in order thereunto, to be executed in conformity to the counsels of God. What Christ spake, He spake not as a mere preacher, but as a king, and a judge. His business into the world was great: He came for judgment, that is,

1. To preach a doctrine and a law which would try men, and effectually discover them, and would be completely fitted, in all respects, to be the rule of government now, and of judgment shortly. 2. To put a difference between men, by revealing the thoughts of many hearts, and laying open men's true characters, by this test, whether they were well or ill affected to Him. 3. To abolish the Jewish ceremony, and take down that fabric, which, though erected by the hand of God Himself, yet was antiquated, and by incurable corruptions was become rotten and dangerous; and to erect a new building by another model, institute new ordinances and offices, to abrogate Judaism and enact Christianity; for this judgment He came into the world, and it was a great revolution.

V. 24-41. It has often happened, that they profess most zeal for the glory of God, who are most assiduous in dishonoring Christ; but he that honoreth not the Son, honoreth not the Father that sent Him.—When a believer knows not how to answer the arguments of enemies to the truth, he may have recourse to his own experience: 'one thing he knows, that whereas he was blind, now he sees'; and what he has discovered of the glory of God, the evil of sin, the depravity of his own heart, the preciousness of Christ, the beauty of holiness, so evinces to him the truth of the Gospel, that no arguments can answer 'this witness in himself.' (Notes, 2 Pet. 1:19, 1 John 5:9, 10.)—How little ought we to regard the contempt and revilings of the scornful and unbelieving, though most eminent among men; when Jesus was reviled by a convention of Jewish priests and rulers, as a notorious sinner, and 'the Lord of glory' was disclaimed as contemptible! But how unbecoming are such revilings, especially in those who are of superiour rank and education!—Plain unlettered sense will [sometimes] go further, in understanding the most important matters, than all the advantages of science, which often render men too self-sufficient to judge aright.—Our God, who heareth the repenting destitute of divine revelation, might see it; and the Jews, who had long enjoyed it, might have the things of their peace hid from their eyes, Hos. 1:10. 2:23. The Gentiles see a great light, while blindness is happened unto Israel.

(2.) To particular persons. Christ came into the world, [1.] Intentionally to give sight to them that were spiritually blind; by his Word to reveal the object; and by his Spirit to heal the organ, that souls might be turned from darkness to light. He came for judgment, that is, to set those at liberty from their dark prison, that were willing to be released, Isa. 61:1. [2.] Eventually, that those who see, might be made blind; that those who have a high conceit of their own wisdom, and set up that in contradiction to revelation, might be sealed up in ignorance and infidelity. The preaching of the cross was foolishness to them, who by wisdom knew not God. Christ came into the world, to administer the affairs of a spiritual kingdom in men's minds. Whereas, in the Jewish church, the blessings and judgments of God's government were mostly temporal, now the method of administration should be changed; and as the subjects of his kingdom should be blessed with spiritual blessings, such as arise from illumination of the mind, so the rebels should be punished with spiritual plagues, not war, famine, and pestilence, as formerly, but judicial infatuation, hardness of heart, terror of conscience, strong delusions, vile affections. In this way Christ will judge between cattle and cattle, Ezek. 34:17.

The Pharisees were with Him, not desirous to learn any good from Him, but to form evil against Him; and they said, Are we blind also? When Christ said that they who saw, should by his coming be made blind, they apprehended that He meant them who were the seers of the people, and valued themselves on their insight and foresight. 'Now,' say they, 'we know that the common people are blind; but are we blind also? What! we—the rabbins, the doctors, the learned in the laws?' This is a libel on the great. Note, Frequently those that need reproof most, and deserve it best, though they have wit enough to discern a tact one, have not grace enough to bear a just one. These Pharisees took this reproof for a reproach, as those lawyers, Luke 11:45. 'Darest thou say that

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 24-41. It has often happened, that they profess most zeal for the glory of God, who are most assiduous in dishonoring Christ; but he that honoreth not the Son, honoreth not the Father that sent Him.—When a believer knows not how to answer the arguments of enemies to the truth, he may have recourse to his own experience: 'one thing he knows, that whereas he was blind, now he sees'; and what he has discovered of the glory of God, the evil of sin, the depravity of his own heart, the preciousness of Christ, the beauty of holiness, so evinces to him the truth of the Gospel, that no arguments can answer 'this witness in himself.' But how unbecoming are such revilings, especially in those who are of superiour rank and education!—Plain unlettered sense will [sometimes] go further, in understanding the most important matters, than all the advantages of science, which often render men too self-sufficient to judge aright.—Our God, who heareth the repenting sinner's cry, will not regard those, who go on in wickedness: (Note, Ps. 66:18, 19.) but when we desire and aim to do his will, He answers our prayers, and employs us in his service.—When arguments fail pertinacious disputers, they commonly have recourse to abusive language: and many show their pride and folly, by refusing to hear sense and argument from their supposed inferiors, and by answering them with contempt and upbraidings. But Jesus will show Himself peculiarly attentive to those, who are suffering for his sake: those who act conscientiously and boldly, according to their present measure of knowledge, shall be led forward; and the more they know of Christ, the greater honor they will render Him. (Notes, Hos. 6:1-3, v. 3.) Thus the Lord gives eyes to the blind, and closes the minds of haughty boasters. Conscious, humble ignorance dwells nearer the porch of wisdom, than arrogant genius and science. If a man be 'wise in his own conceit there is more hope of a fool than of him'; and none are so more danger than such as exclaim, 'Are we blind also?' For numbers of this character will perish under the guilt of 'loving darkness and hating the light, because their deeds are evil.' (Notes, 3:19-21. Is. 8:20.)

SCOTT.

Verse 39.

'The language of the Gospel has many seeming contradictions, called paradoxes, which, when examined, are strictly true and proper; this is one of them. How can he be said to see, that seeth not; or he to be made blind, that has the use of his sight? The meaning is, that the Gospel should make the poor, and ignorant, who are reckoned to see nothing, wise and knowing in the things of God; but that it should make those who are wise in their own conceit, know less than they did before. In the two characters of the Pharisees, and the person they thus cast out, we have a pattern of the believer and an unbeliever, which will hold true to the end of the world; where the temper of the Pharisee is, there will Christ be unknown or rejected; where the other temper is, of the man that was born blind, there will Christ be valued, and nowhere else.'

Verse 41.

'If ye were blind, &c.' 'If ye were unable to discern who I am, if you had paid to the law nor the prophets to direct you, nor the light of clear and early miracles, then your rejecting Me could not be imputed to you as sin; but now, ye say, we see, and you arrogate to yourselves the knowledge of the law and the prophets: and yet ye will not receive the light that shineth in your eyes, therefore your sin remaineth inexcusable.'

WHITBY.

'It is worthy of observation, in what manner the Jews resisted the force of the miracle related in this chapter, and the conclusion to which it led, after they had failed in discrediting its evidence. If it should be inquired how a turn of thought so different from what prevails at present should obtain currency with the ancient Jews, the answer is found in two opinions which then prevailed. The one was their expectation of a Messiah, of a kind totally contrary to what the appearance of Jesus bespoke Him to be: the other, their persuasion of the agency of demons in the production of supernatural effects. Matt. 12:24. The first put them upon seeking out some excuses to themselves for not receiving Jesus in the character in which He claimed to be received; and the second supplied them with just such an excuse as they wanted.'

CHAP. X.

True shepherds enter in by the door of the sheep-fold, are acknowledged by the sheep, and go before them; being thus distinguished from dishonest and corrupt teachers, 1-8. Christ is the Door, and the good Shepherd, who lays down his life for the sheep, 9-18. Diverse opinions are held concerning Him, 19-21. He proves his mission by his works; allows the character of his sheep, to whom He gives eternal life, neither shall any pluck them out of his hands; and that He and the Father are One, 22-30. The Jews attempt to stone Him as a blasphemer; but He justifies his doctrine, and escapes from them, 31-39. He goes beyond Jordan, where many believed on Him, 40-42.

VERILY, 'verily, I say unto you, He that entereth not by the door into the sheep-fold, but climbeth up some other way, the same is a thief and a robber.

2 But he that entereth in by the door, is the shepherd of the sheep.

CHAP. X. v. 1-18. It is not certain whether this discourse was at the feast of dedication in the winter, which may be taken as the date, not only of what follows, but of what goes before; (that which countenances this is, that Christ, in his discourse there, carries on the metaphor of the sheep, (v. 26, 27.) from whence it seems that that discourse and this were at the same time;) or whether this was a continuation of his parley with the Pharisees, in the foregoing chapter. The Pharisees supported themselves in their opposition to Christ with this, that they were the pastors of the church, and that Jesus, having no commission from them, was an intruder, and therefore the people were bound in duty to stick to them against Him. In opposition to this, Christ here describes who were false shepherds, and who the true, leaving them to infer what they were.

The similitude proposed, is borrowed from the custom of that country, in the management of sheep. Similitudes, used for the illustration of divine truths, should be taken from those things that are familiar, that the things of God be not clouded by that which should clear them. The preface to this discourse is solemn, Verily, verily, I say unto you—Amen, Amen. This speaks the certainty and weight of what He said; we find Amen doubled in the church's praises and prayers, Ps. 41:13, 72:19. 89:52. If we would have our Amens accepted in heaven, let Christ's Amens be prevailing on earth; his repeated Amens.

The evidence of a thief and a robber. He enters not by the door, as having no lawful cause of entry, but climbs up some other way, at a window, or breach in the wall. How industrious are wicked people to do mischief! What plots they lay, what pains they take, what hazards will they run, in we are blind, for whose judgment every one has such a veneration? Note, Nothing fortifies men's corrupt hearts more against convictions, nor more effectually repels them, than the good opinion others have of them; as if all that had gained applause with men, must needs obtain acceptance with God, than which nothing is more false, for God sees not as man sees.

Christ's answer to this cavil, which, if it did not convince, yet silenced them; If ye were blind, ye should have no sin; but now ye say, We see, therefore your sin remaineth. They gloried in it, that they were not blind, as the common people, were not so credulous and manageable as they, but having abilities, needed not any to lead them. This very thing which they gloried in, Christ tells them, was their shame and ruin.

If ye were blind, ye would have no sin. (1.) 'If ye had been really ignorant, your sin had not been so deeply aggravated, nor would ye have had so much sin to answer for, as now. If ye were blind, as the Gentiles are, and many of your own subjects, from whom ye have taken the key of knowledge, ye would have had comparatively no sin.' The times of ignorance God winked at; invincible ignorance, though it does not justify sin, lessens the guilt. It will be more tolerable with those that perish for lack of vision, than for those that rebel against the light. (2.) 'If ye had been sensible of your own blindness, could have seen the need of one to lead you, ye would soon have accepted Christ as your guide, and then would have had no sin, would have submitted to an evangelical righteousness, and have been put into a justified state.' Note, Those that are convinced of their disease, are in a fair way to be cured, for there is not a greater hindrance to the salvation of souls than self-sufficiency.

But now ye say, We see; now that ye have knowledge, your sin is aggravated; and now that ye have a conceit of that knowledge, therefore your case is desperate.' As those are most blind, who will not see, so their blindness is most dangerous, who fancy they do see. No patients are so hardly managed as those in a frenzy, who say, nothing ails them. The sin of the self-conceited and self-confident, remains, for they reject the Gospel, and therefore their guilt remains unpardoned; they forfeit the Spirit of grace, and therefore the power of their sin remains unbroken. Seest thou a man wise in his own conceit? Hearest thou the Pharisees say, We see? There is more hope of a fool, of a publican and a harlot, than of such.

NOTES.

CHAP. X. v. 1. 'Whoever pretends to feed and guide the flock of God, to teach and instruct his people, and yet does not come to them in that way which God has appointed, but follows the method of his own inventing, according to his own fancy or corrupt inclination, is certainly, notwithstanding any pretences of zeal or authority, an enemy and a hinderer of man's salvation. For every one that sincerely, and without worldly designs, intends to teach and instruct men in the way of salvation, will proceed by that method only which God shall think fit to appoint, and will submit entirely to his directions.' S. CLARKE. Sheep-fold. 'An enclosure, it seems, of walled work, high and strong enough to secure the flock against wild beasts.' Bloomfield. their wicked pursuits! This should shame us out of our slothfulness and cowardice in the service of God.

The rightful owner, who has a property in the sheep, and a care for them, enters in by the door, as one having authority, (v. 2.) and comes to do them some good office, to bind up that which is broken, and strengthen that which is sick, Ezek. 34:16.

To him the porter openeth. Anciently they had their sheep-folds within the outer gates of their houses, for the safety of their flocks, so that none could come to them the right way, but those to whom the porter opened, or the master of the house gave the keys.

The sheep hear his voice, when He speaks familiarly to them, when they come into the fold, as men now do to their dogs and horses; and, which is more, He calls his own sheep by name, so exact is the notice He takes of them, the account He keeps of them; and He leads them out from the fold to the green pastures; and when He turns them out to graze, He does not drive them, but (such was the custom in those times) goes before them, to prevent any mischief or danger that might meet them, and they, being used to it, follow Him.

The sheep know his voice, so as to discern his mind by it, and to distinguish it from that of a stranger; (for the ox knows his owner, Isa. 1:3.) and a stranger will they not follow, but, suspecting some ill design, will flee from him, knowing it is not the voice of their shepherd. This is the parable; we have the key to it, Ezek. 34:31. Ye my flock are men, and I am your God.

(1.) Good men are compared to sheep. Men, as creatures depending on their Creator, are called the sheep of his pasture. Good men, as new creatures, have the good qualities of sheep, harmless and inoffensive; meek and quiet, without noise; patient as sheep under the hand both of the shearer and of the butcher; useful and profitable, tame and tractable, to the shepherd, and sociable one with another, and much used in sacrifices.

(2.) The church of God in the world is a sheep-fold, into which the children of God that were scattered abroad, are gathered together, and united; it is a good fold, Ezek. 34:14. See Mic. 2:12. It is well fortified, for God Himself is a wall of fire about it, Zech. 2:5.

(3.) This fold lies much exposed to thieves and robbers; crafty seducers, cruel persecutors, grievous wolves, Acts 20:29. Thieves that would steal Christ's sheep from Him, to sacrifice them to devils, or steal their food from them, that they might perish for lack of it. Wolves in sheep's clothing, Matt. 7:15.

(4.) The great Shepherd of the sheep takes wonderful care of the flock. God is the great Shepherd, Ps. 23:1. 80:1. He knows them that are his, calls them by name, marks them for Himself, leads them out to fat pastures, makes them feed and rest there; speaks comfortably to them, guards them by his providence, guides them by his Spirit and Word, and goes before them, to set them in the way of his steps.

(5.) The under-shepherds, intrusted to feed the flock of God, ought to be faithful in the discharge of that trust; magistrates must defend them, and protect and advance their secular interests; ministers must serve them in their spiritual interests, feed their souls with the Word of God faithfully opened and applied, and with gospel-ordinances duly administered, taking the oversight of them. 'they must enter

Zeph. 2:6. There is no other kind than this used in the East.' Jahn 'It appears that these folds had two doors, one a larger, by which the shepherd, the door-keeper, and the sheep entered, and a smaller one by which the lambs were put out.' Lightfoot. Ed.

Verse 3. Porter. 'The richer Jews usually kept a porter. 18:16, 17. Acts 12:13. Mention is also made of a porter, 2 Kings 7:10, and Ezek. 44:11. The Greeks and Romans too had their door-keepers, who were usually freedmen. Here, however, there is no reference to these domestics, and we must understand one of the shepherds who stays in the sheep-fold, and opens the door to any of his fellow-shepherds. For there were folds of a large size, in which, not merely one or two, but many shepherds used to enter, and there inhabit and sleep.'

ter openeth; and the sheep hear his voice: and he calleth his own sheep by name, and leadeth them out.

4 And when he putteth forth his own sheep, he goeth before them, and the sheep follow him: for they know his voice.

5 And as a stranger will they not follow, but will flee from him: for they know not the voice of strangers.

6 This parable spake Jesus unto them: but they understood not what things they were which he spake unto them.

7 Then said Jesus unto them again, Verily, verily, I say unto you, I am the Door of the sheep.

in by the door. In the explication of the parable, He makes Himself to be both the Door by which the shepherd enters, and the Shepherd that enters in by the door. Though it may be a solecism in rhetoric, to make the same person both the door and the shepherd, it is no solecism in divinity, to make Christ have his authority from Himself, as He has life in Himself; and Himself to enter by his own blood, as the door, into the holy place.

Christ is the Door. This He saith to them who pretended to seek for righteousness, but, like the Sodomites, wearied themselves to find the door. He saith it to the Jews, who would be thought God's only sheep, and to the Pharisees, who would be thought their only shepherds; I am the door of the sheep-fold. (1.) He is as a door shut, to keep out such as are not fit to be admitted. The shutting of the door is the securing of the house; and what greater security has the church of God, than the interpossession of the Lord Jesus between it and its enemies? (2.) He is as a door open, for passage and communication. By Christ as the door, we have our first admission into the flock of God, ch. 14: 6. We go in and out in a religious conversation, assisted by Him, accepted in Him; walking up and down in his name, Zech. 10: 12. By Him God comes to his church. By Him, the sheep are at last admitted into the heavenly kingdom, Matt. 25: 34.

Christ is the Door of the shepherds, so that those who come not in by Him, are not pastors, but thieves and robbers; (though they pretended to be shepherds;) but the sheep did not hear them. This refers to all that had the character of shepherds in Israel, whether magistrates or ministers, that exercised their office without regard to the Messiah, or with expectations of Him suggested by their carnal interest.

All that went before Him, not in time, many of them were faithful shepherds, but all that went before He sent them, (Jer. 23: 21.) that assumed a superiority above Him, as the antichrist is said to exalt himself, 2 Thess. 2: 4. The scribes, Pharisees, and chief priests, all, even as many as have come before Me, that have endeavored to forestall my interest, and prevent my gaining glory in the minds of people, by prepossessing them with prejudices against Me, they are thieves and robbers, and steal those hearts which they have no title to, defrauding the right owner of his property. They condemned our Savior as a thief and robber, because He did not come in by them as the door; but He shows that they ought to have received their commission from Him, and to have come after Him; because they stepped before Him, they were thieves and robbers. They would not come as his disciples, and therefore were condemned as usurpers, and their pretended commissions superseded. Note, Rivals with Christ are robbers of his church, however they pretend to be shepherds, nay shepherds of shepherds

The care taken to preserve the sheep from them; but the sheep did not hear them. Those that had a true savor of piety, that were spiritual and heavenly, and sincerely devoted to God, could by no means approve of the traditions of the elders, nor relish their formalities. Christ's disciples, without particular instructions from their Master, made no conscience of eating with unwashed hands, or plucking the ears of corn on the sabbath-day; for nothing is more opposite to true Christianity than Pharisaism; nor any thing more disrelishing to a soul truly devout, than their hypocritical devotions.

Christ is the Door of the sheep: (p. 9.) By Me—through Me as the door, if any man enter into the sheep-fold as one of the flock, he shall be saved; shall not only be safe from thieves and robbers, but happy; he shall go in and out.

Here are plain directions how to come into the fold; by Jesus Christ as the door. By faith in Him as the Mediator between God and man, we come into covenant and communion with God. There is no entering into God's church but by coming into Christ's church; nor are any looked upon as members of the kingdom of God among men, but those that are willing to submit to the government of the Redeemer. We must enter by the door of faith, (Acts 14: 27.) since the door of innocence is shut against us, Gen. 3: 24.

Precious promises to those that observe this direction:

(1.) They shall be saved hereafter; that is the privilege of their home; these sheep shall be saved from being impounded by divine justice for trespass done, satisfaction being made for the damage by their great Shepherd; saved from being a prey to the roaring lion; they shall be forever happy.

(2.) In the mean time they shall go in and out, and find pasture; that is the privilege of their way. They shall have their conversation in the world by the grace of Christ, shall be in his fold as a man at his own house. True believers are at home in Christ; when they go out, they are not shut out as strangers, but have liberty to come in again; when they come in, they are not shut in as trespassers, but have liberty to go out. They go out to the field in the morning, come in to the fold at night; and in both the Shepherd leads and keeps them, and they find pasture in both; grass in the field, fodder in the fold. In public, in private, they have the Word of God to converse with, by which their spiritual life is supported, and out of which their gracious desires are satisfied; they are replenished with the goodness of God's house.

Christ is the Shepherd, v. 10., &c. He was prophesied of under the Old Testament as a Shepherd, Isa. 40: 11. Ezek. 34: 23. 37: 24. Zech. 13: 7. In the New Testament He is spoken of as the great Shepherd, (Heb. 13: 20.) the chief Shepherd, (1 Pet. 5: 4.) the Shepherd and Bishop of our souls, 1 Pet. 2: 25. God, our great Owner, the sheep of whose pasture we are by creation, has constituted his Son Jesus to be our Shepherd; and here again and again He owns the relation. He has all that care of his church, and every believer, that a good shepherd has of his flock; and expects all that attendance and observance from the church, and every believer, that the shepherds in those countries had from their flocks.

The mischievous design of the thief; (v. 10.) The thief cometh not with good intent, but to steal, and to kill, and to destroy. 1st. Those whose affections they steal from Christ and his pastures, they kill and destroy spiritually; for the heresies they privily bring in, are damnable. Deceivers are murderers of souls. They that steal away the Scripture, by keeping it in an unknown tongue, that steal away the sacraments by altering the property of them, that steal away Christ's ordinances to put their own inventions in their room, kill and destroy; ignorance and idolatry are destructive. 2dly. Those whom they cannot steal, lead, drive, nor carry away from Christ, they aim by persecutions to kill and destroy corporally. He that will not suffer himself to be robbed, is in danger to be slain.

9 All that ever I came before me, are thieves and robbers: but the sheep do not hear them.

9 I am 'the Door': by me if any man enter in, he shall be saved, and shall go in and out, and find pasture.

[Practical Observations.]

10 The "thief cometh not, but for to steal, and to kill, and to destroy: I am come that they might have life, and that they might have it more abundantly.

11 I am 'the good Shepherd': the good Shepherd giveth his life for the sheep.

there were many that were not thieves, aiming to destroy the sheep, but passed for shepherds, yet were very careless in the discharge of their duty, and through their neglect the flock was greatly damaged; foolish shepherds, idle shepherds, Zech. 11:15, 17. In opposition to these,

In opposition to the design of the thief, the scribes and Pharisees, Christ saith, I am come among men, 1. That they might have life. He came to put life into the church, which had seemed rather like a valley of dry bones, than a pasture covered with flocks. Christ came to vindicate divine truths, to purify ordinances, to redress grievances, to revive dying zeal, to seek them of his flock that were lost, to bind up that which was broken, (Ezek. 34:16.) and this to his church is as life from the dead. Life is inclusive of all good, and stands in opposition to the death threatened; (Gen. 2:17.) that we might have life, as a criminal has when pardoned, as a sick man when cured, a dead man when raised; that we might be justified, sanctified, and glorified. 2. It is comparative, that they might have a life more abundant than that which was lost by sin; more abundant than was promised by the law of Moses, length of days in Canaan; more abundant than could have been expected, or than we ask or think. But it may be construed without a note of comparison, that they might have abundance, or, might have it abundantly. Christ came to give life, and something more, something better, life with advantage; that in Christ we might not only live, but live comfortably, plentifully, live and rejoice; life in abundance is eternal life; life without death, or fear of death; life, and much more.

The good Shepherd giveth his life for the sheep. 1. It is the property of every good shepherd to expose his life for the sheep. Jacob did so, when he would go through such a fatigue to attend them, Gen. 31:40. So did David, when he slew the lion and the bear. Such a shepherd of souls was Paul, who would gladly spend, and be spent, for their service, and counted not his life dear to him, in comparison with their salvation. But, 2. It was the prerogative of the great Shepherd, to give his life to purchase his flock, (Acts 20:28.) to satisfy for their trespass, and to shed his blood to cleanse them.

Christ is a good shepherd, and not a hireling;

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1.—9. It is incumbent on all, who enter the sacred ministry; to scrutinize their motives, and the tendency of their doctrine and example. By whatever external way men obtain admission, unless they enter by 'Christ, the Door,' unless their state of mind and heart, their aim and object, their example and instructions authorize the conclusion, that He has sent them; they will have a dreadful account to give of the emoluments and distinctions, which many now so eagerly pursue, or glory in. For it will at length be proved, that they have seized on advantages, to which they had no right; and grown rich and great by an office, in which they had neither knowledge, integrity, humility, nor industry to do good. Happy is that pastor, whom the Savior employs; who is a true Christian; regards the honor of Christ, the conversion of sinners, and the edification of believers, more than any advantage whatsoever; and can say to his people, 'I seek not yours, but you.' To him the Lord will 'open a door of utterance'; seals shall be given to his ministry; believers will approve and encourage his labors; and his work will be its own reward: while he gets acquainted with his people, attends to the case of each of them, leads them forward in the knowledge and practice of the Gospel, and goes before them in every good work.—Every man, who values his own soul, should avoid those who, strangers to Christ and the knowledge of his salvation, intrude into the ministry, and whose example and doctrine prove them 'hirelings, who care not for the sheep.' The true people of God will flee from such teachers; for 'they know not the voice of strangers;' and for this they will be reproached by those who, like these Jews, understand not this parable. These very persons would think those men very imprudent, who should trust their health to some ignorant empiric, or their estate to a dishonest lawyer, merely because he happened to live in the same street, town, or village: yet they suppose it incumbent on them to follow the instructions of a man, who neither knows nor cares any thing about vital godliness, if he be the minister of the parish, or of some neighboring congregation! Alas! how much more sagacious are men in their temporal, than in their eternal concerns!—They will entrust their immortal souls and their eternal interests to such men, as no one of them would employ even to take care of his sheep!

Verse 8.

All that ever came before Me.] 'All who have entered in another manner. The words before Me, on which the meaning of the sentence depends, are wanting in some of the most ancient, and in a very great number of other manuscripts. There is nothing corresponding to them in the vulgate, and most of the ancient expositors appear not to have read them. Our Lord, when He compares Himself to a shepherd, speaks in the character of the great Prophet or Teacher of God's people; when He compares Himself to the door of the sheep-fold, He signifies that it is by Him, that is, by sharing in his grace and partaking of his Spirit, that the under-shepherds and teachers must be admitted into his fold, and participate in all the spiritual blessings belonging to its members. In this view, the words are directed chiefly against the scribes and Pharisees, considered as teachers, whose doctrine was far from breathing the same spirit with his, and whose chief object was not, like that of the good Shepherd, to feed and to protect the flock, but, like that of the robber, of the wolf, to devour them. The interpretation here given suits the words that follow, as well as those that precede. Thus, 7. 'I am the Door.' All who enter in another manner are thieves and robbers. 9. All who enter by Me, Christ calls Himself the good Shepherd, (v. 11.) and again, (v. 14.) that good Shepherd whom God had promised. Note, Jesus Christ is the best of shepherds, none so skillful, faithful, tender, as He, no such feeder and leader, no such protector and healer of souls as He.

He proves Himself so, in opposition to all hirelings.

He that is a hireling, that is, employed as a servant, whose own the sheep are not, who has neither profit nor loss by them, sees the wolf coming, or some other danger threatening, and leaves the sheep to the wolf, for in truth he careth not for them. Here is plain reference to the idle shepherd, Zech. 11:17.

Here is the description of bad shepherds, magistrates and ministers, their bad principles and practices.

1. Their bad principles, the root of their bad practices. What makes those that have the charge of souls in trying times betray their trust, and in quiet times not mind it? What makes them false, trifling, and self-seeking? They are hirelings, and care not for the sheep. That is, 1. The wealth of the world is their chief good. They undertook the shepherd's office, as a trade to live and grow rich by, not as an opportunity of serving Christ. It is the love of money, and of their own bellies, that carries them on in it. Not that those are hirelings, who, while they serve at the altar, live, and live comfortably, upon the altar; the laborer is worthy of his meat; and a scandalous maintenance will soon make a scandalous ministry; but those are hirelings, that love the wages more than the work, and set their hearts upon that, as the hireling is said to do, Deut. 24:15. See 1 Sam. 2:29. Isa. 56:11. Mic. 3:5, 11. (2.) The work of their place is the least of their care; they are unconcerned in the souls of others, their business is to be their brothers' lords, not their brothers' keepers or helpers; they seek their own things, and do not, like Timothy, naturally care for the state of souls; what can be expected but that they will flee when the wolf comes? He is one whose own the sheep are not; in one respect we may say of the best of the under-shepherds, that the sheep are not their own, they have no dominion over them; (Feed my sheep and my lambs, saith Christ;) but in re-shall be safe." How common was this method with our Lord, to enforce his sentiments by affirmations and negations thus connected.

T. H. HORN

A pastor ought to remember, that whoever boasts of being the way of salvation, shows himself to be a thief and an impostor; and though few are arrived at this degree of folly, yet there are many who rely too much upon their own talents, eloquence, and efforts, as if the salvation of the sheep depended necessarily thereon, in which respect they are always robbers, since they rob the grace of Christ of the glory of saving the sheep. God often puts such pastors to shame by not opening the hearts of the people to receive their word, while He blesses those who are humble, in causing them to be heard with attention, and accompanying their preaching with an unction which converts and saves souls. Let every man know, that in this respect his sufficiency and success are of the Lord? Quesnel, by Dr. A. CLARKE.

Verses 10–13.

The transition from viewing Christ, as the Door both of pastors and sheep, to the consideration of Him 'as the good Shepherd,' should be carefully noted; because it excludes that confusion of metaphors, which arises from viewing Him, at once as the Door by which the shepherd

12 But he that is an hireling, and not the shepherd, whose own the sheep are not, seeth the wolf coming, and leaveth the sheep, and fleeth: and the wolf catcheth them, and scattereth the sheep.

13 The hireling fleeth, because he is an hireling, and careth not for the sheep.

14 I am the good Shepherd, and know my sheep, and am known of mine.

15 As the Father knoweth me, even so know I the Father: and I lay down my life for the sheep.

spect of dearness and affection, they should be their own. Paul looked upon those as his own, whom he called his dearly beloved and longed for. Those who do not cordially espouse the church's interests, will not long be faithful to them.

2. Their bad practices, the effect of bad principles, v. 12. The hireling deserts his post, when he sees the wolf coming, though then there is most need of him. Note, Those who mind their safety more than their duty, are an easy prey to Satan's temptations. How fatal the consequences; the hireling fancied the sheep might look to themselves, but the wolf catches them, and scatters the sheep, and havoc is made of the flock, which will be charged upon the treacherous shepherd. The blood of perishing souls is required at the hand of the careless watchman.

See the grace and tenderness of the good Shepherd, set over against the former, as it was in the prophecy, (Ezek. 34: 21, 22, &c.) I am the good Shepherd. It is made of comfort to the church and her friends, that, however she may be damaged by her under-officers, the Lord Jesus is, and will be, as He ever has been, the good Shepherd.

Here are two great instances of the shepherd's goodness.

1. His acquainting himself with all that in anywise appertain to his flock.

He is acquainted with all that are now of his flock; I know my sheep, and am known of mine. Note, There is a mutual acquaintance between Christ and believers; and knowledge denotes affection.

Christ knows his sheep. He knows who are his sheep, and who are not; He knows the sheep under their many infirmities, and the goats under their most plausible disguises. He takes cognizance of their state, concerns Himself for them, has a tender regard to them, and is continually mindful of them in the intercession He ever lives to make within the veil; He visits them graciously by his Spirit, and has communion with them, He approves and accepts of them, as Ps. 1: 6. 37: 18. Exod. 33: 17.

He is known of them. He observes them with favor, and they observe Him with faith. Christ's knowing his sheep, is put before their knowing Him, for He knew and loved us first; (1 John 4: 19.) and it is not so much our knowing Him, as our being known of Him, that is our happiness, Gal. 4: 9. Yet it is the character of Christ's sheep, that they know Him from all pretenders and intruders; they know his mind, his voice, the power of his death. Christ speaks here as if He gloried in being known by his sheep, and thought their respect an honor to Him.

As the Father knows me, even so know I the Father. This may be considered, either, 1st, As the ground of the intimate acquaintance between Christ and believers. The covenant of grace, the bond of that relation, is founded in the covenant of redemption between the Father and the Son, which stands firm; for the Father and the Son understood one another perfectly well, and there could be no mistake or uncertainty. The Lord Jesus knows whom He hath chosen, and is sure of them, (ch. 13: 18.) and they also know whom they have trusted; (2 Tim. 1: 12.) and the ground of both is the perfect knowledge which the Father and the Son had of one another's mind, when the counsel of peace was between them. Or, 2dly, As an apt similitude, illustrating the intimacy between Christ and believers; it may be connected with the foregoing words, thus; I know my sheep, and am known of mine, even as the Father knows me, and I know the Father; compare ch. 17: 21.

1. As the Father knew the Son, and loved and owned Him, in his sufferings, when led as a sheep to the slaughter, so Christ knows his sheep, and has a watchful eye upon them, will be with them when left alone, as He was with Him. 2. As the Son knew the Father, loved and obeyed Him, and always did those things that pleased Him, and confided in Him as his God, even when He seemed to forsake Him, so believers know Christ with an obedient regard.

He is acquainted with those that are hereafter to be of his flock; (v. 16.) Other sheep I have a right to, and an interest in, which are not of this fold, the Jewish church, them also I must bring.

Christ referred to the Gentiles; He had intimated his special concern for the lost sheep of the house of Israel, to them his personal ministry was confined, but, saith He, I have other sheep. Those who in process of time should believe in Christ among the Gentiles, are here called sheep, and He is said to have them though as yet uncalled, and many of them unborn, because they were chosen of God, from eternity. Christ has a right to many a soul, by virtue of the Father's donation and his own purchase, which He has not yet the possession of; thus He had much people in Corinth, when as yet it lay in wickedness, Acts 18: 10. 'Those other sheep I have,' saith Christ, 'I have them on my heart, in my eye, am as sure to have them as if I had them already.' Christ speaks of those other sheep, 1st. To take off the contempt that was put upon Him, as having but a little flock, and therefore, if a good shepherd, yet a poor shepherd; 'But,' saith He, 'I have more sheep than you see.' 2dly. To take down the pride of the Jews, who thought the Messiah must gather all his sheep from among them. 'No,' saith Christ, 'I have others whom I will set with the lambs of my flock, though you disdain to set them with the dogs of yours.'

'Them also I must bring, home to God, into the church, and in order to that, bring off from their vain conversation, back from their wanderings, as that lost sheep,' Luke 15: 5. But why must He bring them? 1st. The necessity of their case required it; 'I must bring, or they must be left to wander endlessly, for, like sheep, they will never come back of themselves, and no other can or will bring them.' 2dly. The necessity of his own engagements: He must bring them, or He would not be faithful to his trust. 'They are my own, bought and paid for, and therefore, I must not neglect nor leave them to perish.' He must in honor bring those whom He was intrusted with.

'They shall hear my voice among them; they have not heard, and therefore could not believe; now the sound of the gospel shall go to the ends of the earth, I will speak, and give them to hear.' Faith comes by hearing, and our diligent observance of the voice of Christ is a mean and evidence of being brought to Christ, and to God by Him. There shall be one fold and one Shepherd, since both Jews and Gentiles, upon their turning to Christ, shall be incorporated in one church, be equal sharers in the privileges of it. Being united to Christ, they shall unite in Him. Note, One Shepherd makes one fold; one Christ one church. As the church is one in its constitution, subject to one head, animated by one spirit, and guided by one rule, so the members of it ought to be one in love and affection, Eph. 4: 3-6.

Christ's offering up Himself for his sheep, is another proof of his being a good Shepherd, and in this He yet more commended his love, v. 15, 17, 18.

(1.) He declares his purpose of dying for his flock; v. 15. He not only ventured his life for them, but He actually deposited it, submitted to a necessity of dying for our redemption;—I put it, as a pawn or pledge; as purchase-money paid down. Sheep appointed for the slaughter, ready to be sacrificed, were ransomed with the blood of the shepherd. He laid down his life, not only for the good of the sheep, but in their stead. Thousands of sheep had been offered in sacrifice for their shepherds, as sin-offerings, but here, by a surprising reverse, the shepherd is sacrificed for the sheep. When David, the destroying of Israel, was himself guilty, and the shepherd angel drew his sword against the flock for his sake, with good reason did he plead, These sheep, what evil have they done? Let thy hand be against me, 2 Sam. 24: 17. But the Son of David was sinless and spotless, and his sheep, what evil have they not done?

enters, and yet Himself 'the good Shepherd.' An hireling.] He is not an hireling, who, faithfully feeding the flock, is maintained by his ministry; but he, to whom the filthy lucre is the great object or inducement. (Notes, 1 Cor. 3: 7-12. 1 Tim. 5: 17, 18.) Scott.

Verses 14-18.

'The good Shepherd,' has been shown to be a character appropriated to JEHOSHAPHAT, throughout the Old Testament. (Notes, Ps. 23: 30: 1.) (1st) I lay down my life for the sheep. 'Nothing is more certain, than that Christ "gave Himself a ransom for all." (1 Tim. 2: 6. Heb. 2: 1. 1 John 2: 2. 3: 16, 17.) But because the world can no otherwise obtain this salvation, than by believing in Him, and obeying [713]

'the voice of this Shepherd; therefore He is said to do this more eminently for his sheep.' Whitby, (17, 18.) A more decisive testimony to the Deity of our Lord cannot be conceived. It is impossible that a dead man, if no more than man, can do any thing towards restoring Himself to life; and even supposing the dead person to have a superior created nature, distinct from manhood; is raising the dead to life the work of an angel, arch-angel, a created being, however exalted? or is it the work of Almighty God exclusively? And did not God raise Christ from the dead? And if He raised Himself from the dead, is He not 'God over all blessed for evermore?' Scott.

V. 22—38. The time of this conference was, the feast of dedication, and it was winter, a feast annually observed, by consent, in remembrance of the dedication of a new altar, and the purging of the temple, by Judas Maccabeus after it had been profaned; we have the story in Maccabees 1: 4, and the prophecy of it, Dan. 8: 13, 14. See more of the feast, 2 Mac. 1: 18. The return of their liberty was to them as life from the dead, and, in remembrance of it, they kept a seven days' feast, commencing on the twenty-fifth day of the month Cisleu, about the beginning of December. It was not confined to Jerusalem, as that of the divine feasts was, but every one observed it in his own place, not as a holy time, (it is only a divine institution that can sanctify a day,) but as a good time, as the days of Purim, Esth. 9:18. Christ forecast to be at Jerusalem, not in honor of the feast, which did not require his attendance there, but that He might improve those eight days for good purposes.

He did all this by the express appointment of his Father; This commandment have I received of my Father; not such a commandment as made what He did necessary, prior to his own undertaking; but this was the law of mediation, which He was willing to have written in his heart, so as to delight in doing the will of God, Ps. 40: 8.

Jesus walked in the temple, in Solomon's porch; so called, (Acts 3:11.) not because built by Solomon, but because built in the same place with that which had borne his name in the first temple, and the name was kept up for the greater reputation of it. Here Christ walked, to observe the proceedings of the Sanhedrim that sat here; (Ps. 82:1.) He walked ready to give audience to any that should apply to Him. He walked, as it would seem, alone, neglected; pensive, in the foresight of the ruin of the temple. Those that have any thing to say to Christ, may find Him in the temple, and walk with Him there.

The Jews came round about Him, to tease Him; He was waiting for an opportunity to do them a kindness, and they took the opportunity to do Him a mischief. Ill-will for good-will is no uncommon return. He could not enjoy Himself in his Father's house, without disturbance. They came to lay siege to Him: compassed Him about like bees. They came as if they had a joint desire to be satisfied; as one man, pretending an impartial and importunate inquiry after truth, but intending a general assault upon Him; and they seemed to speak the sense of their nation, as if they were the mouth of all the Jews; How long dost thou make us to doubt? If thou be the Christ, tell us.

They quarrel with Him, as if He had unfairly held them in suspense hitherto. How long dost thou steal away our hearts? or, take away our souls? So some read it; basely intimating that what share He had of the people's love, He did not come fairly by; as Absalom stole the hearts of the men of Israel; and as seducers deceive the hearts of the simple, and so draw away disciples after them, Rom. 16:18. Acts 20:30. But most interpreters understand as we do; How long are we kept debating, not able to determine whether thou be the Christ or no? PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 10-21. Christ Himself is, not only the source of authority to all pastors, but the perfect model, according to which they ought to be formed, and by which their pretensions must be decided. He came, that sinners might have life, and have it more abundantly. For their good He became poor, abased Himself, labored, agonized, and died! While we adore his condescension, and love to such enemies, let us inquire, which professed pastors of his church are most like Him? Are they, who rise from obscurity to wealth and grandeur, by the ministry; but who leave the poor of the flock, and every thing that requires labor or self-denial to others; perhaps without much inquiry into their principles or characters, and without knowing whether they too be not 'hirelings' of an inferior order? Does this procedure, (alas! too common,) resemble the conduct of the good Shepherd? Or rather is it not a perfect contrast to it? But, whatever indignation it may excite, such men must be plainly told that they 'are thieves and robbers;' they only need the character of persecutors to complete their likeness to those, who 'came not, but to steal, and to kill, and to destroy;' and this exemption is often the effect, rather of want of power than of will. But, alas, 'such a minister carries a shroud down with him, of those who have perished in ignorance through his neglect, or of those who have been hardened in sin through his ill example.' Bp. Burnet.—Let those, however, be thankful, who have been preserved or recovered from such a state; and let us pray for others, who are still blinded and deluded. Let all who have entered the ministry from worldly motives, and in an unholy manner, pause, and consider their awful case: that, by deep repentance and faith in Christ, they may be commissioned by Him, to exercise their ministry in a better manner, than they entered it. And let all, who desire to be faithful ministers, study Christ's example; that they may grow more willing to labor for the good of that flock, for which He shed his blood; that they may mortify every covetous and selfish desire; and lay aside all sloth, pride, false delicacy, fear of men, and whatever else can render them unwilling to 'spend and be spent for the people.'—We all, especially ministers, should have our desires fixed upon those, who are not yet brought into the fold of Christ, but are scattered abroad in the world, even to the remotest regions of the globe; and endeavor, with all our ability and diligence, that they too may hear the Savior's voice, and become 'the sheep of his pasture;' and if our zeal in such a work should bring upon us the reproach of being hypocrites, ignorant enthusiasts, or even fanatics, we may remember, that our holy Lord and Master was thus vilified before us.—Let sinners also hearken to Him, who says, 'I am the Door.' They can have no access into the favor of God, or into heaven, except they believe in Him. But He will admit all who come to Him, and nourish their souls unto everlasting life.

Verse 23.

Solomon's porch.] 'It looked towards the East, and is therefore called by Josephus, the Eastern porch. It was the only part left uninjured when the Babylonians destroyed the temple. Hence, king Agrippa, though solicited by the people, could not be induced to demolish this ancient pile, even for the purpose of building it anew.' Kuinzel. 'It appears that several porticos, or piazzas, were erected round the temple, in which persons might walk, and the doctors and in the object, they are all plain to him if it understands, but in the eye. Christ would make us to believe; we make ourselves to doubt.

They challenge Him to give a direct, categorical answer, whether He was the Messiah or no; 'If Thou be the Christ, as many believe Thou art, tell us plainly, not by parables, as, I am the Light of the world, and the good Shepherd, and the like, but in so many words, either that Thou art the Christ, or as John Baptist, that Thou art not,' ch. 1:20. This pressing query of theirs was seemingly good; they pretended to be desirous to know the truth, as if ready to embrace it; but it was put with an ill design; for if He should tell them plainly that He was the Christ, there needed no more to make Him obnoxious to the jealousy of the Roman government. Every one knew the Messiah was to be a king, and therefore, whoever pretended to be the Messiah, would be prosecuted as a traitor. Let Him tell them ever so plainly that He was Christ, they would have this to say presently, Thou bearest witness of Thyself, as ch. 8:13.

Christ is not at all necessary to their scepticism; I have told you. He had told them He was the Son of God, the Son of man; that He had life in Himself, and that He had authority to execute judgment. And is not this the Christ? They believed not; why then should they be told, merely to gratify their curiosity? They pretended they only doubted, but Christ tells them they did not believe, Scepticism in religion is no better than downright infidelity. It is not for us to teach God how He should teach us, nor prescribe to Him how plainly He should tell us his mind; but to be thankful for divine revelation as we have it, which if we do not believe, neither would we be persuaded if it were ever so much adapted to our humor. He refers them to his works, to his life, which was not only perfectly pure, but highly beneficent, and of a piece with his doctrine; especially to his miracles, which He wrought for the confirmation of his doctrine. It was certain, no man could do those miracles except God were with him, and God would not be with him to attest a forgery.

He condemns them for their obstinate unbelief, notwithstanding all the powerful arguments used to convince them; Ye believed not; and again, 'Ye believed not. Ye still are what ye always were, obstinate in your unbelief.'

The reason He gives, is very surprising; 'Ye believed not, because ye are not of my sheep; ye believe not in Me, because ye belong not to Me.'

other masters might communicate oral instruction to their followers sheltered from the inclemency of the weather.' Titman. 'So were porticoes contrived in Greece and Rome, and in the East, for a similar use.' Weston. [Hence the Stoics obtained their name.] 'Titman thinks this was called Solomon's porch, not as having been built by him, but as standing in the same place, and erected chiefly of materials supplied by the ruins of Solomon's portico.'

his word their rule. Christ will not account those his sheep, that are deaf to his call, deaf to his charms, Ps. 58: 5.

They follow Him, submit to his conduct by obedience to all his commands, and conformity to his Spirit and pattern. The word of command has always been, Follow Me. In vain do we hear his voice if we do not follow Him.

To convince them it was their great unhappiness not to be of Christ's sheep, He here describes the state and case of those that are; which would likewise serve for the comfort of his despised followers, and keep them from envying the power and grandeur of those who were not of his sheep.

Our Lord Jesus takes cognizance of his sheep; They hear my voice, and I

Verses 25, 29.

The doctrine of the preservation of all true believers, from every enemy, and through all dangers and temptations, to the full enjoyment of eternal life, is taught in these verses, with the greatest decision. 'I give them eternal life,' they shall never perish, or 'not perish forever.' Now if any of them come short of eternal life, and actually and eternally perish, how can these testimonies be true, these engagements faithful? Will not the Savior's words pass away? (Note, Matt. 24: 35.) 'I have brought any defect on my part. Or Christ may speak here of sheep, contrasting us to the devil, Whithy. This means that they shall not perish, except by their own fault. But as such a condition was implied in this and similar Scriptures, (which must be supposed by those who deny the doctrine in question,) why is it never once hinted? (Marg. Ref. i.-1.-Notes, 5: 24-27. 1 Sam. 2: 9. Ps. 37: 27. 23. 133: 8. Is. 54: 15-17. Jer. 32: 39-41.) In none of these texts is such a condition so much as hinted at; and in some of them, the danger arising from it, and our violating it, is expressly obviated. Can we then reasonably suppose, that a condition was everywhere implied, a condition of infinite importance to us; and yet that not the smallest intimation of it was given in any one of them? Could this be done by design? Or could it possibly be an oversight? Or was the case so obvious, that no caution or warning was at all requisite? It was indeed of considerable importance for our Lord, in his circumstances, to declare his 'ability and readiness to save all such, as should persevere in believing on Him' but his words are calculated to convey far more than this assurance; and, 'persevere in believing' must be added to them, before they can be limited to it. (Notes, Deut. 4: 2. Prov. 30: 5. 6. Rev. 22: 18-21.) Where is the confidence of a believer to be placed, that he shall 'persevere in believing'? Must he trust in the strength of his own resolution? or the constancy of his own will? or on his experienced superiority to temptation? That is, shall he 'trust in his own heart'? (Notes, Prov. 23: 26. Jer. 17: 9, 10.) His confidence, as to perseverance to the end in believing, must be placed, either on the truth, love, and power of Christ, and on the supposition that He has promised to preserve the believer; or on his own heart, at least conjointly with Christ, if all the promises to this effect be conditional. If we have for a long time persevered in believing, ought we to take the credit of it to ourselves; or ought we to ascribe all the glory of it to the Lord alone? When Adam fell, it was not against his will, or without his own fault; yet he was overcome, and ruined, and must have perished with all his race, had not Christ interposed; and could the true believer, though by his own fault, thus be plucked out of the hands of Christ, and finally perish, the enemy would triumph over the second Adam, in some respects, as he did over the first. (Notes, 1 Cor. 15: 45-49. Col. 3: 1-4, v. 3, 4.) Indeed, there can be no sin, except where the will consents; or any conceivable way, by which our great enemy, or any of his servants, heretics, persecutors, or tempters of whatever description, can 'pluck us out of Christ's hand' by an act of violence, or without our own fault. (Notes, Rom. 8: 28-39. Jude 22-25.) It is said, 'Where do we learn this, except from such passages as that under consideration?' We learn it, not so much from any particular text, as from the general tenor of Scripture, and our own most obvious notions of right and wrong. Man had not fallen, had he not consented to the temptation; though it had been possible, to have forced the forbidden fruit on him. When Satan desired to know them. He distinguishes them from others (2 Tim. 2: 19.) has a particular regard to every individual, (Ps. 34: 6.) knows their wants and desires; knows their souls in adversity, where to find them, and what to do for them. He knows others afar off, but them near at hand.

He has provided happiness for them; I give unto them eternal life, v. 28. 1st. The estate settled upon them is rich and valuable; it is eternal life. Man has a living soul, therefore the happiness provided is life, suited to his nature. Man has an immortal soul, therefore the happiness provided is eternal life. Life eternal is the felicity and chief good of a soul immortal. 2dly. The manner of conveyance is free; I give it to them; it is not sold upon a valuable consideration, but given by the free grace of Christ. The donor has power to give it. The Fountain of life, and Father of eternity, has authorized Christ to give eternal life, ch. 17: 2. Not I will give it, but I do give it, it is a gift in present. He gives the assurance of it, the pledge and earnest of it, the first fruits and foretastes of it; that spiritual life, which is eternal life begun, heaven in the seed, in the bud.

He has undertaken their security and preservation to this happiness. They shall be saved from everlasting perdition.—Shall by no means perish forever; so the words are. As there is an eternal life, so there is an eternal destruction; the soul not annihilated, but ruined; its being continued, but its happiness irrecoverably lost. All believers are saved from this; whatever cross they come under, they shall not come into condemnation. A man is never undone till he is in hell, and they shall not go down to that. Shepherds that have large flocks, often lose some of the sheep and suffer them to perish; but Christ has engaged that none of his sheep shall perish, not one. They cannot to have Peter to sift him as wheat,' our Lord said, 'I have prayed for thee, that thy faith fail not.' (Notes, Luke 22: 31-34, v. 32. 1 Cor. 10: 13. 1 Pet. 1: 2-5.) His perseverance in believing, therefore, was insured by Christ's intercession. The event was certain; but the exhortation to watch and pray was not superfluous; for had Peter regarded it, he would have escaped unspeakable anguish. Now if Peter's perseverance in believing was secured by our Lord's intercession, is it not most obvious, with such Scriptures before us as that under consideration, to suppose that our perseverance in believing is secured in the same way; and that we are assured of it by express promises, as we are of that, which is provided for true believers. The warnings and exhortations which many object to this doctrine, as if nugatory on the supposition that it is true, are of different sorts. Some are suited to stir up professed Christians to examine, whether they have the true faith or not. This may be distinguished from a dead faith, not only by its other fruits, but by standing the trials, which cause many to fall away, 'having no root in themselves.' 'Continue in my word,' 'Abide in Me.' 'He that continueth to the end shall be saved.' 'That on the good ground are they, which in an honest and good heart, having heard the word, keep it, and bring forth fruit with patience.' (Notes, 8: 30-36, v. 31. 15: 1-3. Matt. 13: 20-23. Luke 8: 4-15, v. 14, 15. 1 Pet. 1: 6, 7.) These guarding doctrine from perversion, and tend to exclude presumption. Others are suited to stir up believers to 'give all diligence to make their calling and election sure'; and to 'possess the full assurance of hope unto the end'; that, knowing their own safety and happiness, they may be the more cheerful, in self-denying services and afflictions. (Note, 1 Cor. 15: 55-58.) There are also such warnings and exhortations as call them to the use of those means, by which it is the will of God to preserve them. Thus the apostle assured his companions in danger, 'that there should be no loss of any man's life'; yet he afterwards said, 'Except these abide in the ship, ye cannot be saved'; for that was the method, in which it was the will of God to save them. (Notes, Acts 27: 30-32.) And others are intended to put believers on their guard against those temptations, which, if listened to, would not only greatly distress and injure them, but also hinder their usefulness, disgrace their profession, dishonor God, and do unspeakable evil to their brethren and neighbors. Indeed, though a man could be most fully assured, that he should not be killed by falling from a precipice: there might yet be sufficient reason to warn him to beware; for broken bones, and various dreadful effects might follow, should he heedlessly fall down, though by a miracle his life should be preserved. In fine, it cannot be said to be impossible, that Christ should engage, not only to take care of his sheep, while they persevere in believing; but also to insure their perseverance, and to secure them from final apostasy, or from dying impenitent and unbelieving. Now, can any one possibly convey this meaning in clearer, and more determinate, and more emphatical language, than that contained in these verses, and the texts referred to? But, if any be confident that the doctrine is of such a nature, that no words can prove it; do they not 'lean to their own understandings, instead of simply crediting the Word of God?'

Neither shall any enemy pluck them, &c.] 'This is the plain import and energy of the original, which is greatly exalted by adding the word man in the translation, as the authors of our English version have frequently done.' SCOTT.

DOVERPICK.

29 My father, "which gave them me," is greater than all; and none is able to pluck them out of my Father's hand.

30 I and my Father are one.

31 Then the Jews took up stones again to stone him.

32 Jesus answered them, "Many good works have I showed you from my Father: for which of those works do ye stone me?"

33 The Jews answered him, saying, For a good work we stone thee not, but for blasphemy; and because that thou, being a man, makest thyself God.

they have, or hinder them from the glory designed them; not able to put them out of God's protection, nor get them into their own power. Christ had Himself experienced the power of his Father upholding and strengthening Him, and therefore puts all his followers into his hand too. He that secured the glory of the Redeemer, will secure the glory of the redeemed.

Further to corroborate the security, that the sheep of Christ may have strong consolation, He asserts the union of these two undertakers; 'I and my Father are one, and have jointly undertaken for the protection of the saints.' This speaks more than the harmony, that was between the Father and the Son in the work of redemption; every good man is so far one with God, as to concur with Him; it must be meant of the oneness of the nature of Father and Son, that they are the same in substance, equal in power and glory.

The fathers urged this, both against the Sabellians, to prove the distinction and plurality of the persons, that the Father and the Son are two; and against the Arians, to prove the unity of the nature, that these two are one. If we should hold our peace concerning this sense of the words, even the stones which the Jews took up to cast at Him would speak it out, for the Jews understood Him as hereby making Himself God, (v. 33.) and He did not deny it. He proves that none could pluck them out of his hand, because they could not pluck them out of the Father's hand; which had not been a conclusive argument, if the Son had not had the same almighty power with the Father, and, consequently, been one with Him in essence and operation.

The Jews took up stones again, v. 31. It is not the word that is used before, (ch. 8: 59.) that they carried stones, stones that were a load, such as they used in stoning malefactors; they brought them from some place at a distance, as if preparing for his execution without any judicial process; as if He were convicted of blasphemy upon notorious evidence. The absurdity of this insult which the Jews offered to Christ, will appear, if we consider, 1. That they had imperiously, not to say impudently, challenged Him to tell them plainly whether He were the Christ; and now that He not only said it, but proved Himself so, they condemned Him for it as a malefactor. If the preachers of the truth propose it modestly, they are branded as cowards; if boldly, as insolent. 2. When they had made the like attempt before, it was in vain, He escaped through the midst of them; (ch. 8: 59.) yet they repeat their baffled attempt. Daring sinners will throw stones at heaven, though they return upon their own heads; and will strengthen themselves against the Almighty, though never any hardened themselves against Him, and prospered.

Verse 30.

'That Christ speaks not here of an unity of will and concord only, appears, 1. From the reason assigned of the security of the sheep; the want of power in any one to snatch them out of the hands of Christ, because, the Father being greater in power than all, his power could secure them from all: and so could also Christ, He being one in power with the Father; for the foundation of this argument is not, that the Father's will; but that his power was above all. 2. From the inference of the Jews, that by these words, 'He made Himself God,' and so was guilty of blasphemy.' Whitby. (Notes, 32-35. 2 Tim. 11: 12. 1 Job 4: 1-4.)

be kept from everlasting happiness; He that gives it them will preserve them to it.

His own power is engaged for them; Neither shall any pluck them out of my hand. A mighty contest is here supposed about these sheep. The Shepherd is so careful of their welfare, that He has them not only in his fold, and under his eye, but in his hand, interested in his special love, and under his special protection; (all his saints are in thy hand, Deut. 33: 3.) yet their enemies are so daring, they attempt to pluck them out of his hand; but they cannot, shall not, do it. Note, Those are safe, who are in the hands of Jesus. The saints are preserved in Christ; their salvation is not in their own keeping, but in the keeping of a Mediator. The Pharisees and rulers did all they could to frighten the disciples of Christ from following Him, but Christ saith they shall not prevail.

His Father's power is likewise engaged for their preservation, v. 29. He now appeared in weakness, and, lest his security should therefore be thought insufficient, He brings in that of his Father.

My Father is greater than all; greater than all the other friends of the church, shepherds, magistrates, or ministers. Those shepherds slumber and sleep; it will be easy to pluck the sheep out of their hands; but He keeps his flock day and night. He is greater than the enemies of the church, and able to secure his own; He is greater than the combined force of hell and earth.

'It is my Father that gave them Me, and He is concerned in honor to uphold his gift.' They were given to the Son as a trust, and therefore God will still look after them. All the divine power is engaged for the accomplishment of all the divine counsels.

If this be so, then none (neither man nor devil) is able to pluck them out of the Father's hand, not able to deprive them of the grace that they have, or hinder them from the glory designed them; not able to put them out of God's protection, nor get them into their own power. Christ had Himself experienced the power of his Father upholding and strengthening Him, and therefore puts all his followers into his hand too. He that secured the glory of the Redeemer, will secure the glory of the redeemed.

Further to corroborate the security, that the sheep of Christ may have strong consolation, He asserts the union of these two undertakers; 'I and my Father are one, and have jointly undertaken for the protection of the saints.' This speaks more than the harmony, that was between the Father and the Son in the work of redemption; every good man is so far one with God, as to concur with Him; it must be meant of the oneness of the nature of Father and Son, that they are the same in substance, equal in power and glory.

The fathers urged this, both against the Sabellians, to prove the distinction and plurality of the persons, that the Father and the Son are two; and against the Arians, to prove the unity of the nature, that these two are one. If we should hold our peace concerning this sense of the words, even the stones which the Jews took up to cast at Him would speak it out, for the Jews understood Him as hereby making Himself God, (v. 33.) and He did not deny it. He proves that none could pluck them out of his hand, because they could not pluck them out of the Father's hand; which had not been a conclusive argument, if the Son had not had the same almighty power with the Father, and, consequently, been one with Him in essence and operation.

The Jews took up stones again, v. 31. It is not the word that is used before, (ch. 8: 59.) that they carried stones, stones that were a load, such as they used in stoning malefactors; they brought them from some place at a distance, as if preparing for his execution without any judicial process; as if He were convicted of blasphemy upon notorious evidence. The absurdity of this insult which the Jews offered to Christ, will appear, if we consider, 1. That they had imperiously, not to say impudently, challenged Him to tell them plainly whether He were the Christ; and now that He not only said it, but proved Himself so, they condemned Him for it as a malefactor. If the preachers of the truth propose it modestly, they are branded as cowards; if boldly, as insolent. 2. When they had made the like attempt before, it was in vain, He escaped through the midst of them; (ch. 8: 59.) yet they repeat their baffled attempt. Daring sinners will throw stones at heaven, though they return upon their own heads; and will strengthen themselves against the Almighty, though never any hardened themselves against Him, and prospered.

Christ tenderly expostulates with them upon this outrage; Jesus answered what they did, for we do not find that they said any thing, unless perhaps they stirred up the crowd to join with them, crying, Stone Him, stone Him, as afterwards, Crucify Him, crucify Him. When He could have answered them with fire from heaven, He mildly replied, Many good works have I showed you from my Father: for which of those works do you stone Me? Words, that one would think would have melted a heart of stone.

In dealing with his enemies He still argued from his works; men evidence what they are by what they do. His good works: it signifies both great works and good works.

The divine power of his works convicted them of obstinate infidelity. They were works from his Father, so far above the course of nature, as to prove Him that did them, sent of God. These works He showed them openly, not in a corner; his works would bear the test, and refer themselves to the testimony of the most inquisitive and impartial spectators. He did not show his works by candle-light, as they that do them only for show, but at noon-day before the world, ch. 18: 20. See Ps. 111.

The divine grace of his works convicted them of the most base ingratitude. The works He did among them were not only miracles, but mercies; not only works of wonder, but works of love and kindness. He healed the sick, cleansed the lepers, cast out devils, which were favors, not only to the persons concerned, but to the public; these He had multiplied; 'Ye cannot say that I have done you any harm; or given any provocation; if therefore ye will quarrel with Me, it must be for some good work, tell Me for which.' Note, (1.) The horrid ingratitude of our sins against God and Christ, is a great aggravation of them. See how God argues to this purpose, Deut. 32: 6. Jer. 2: 5. Mic. 6: 3. (2.) We must not think it strange if we meet with those who not only hate us without cause, but are our adversaries for our love, Ps. 35: 12. 41: 9. When He asks, For which of these do ye stone Me, as He intimates the abundant satisfaction He had in his own innocency, which gives a man courage in suffering, so He induces his persecutors to consider the true reason of their enmity, and ask, as al. should do, that create trouble to their neighbor, Why persecute ye him? As Job advises his friends to do, Job 19: 23.

They vindicate their attempt upon Christ, and the cause on which they grounded their prosecution, v. 33. What sin will warrant leaves to cover itself, when the persecutors of the Son of God could find something to say for themselves?

They would not be thought such enemies to their country, as to persecute Him for a good work; For a good work we stone Thee not. They would scarcely allow any of his works to be so. His curing the impotent man, (ch. 5.) and the blind man, (ch. 9.) were so far from being acknowledged such, that they were put on the score of his crimes, because done on the sabbath-day. But if He had done any good works, they would not own that they stoned Him for them, though these were really the things that did most exasperate them, ch. 11: 47. Thus, though most absurd, they could not be brought to own their absurdities.

They would be thought such friends to God and his glory, as to prosecute Him for blasphemy; Because that thou, being a man, makest thyself God.

Here is, (1.) A pretended zeal for the law. They seem mightily concerned for the honor

I and my Father are one. 'That is, the union between us is as strict and intimate in nature, as was affection and design, that his almighty power is mine, to be employed for the defence of my sheep, and no one can deprive them of eternal life without prevailing against Him as well as Me. How widely different that sense is, in which Christians are said to be one with God, (John 17: 21.) it will sufficiently appear, by considering how flagrantly absurd and blasphemous it would be to draw that inference from their union with God, which Christ does from his.'

Scripture on his side. It is written, (Ps. 82: 6.) I have said, Ye are gods. It is an argument from the less to the greater. If they were gods, much more am I. Observe,

(1.) How He explains the text; He called them gods, to whom the Word of God came, and the Scripture cannot be broken. The word of God's commission came to them, appointing them to their offices, as judges, and therefore they are called gods, Exod. 22: 28. To some the Word of God came immediately, as to Moses; to others in the way of an instituted ordinance. Magistracy is a divine institution; and magistrates are God's delegates, and therefore the Scripture calleth them gods; and we are sure that the Scripture cannot be broken, or broken in upon, or found fault with. Every word of God is right, the very style and language of Scripture are unexceptionable, and not to be corrected, Matt. 5: 18.

(2.) How He applies it. They were very rash and unreasonable, who condemned Christ as a blasphemer, for calling Himself the Son of God, when they themselves called their rulers so, and therein the Scripture warranted them. But the argument goes further; v. 36. If magistrates were called gods, because commissioned to administer justice in the nation, say ye of Him whom the Father hath sanctified, Thou blasphemest? We have here two things concerning Jesus:

[1.] The honor due Him by the Father, which He justly glories in; He sanctified, sent Him into the world. Magistrates were called the sons of God, though the Word of God only came to them, and the spirit of government came upon them by measure, as upon Saul; but our Lord was Himself the Word, and had the Spirit without measure; they were constituted for a particular country, city, or nation, but He was sent into the world, with a universal authority; they were sent to, as persons at a distance, He was sent forth, as having been from eternity with God. The Father sanctified Him, that is, designed Him, and set Him apart to the office of Mediator, and qualified Him for that office. Sanctifying Him is the same with sealing Him, ch. 1: 27. Note, Whom the Father sends, He sanctifies; whom He designs for holy purposes, He prepares with holy principles and dispositions. The holy God will reward, and therefore will employ, none but such as He

of the divine majesty, and to be seized with religious horror at what they imagined to be a reproach to it. A blasphemer was to be stoned, Lev. 24: 16. This law, they thought, did not only justify, but sanctify, what they attempted, as Acts 26: 9. Note, The vilest practices are often varnished with plausible pretences. As nothing is more courageous than a well-informed conscience, so nothing is more outrageous than a mistaken one. See Isa. 66: 5, ch. 16: 2.

(2.) A real enmity to the Gospel, on which they could not put a greater affront, than by representing Christ as a blasphemer.

The crime laid to his charge is blasphemy, speaking reproachfully of God. God Himself is out of the sinner's reach, and not capable of receiving any real injury; and therefore enmity to God spits its venom at his name.

The proof of the crime; Thou, being a man, makest thyself God. As it is God's glory, that He is God, which we rob Him of when we make Him altogether such a one as ourselves, so it is his glory, that beside Him there is no other, which we rob Him of when we make ourselves, or any creature, altogether like Him.

Thus far they were in the right, that what Christ said of Himself, amounted to this—that He was God, for He had said that He was One with the Father, and that He would give eternal life; and Christ does not deny it, which He would have done, if it had been a mistaken inference from his words.

But, They greatly mistook, when they looked on Him as a mere man, and that the godhead He claimed was his own usurpation. They thought it impious that such a poor, mean man, should profess Himself the Messiah, and entitle Himself to the honors due to the Son of God. Note, 1. Those who say that Jesus is a mere man, and only a made God, as the Socinians say, do in effect charge Him with blasphemy, but do effectually prove it upon themselves. 2. He, who, being a man, makes himself a god, as the pope does, is, no question, a blasphemer, and that antichrist.

Christ proves Himself to be no blasphemer, 1. From God's Word. He appeals to their law, the Old Testament; Christ is sure to have finds or makes holy. The Father's sanctifying and sending Him is here vouched as a sufficient warrant for his calling Himself the Son of God; for, because He was a holy man, He was called the Son of God; Luke 1: 35. See Rom. 1: 4.

[2.] He justly complains that they impiously said of Him, whom the Father had thus dignified, that He was a blasphemer, because He called Himself the Son of God; 'Say ye of Him so and so? Dare ye thus set your mouths against the heavens?' If devils had said so of Him, whom He came to condemn, it had not been so strange; but that men should say so of Him, whom He came to save, be astonished, O heavens! See the language of obstinate unbelief; it, in effect, calls the holy Jesus a blasphemer. It is hard to say which is more to be wondered at, that men who breathe God's air, should yet speak such things, or that men who have spoken such things, should still be suffered to breathe. The wickedness of man, and the patience of God, as it were, contend which shall be most wonderful.

In the former argument, He only answered the charge of blasphemy by an argument ad hominem—turning a man's own argument against himself; here He makes out his own claims, and proves that He and the Father are One; If I do not the works of my Father, believe Me not. Though He might justly have abandoned such blasphemous wretches as incurable, He reasons with them.

2. He argues from his works, which He has often vouched as the proofs of his mission. As He proved Himself sent of God by the divinity of his works, so we must prove ourselves allied to Christ by the Christianity of ours. The argument is very cogent; for the works He did, were the works of his Father, which could not be done in the ordinary course of nature, but only by the over-ruling power of God. He that can dispense with the laws of nature, repeat, and over-rule them at his pleasure, is certainly the sovereign Prince who instituted those laws. The miracles the apostles wrought in his name, and for the confirmation of his doctrine, corroborated this argument, and continued the evidence of it, when He was gone. It is proposed as fairly as can be desired, and put to a short issue.

If I do not the works of my Father, believe Me not. He does not demand a blind faith, nor an assent to his divine mission further than He gave proof of it. He did not wind Himself into the affections of the people, nor wheedle them by sly insinuations, nor impose upon their credulity by bold assertions; but, with the greatest fairness imaginable, quitted all demands of their faith, further than He produced warrants for these demands. Christ is no hard master, who expects to reap in assents, where He has not sown in arguments. None shall perish for the disbelief of that which was not proposed to them with sufficient motives of credibility, Infinite Wisdom itself being judge.

But if I do the works of my Father, if I work undeniable miracles, though you are so scrupulous as not to take my word, yet believe the works; believe your own eyes, the thing speaks itself plainly enough.' As the invisible things of the Creator are clearly seen by his works of creation and common providence, (Rom. 1: 20.) so the invisible things of the Redeemer were seen by his miracles, and by all his works, both of power and mercy; so that they who were not convinced by these works, were without excuse.

That ye may know and believe, may believe it intelligently, and with entire satisfaction, that the Father is in Me, and I in Him; which is

Lord, to the divine inspiration of the Old Testament. (36.) Sent into the world. It may be said of every man, that God 'sent him into the world.' Campbell. It is however, not said in Scripture of any other man except our Lord, but of Him frequently; (Marg. Ref. c.) and, it may be questioned, whether it could be said, with propriety, of any other man. God creates men, or brings them into the world; and then sends them, as He sees good; but 'to send,' applied to rational creatures, pre-supposes a capacity of being sent, as moral agents; and 'to send into the world,' in this sense, evidently implies pre-existence. When magistrates and judges are in Scripture called gods, the Holy Christ still addeth something, which exalts them from true divinity to that 'they shall die like men.' (Ps. 82: 6.) or they are 'rulers of the people,' (Ex. 22: 28.) Whereas, when Christ is called God, it is either with some epithet belonging to the supreme God, as 'God over all;' (Rom. 9: 5.) 'The great God;' (Tit. 2: 13.) 'The true God;' (1 John 5: 20.) or with addition of some operation proper to God, as when it is said, 'The Word was God, and all things were made by Him,' (1: 1.) Whitby. (35.) The Scripture cannot be broken. This is a decisive testimony of our and therefore, having the same provocation, they express the same resentments, and justify their attempt to stone Him by another attempt to take Him. Such is the temper of a persecuting spirit, and such its politics, to cover one set of bad deeds with another, lest the former should fall through.

He avoided them by flight; not an inglorious retreat, in which there was any thing of human infirmity, but a glorious retirement, in which there was much divine power. He escaped out of their hands, not by the interposals of any friend, but He either drew a veil over Himself, or cast a mist before their eyes, or tied the hands of those whose hearts He did not turn. Note, No weapon formed against our Lord Jesus shall prosper, Ps. 2: 5. He escaped, not because He was afraid to suffer, but because his hour was not come. And He who knew how to deliver Himself, no doubt knows how to deliver the godly out of temptation, and to make a way for them to escape.

He went away again beyond Jordan, v. 40. The Bishop of our souls care: not to be fixed in one see, but to go from place to place, doing good. This great Benefactor was never out of his way, for wherever He came there was work to be done. Observe,

1. What seeker He found there. He went into a private part of the country, and there abode; there He found some rest, when in Jerusalem He could find none. Note, Though persecutors may drive Christ and his Gospel out of their own city or country, they cannot drive Him or it out of the world. Though Jerusalem was not gathered, yet Christ was glorious. Christ's going now beyond Jordan, was a figure of the taking of the kingdom of God from the Jews, and bringing it to the Gentiles. Christ and his Gospel have often found better entertainment among plain country-people than among the wise, the mighty, the noble, 1 Cor. 1: 26, 27.

2. What success He found there. He did not go thither merely for security, but to do good; and therefore He chose to go where John at first baptized, (ch. 1: 28.) because there could not but remain some impressions of John's ministry, which would dispose them to receive Christ, for it was not three years since John was baptizing, and Christ was Himself baptized here at Bethabara. Christ came hither now to see what fruit there was of all the pains John Baptist had taken among them, and what they retained of the things they then heard. The event in some measure answered expectation; for we are told,

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 22-42. The proud, the malicious, and all who are not the sheep of Christ, will be convinced by no evidence, and take no warning; but his sheep 'hear his voice,' and follow his example; thus they become like the harmless, holy, patient Lamb of God. These He knows, and they know Him; they 'love Him, because He hath first loved them,' (Note, 1 John 4: 19.) they seek his glory, and He takes care of their interests. He gives them eternal life, and keeps them to the enjoyment of it; nor shall any enemy, or any event, ever separate them from his love. 'They know whom they have believed;' their Redeemer is the LORD of Hosts. 'God is become their Salvation;' JEHOVAH, Jesus, is their good Shepherd, One with the Father, and possessing with Him divine perfection. They cannot expect too much from Him, to whom the prophets bare witness, of whom the priests and kings of Israel were types, 'whom all angels worship,' and 'who upholds all things by the word of his power.' (Notes, Heb. 1: 1-4.) His works pro-

(1.) That they flocked after Him; Many resorted to Him. The return of the means of grace to a place, after they have been for some time intermitted, commonly occasions a great stirring of affections. Some think Christ chose to abide at Bethabara, the house of passage, where the ferry-boats for crossing the Jordan lay, that the confluence of people thither might give an opportunity of teaching many who would come to hear Him when it lay in their way, but would scarcely go a step out of the road for an opportunity of attending on his word.

(2.) They reasoned in his favor, and sought arguments to induce them to close with Him, as much as they at Jerusalem sought objections against Him. They said very judiciously, John did no miracle, but all things that John spake of this Man were true.

Christ far exceeded John Baptist's power, for John did no miracle, but Jesus does many. If John were so great a prophet, how great then is Jesus! Christ is best known by such a comparison with others as sets Him superlatively above them. Though John came in the spirit and power of Elias, yet he did not, like him, work miracles, lest the minds of people should be made to hesitate between him and Jesus; therefore the honor of working miracles was reserved for Jesus, that there might be a sensible and an undeniable demonstration, that, though He came after John, yet He was preferred far before him.

Christ exactly answered John Baptist's testimony. John not only did no miracle to divert people from Christ, but directed them to Christ, turned them over as apprentices to Him, and that came to their minds now; all things John said of this Man were true, that He should be the Lamb of God, should baptize with the Holy Ghost and with fire. Great things John had said of Him, which raised their expectations; so that, though they had not zeal enough to carry them into his country to inquire after Him, yet, when He came into theirs, they acknowledged Him as great as John had said He would be. When we get acquainted with Christ, and come to know Him experimentally, we find all that the Scripture saith of Him is true; nay, that the reality exceeds the report, 1 Kings 10: 6, 7. John Baptist was now dead, yet his hearers profited by what they had heard formerly, and by comparing what they heard then with what they saw now, they gained a double advantage; for, 1st. They were confirmed in their belief that John was a prophet, who foretold such things, and spake of the eminence to which this Jesus would arrive. 2dly. They were prepared to believe that Jesus was the Christ, in whom they saw those things accomplished, which John foretold. Thus we see that the efficacy of the word preached, is not confined to the life of the preacher, nor does

'This and the preceding chapter contain two remarkable "scintillations" of the Jewish doctors. In the former, they were confounded by the testimony of a plain, uneducated man, simply appealing to the various circumstances of a matter of fact at which they cavilled. In this chapter the wise are taken in their own craftiness. The Pharisees are confounded by that wisdom which is from above, speaking of and manifesting the deep things of God.'

CHAP. XI.

Lazarus, the brother of Martha and Mary, is sick, 1, 2. They send to Jesus, declaring his sickness, not unto death, but for the glory of God, abides two days where He is, 3-8. He informs the disciples that Lazarus is dead, and intimating that He would raise him to life. He proposes going to him: the disciples, fearing the Jews, express their aversion, yet resolve to accompany Him, 7-16. Jesus arrives at Bethany, after Lazarus had been dead four days, 17, 18. He assures Martha that her brother shall rise again, and requires her to believe, that He is the 'Resurrection and the Life'; and as she confesses her faith in Him as 'the Christ, the Son of God', 19-27. She calls Mary, who comes with her, 28-31. Jesus, sympathizing with the mourners, 'groans in spirit,' and 'weeps': the remarks of the Jews on the occasion, 32-37. He comes to the grave, appeals to God as his Father, who sent Him, and calls Lazarus out of the grave, 38-44. Many Jews believe; but some inform the Pharisees, 45-46. They hold a council; and confer with Caiaphas, who insinuates that to put Jesus to death; while, as high priest, Caiaphas says, 'that by his intention, to prophesy concerning the gracious design and extensive efficacy of his death, 47-53. Jesus retires from places of public resort, 54. Before the passover, the Jews inquire about Him, the rulers having given orders to apprehend Him, 55-57.

NOW a certain man was sick, named Lazarus, of ^aBethany, the town of ^bMary and her sister Martha.

2 (It was ^cthat Mary which ^danointed the Lord with ointment, and wiped his feet with her hair, whose brother Lazarus was sick.)

3 Therefore his sisters sent unto him, saying, Lord, behold, ^ehe whom thou lovest is sick.

4 When Jesus heard that, he said, ^fThis sickness is not unto death; but ^gfor the glory of God, ^hthat the Son of God might be glorified thereby.

It relates: (ch. 12: 3.) for the evangelists never refer to one another, but John frequently refers in one place of his Gospel to another. Extraordinary acts of piety, that come from love to Christ, will not only find acceptance with Him, but gain reputation in the church, Matt. 26: 13. Her brother Lazarus was sick; and the sickness of those we love is our affliction. The more friends we have, the more frequently we are afflicted by sympathy; and the dearer they are, the more grievous it is. The multiplying of our comforts is but the multiplying of our cares.

Tidings were sent to Jesus of the sickness of Lazarus. His sisters knew that He was a great way off beyond Jordan, and they sent a special messenger to acquaint Him with the affliction of their family. In which they manifest, 1. Affection and concern for their brother. Though it is likely, his estate would come to them after his death, yet they earnestly desired his life. They showed their love to him now that he was sick, for a brother is born for adversity, and so is a sister. We must weep with our friends when they weep, as well as rejoice with them when they rejoice. 2. The regard they had to Jesus, whom they were willing to make acquainted with all their concerns, and, like Jephthah, utter all their words before Him. Though God knows all our wants, and griefs, He will know them from us, and is honored by our saying them before Him.

it expire with his breath, but that which seemed as water spilt upon the ground, may afterward be gathered up again. See Zech. 1: 5, 6. Many believed on Him there. Believing that He who wrought such miracles, and in whom John's predictions were fulfilled, was what He declared Himself to be, the Son of God, they gave up themselves to Him as his disciples, v. 42. [1.] The persons that believed on Him, were many. While they that received his doctrine at Jerusalem, were but as the grape-gleanings of the vintage, they that believed on Him in the country beyond Jordan, were a full harvest. [2.] In this place, where John had been preaching with great success, many believed on the Lord Jesus. Where the preaching of repentance has had success, there the preaching of reconciliation is most likely to prosper. Where John has been acceptable, Jesus will not be unacceptable. The jubilee-trumpet sounds sweetest in the ears of those, who in the day of atonement have afflicted their souls for sin.

CHAP. XI. v. 1-16. In this chapter, we have the history of the illustrious miracle Christ wrought a little before his death—the raising of Lazarus to life; recorded only by this evangelist: for the other three confined themselves to what Christ did in Galilee, where He resided most, and scarcely ever carried their history into Jerusalem till the passion-week: whereas John's memoirs relate chiefly to what passed at Jerusalem; this passage therefore was reserved for his pen. Some suggest that, when the other evangelists wrote, Lazarus was alive, and it would not agree, either with his safety or humility, to have it recorded till now, when it is supposed He was dead. It is more largely recorded than any other of Christ's miracles, not only because many circumstances of it are so very instructive, and the miracle of itself so great a proof of Christ's mission, but because it was an earnest of the crowning proof of all—Christ's own resurrection.

Bethany was a village not far from Jerusalem, where Christ usually lodged, when He came up to the feasts. It is here called the town of Mary and Martha, the town where they dwelt, as Bethsaida is called the city of Andrew and Peter, ch. 1: 44. I see no reason to think, as some do, that Martha and Mary were owners of the town. Their brother was named Lazarus; his Hebrew name, probably, was Eleazar, which, being contracted, and a Greek termination put to it, is Lazarus. Perhaps, in prospect of this history, our Savior made use of the name Lazarus, Luke 16: 22. Martha and Mary seem to have been the housekeepers, while perhaps Lazarus lived a retired life, and gave himself to study and contemplation. Here was a happy, well-ordered family, that Christ was very much conversant in, where yet there was neither husband nor wife, (for aught that appears,) but the house kept by a brother, and his sisters, dwelling together in unity. One of the sisters is particularly described to be Mary which anointed the Lord with ointment, v. 2. Some think she was that woman that we read of, (Luke 7: 37, 38,) who had been a sinner. I rather think it refers to that anointing of Christ, which this evangelist

The message they sent was very short, not petitioning, much less prescribing or pressing, but barely relating the case with tender insinuation Lord, behold, he whom Thou lovest, is sick. Not he whom we love, but whom Thou lovest. Our greatest encouragements in prayer are fetched from God Himself and from his grace. They do not say, Lord, behold, he who loveth Thee but, he whom Thou lovest; for herein is love not that we loved God, but that He loved us. Our love to Him is not worth speaking of, but his to us can never be enough spoken of. Note (1.) There are some of the friends and followers of Jesus for whom He has a special kindness. Among the twelve there was one whom Jesus loved. (2.) It is no new thing for those whom Christ loves, to be sick; all things come alike to all; bodily distempers correct the corruption, and try the graces, of God's people. (3.) It is a great comfort to us when sick, to have those about us that will pray for us. (4.) We have great encouragement in our prayers for the sick, if we have ground to hope that they are as such as Christ loves; and we have reason to love and pray for those, whom we have reason to think Christ loves and cares for.

Christ prognosticated the event of the sickness, and probably sent it as a message to the sisters to support them while He delayed. Two things He prognosticates:

(1.) This sickness is not unto death; it proved fatal, and no doubt Lazarus was truly dead four days. But, [1.] That was not the errand on which this sickness was sent; it came not, as in a common case, to be a summons to the grave; there was a further intention in it. [2.] That was not the final effect. He died, and yet it might be said he did not die,—That is not said to be done, which is not done for a perpetuity. Death is an everlasting farewell to this world, the way whence we shall not return; in this sense it was not unto death. The grave was not his long home, his house of eternity. Thus Christ said of the maid whom He proposed to restore to life, She is not dead. The sickness of good people, how threatening soever, is not unto death, for it is not unto eternal death. The body's death to this world is the soul's birth into another; when we or our friends are sick, the hope of a recovery is our principal support, but in that we may be disappointed; therefore it is our wisdom to build upon that in which we cannot be disappointed; if they belong to Christ, let the worst come, they cannot be hurt of the second death, and then not much hurt of the first.

(2.) But it is for the glory of God, that an opportunity may be given for the manifesting of God's power. The afflictions of the saints are designed for the glory of God, that He may show them favor; for the sweetest, and most affecting mercies, are those occasioned by trouble. Let this reconcile us to the darkest dispensations; they are for the glory of God; and if God be glorified, we ought to be satisfied, Lev. 10: 3. As before, the man was born blind, that Christ might have the honor of curing him, (ch. 9: 3,) so Lazarus must be sick and die, that Christ may be glorified as the Lord of life, in raising him from the dead. Let this comfort those whom Christ loves under all their grievances, that the design of them all is, that the Son of God might be glorified thereby, his wisdom, power, and goodness glorified in supporting and relieving them; see 2 Cor. 12: 9, 10.

He deferred visiting his patient. They had pleaded, Lord, it is he whom Thou lovest, and the plea is allowed; (v. 5.) Jesus loved Martha, and her sister, and Lazarus: the claims of faith are ratified in heaven. One would think it should follow, When He heard therefore that he was sick, He made all haste to him. If He loved them, now was a time to show it. But He took the contrary way to show his love: it is not said, He loved them, and yet He lingered; but He loved them, and therefore He lingered; instead of coming post to him, He abode three days still in the same place where He was. He loved them, that is, had a great opinion of Martha and Mary, of their wisdom, grace, faith, and patience, above others of his disciples, and of the om 3. and the worst time is commonly the set time. When our hope is lost, we are cut off for our parts, then they shall know that I am the Lord, when I have opened the graves, Ezek. 37: 11, 13. In the depths of affliction, let this therefore keep us out of the depths of despair, that man's extremity is God's opportunity; Jehovah-jireh. Or it was a trial of the courage of the disciples, whether they would venture to follow Him thither, where they had so lately been frightened by an attempt on their Master's life, which they looked upon as an attempt on theirs. To go to Judea, was a saying that proved them. But Christ did not say, "Go ye into Judea, and I will take shelter here;" no, Let us go. Note, Christ never brings his people into any peril, but He accompanies them in it.

Master, the Jews of late sought to stone Thee, and goest Thou thither again? Christ's disciples are apt to make a greater matter of sufferings than their Master, and to remember injuries longer. He had put up the affront, it was forgotten, but his disciples could not forget it. Though it was at least two months ago, the remembrance of it was fresh in their minds. They marvel that He will go thither again. "Wilt Thou favor those with thy presence, that have expelled Thee out of their coats?" Christ's ways, in passing by offences, are above our ways. "Wilt Thou expose Thyself among a people so desperately enraged against Thee?" Goest Thou thither again, where Thou hast been so ill used? Here they showed great care for their Master's safety, as Peter did, when he said, Master, spare Thyself; Christ did not want friends to persuade Him to shift off suffering, but He had opened his mouth to the Lord, and would not go back. While the disciples show a concern for his safety, they discover distrust of his power; as if He could not secure fore deferred coming to them, that their trial might at last be found to praise and honor. He loved them, that is, designed to do something great for them, such as He had not wrought for any of his friends; and therefore delayed coming to them, that Lazarus might be buried before He came. If Christ had come and cured the sickness of Lazarus, He had done no more than He did for many; if He had raised him to life when newly dead, no more than He had done for some; but, deferring relief so long, He had an opportunity of doing more for him than for any. Note, God hath gracious intentions, even in seeming delays, Isa. 54: 7, 8. 49: 14, &c. Christ's friends at Bethany were not out of his thoughts, though He made no haste to them. When the work of deliverance, temporal or spiritual, public or personal, stands at a stay, it does but stay the time, and every thing is beautiful in its season.

The discourse He had with his disciples, when about to visit his friends at Bethany, makes out what Christ saith, I have called you friends.

His disciples were the men of his counsel, and to them He saith, (v. 7.) "Let us go into Judea again, though unworthy such a favor. Christ repeats the tenders of his mercy to those that have often rejected them. This may be considered a purpose of kindness to his friends at Bethany, whose affliction, and all the circumstances of it, He knew very well, though no more expresses were sent to Him; for He was present in spirit, though absent in body. When He knew they were brought to extremity, when the brother and sisters have given and taken a final farewell: 'Now,' saith He, 'let us go to Judea.' Christ will arise in favor of his people, when the time to favor them, yea, the set time is commonly the set time. When our hope is lost, Himself and them now in Judea, as He had done formerly. Is his arm waxen short? When solicitous for the interests of Christ's church, we must rest satisfied in the wisdom and power of the Lord Jesus, who knows how to secure a flock of sheep in the midst of wolves. They secretly feared suffering themselves: for they count upon that if He suffer. When our private interests run in the same channel with the public, we are apt to think ourselves zealous for the Lord of hosts, while really we are only zealous for our own wealth, credit, ease, and safety, under color of seeking the things of Christ; we have therefore need nicely to distinguish as to our principles.

Christ's answer to this objection: Are there not twelve hours in the day? An hour with the Jews was the twelfth part of the time between sun and sun; so some. Or, they lying much more south than we, their days were nearer twelve hours long than ours. The Divine Providence has given us daylight to work by, and lengthens it out to a competent time; and reckoning the year round, every country has just as much daylight as night, and so much more as the twilight's amount to. Man's life is a day, divided into ages, states, and opportunities; the consideration of this should make us not only very busy, as to the work of life, but also very easy as to the perils of life; our day shall be lengthened out till our work be done. This Christ applies to his case, and shows why He must go to Judea, because He had a clear call to go.

He shows the comfort and satisfaction a man has in his own mind, while he keeps in the way of duty, as it is in general prescribed by the Word of God, and particularly determined by his providence. If any man walk in the day, he stumbles not; that is, if a man keep close to his duty, and set the will of God before him as his rule, he does not hesitate in his own mind, but, walking uprightly, walks surely. As he that walks in the day, goes on steadily and cheerfully in his way, because he sees the light of this world, so a good man, without sinister aims, relies on the Word of God as his rule, and regards the glory of God as his end; thus he is furnished with a faithful guide in all his doubts, and a powerful guard in all his dangers, Gal. 6: 4. Ps. 119: 6. Christ, wherever He went, walked in the day, and so shall we, if we follow his steps.

He shows the pain and peril a man is in, who walks not according to this rule; (v. 10.) If a man walk in the night, he stumbles; that is, if a man walk in the way of his heart, and according to the course of this world, if he consult his own reasonings more than the will and glory of God, he falls into snares, is liable to uneasiness and apprehensions; while an upright man stands undaunted. See Isa. 33: 14-16. There is no light in him, for light in us is that to our moral actions, which light about us is to our

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-6. Those families, in which love and peace abound, are highly favored; but they whom Jesus loves, and by whom He is beloved, are most happy. Alas! that this should so very seldom be the case with every individual, even in small families, and still more rarely in large households! Yet even this privilege cannot exclude sickness and death. It may still be often said, "Lord, he whom Thou lovest is sick;" and they whom Thou lovest are mourning over the dying agonies, or the dead bodies of their relatives; for Jesus did not come to preserve his people from these afflictions; but to 'save them from their sins,' and 'from the wrath to come;' and to convert outward sorrows, and temporal death, into means of completing that salvation.—It behooves us, however, to seek to Him, in behalf of the sick and afflicted; and if they be true Christians, this will suggest the most encouraging plea in their behalf. But we must leave the event to his unerring wisdom. In one way or other, the sickness of those whom He loves will be 'for the glory of God,' and for their own good. We ought to be willing to live or die, to pass through any temporal suffering, or part with our dearest relatives, when his glory requires it: for that cannot be separated from the real, and enduring advantage of those whom He loves, any more than the glory of the Father can be separated from that of his Son. We cannot judge of his love to us by outward dispensations: 'his ways are not as our ways;' and He sees good to prove the faith of his people by afflictions and delays, when we should think it proper and almost indispensable for Him to hasten to their relief. (P. O. 13: 1-7.—Note, Is. 55: 8, 9.) We must therefore learn to 'walk by faith,' and to wait for Him in patience and hope, and fervent prayer. (Notes, Rom. 8: 24-27. Heb. 10: 35-39. 12: 1-3. Jam. 5: 7-11.)

NOTES.

CHAP. XI. v. 7, 8. 'The sentiments expressed by the apostles, on this and similar occasions, afford a clear proof that they were not persons of an over-easy credulity; or such as may, with any color of probability, be supposed to have been themselves deceived in the wonders they reported of our Lord. They seem rather to have deserved the reproach which, after his resurrection, He cast upon them, "fools, and slow of heart to believe." They appear to have believed nothing till the testimony of their own senses extorted the belief. They reasoned not from what they had once seen, to what might be; they built a probabilities of the future on the past. They formed no general belief concerning the extent of our Lord's power, from the effects of it they had already witnessed.'

I go, that I may awake him out of sleep. He could have done it, where He was; He that recovered at a distance one dying, (ch. 4: 50.) could have raised at a distance one dead; but He would put this honor upon the miracle, to work it by the grave-side. As sleep is a resemblance of death, so a man's waking out of sleep, especially when called by his own name, is an emblem of the resurrection; (Job. 14: 15.) Then shalt thou call. Christ had no sooner said, Our friend sleeps, but presently added, I go, that I may awake him. When Christ tells his people at any time how bad the case is, He lets them know in the same breath how easily He can mend it. Christ's telling his disciples that this was his business to Judea, might help to take off their fear of going with Him: He did not go on an errand to the temple, but on a private visit, which would not so much expose Him and them; and besides, it was to do a kindness to a family they were all obliged to.

They mistake his meaning; Lord, if he sleep, he shall do well. This speaks, [1.] Some concern for Lazarus; they hoped he would recover. Now that they heard he slept, they concluded the fever was gone, and the worst was past. Sleep is often nature's physic, and reviving to its weak and weary powers. This is true of the sleep of death; if a good Christian so sleep, he shall do well, better than he did here.

[2.] Yet it speaks a greater concern for themselves; for hereby they insinuate that it was now needless for Him to go to him. 'If he sleep, he will be quickly well, and we may stay where we are.' Thus we are willing to hope that that good work we are called to do, will do itself, or be done by some other hand, if there be peril in doing it.

Jesus spoke of his death. How dull of understanding Christ's disciples as yet were. Let us not therefore condemn all as heretics, who mistake the sense of some of Christ's sayings. It is not good to aggravate our brethren's mistakes; yet this was a gross one, for they should have remembered how frequently death is called a sleep in the Old Testament. They should have understood Christ when He spoke scripture-language. Besides, it would seem odd for their Master to undertake a journey of two or three days, only to awake a friend out of a natural sleep. What Christ undertakes to do, we may be sure, is something worthy of Himself. How carefully the evangelist corrects this error; Jesus spoke of his death. Those that speak in an unknown tongue, or use similitudes, should learn hence to explain themselves, and pray that they may interpret, to prevent mistakes.

natural actions. He has not a good principle within; his eye is evil. Thus Christ not only justifies his purpose of going into Judea, but encourages his disciples to go with Him. *

After He had prepared his disciples for this, he goes into an enemy's country. He gives them plain intelligence of the death of Lazarus, though He had received no advice of it. See here how Christ calls a believer his friend; our friend Lazarus. Note, 1. There is a covenant of friendship between Christ and believers, and a friendly affection, which our Lord Jesus will not be ashamed of. His secret is with the righteous. 2. Those whom Christ is pleased to own as his friends, all his disciples should take for theirs. Christ speaks of Lazarus as their common friend; Our friend. 3. Death itself does not break the bond of friendship between Christ and a believer. Lazarus is dead, and yet is still our friend. He calls the death of a believer a sleep; he sleepeth. It is good to call death by such names as will help to make it familiar and less formidable. The death of Lazarus was in a peculiar sense a sleep, as that of Jairus' daughter, because he was to be raised again speedily; and since we are sure to rise again at last, why should that make any difference? And why should not the hope of that resurrection make it as easy to us to put off the body and die, as to put off our clothes and sleep? A good Christian, when he dies, does not sleep; he rests from the labors of the day past, and is refreshing himself for the next morning. Sleep is only the parenthesis, but death is the period, of our cares and toils. The soul does not sleep, but becomes more active; but the body sleeps not disturbed nor disturbed. The grave to the wicked is a prison, its grave-clothes the shackles of a criminal reserved for execution; but to the godly it is a bed, and all its bands as the downy fetters of an easy sleep. Though the body corrupt, it will rise in the morning as if it had never seen corruption; it is but putting off our clothes to be mended for the marriage-day. See Isa. 57: 2. 1 Thess. 4: 14. The Greeks called their burying-places, dormitories.

What He had before said darkly. He now says plainly; Lazarus is dead. Christ takes cognizance of the death of his saints, for is precious in his sight, (Ps. 116: 15.) and He is not pleased if we do not consider it, and love it to heart. What a compassionate Teacher, Christ is; He condescends to those that are out of the way, and by his subsequent sayings and doings explains the difficulties of what went before.

He gives them the reason He had delayed so long to go and see him; I am glad for your sakes that I was not there. If He had been there, He would have prevented his death, which would have been much for the comfort of Lazarus' friends; but then his disciples would have seen no further proof of his power than what they had often seen, and their faith had received no improvement; but now that He went and raised Him from the dead, as there were many brought to believe on Him, so there was much done to perfect what was lacking in their own faith, which Christ aimed at; to the intent that ye may believe.

He resolves now to go to Bethany, with his disciples; Let us go unto him. Not, 'Let us go to his sisters, to comfort them,' (which is the utmost we can do,) but, 'Let us go to him; for Christ can show wonders to the dead.' Death which will separate us from all other friends, cannot separate us from the love of Christ, not put us out of his reach; as He will maintain his covenant with the dust, so He can make visits to the dust. Perhaps those who said, 'If he sleep, there is no need to go, we were ready to say, if he be dead, it is to no purpose to go.'

Thomas excited his fellow-disciples to attend; their Master's motions, Thomas, which is called Didymus. Thomas in Hebrew, and Didymus in Greek, signify a twain, Gen. 25: 24. The word for twins is Thomin; probably, Thomas was a twain; he said to his fellow-disciples, very courageously, Let us also go, that we may die with him. With him; that is,

[1.] With Lazarus; so some take it. Lazarus was a dear friend both to Christ and his disciples, and perhaps Thomas had a particular intimacy with him. Now if he be dead, saith he, let us even go and die with him. For, 1st. 'If we survive, we know not how to live without him.' Probably, Lazarus had sheltered them, and provided for them; and now that he was gone, they had no man like minded. Thus we are sometimes ready to think our lives bound up in some that were dear to us; but God will teach us to live, and to live comfortably, upon Himself, when those are gone; whom we thought we could not have lived without. But that is not all. 2dly. 'If we die, we hope to be happy with him.' Such a firm belief he has of a happiness on the other side death, and such good hope through grace of their own and Lazarus' interest in it. It is better to die, and go with Christian friends to that world which is enriched by their removal, than stay behind in a world that is impoverished by their departure. The more of our friends are translated hence, the fewer cords we have to bind us to this earth, and the more to draw our hearts heaven-ward. How pleasantly does the good man speak of dying, as if it were but going to bed. Or,

[2.] 'Let us go and die with our Master, who is now exposing Himself to death by venturing into Judea;' and so I rather think it is meant. 'If He will go into danger, let us also go and take our lot with Him, according to the command we received, Follow Me.' Thomas knew so much of the malice of the Jews, and the counsels of God concerning Him, which He had often told them of, that it was no foreign supposition that He was now going to die. The readiness of Thomas to die with Christ, flowed from strong affections to Him, though his faith was

(9, 10.) Walk. 'A metaphor borrowed from travelling, as Christ was about to proceed to Judea. Walking and journeying is the traveller's work, so that "walk" is in the application equivalent to "work".'

Verses 11-13.

'The use of the expression sleeping, may be considered as an instance of the friend's tenderness, as being least shocking when speaking of so dear a friend, and also of his modesty. He does not immediately say, "He is dead, and I go by my almighty power to burst the bonds of the sepulchre and command him back to life again;" but, avoiding all ostentation. He chooses the simplest and humblest expression that can be thought of.'

Doddridge, after BLACKWALL.

10 Then said ^b Thomas, which is called Didymus, unto his fellow-disciples, 'Let us also go, that we may die with him.'

[Practical Observations.]

17 ¶ Then when Jesus came, he found that he had ^alain in the grave ^afour days already.

18 Now Bethany was nigh unto Jerusalem, about ^afifteen furlongs off.

19 And many of the Jews: came to Martha and Mary, ^ato comfort them concerning their brother.

weak, as appeared afterward, ch. 14: 5. 20: 25. Where thou diest I will die, Ruth 1: 17. See his desire to help his fellow-disciples into the same frame; 'Let us go, and die with Him; if they stone Him, let them stone us; who would desire to survive such a Master?' Thus, in difficult times, Christians should animate one another. We may each of us say, Let us die with Him. Note, The consideration of the dying of the Lord Jesus should make us willing to die whenever God calls us.

V. 17-32. In this journey, the other evangelists record the healing of a blind man at Jericho, and the conversion of Zaccheus. We must not reckon ourselves out of the way, while in the way of doing good; nor be so intent on one good office as to neglect another.

Bethany is said to be about fifteen furlongs (two miles) from Jerusalem. Notice is taken of this, that this miracle was in effect wrought in Jerusalem, and so put to her score. Christ's miracles in Galilee were more numerous, but those in or near Jerusalem were more illustrious; there He healed one that had been diseased thirty-eight years, another that had been blind from his birth, and raised one that had been dead four days.

When He was last with his friends there, it is probable He left them well, in health and joy; but when we part from our friends, (though Christ knows,) we know not what changes may affect us before we meet again.

He found his friend Lazarus in the grave. When He came near the town, probably by the burying-place belonging to the town, He was told by some He met, that Lazarus had been four days buried. Some think Lazarus died the same day the messenger came to Jesus, and so reckon two days for his abode in the same place, and two days for his journey. I rather think he died at the very instant Jesus said, 'Our friend sleepeth; he is now newly fallen asleep;'

and that the time between his death and burial, (among the Jews but short,) with the four days of his lying in the grave, was taken up in this journey; for Christ travelled publicly, as appears by his passing through Jericho; and his abode at Zaccheus' house took up some time. Promised salvations, though sure, often come slowly.

He found his friends in grief. Martha and Mary were almost swallowed up with sorrow for the death of their brother, which is intimated where it is said, many came to comfort them. Note, (1.) Where death is, there are mourners, especially when those that were agreeable and amiable to their relations, and serviceable to their generation, are taken away. The house where death is, is called the house of mourning, Eccl. 7: 2. When man goes to his long home, the mourners go about the streets, (Eccl. 12: 5.) or rather sit alone, and keep silence. Here was Martha's house, a house where the fear of God was, and on which his blessing rested; yet a house of mourning. Grace will keep sorrow from the heart, (ch. 14: 1.) not from the house. (2.) Where there are mourners, there ought to be comforters. It is our duty to mourn with persons in sorrow, and comfort them; our mourning with them will be some comfort to them. When under present grief, we are apt to forget those things which would comfort us, and therefore have need of remembrancers. It is a mercy to have such when in sorrow, and our duty to be such to persons in sorrow. The Jewish doctors laid great stress on this, obliging their disciples to make conscience of comforting the mourners after the burial of the dead. They comforted them concerning their brother, by speaking to them of him, not only of the good name he left behind, but of his happy state.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 7-15. When we follow our Redeemer's example of diligence in the work of the Lord, we shall experience similar protection, as far as it is good for us. As long as the appointed but unknown days of our life continue, we may pursue our journey and attend to our duty, without fear of our enemies; but when that time is past, we must fall into the grave, and all our precautions will be unavailing. (Notes, Job 7: 1-6. 14: 13-15.)—While we therefore have opportunity, and the light of the Gospel is afforded us, let us endeavor 'to do good to all men;' and let us expect death as the end of our labors, and as the entrance of our souls into rest; nay, the quiet repose of our

When godly relations and friends are taken from us, whatever occasion we have to be afflicted concerning ourselves, who are left behind, and miss them, we have reason to be comforted concerning them who are gone, before us, to a happiness where they do not miss us.

This visit of the Jews to Martha and Mary is an evidence that they were persons of distinction; as also that the, behaved obligingly to all; so that though they were followers of Christ, yet those who had no respect for Him, were civil to them. There was also a providence in it, that so many Jews, Jewish ladies, it is probable, should come together, to comfort the mourners, that they might be unexceptionable witnesses of the miracle. Christ did not usually send for witnesses to his miracles, and yet if none were by but relations, it would have been excepted against; therefore God so ordered it, that those should come together accidentally, to bear their testimony to it, that infidelity might stop her mouth.

When Christ defers his visits for a time, they are thereby the more acceptable, much the more welcome. His departures endear his returns, and his absence teaches us how to value his presence.

Martha went and met Him, v. 20.

It would seem that Martha was earnestly expecting Christ's arrival. Either she had sent out messengers, to bring her tidings of his first approach, or she had often asked, Sao ye Him whom my soul loveth? So that the first who discovered Him, ran to her with the news. However it was, she heard of his coming before He was come. She had waited long, and could bear no tidings of Him; but He came at last.

Martha, when the good news was brought that Jesus was coming, threw all aside, and went and met Him, in token of a most affectionate welcome. She waived all ceremony with the Jews who came to visit her, and hastened to meet Jesus. Note, When God, by his grace or providence, is coming towards us in ways of mercy and comfort, we should go forth by faith, hope and prayer, to meet Him. Mary sat still in the house. Some think she did not hear the tidings, being in her withdrawing-room, receiving visits of condolence, while Martha, who was busied in the household affairs, had early notice of it.—Holy prudence conducts us to Christ while brethren and parents know not what we are doing. Others think that she did hear that Christ was come, but was so overwhelmed that she chose rather to sit poring upon her affliction, and saying, I do well to mourn. (Compare this story with Luke 10: 39, 39, &c.) We may observe the different tempers of these two sisters, and the temptations and advantages of each. Martha's natural temper was active and busy, she loved to be here and there, and at the end of every thing; and this had been a snare to her, when by it she was not only careful and cumbered about many things, but hindered from the exercises of devotion; but now, in a day of affliction, this active temper did her a kindness, bodies also, till Jesus shall awake them from sleep to participate our eternal recompense.—Let us remember, that even disciples are dull of apprehension; and that, while He orders every thing in suberviency to the increase of faith, He deems their transient distress a small matter, compared with the good of their souls, and the common benefit of his people. We should therefore be ready to suffer and die with Him, if called to it: but many have lively affections, and make confident resolutions, whose views are dark and erroneous, and who, like Thomas, are in no wise prepared for the day of trial. (Note, 20: 24-29, v. 24, 25.)

'Bethany being so nigh to Jerusalem, many of the relatives and friends of the family came, according to the Jewish custom, to mourn with the afflicted sisters. Mourning among the Jews lasted about thirty days; the first three days were termed days of weeping, then followed seven of lamentation. During the three days, the mourner did no servile work. During the seven days, he did no servile work except in private, lay with his bed on the floor, did not put on his sandals, did not wash nor anoint himself, had his head covered, and neither read in the law, the Mishnah, nor the Talmud. All the thirty days he continued unshaven, wore no white or new clothes, and did not seek up the rents which he had made in his garments. See Lightfoot.'

21 Then said Martha unto Jesus, Lord, if thou hadst been here, my brother had not died.

22 But I know, ^b that even now, whatsoever thou wilt ask of God, God will give it thee.

23 Jesus saith unto her, ^c Thy brother shall rise again.

24 Martha saith unto him, ^d I know that he shall rise again in the resurrection at the last day.

25 Jesus said unto her, ^e I am the Resurrection and ^f the Life: ^g he that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live; kept the grief from her heart, and made her forward to meet Christ, and so she received comfort from Him the sooner. On the other hand, Mary's natural temper was contemplative and reserved; this had been formerly an advantage to her, when it set her at Christ's feet, to hear his word, and enabled her there to attend upon Him, without those distractions which Martha was cumbered with: but now in the day of affliction, that same temper proved a snare to her, and made her less able to grapple with grief, and disposed her to melancholy; but Mary saith still in the house. See here how much it will be our wisdom carefully to watch against the temptations, and improve the advantages, of our natural temper.

Martha complains of Christ's long absence and delay. She said it, not only with grief for the death of her brother, but some resentment for the seeming unaddress of the Master; Lord, if Thou hadst been here, my brother had not died. Here is, 1. Some evidence of faith. She believed Christ's power; she believed his pity, that, if He had but seen Lazarus in his extreme illness, and his relations in tears about him, He would have prevented so sad a breach, for his compassions fail not. But, 2. Here are sad instances of unbelief. Her faith was true, but weak as a bruised reed, for she limits the power of Christ, in saying, If Thou hadst been here; whereas she ought to have known that Christ could cure at a distance, and that his gracious operations were not limited to his bodily presence. She reflects likewise upon the wisdom and kindness of Christ, that He did not hasten to them when they sent for Him, as if He had not timed his business well, and now might as well not have come at all, as to come too late; and as for any help now, she can scarcely entertain the thought of it.

Yet she corrects and comforts herself with the thoughts of the interest Christ had in heaven; for I know that even now, desperate as the case is, whatsoever Thou wilt ask of God, God will give it Thee. How willing her hope was.

Though she has not courage to ask of Jesus that He would raise him to life again, there having been no precedent as yet of any one raised to life that had been so long dead, yet, like a modest petitioner, she humbly recommends the case to the wise and compassionate consideration of Jesus. When we know not what in particular to ask or expect, let us refer ourselves to God, to do as seemeth Him good. I leave it to thy judgment, not to my presumption. When we know not what to pray for, it is our comfort that the great Intercessor knows what to ask for us, and is always heard. How weak her faith was. She should have said, 'Lord, Thou canst do whatsoever Thou wilt;' but she only says, 'Thou canst obtain whatever Thou prayest for;' she had forgotten that the Son has life in Himself, that He wrought miracles by his own power. Yet both these considerations must be taken for the encouragement of our faith and hope; the dominion Christ has on earth, and his interest and intercession in heaven. He has in the one hand the golden sceptre, and in the other the golden censer; his power always predominant, his intercession always prevalent.

Jesus saith unto her, Thy brother shall live again. We are apt to add to our trouble, by fancying what might have been. 'If such a method had been taken, such a physician employed, my friend had not died;' which is more than we know: but what good does this do, when God's will is done, and our business is to submit to Him? Christ directs Martha, and us in her, to look forward, and to think what shall be, for that is a certainty, and yields sure comfort; Thy brother shall rise again.

1st. This was true of Lazarus in a sense peculiar to him, he was presently to be raised; but Christ speaks of it in general as a thing to be done, not which He Himself would do, so humbly did our Lord Jesus speak of what He did. He also expresses it ambiguously, leaving her uncertain at first, whether He would raise him presently, or not till the last day, to try her faith and patience.

2dly. It is applicable to all the saints, and their resurrection. Note, It is matter of comfort to us, when we have buried our godly friends and relations, to think that they shall rise again. As the soul at death is not lost, but gone before, so the body is not lost, but laid up. Hear Christ saying, 'Thy parent, thy child, thy yoke-fellow, shall rise again; these dry bones shall live.' Observe

The faith Martha mixed with this word, and the unbelief mixed with this faith.

She accounted it a faithful saying, that he shall rise again at the last day. Though the doctrine of the resurrection was to have its full proof from Christ's resurrection, yet, as it was already revealed, she firmly believed it, Acts 24: 15. 1. There shall be a last day, with which all the days of time must be finished. 2. There shall be a general resurrection at that day; the ear: and sea shall give up their dead. 3. There shall be a particular resur- rection of each one. 'I know that I shall rise again, and this and the other relation that was dear to me.' As bone shall return to his bone in that day, so friend to his friend.

Yet she seems to think this saying not so worthy of all acceptance as really it was; 'I know he shall rise again at the last day; but what are we the better for that now?' As if the comforts of the resurrection to eternal life were not worth speaking of, or yielded no satisfaction sufficient to balance her affliction. See our weakness and folly, that we suffer present things to make a deeper impression upon us, both of grief and joy, than things which are the objects of faith. I know that he shall rise again at the last day; and is not that enough? By discontent under present crosses, we greatly undervalue our future hopes. See

The further instruction and encouragement Christ gave her; for He will not quench the smoking flax, nor break the bruised reed. I am the Resurrection and the Life. Two things Christ inspires her with the belief of, in reference to the present distress; our faith should fasten upon them in the like cases.

1st. The power of Christ; I am the Resurrection, and the Life, the Fountain of life, the Author of the resurrection. Martha believed that, at his prayer, God would give any thing, but He would have her know, that by his word He could work any thing. Martha believed a resurrection at the last day, Christ tells her that He had that power in his own hand, that the dead were to hear his voice, (ch. 5: 25.) whence it was easy to infer, He that could raise a world of men that had been dead many ages, could doubtless raise one that had been dead four days. Note, It is an unspeakable comfort to Christians, that Christ is the Resurrection and the Life, and will be so to them. We look for the resurrection of the dead, and the life of the world to come, and Christ is both; the author and principle of both, and ground of our hope of both.

2dly. The promises of the new covenant give us further ground of hope that we shall live. Observe,

These promises are made to them that believe in Christ, to them that consent to, and confide in Him, as the only Mediator between God and man; that receive the record God has given of his Son, and answer all the intentions of it. The condition of the latter promise is thus expressed, Whosoever liveth, and believeth in Me; which may be understood, Whosoever lives in this world, whether Jew or Gentile, wherever he lives. Yet it limits the time; whoever, during life, while in this state of probation, believes in Me, shall be happy in Me, but after death it will be too late. Whoever lives and believes, lives by faith, (Gal. 2: 20.) has a faith that influences his conversation. Or, He that lives and believes, is he that by faith is born again, to whom to live is Christ—that makes Christ the life of his soul.

The promises are, (v. 25.) Though he die, yet shall he live, nay, (v. 26.) he shall never die. Man consists of body and soul, and provision is made for the happiness of both.

(1.) For the body, here is the promise of a blessed resurrection. Though the body be dead because of sin, (there is no remedy but it will die,) yet it shall live again, though he were dead. All the difficulties that attend the state of the dead, are here made nothing of. Though the sentence of death was just, though its effects be dismal, its hands strong, though he be dead and buried, though the scattered dust be so mixed with common dust, that no art of man can distinguish, much less separate them, yet we are sure that the body shall be raised a glorious body.

(2.) For the soul, here is the promise of a blessed immortality. He that liveth and believeth, who, being united to Christ by faith, lives spiritually, shall never die. That spiritual life shall never be extinguished, but perfected in had for so many ages waited for ^a future, she embraced ^a present.

She inferred hence, that if she admits that Jesus is the Christ, there is no difficulty in believing that He is the Resurrection and the Life; for, (1.) He is the Fountain of light and truth, and we may take all his sayings for faithful and divine, upon his own word. If He be the Christ, He is that Prophet whom we are to hear in all things. (2.) He is the Fountain of life and blessedness, and we may therefore depend upon his ability as well as upon eternal life. As the soul, being in its nature spiritual, is therefore immortal; so, if by faith it live a spiritual life, its fecundity shall be immortal. It shall never die, shall never be otherwise than easy and happy, and there is not any intermission, or interruption of its life, as of the life of the body. The mortality of the body shall at length be scallop'd up of life; but the life of the soul shall be immediately at death swallowed up of immortality. He shall not die forever. The body shall not be forever in the grave; it dies (like the two witnesses) but for a time, times, and the dividing of time; and when time shall be no more, a spirit of life from God shall enter into it. But that is not all; the soul shall not die eternally. Blessed and holy, that is, Blessed and happy, is he, that by faith has part in the first resurrection, in Christ, who is that Resurrection; for on such the second death shall have no power; see ch. 6:40.

Christ asks her, 'Believest thou this? Canst thou take my word for it?' Note, When we have read or heard the Word of Christ concerning the great things of the other world, we should seriously put it to ourselves, 'Do we believe this, attended with so many difficulties, this which is suited to my case? Does my belief of it realize it to me, and give my soul an assurance of it, so that I can say, not only this I believe, but thus I believe it?' Martha was doing upon her brother's being raised to life in this world; before Christ gave her hopes of that, He directed her thoughts to another life; 'No matter for that, but believest thou this that I tell thee concerning the future state?' The crosses and comforts of this present time would not make that impression upon us they do, did we but believe the things of eternity.

We have here Martha's creed, the good confession she witnessed, the same for which Peter was commended, Matt. 16: 17.

The guide of her faith, is the word of Christ; without any alteration, exception, or proviso, she takes it entire as Christ had said it. Faith is an echo to divine revelation; Yea, Lord. As the word did make it, so I believe and take it, said queen Elisabeth.

The ground of her faith, is the authority of Christ; she believes this, because He who saith it, is Christ. She has recourse to the foundation for the support of the superstructure. 'I have believed that Thou art Christ, and therefore I believe this.'

She believed, concerning Jesus, three things; (1.) That He was the Christ. (2.) That He was the Son of God; so the Messiah was called, (Ps. 2: 7.) not by office only, but by nature. (3.) That it was He which should come into the world; that Blessing of blessings the church his veracity. How shall bodies, turned to dust, live again? How shall souls, clogg'd and clouded as ours are, live forever? We could not believe this, but that we believe Him, that undertakes it, to be the Son of God, who has life in Himself, and for us.

When she had so said, she went her way, easy in mind, and called Mary her sister. Having received instruction and comfort from Christ herself, she called her sister to share with her. Time was, when Martha would have drawn Mary from Christ, to help her in much serving t (Luke 10: 40,) but, to make amends, here she is industrious to draw her to Christ. She called her secretly, because there were Jews by, who were no friends to Christ. The saints are called into the fellowship of Christ, by an invitation secret and distinguishing; they have meat to eat that the world knows not of, joy that a stranger does not intermeddle with. She called her by order from Christ; He bid her go call her sister. Christ sends the call that is effectual, whoever brings it. The Master is come, and calleth for thee. She calls Christ the Master; a teaching Master; by that title He was commonly known among them. She triumphs in his arrival; He whom we have long wished for, is come; this was the best cordial in the present distress. 'Lazarus, and our comfort in him, is gone; but the Master is come, who is better, and will abundantly make up all our losses. He is come, our Teacher, who will teach us how to get good by our sorrow, (Ps. 94: 12.) who will teach, and so comfort.' She invites her sister to go and meet Him; 'He calls for thee.' Note, When Christ, our Master, comes, He calls for us. He comes in his Word and ordinances, and calls us to them, by them to Himself. He calls for thee in particular, by name, Ps. 27: 8. And if He call thee, He will cure, He will comfort thee.

She arose quickly, and came to Him. She little thought how near He was to her, for He is often nearer to them that mourn in Zion than they are aware of; but when she knew how near He was, in a transport of joy, she runs to meet Him; the least intimation of Christ's approaches, is enough to a lively faith, which stands ready to answer the first call. When Christ was come, forgetting ceremony, and the common usage in cases of mourning, she runs through the town, to meet Christ. Let not punctilios of decency and honor deprive us at any time of opportunities of conversing with Christ. She did not consult the Jews, that were with her, comforting her; she left them all, to come to Him.

The Master was not yet come to Bethany, but was at the place where Martha met Him. See here, 1st. Christ's love to his work; He staid near the place where the grave was, that He might be ready to go to it; and would not refresh Himself till He had done the work He came to do; nor would He go into the town, lest it should look like a design to levy a crowd to be spectators of the miracle. 2dly. Mary still loved much. Though Christ had seem'd

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 17-27. Natural humanity may induce men to sympathize with the afflicted; and divine grace will always lead us to do so: yet our compassions and our endeavors are feeble, and generally unavailing; (Note, 14: 27, 28.) but, however the Lord may prove his people, by delaying to appear for their relief, He is their only effectual Comforter, and they will leave friends, to pour out their complaints before Him.—How seldom have we adequate views of his power and love, and suitable expectations of help from Him! How constantly is our faith counteracted by unbelief!—We are assured, that our deceased relatives shall 'rise again at the resurrection at the last day,' and that all believers shall then appear with Jesus in glory; yet this assurance, comfortable as it is, cannot wholly allay our anguish for the loss of those, who were a daily blessing to us. But we should by no means 'sorrow without hope, for those who sleep in Him;' neither should we look forward to death with dismay; for our Friend, who gave Himself for us, is 'the Resurrection and the Life;' and death is a conquered enemy, or rather converted into a friend to every believer. (Notes, 1 Cor. 3: 18-23, v. 22, 15: 55-58. Phil. 1: 21-26, 1 Thes. 4: 13-18. P. O. 9-18.) Our pious friends, whose bodies now sleep in the grave, live in heaven; and they, who are alive and remain, shall never die; for Jesus 'hath abolished death, and hath brought life and immortality to light by the Gospel.' (Notes, 2 Tim. 1: 10. Heb. 2: 14, 15.)—Do we indeed believe this? And are we debilitated by the troubles of life, and the prospect of the grave? Lord, pardon our unbelief, 'increase our faith,' help us assuredly to hope in Thee as 'the Christ, the Son of God,' who 'came into the world to save sinners,' by dying on the cross; and 'to those that wait for Thee Thou wilt appear the second time without sin unto salvation.' (Note, Heb. 9: 27, 28.)

SCOTT.

Verse 31.

'It appears that it was the custom of the nearest relatives of the deceased to go at times, during the three days of weeping, to turn near the graves of the deceased. They supposed that the spirit hovered about the place where the body was laid, for three days, to see whether it might be permitted again to enter; but when it saw the face change, it knew that all hope was now past. It was on this ground that the seven days of lamentation succeeded the three days of weeping, because all hope was now taken away. They had traditions, that in the course of three days, persons who had died were 'raise to life again.'

32 Then when Mary was come where Jesus was, and saw him, she fell down at his feet, saying unto him, Lord, if thou hadst been here, my brother had not died.

33 When Jesus therefore saw her weeping, and the Jews also weeping which came with her, he groaned in the spirit, and * was troubled, 34 And said, * Where have ye laid him? They said unto him, Lord, come and see.

Mary came attended with her train of comforters, fell down at his feet, overwhelmed with sorrow, and said with many tears, (as appears, v. 33.) Lord, if Thou hadst been here, my brother had not died, as Martha said before, for they had often said it to one another.

Her posture is humble and submissive; She fell down at his feet, which was more than Martha did, who had a greater command of her passions. She fell down as a sinking mourner, but at his feet as a humble petitioner. This Mary had sitted at Christ's feet to hear his word, (Luke 10: 39.) and now we find her there on another errand. Note, Those that in a day of peace set themselves at Christ's feet, to receive instructions, may with comfort and confidence in a day of trouble cast themselves at his feet, to find favor with Him. She fell at his feet, as submitting to his will, and referring herself to his good will in what was now to be done. When in affliction, we must cast ourselves at Christ's feet in penitent sorrow, and self-abasement for sin, and resignation of ourselves to the divine conduct. Mary's casting herself at Christ's feet, was in token of the veneration she had for Him. Thus they were wont to honor kings and princes; but our Lord not appearing in secular glory, they who by this posture honored Him, certainly looked upon Him as more than man, and intended hereby to give Him divine honor. Mary hereby made profession of the Christian faith, as truly as Martha, and in effect said, I believe that Thou art the Christ; bowing the knee to Christ, and confessing Him with the tongue, are equivalent, Rom. 14: 11. Phil. 2: 10, 11. This she did in presence of the Jews, (who, though friends to her and her family, yet were bitter enemies to Christ;) neither ashamed to own the veneration she had for Christ, nor afraid of disobliging her neighbors by it. Let their resent it as they pleased; if this be to be vile, she will be yet more vile; see Jan. 8: 1. We serve a Master whom we have no reason to be ashamed of, and whose acceptance of our services balances the reproach of men.

Her address is very pathetic; Lord, if Thou hadst been here, my brother had not died. Christ's delay was designed for the best, and proved so; yet both the sisters in effect charge Him with the death of their brother. He might have told them He had something else to do than to be at their beck; He must come when his business would permit Him: but not a word of this; He considered the circumstances of their affliction, and that losers think they have leave to speak; and therefore overlooked the rudeness, and gave us an example of mildness in such cases. Mary added no more, as Martha did; but it appears by what follows, that what she fell short in words, she made up in tears; she said less than Martha, but wept more; and tears of devout affection have a loud, prevailing voice, in the ears of Christ: no rhetoric like that.

V. 33-34. Christ had a tender sympathy with his afflicted friends.

Jesus said, Mary weeping for the loss of a brother, and the Jews that came with her weeping for the loss of a friend; when He saw this, He groaned in spirit, and was troubled.

The griefs of the sons of men are represented in the tears of Mary and her friends. What an emblem of this vale of tears! Nature teaches us to weep over relations, removed by death; Providence thereby calls to weeping and mourning. Religion teaches us to weep with them that weep, as those Jews with Mary, considering that we ourselves also are in the body. They that truly love their friends, will share with them in their joys and griefs; for what is friendship, but a communication of affections? Job. 16: 5.

In all their afflictions Christ is afflicted, Isa. 63: 9. Judg. 10: 16. When He saw them all in tears, He groaned in the spirit. He suffered Himself to be troubled, (as we are when disturbed by great affliction,) yet without sin. This unkind in his delays, she can take nothing amiss from Him. Let us go thus to Christ without the camp, Heb. 13: 13.

The Jews that were with Mary, said, She goes to the grave, to weep there. Martha bore up better under this affliction than Mary, who was a woman of a tender and sorrowful spirit. Those that are so, have need to watch against melancholy, and ought to be pitied and helped. Those comforters found that their formalities did her no service, but that she hardened herself in sorrow; and therefore concluded, that she went out, to go to the grave, and weep there. The folly and fault of mourners often is, they contrive how to aggravate their grief. We are apt in such cases to take a strange pleasure in our pain, and say, We do well to be passionate in our grief, even unto death; we are apt to fasten upon those things that aggravate the affliction; what good does it do us, when it is our duty to reconcile ourselves to the will of God? Why should mourners go to the grave, to weep there, when they sorrow not as those that have no hope? Affliction of itself is grievous; why make it more so? The wisdom and duty of comforters, is, to prevent as much as may be, in those who grieve inordinately, the revival of the sorrow, and to divert it. Those Jews that followed Mary, were thereby led to Christ, and became witnesses of one of his most glorious miracles. It is good cleaving to Christ's friends we may come to know Him better.

V. 33-34. Christ had a tender sympathy with his afflicted friends.

Jesus said, Mary weeping for the loss of a brother, and the Jews that came with her weeping for the loss of a friend; when He saw this, He groaned in spirit, and was troubled.

The griefs of the sons of men are represented in the tears of Mary and her friends. What an emblem of this vale of tears! Nature teaches us to weep over relations, removed by death; Providence thereby calls to weeping and mourning. Religion teaches us to weep with them that weep, as those Jews with Mary, considering that we ourselves also are in the body. They that truly love their friends, will share with them in their joys and griefs; for what is friendship, but a communication of affections? Job. 16: 5.

In all their afflictions Christ is afflicted, Isa. 63: 9. Judg. 10: 16. When He saw them all in tears, He groaned in the spirit. He suffered Himself to be troubled, (as we are when disturbed by great affliction,) yet without sin. This was an expression, either, 1st. Of his displeasure at the inordinate grief of those about Him, as Mark 5: 39. 'Why make ye this ado, and weep? Does this become those that believe a God, a heaven, and another world?' Or, 2dly. Of his deep sense of the calamitous state of human life, and the power of death; being now to make a vigorous attack upon death and the grave, He thus stirred up Himself to the encounter, put on the garments of vengeance, and his fury it upheld Him; and that He might the more resolutely redress our grievances, and cure our griefs, He was pleased to make Himself sensible of the weight of them. Or, 3dly. It was an expression of his sympathy with his friends in sorrow. Here were the sounding of the bowels, and the mercies, which the afflicted church so earnestly solicits, Isa. 63: 15. Christ not only seemed concerned, but groaned in the spirit; He was inwardly and sincerely affected. David's pretended friends counterfeited sympathy, to disguise their enmity; (Ps. 41: 6.) but we must learn of Christ o have our love and sympathy without dissimulation. Christ's was a deep and hearty sigh. He was troubled. He troubled Himself; so the phrase is. He had all the passions and affections of human nature, for in all things He must be like to his brethren, but He had a perfect command of them, so that they were never up, but when and as they were called; He was never troubled, but when He troubled Himself; He often composed Himself to trouble, but was never discomposed; He was voluntary both in his passion and in his compassion.

His concern for them appeared by his inquiry after the remains of his deceased friend; (v. 34.) Where have ye laid him? He knew where he was laid, and yet asks, because, (1.) He would thus express Himself as a man, even when He was going to exert the power of a God. Being found in fashion as a man, He accommodates Himself to the manner of the sons of men; He is not ignorant, but makes as if He were, saith Austin. He inquired where the grave was, lest, if He had gone to it of his own knowledge, the Jews should take occasion to suspect a collusion between Him and Lazarus, and a trick in the case. He would thus divert the grief of his friends, by raising their expectations of something great; as if He had said, 'I did not come hither with an address of condolence; I have other work to do; let us adjourn to the grave.' Note, A serious address to our work is the best remedy against inordinate grief. He would hereby intimate to us the special care He takes of the bodies of the saints; He takes notice where they are laid; there is not only a covenant with the dust, but a guard upon it.

Those about Him did not tell Him where the body was buried, but led Him directly to the grave, that his eye might yet more affect his heart. As He was going to the grave, as if following the corpse, Jesus wept, v. 35. A very short verse, but it affords many useful instructions. (1.) That Christ was really and truly Man, and partook not only of flesh and blood, but a human soul susceptible of joy, grief, and other affections. Christ gave the proof of his humanity, in both senses of the word; that, as a man, He could weep, and, as a merciful man, He would weep, before He gave this proof of his divinity. (2.) He was a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief, Isa. 53: 2. We never read that He laughed, but more than once we read He was in tears. Thus He shows not only that a mournful state will consist with the love of God, but they who sow to the Spirit, must sow in tears. (3.) Tears of compassion well become Christians, and make them resemble Christ. It is a relief to those who are in sorrow, to have their friends sympathize with them, especially such a friend as the Lord Jesus.

Some made a kind and candid interpretation of Christ's weeping. Then said the Jews, Behold how He loved him! They seem to wonder that H. should have so strong an affection for one to whom He was not related, and with whom He had not had a long acquaintance, for Christ spent most of his time in Galilee, a great way from Lazarus. It becomes us, according to this example, to show our love to our friends, living and dying. We must sorrow for our brethren that sleep in Jesus, full of love, though not void of hope; as the devout men that buried Stephen, Acts 8: 2. Though our tears profit not the dead, they embalm their memory. These tears were indications of his particular love to Lazarus, but He has given proofs no less evident of his love to all the saints, in that He died for them. When He only dropped a tear over Lazarus, they said, See how He loved him! Much more reason have we to say so, for whom He hath laid down his life; See how He loved us. Greater love has no man than this.

Others made a peevish reflection, as if these tears bespoke his inability to help his friend; (p. 37.) Could not this Man, that opened the eyes of the blind, have prevented the death of Lazarus? Here it is insinuated, 1st. That the death of Lazarus being, (as it seemed by his tears,) a great grief to Him, if He could have prevented it He would, and therefore because He did not, they incline to think that He could not, as when He was dying, they concluded that He could not, because He did not, come down from the cross; not considering that divine power is always directed by divine wisdom, not merely according to his will, but according to the counsel of his will. If Christ's friends, whom He loves, die; if his church, whom He loves, be persecuted and afflicted; we must not impute it to any defect, either in his power or love, but conclude that it is because He sees it for the best. 2dly. Therefore it might justly be questioned, whether He did indeed open the eyes of the blind. His not working this miracle, they thought enough to invalidate the former; at least, it would seem that He had limited power, and therefore not divine. Christ soon convinced them that He could have prevented his death, but did not, because He would glorify Himself the more.

Christ repeats his groans, upon coming near the grave: (p. 38.) Agnin groaning in Himself, He comes to the grave; He groaned, (1.) Being displeased at the unbelief of those, who spake doubtfully of his power, and blamed Him for not preventing the death of Lazarus; He was grieved for the hardness of their hearts. He never groaned so much for his own sufferings as for the sins and follies of men, particularly Jerusalem's, Matt. 23: 37. (2.) Being affected with the fresh lamentations, which, it is likely, the sisters made, when they came near the grave; his tender spirits were sensibly touched with their wailings. (3.) Some think that He groaned in spirit, because, to gratify the desire of his friends, He was to bring Lazarus again into this troublesome world, from the rest into which he was entered; it would be a kindness to Martha and Mary, but it would be like thrusting one out to a stormy sea, who was newly got into a safe and quiet harbor. If Lazarus had been left alone, Christ would quickly have gone to him into the other world; but, being restored to life, Christ quickly left him behind in this world. (4.) Christ groaned, as affected with the calamitous state of human nature, subject to death from which He was now about to redeem Lazarus. Thus He stirred up Himself to take hold on God in prayer, that He might offer it up with strong crying, Heb. 5: 7. Ministers, when sent by the preaching of the Gospel to raise dead souls, should be much affected with the condition of those they preach to, and pray for, and groan in themselves to think of it.

The grave was a cave, and a stone lay upon it. The graves of the common people, probably, were digged as ours are; but persons of distinction were, as with us, interred in vaults; so Lazarus was, and such was the sepulchre in which Christ was buried. Probably, this was in imitation of the patriarchs, who buried their dead in the cave of Machpelah, Gen. 23: 19. This care taken of the bodies of their friends, intimates their expectation of their resurrection; they reckoned the solemnity of the funeral ended, when the stone was rolled to the grave, or, as here, laid upon it, like that on the mouth of the den into which Daniel was cast, (Dan. 6: 17,) that the purpose might not be changed; intimating that the dead are separated from the living, and gone the way whence they shall not return. This stone was probably a grave-stone, with an inscription upon it.

Take ye away the stone. He would have this stone removed, that all the standers-by might see the body dead, and that way might be made for its coming out, and it might appear to be a true body, and not a spectre. He would have some of the servants remove it, that they might be witnesses that it was truly dead. It is a good step toward the raising of a soul to life when the stone is taken away, when prejudices are removed, and way made for the Word to the heart, that it may do its work there, and say what it has to say.

Martha objected to the opening of the grave; Lord, by this time he is become noisome, for he has been dead four days, he is four days old in the other world.

It is easy from hence to observe the nature of human bodies; four days is but a little while, yet what a change will that make with the body of man, if he be but so long without food, much more if so long without life! Dead bodies, (saith Dr. Hammond,) after a revolution of the humors, which is completed in seventy-two hours, naturally putrefy; and the Jews say, that by the fourth day after death, the body is so altered, that one cannot be sure it is such a person. Christ rose the third day, because He was not to see corruption.

It is not so easy to say what was Martha's design in saying this. Some think that she said it in tenderness, such as decency teaches to the dead body; she did not care it should be thus publicly shown. Others think she said lest the smell of the dead body should be offensive to Christ. That which is very noisome, as compared to an open sepulchre, Ps. 5: 9. It would seem by Christ's answer, that it was the language of her unbelief and distrust; 'Lord, it is too late to attempt any kindness to him.' She gives up his case as hopeless, there having been no instances, either of late or formerly, of any raised to life after they had begun to see corruption. When our bones are dried, we are ready to say, Our hope is lost. Yet this distrustful word of hers, served to make the miracle the more evident and the more illustrious; by this it appeared that he was truly dead, and not in a trance. Her suggesting that it could not be done, puts the more honor on Him that did it.

Said I not unto thee, that if thou wouldest believe thou shouldst see the glory of God? It is probable that He said this to her, when she had said, (p. 27.) Lord, I believe, and it is enough that it is recorded here, where it is repeated. Note, (1.) Our Lord has given us all the assurance imaginable, that a sincere faith shall at length be crowned with a blessed vision; 'If thou believe, thou shalt see God's glorious appearances for thee in this world, and in thee in the other world.' If we will rely on Christ's power and faithfulness, we shall see the glory of God, and be happy in the sight. (2.) We have need to be often reminded of these sure mercies with which our Lord hath encouraged us. Christ does not give a direct answer to what Martha had said, nor any particular promise of what He would do, but orders her to keep hold of the general assurances He had already given; On thy believe. We are apt to forget what Christ has spoken, and need Him to put us in mind of it by his Spirit.

Then they took away the stone; Martha was satisfied, and had waived her objection. If we will see the glory of God, we must let Christ take his own way, and not prescribe, but subscribe, to Him. They took away the stone, and that was all they could do; Christ only could give life. What man can do is but to prepare the way of the Lord, to fill the valleys, and level the hills, and, as here, to take away the stone.

The spectators, invited by the rolling away of the stone, gathered about the grave, not to commit dust to dust, but to receive dust from the dust; and their expectations being raised, our Lord Jesus addresses Himself to his work.

He applies Himself to his living Father in heaven, ch. 6: 57.

The gesture He used was very significant; He lifted up his eyes, an outward expression of the elevation of his mind; and to show them who stood by from whence He derived his power; also to set us an example; this outward sign is hereby recommended to our practice, see ch. 17: 1. That which is especially charged upon us hereby, is, to lift up our hearts to God: what is prayer, but the assent of the soul to God, and the directing of its affections heavenward? He lifted up his eyes, as looking beyond the grave, and overlooking the difficulties that arose thence, to teach us to do as Abraham, who considered not his own body now dead, and so gained such a degree of faith, as not to stagger at the promise, Rom. 4: 20.

His address to God was with great assurance; Father, I thank Thee that Thou hast heard Me. He has here taught us, [1.] In prayer to call God Father, and to draw nigh to Him as children to a father, with humble reverence, and yet with holy boldness. [2.] In our prayers to praise Him, and, when we come to beg for further mercy, thankfully to acknowledge former favors. Thanksgivings, which speak God's glory, not our own, like the Pharisee's God, I thank Thee, are decent forms into which to put supplications.

Our Savior's thanksgiving here was intended to express his unshaken assurance of effecting this miracle, in concurrence with his Father;

38 Jesus therefore again 'groaning in himself cometh to the grave.' It was a cave, and a stone lay upon it.

39 Jesus said, Take ye away the stone. Martha, the sister of him that was dead, saith unto him, 'Lord, by this time he stinketh: for he hath been dead four days.'

40 Jesus saith unto her, 'said I not unto thee, that, if thou wouldest believe, thou shouldest see the glory of God?'

[Practical Observations.]

41 Then they took away the stone from the place where the dead was laid. And Jesus lifted up his eyes, and said, 'Father, I thank thee that thou hast heard me.'

with early thanksgivings. As God answers us with mercy, even before we call, and hears while we are yet speaking, so we should answer Him with praise, even before He grants, and give Him thanks while He is yet speaking comfortable words.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 28-40. When Jesus displays his presence to us, as He does not to the world, we should confer with our fellow-Christians on the encouragement given us, that we may be 'helpers of their joy': and when He calls us to his ordinances, or his throne of grace, we must not permit company to detain us. But we should be careful not to limit our faith and hope, by the measures of those with whom we converse; lest we impede instead of furthering, each other's 'growth in grace.'—Our Redeemer was 'a man of sorrows.' In this world of affliction, He conformed Himself to the situation; we do not read that He ever laughed; but 'He groaned,' 'He troubled Himself,' 'He wept.' That sensibility, by which many are elated in self-complacency, and self-preference, while they weep for fictitious distress, but are callous to real woe, He never sanctioned. But He wept with the afflicted; and thus both encouraged mourners to trust in Him, and expect comfort from Him; and set us an example to withdraw from scenes of mirth, that we may sympathize with the distressed, (Note, Ec. 7:2-6.) Yet proud and prejudiced unbelievers call far more for our compassion and deep concern, than the most afflicted servants of our God. (Notes, Ps. 119:136. Jer. 9:1, 2, 13:15-17. Luke 19:41-44. Rom. 9:1-3.)—It is indeed grievous to

He professes his cheerful assurance of a ready answer at any time, (v. 42.) And I knew that Thou hearest Me always. Let none think that this was some favor, such as He ever had before, nor should ever have again; H. had the same divine power with Him in his hole undertaking. 'I gave thanks,' saith He, 'for hearing heard in this, because I am sure to be heard in every thing.' See here, (1.) The interest our Lord had in heaven; the Father heard Him always. He had access to the Father upon every occasion, and success with Him in every errand. And we may be sure that his interest is not the less for his going to heaven; which may encourage us to depend upon his intercession, and put all our petitions into his hand, for we are sure that Him the Father hears always. (2.) The confidence He had of that interest; I knew it. He did not in the least doubt concerning it, but had an entire satisfaction in his own mind of the Father's concurrence with Him in every thing. We cannot have such a particular assurance as He had; but this we know, that whatsoever we ask according to his will, He heareth us, 1 John 5:14, 15.

But why should Christ give this public intimation of his obtaining this miracle by prayer? He adds, It is because of the people which stand by, that they may believe that Thou hast sent Me; for prayer may preach.

It was to obviate the objections of his enemies. It was blasphemously suggested by the Pharisees, that He wrought his miracles by compact with the devil; now, to evidence the contrary, He openly made his address to God, using prayers, and not charms, not peeping and muttering, as they did, that used familiar spirits, (Isa. 8:19.) but with elevated eyes and voice professing his dependence on Heaven.

It was to corroborate the faith of those that were well inclined to Him; that they may believe that Thou hast sent Me, not to destroy men's lives, but to save them. Moses, to show that God sent him, made the earth open and swallow men up; (Num. 16:29, 30.) Elijah, to show that God sent him, made fire come from heaven, hear men pertinaciously dispute against those truths, by the belief of which alone they can be saved from everlasting misery; and to see the world full of sin and woe, and men rejecting the only remedy with obstinate contempt.—The Lord, however, proceeds with his gracious plan, notwithstanding the perverseness of mankind: and those who believe and obey his Word, shall experience the displays and efficacy of his power. But, while we expect help from Him alone, we must not neglect the means which He has instituted, or refuse to follow his directions to the best of our ability. The sinner cannot quicken his own soul; but he ought to use the means of grace: the believer cannot sanctify himself; but he ought to 'lay aside every weight'; we cannot convert our children, relatives, neighbors, or congregations; but we should instruct, and exhort them; and exhibit before them an edifying and conciliating example: seeking a blessing by fervent and persevering prayer. (Note, Ez. 37:1-10. P. 9:1-14.) We may remove the stone, or loose the grave-clothes, though we cannot raise the dead: and if we would have the Lord do for us and ours, what man cannot do; we must diligently attend to all those things, which we can and ought to do. Verse 33.

It was a cave, and a stone lay upon it. 1. 'From this we learn the form of the Jewish sepulchres, which consisted of subterranean caves hewn out in the rock, or (as in so rocky and cavernous a country as Judea) shaped into proper form, with a foramen, closed with a huge stone, instead of a door. This stone was called gelo, the roller. The corpses were placed in repositories hollowed out on the sides of the cave. Such were the hypogæa of the Greeks, and the cryptæ of the Romans and the middle ages. It appears that the bodies were here deposited naked, just as the embalmers had left them, except that they were wrapt in rolls of linen cloth. At least, there is here no mention made of a sarcophagus or coffin. So even in Italy, hypogæa or cryptæ of this sort are formed under the floors of the churches, into which the corpses are lowered, wrapt only in linen. The particle rendered 'upon,' should be rendered at, against; for the Jewish tomb opened on the side; (as is seen in the cut, (given in Nicolai,) representing the grave of Lazarus.) BLOOMFIELD.

63.) and now He gives a specimen of it. By his Word, He saith to souls, Live, Ezek. 15: 6. Arise from the dead, Eph. 5: 14. The Spirit of life from God entered into dry bones, when Ezekiel prophesied over them, Ezek. 37: 10. They who infer from the commands of the Word, to turn and live, that man has a power of his own to convert and regenerate himself, might as well infer from this call to Lazarus, that he had a power to raise himself to life.

[2.] Of the sound of the archangel's trumpet at the last day, with which they that sleep in the dust, shall be summoned before the great tribunal. Christ shall descend with a shout, a call, or command, like this, Come forth. Ps. 50: 4. He shall call both to the heavens for their souls, and to the earth for their bodies, that He may judge his people.

This loud call here was but short, yet mighty through God to the battering down of the strong-holds of the grave.

He calls him by name, Lazarus, as we call those by their names, whom we would awake out of sleep. God said to Moses, as a mark of his favor, I know thee by name. The naming of him intimates that the same individual person that died, shall rise again at the last day. He that calls the stars by their names, can distinguish by name his stars that are in the dust, and will lose none of them.

He calls him out of the grave, as if he were already alive, and had nothing to do but to come out of his grave. He does not say unto him, Live, for He Himself must give life, but He saith to him, More, for when by the grace of Christ we live spiritually, we must stir up ourselves to move; the grave of sin and this world is no place for those whom Christ has quickened, and therefore they must come forth.

The event was according to the intention; he that was dead came forth, v. 14. Power went with the word of Christ, to reunite the soul and body of Lazarus. The miracle is described, not by its invisible springs to satisfy curiosity, but by its visible effects to confirm our faith. Do any ask where the soul of Lazarus was during the four days of its separation? We are not told, but have reason to think it was in paradise; but you will say, 'Was it not then an unkindness to it, to return it into the prison of the body?' And if it were, yet, being for the honor of Christ, and the interests of his kingdom, it was no more an injury to him than to Paul to continue in the flesh, when he knew that to depart to Christ, was so much better. If any ask whether Lazarus, after he was raised, could give an account of his soul's removal out of and devour men; for the law was a dispensation of terror: but Christ proves his mission by raising to life one that was dead. Some give this sense; had Christ declared his doing it by his own power, some of his weak disciples, who as yet understood not his divine nature, would have thought that He took too much upon Him; these babes could not bear that strong meat; therefore He chooses to speak of his power as derived; He speaks self-denyingly of Himself, that He might speak the more plainly to us. In what He said, He consulted not so much his dignity as our salvation.

He now applies Himself to his dead friend in the earth. He cried with a loud voice, Lazarus, come forth. He could have raised Lazarus by a silent power, and the indiscernible operations of the Spirit of life; but He did it by a loud call.

(1.) To be significant of the power put forth; He spake, and it was done. He cried aloud, to signify the greatness of the work, and of the power employed in it, and to excite Himself as it were to this attack upon the gates of death, as soldiers engage with a shout. Speaking to Lazarus, it was proper to cry with a loud voice; for, [1.] The soul of Lazarus, which was to be called back, was at a distance, not hovering about the grave, as the Jews fancied, but removed to the world of spirits; it is natural to speak loud when we call to those at a distance. [2.] The body of Lazarus, which was to be called up, was asleep, and we usually speak loud, when we would awake any out of sleep. He cried with a loud voice, that the Scripture might be fulfilled, (Isa. 45: 19.) I have not spoken in secret, in a dark place of the earth.

(2.) To be typical of other works of wonder, and particularly other resurrections, which the power of Christ was to effect. This loud call was a figure,

[1.] Of the gospel-call, by which souls were to be brought out of the grave of sin, which resurrection Christ had formerly spoken of, (ch. 5: 25.) and of his Word as the means of it; (ch. 6: 25.)

[2.] Of the power of his Word, which was to effect, (ch. 5: 25.) and of his Word as the means of it; (ch. 6: 25.)

[3.] Of the power of his Word, which was to effect, (ch. 5: 25.) and of his Word as the means of it; (ch. 6: 25.)

[4.] Of the power of his Word, which was to effect, (ch. 5: 25.) and of his Word as the means of it; (ch. 6: 25.)

[5.] Of the power of his Word, which was to effect, (ch. 5: 25.) and of his Word as the means of it; (ch. 6: 25.)

[6.] Of the power of his Word, which was to effect, (ch. 5: 25.) and of his Word as the means of it; (ch. 6: 25.)

[7.] Of the power of his Word, which was to effect, (ch. 5: 25.) and of his Word as the means of it; (ch. 6: 25.)

'Such is the voice we shall one day hear, which will raise us from the dust. Such the voice which will pierce the rocks, divide the mountains, and bring up the dead. His word made all, his word will repair all. Let us cast away all diffident fears. He in whom we trust is omnipotent.'

Bp. HALL.
(44.) Grave-clothes. Literally, a sort of belts or bandages, brought round the linen shroud, by which the spices used in embalming were kept in their places. Napkin. The kerchief, which was brought round the forehead and under the chin, through (if we may judge from the Egyptian mummies) it did not cover the face. But this is uncertain. Thus by loose, is meant cut or remove the bandages, which would still leave the sinder, or liner sheet in which the corpse was involved, without which Lazarus would have been left entirely naked; which Jesus could not have intended.

46 But ⁴some of them went their ways to the Pharisees, and told them what things Jesus had done.

47 ¶ Then ⁵gathered the chief priests and the Pharisees a council, and said, 'What do we? for this man doeth many miracles.'

48 If ⁶we let him thus alone, ⁷all men will believe on him; and the Romans shall come, and take away both our place and nation.

49 And one of them, named ⁸Caiaphas, being the high priest that same year, said unto them, 'Ye know nothing at all,

ed. But blessed are they who have not seen, and yet have believed. The more we see of Christ, the more cause we shall see to love, and confide in Him. These were some of those Jews that came to Mary to comfort her. When we are doing good offices to others, we put ourselves in the way of receiving favors from God, and have opportunities of getting good when we are doing good.

Others were irritated, and hardened in their unbelief.

The informers were so; (v. 46.) Some of them were so far from being convinced, that they went to the Pharisees, his implacable enemies, and told them what things Jesus had done; as an inducement to think more favorably of Christ, but with a spiteful design. Here is a strange instance, (1.) Of obstinate infidelity; and it is hard to imagine how they could evade the force of this evidence, but that the god of this world had blinded their minds. (2.) Of a most inveterate enmity. If they would not be satisfied that He was to be believed in as the Christ, yet one would think they should have been persuaded not to persecute Him; but if the water be not sufficient to quench the fire, it will inflame it. They told what Jesus had done, and told no more than was true; but their malice gave a tincture of diabolism to their information equal to that of lying; perverting what is true is as bad as forging what is false. Doeg is called a false, lying, and deceitful tongue. (Ps. 120: 2, 3. 52: 2-4.) though what he said was true.

A special council is called, (v. 47.) Then gathered the chief priests and Pharisees a council, as was foretold, (Ps. 2: 2.) The rulers take counsel together against the Lord. The sanhedrim was intended for the public good, but here the greatest injury and mischief are done to the people. The things that belong to the nation's peace, were hid from the eyes of those who were intrusted with its counsels. This council was called, not only for joint advice, but for mutual irritation; as iron sharpens iron, and as coals are to burning coals, and wood to fire, so they might exasperate and inflame one another against Christ and his doctrine.

The matter to be debated was, what course they should take with Jesus; they said, What do we? For this man doeth many miracles. The information given about Lazarus, was produced, and the men, brethren, and fathers are called in to help, as if a formidable enemy had been with an army in their country. They own the truth of Christ's miracles, and that He had wrought many of them: they are therefore witnesses against themselves, for they acknowledged his credentials, and yet denied his commission. They consider what was to be done, and chide themselves that they had not done something sooner, to crush Him. They do not take it at all into consideration, whether they should not receive Him as the Messiah, though they professed to expect Him, and Jesus gave proofs of his being so; but they take it for granted that He is an enemy. What do we? Have we no care to support our church? Is it nothing to us that a doctrine, so destructive to our interest, spreads thus? Shall we tamely yield the ground we have got in the affections of the people? Shall we see our authority brought into contempt, and the craft by which we get our living ruined? What have we been doing? What are we now thinking of? Shall we always talk, and bring nothing to pass?

That which made this matter weighty, was the peril they apprehended from the Romans, (v. 43.) 'If we do not silence Him, all men will believe on Him; and this being the setting up of a new King, the Romans will take umbrage at it, and will come with an army, and take away our place and nation.' See what an opinion they have,

1st. Of their own power. They speak as if they thought Christ's progress in his work depended on their connivance; as if He could not work miracles, and make disciples, unless they let Him alone; as if it were in their power to conquer Him who had conquered death, or as if they could fight against God. But He, that sits in heaven, laughs at the fond conceit which impotent malice has of its own omnipotence.

2ly. Of their own politics.

They prophesy that, in a little time, if He have liberty, all men will believe on Him: hereby owning, when it was to serve their purpose, that his doctrine and miracles had a very convincing power, such as could not be resisted; that all men would become his proselytes and votaries; thus do they now make his interest formidable, though, to serve another turn, they strove to make it contemptible; (ch. 7: 48.) Have any of the rulers believed on Him? This they were afraid of, that men would believe on Him, and then all their measures were broke. Note, The success of the Gospel is the dread of its adversaries; if souls be saved, they are undone.

VERSES 49-53.

'It would appear, that some of the sanhedrim were sensible that Jesus had given them no just or legal handle, by any thing He had either done or taught, for taking away his life; and that in their deliberations something had been advanced, which made the high priest fear they would not enter with spirit and resolution into the business.

'May we not reasonably conjecture, that this must have arisen from some objections made by Nicodemus, who was not afraid to object to them the illegality of their proceedings, (7: 50-52) or by Joseph or Arimathea, concerning whom we have this honorable testimony, that he did not concur in their resolutions? (Luke 23: 50 51.)' Camp

Scott.

They foretell, that, if the generality of the nation be drawn after Him, the rage of the Romans will be drawn upon them. They will come and take away our place; the country in general, especially Jerusalem, or the temple their idol; or, their places of power and trust.

It was true the Romans had a very jealous eye on them, and knew they wanted nothing but power and opportunity to shake off their yoke. It was likewise true that if the Romans should pour an army in upon them, it would be very hard for them to make any head against it; yet here appeared a cowardice which one would have found in the priests of the Lord, if they had not by their wickedness forfeited their interest in God, and good men. Had they kept their integrity, they needed not to have feared; but they speak like a dispirited people, as the men of Judah, when they basely said to Sennacherib, Knowest thou not that the Philistines rule over us? Judg. 15: 11. When men lose their piety, they lose their courage.

But, it was false that there was any danger of the Romans, being irritated against their nation by the progress of Christ's Gospel, for it was no way hurtful to kings or provinces, but highly beneficial. The Romans had no jealousy at all of his growing interest, for He taught men to give tribute to Cæsar, and not to resist evil, but take up the cross. The Roman governor, at his trial, could find no fault in Him. There was more danger of the Romans being incensed against the Jewish nation by the priests, than by Christ. Note, Pretended fears are often the color of malicious designs.

Had there really been danger of displeasing the Romans by tolerating Christ's preaching, that would not justify their persecuting a good man. Note, [1.] The enemies of Christ have often colored their enmity with a seeming care for the public good, and the common safety, and, in order to that, have branded his ministers as troublers of Israel, and men that turn the world upside down. [2.] Carnal policy commonly sets up reasons of state, in opposition to rules of justice. When men are concerned for their own wealth and safety, more than for truth and duty, it is wisdom from beneath, earthly, sensual, devilish. But see the issue; they pretended fear, that tolerating Christ would bring desolation upon them, and therefore, right or wrong, set themselves against Him; but it proved that their persecuting of the Gospel, filled up the measure of their iniquity, and the Romans came and took away their place and nation, and their place knows them no more. Note, That calamity which we seek to escape by sin, we take the most effectual course to bring upon our own heads; and they who think by opposing Christ's kingdom to advance their own secular interest, will find Jerusalem a more burthensome stone than they think, Zech. 12: 3. The fear of the wicked it shall come upon them.

Caiaphas makes a malicious but mystical speech in the council, on this occasion.

The malice of it appears evident at first view, v. 49, 50. He, being the high priest, and so, president of the council, took upon him to decide the matter before it was debated: 'You know nothing at all, your hesitating betrays your ignorance, for it is not a thing that will bear a dispute, if you consider the received maxim, That it is expedient for us that one man should die for the people.'

This counsellor was Caiaphas, who was high priest that same year. The high-priesthood was, by divine appointment, settled upon the heir of the house of Aaron, during the term of his natural life, and then to his heir, but in those degenerate times it was become, though not an annual office, like a consulship, yet frequently changed, as they could make an interest with the Romans. It happened that this year Caiaphas wore the mitre.

The drift of the advice was, that some way or 50 Nor ^m consider that it is expedient for us, that one man should die for the people, and that the whole nation perish not.

51 And this spake he not of himself; but, being high priest that year, ^e he prophesied that Jesus should die for that nation:

52 And ^a not for that nation only, but that also he should gather together in one, ^a the children of God ^a that were scattered abroad.

53 Then ^a from that day forth ^a they took counsel together for to put him to death.

54 Jesus therefore walked no more openly among the Jews; but ^a went thence unto a country near to the wilderness, into a city called Ephraim, and there continued with his disciples.

other ^a was found to put Jesus to death. We have reason to think they strongly suspected Him ^a Messiah; but his doctrine was so contrary to their traditions and interest, and his design did so thwart their notions of the Messiah's kingdom, that they resolve, be He who He will, He must be put to death. Caiaphas does not say, let Him be silenced, imprisoned, banished, though that is sufficient for the restraint of one they thought dangerous; but die He must. Note, Those that have set themselves against Christianity, have commonly divested themselves of humanity, and been infamous for cruelty.

This is plausibly insinuated, with all the subtlety as well as malice of the old serpent.

He suggests his own sagacity, which we must suppose him as high priest to excel in, though the Urim and Thummim were long since lost. How scornfully does he say, 'Ye know nothing, who are but common priests; ye must give me leave to see further into things than you.' It is common for those in authority to impose their corrupt dictates; and because they should be the wisest and best, to expect that every body should believe they are so.

He takes it for granted, that the case is plain, and that those are very ignorant, who do not see it to be so. Note, Reason and justice are often run down with a high hand. Truth is fallen in the streets, and, when it is down, down with it; equity cannot enter, and, when it is out, out with it, Isa. 59: 14.

He insists upon a maxim in politics, That the welfare of communities is to be preferred before that of particular persons. It is expedient for us as priests, whose all lies at stake, that one man die for the people. Thus far it holds true, that it is expedient, and more, it is truly honorable, for a man to hazard his life for his country; (Phil. 2: 17, 1 John 3: 16.) but to put an innocent man to death under color of consulting the public safety, is the devil's politics. Caiaphas craftily insinuates that the greatest and best man, though greater than any individual, is less than the collected mass, and ought to think his life well spent, nay we lost, to save his country. But what is this to the murdering of one evidently a great blessing, under pretence of preventing an imaginary mischief to the country? The case ought to have been put thus, Was it expedient for them to bring on themselves and their nation the guilt of a prophet's blood, to secure their civil interests from a danger they had no just reason to fear? Was it expedient to drive God and their glory from them, rather than venture the Romans' displeasure, who could not harm them, with God on their side? Note, Carnal policy, which steers only by secular considerations, while it thinks to save all by sin, ruins all at last.

The mystery in this counsel of Caiaphas, does not appear at first view, but the evangelist leads us into it; (v. 51, 52.) This spake he not of himself; it was not only the language of his own enmity and policy, but in these words he prophesied, though he himself was not aware of it, That Jesus should die for that nation. Here is a precious comment upon a pernicious text; the counsel of cursed Caiaphas so construed as to fall in with the counsels of God. Charity teaches us to put the most favorable construction upon men's words and actions; but piety teaches us to make a good improvement of them, even contrary to what they were intended for. If wicked men in what they do against us, are God's hand to humble and reform us, why may they not, in what they say against us, be God's mouth to instruct and convince us? But in this of Caiaphas, there was an extraordinary direction of heaven, prompting him to say that which was capable of a very sublime sense. As the hearts of all men are in God's hand, so are their tongues. They are deceived, who say, 'Our tongues are our own, so that either we may say what we will, and are not accountable to God's judgment, or we can say what we will, and are not restrainable by his providence and power.' Balaam could not say what he would, when he came to curse Israel; nor Laban when he pursued Jacob.

The evangelist explains what he said, and shows how it was intended to be accommodated to an excellent purpose. He did not speak it of himself; as it was an artifice to stir up the council against Christ, he spake it of himself; or of the devil: but as it was an oracle, declaring it the purpose of God by the death of Christ to save his spiritual Israel from sin and wrath, he did not speak it of himself, for he knew nothing of the matter; he meant not so, neither did his heart think so, for nothing was in his heart out to destroy and cut off, Isa. 10: 7.

Verse 54.

Ephraim, ^a Situated eight miles north of Jerusalem, near Bethel, and apparently ^a between that city and Jericho. Accordingly we find

He prophesied, and those that prophesied, did not speak of themselves. But is Caiaphas also among the prophets? He is so, this once, though a bad man, and an enemy to Christ and his Gospel. Note, (1.) God can, and often does, make wicked men instruments to serve his purposes, even contrary to their own intentions, for He has them not only in a chain, to restrain them from doing the mischief they would, but in a bridle, to lead them to do the service they would not. (2.) Words of prophecy in the mouth are no infallible evidence of grace in the heart. Lord, Lord, have we not prophesied in thy name? will be rejectea as a frivolous plea.

He prophesied, being high priest that year; not that his being high priest did at all dispose or qualify him to be a prophet; we cannot suppose the pontifical mitre to have first inspired with prophecy the basest head that ever wore it; but, (1.) Being high priest, and therefore eminent in the conclave, God put this significant word into his mouth, that it might be the more observed, or the non-observance of it the more aggravated. The apophthegms of great men have been thought worthy of special regard; A divine sentence is in the lips of the king; this divine sentence was put into the lips of the high priest, that even out of his mouth this word might be established, that Christ died for the good of the nation, and not for any iniquity in his hands. He happened to be high priest that year which was fixed to be the year of the redeemed, when Messiah the Prince must be cut off, but not for Himself; (Dan. 9: 26.) and he must own it. (2.) Being high priest that famous year, in which there was to be an effusion of the Spirit, more than had ever been, according to the prophecy, (Joel 2: 28, 29.) compared with Acts 2: 17, some drops of the showery light upon Caiaphas, as the crumbs (saint Lightfoot) of the children's bread, which fall from the table among the dogs. This year was the year of the expiration of the Levitical priesthood; and out of the mouth of him who was then high priest, was extorted resignation of it to Him, who should not (as they had done for many ages) offer beasts for that nation, but Himself, and so make an end of the sin-offering. This resignation he made unwillingly, as Isaac gave the blessing to Jacob.

The matter of his prophecy was, that Jesus should die for that nation, to which all the prophets bare witness, who testified before-hand the sufferings of Christ; (1 Pet. 1: 11.) That the death of Christ must be the salvation of Israel; he meant by that nation, those in it that obstinately adhered to Judaism; but God meant those in it that would receive the doctrine of Christ; all believers, the spiritual seed of Abraham. The death of Christ proved the ruin of that interest in the nation, which Caiaphas intended should be the establishment of it, for it brought wrath upon them to the uttermost; but it proved the advancement of the interest he hoped it would have been the ruin of, for Christ being lifted up from the earth, drew all men unto Him. A great thing is here prophesied; That Jesus should die, for others, not only for their good, but in their stead; die for that nation, for they had the first offer of salvation by his death. If the Jews had unanimously believed in Christ, they had been not only saved eternally, but saved as a nation. The fountain was first opened to the house of David, Zech. 13: 1. He so died for that nation, as that the whole nation should not perish, but that a remnant should be saved, Rom. 11: 5.

The evangelist enlarges on this word of Caiaphas, (v. 52.) not for that nation only, how much soever it thought itself the darling of heaven, but that also He should gather together in one the children of God that were scattered abroad.

Christ died not for the nation of the Jews only, (it would have been but a light thing for the Son of God only to restore the preserved of Jacob, and the outcasts of Israel,) He must be that a desert or wilderness extended from Jericho to Bethel, called the wilderness of Bethaven, in which Joshua and the Israelites slew the inhabitants of Ai.

55 And the Jews' passover was nigh at hand; and many went out of the country up to Jerusalem ⁴ before the passover, * to purify themselves.

56 Then 'sought they for' Jesus, and spake among themselves, as they stood in the temple, What think ye, that he will not come to the feast?

57 Now both the chief priests and the Pharisees ⁵ had given a commandment, that if any man knew where he were, he should shew it, that they might take him.

salvation to the ends of the earth, Isa. 49: 6. He must die for the children of God that were scattered abroad. Some understand it of the children of God then in being, in the Gentile world, devout men of every nation, (Acts 2: 5.) that feared God, (Acts 10: 2.) and worshipped Him; (Acts 17: 4.) proselytes of the gate, who served the God of Abraham, but submitted not to the ceremonial law of Moses; persons that had a savor of natural religion, but were dispersed in the nations, had no peculiar profession to distinguish themselves by. Christ died, to incorporate these in one great society, to be denominated from, and governed by Him; and this was the setting up of a standard, to which all that had a regard to God and their souls, might have recourse. Others take in with these all that belong to the election of grace, who are called the children of God, though not yet born, because they are predestinated to the adoption of children, Eph. 1: 5. These are scattered abroad in several places of the earth, out of all kindreds and tongues, (Rev. 7: 9.) and in several ages of the world, to the end of time; there are those that fear Him, throughout all generations; to all those He had an eye in the atonement. As He prayed, so He died, for all that should believe on Him.

The purpose and intention of his death concerning those persons; He died to gather them in, who wandered; and to gather them together in one, who were scattered; to invite them to Him, who were at a distance from Him, and unite them to Him, who were at a distance from each other. Christ's dying is,

(1.) The great attractive of our hearts; He is lifted up, to draw men to Him. The conversion of souls is the gathering of them to Christ as their ruler and refuge, as the doves to their windows; and He died to effect this. By dying He purchased them to Himself, and the gift of the Holy Ghost for them; his love in dying for us is the loadstone of our love.

(2.) The great centre of our unity. He gathers them together in one, Eph. 1: 10. They are one with Him, one body, one spirit, and one with each other, in Him. All the saints in all places and ages meet in Christ, as all the members in the head, and all the branches in the root. Christ, by the merit of his death, recommended all the saints in one to the grace and favor of God; (Heb. 2: 11-13.) and by the motive of his death recommends them all severally to the love and affection one of another, ch. 13: 34.

(3.) The result of this debate is a resolve of the council to put Jesus to death; v. 53. They now understand one another's minds, and each was fixed in his own, that Jesus must die; and, it would seem, a committee was appointed to sit daily to consult about it, and receive proposals for effecting it. Note, The wickedness of the wicked ripens by degrees, James 1: 15. Ezek. 7: 10.

Two considerable advances were now made in their design against Christ. [1.] What before they had thought of severally, now they jointly concurred in, and so strengthened the hands one of another. Ill men encourage themselves and one another in ill practices, by comparing notes; men of corrupt minds bless themselves, when they find others of the same mind: then the wickedness which before seemed impracticable, appears not only possible, but easy to be effected. [2.] What before they wished done, but wanted a color for, now they are furnished with a plausible pretence to justify themselves in, which will serve, if not to take off the guilt, (that is the least of their care,) yet to take off the odium, and so satisfy, if not the personal, yet the political conscience, as some subtly distinguish. Many will go on very securely in doing an ill thing, as long as they have but something to say in excuse for it. Now this resolution of theirs, to put Him to death, right or wrong, shows that all the formality of a trial, afterwards, was but show and grimace.

(4.) Christ, hereupon, knowing the vote of their cabal, suspended his public appearances; He walked no more openly among the Jews, the inhabitants of Judea, who were properly called Jews, especially those at Jerusalem; He did not walk up and down among them, from place to place, preaching and working miracles, but, while He staid in Judea, He was there incognito. Thus the chief priests put the Light of Israel under a bushel.

He withdrew into a part of the country so obscure, that the name of the town is scarcely met with any where else. He went to a country near the wilderness, as if driven out from among men, or rather wishing, with Jeremiah, that he might have in the wilderness a lodging-place of wayfaring men, Jer. 9: 2. He entered into a city called Ephraim, some think Ephrath, that is, Bethlehem, where He was born, and which bordered upon the wilderness of Judah; others think Ephron, or Ephraim, mentioned 2 Chron. 13: 19. Thither his disciples went with Him; neither would they leave Him in solitude, nor would He leave them in danger. There He conversed; He knew how to improve this time of retirement in private conversation, when He had not an opportunity of preaching publicly. He conversed with his disciples, his family, when forced from the temple, and his discourses there, no doubt, were very edifying. We must do the good we can, when we cannot do the good we would.

Christ did not fear the power of his enemies, or distrust his own power; He had many ways to save Himself, and was neither averse to suffering, nor unprepared for it; but He retired, to put a mark of his displeasure upon Jerusalem. They rejected Him and his Gospel; justly therefore did He remove Himself and his Gospel from them. The Prince of teachers was now removed into a corner, (Isa. 30: 20.) there was no open vision of Him; and it was a sad presage of that thick darkness shortly to come upon Jerusalem, because she knew not the way of her visitation. He would render the cruelty of his enemies against Him the more inexcusable. If his public appearance was grievous to them, and thought dangerous to the public, He would try whether their anger would be turned away by his privacy; when David fled to Gath Saul sought no more for him, 1 Sam. 27: 4. But it was the life, the precious life, these wicked men hunted after. Again, His hour was not yet come, and therefore He declined danger, in a way common to men, both to warrant and encourage the flight of his servants in time of persecution, and to comfort those who are forced from their usefulness, and buried alive in privacy and obscurity; the disciple is not better than his Lord. His retirement, for a while, was to make his return into Jerusalem, when his hour was come, the more remarkable and illustrious. This swelled the acclamations of joy, with which his well-wishers welcomed Him at his next public appearance, when He rode triumphantly into the city.

(5.) But strict inquiry was made for Him (v. 55-57) on occasion of the approach of the passover, at which they expected his presence, according to custom; (v. 55.) this was Christ's fourth and last passover; and it might truly be said, (as, 2 Chron. 35: 18.) There was never such a passover in Israel, for in it Christ our Passover was sacrificed for us. The passover being at hand, many went out of all parts of the country to Jerusalem, to purify themselves. This was either, 1st. A necessary purification of those who had contracted ceremonial pollution; they came to be sprinkled with the water of purification, and to perform the other rites of cleansing according to the law, Numb. 9: 6. Thus before our gospel-passover we must renew our repentance, and by faith wash in the blood of Christ, and so compass God's altar. Or, 2dly. A voluntary purification, by fasting and prayer, and other religious exercises, which many, that were more devout than their neighbors, spent some time in before the passover, and chose to do at Jerusalem, because of the advantage of the temple-service. Thus must we, by solemn preparation, set bounds about the mount on which we expect to meet with God.

The inquiry was very solicitous; They said, What think ye, that He will so come to the feast? v. 56.

Some think this was said by those who wished well to Him, and expected his coming, that they might hear his doctrine, and see his miracles. They who came early out of the country, that they might purify themselves, were very desirous to meet with Christ, and perhaps came the sooner with that expectation, and therefore as they stood in the temple, the place of their purification, they inquired what news of Christ? Could any body give them

To purify themselves.] Verse 55. It was customary for those who had contracted a defilement which was to be purified by a sacrifice, to reserve themselves for one of the great feasts; also for those who had entered into a vow of Naziritism, to perform it at those seasons' WHITBY. It was required too of those who had become defiled in any manner, to purify themselves before they partook of the celebration of the paschal feast. LITCHFORD.

This whole chapter abounds with great and important truths, delivered in language the most impressive and edifying. Christ's eternal power and godhead are sufficiently manifested in the resurrection of Lazarus. In all his conduct here, we find majesty, humanity, friendship, and sublime devotion blended in the most intimate manner, and illustrating each other, by their respective splendor and excellence. In every act, in every word, we see God manifest in the flesh: Man, in all the amiable and charitable of his nature; God, in the plenitude of his power and goodness. DR. A. CLARK.

show it; probably promising a reward; and imposing a penalty on such as harbored Him. So that hereby He was represented as a dangerous man, an outlaw, whom any one may have a blow at. Saul issued such a proclamation for apprehending David, and Ahab for Elijah. See, 1st. How intent they were on this prosecution, and how they labored in it; at a time when, if they had had any sense of religion and the duty of their function, they would have found something else to do. 2dly. How willing they were to involve others in the guilt with them; if any man were capable of betraying Christ, they would have him think himself bound to do it. Thus was the interest they had in the people abused to the worst purposes. Note, It is an aggravation of the sins of wicked rulers, that they commonly make those under them instruments of their unrighteousness. But, notwithstanding this proclamation, though doubtless many knew where He was, such was his interest in the affections of some, and such God's hold of the consciences of others, that He continued undiscovered, for the Lord hid Him.

CHAP. XII. v. 1-11. Our Lord's coming to Bethany now, may be considered,

1. As a preface to the passover He intended to celebrate, to which relation is had in the date of the time; six days before the passover. Devout men set time apart, to prepare themselves for that solemnity, and thus it became our Lord Jesus to fulfil all righteousness. He has set us an example of solemn self-sequestration, before the solemnities of the gospel-passover; let us hear the voice crying Prepare ye the way of the Lord.

2. As a voluntary exposing of Himself to the fury of his enemies; now that his hour was at hand, He came within their reach, though He had showed how easily He could evade their snares. Note, (1.) Our Lord Jesus was voluntary in his sufferings; his life was not forced from Him, but resigned; Lo, I come. As the strength of persecutors could not overpower Him, so their subtlety could not surprise Him, but He died, because He would. (2.) As there is a time when we are allowed to shift for our own preservation, so there is a time when we are called to jeopard our lives in the cause of God, as St. Paul, when he went bound in the Spirit to Jerusalem.

3. As an instance of his kindness to his friends at Bethany, from whom He was shortly to be taken away. This was a farewell visit; He came to leave with them words of comfort against the approaching day of trial. Note, Though Christ depart for a time from his people, He will give them intimations that He parts in love, and not in anger. Bethany is here described to be the town where Lazarus was, whom He raised from the dead. That miracle, wrought here, put honor upon the place, and made it remarkable; Christ came hither to observe what improvement was made of it; for where Christ shows signal favors, He looks after them, to see whether the intention of them be answered. Where He has sown plentifully, He observes whether it comes up again.

They made Him a supper, v. 2. It is queried whether this that recorded, Matt. 26: 6, &c. in the house of Simon, were the same; most think they were; for the substance of the story and many of the circumstances agree; but that comes in after what was said two days before the passover, whereas this was done six days before; nor is it likely that Martha would serve in any house but her own; and therefore I incline with Dr. Lightfoot to think them different; that that in Matthew was on the third day of the passover week; but this the seventh day of the week before, being the Jewish Sabbath, the night before He rode in triumph into Jerusalem; that in the house of Simon, this of Lazarus; these two being the most public and solemn entertainments given Him in Bethany, Mary graced them both with this token of her respect; and what she left of her ointment this first time, when she spent but a pound of it, (v. 3.) she used that second time, when she poured it all out, Mark 14: 3.

With them, ordinarily, supper was the best meal. A feast is made for frienship, and they wished to have an opportunity of free and pleasant conversation with Him, for a feast is made for fellowship. Perhaps in allusion to this and the like entertainments given to Christ in the days of his flesh, it is that He promises to such as open the door of their hearts to Him, that He will sup with them, Rev. 3: 20.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 41-57. Who can express the majesty and condescension of our Redeemer! For the sake of those, who sought his life, He veiled his glory, and in 'the form of a servant' addressed the Father, before He performed that stupendous miracle, which He immediately after wrought by his own power, as 'the Resurrection and the Life,' as 'God manifest in the flesh.' If He shall please to speak, how soon can He rebuke our enemies, new-create our hearts, or answer our prayers for the conversion of those around us! How safely may we trust the health and life of our dearest relatives in his hand! How cheerfully go down to the grave, in sure hope of a glorious resurrection! Our sharpest trials will terminate in abundant comfort, if we believe in Him; and they often are means of promoting his glory in the conversion of our fellow-sinners; so that, if we could foresee all the effects of them, they would be causes of admiring gratitude and joy, and not of sorrow and dejection. But we must wait in faith, hope, and prayer, till these effects take place. No outward means can overcome the obdurate enmity of sinners against God: and they, who have engaged their interest and reputation in the unequal contest, become more callous than others. Sagacious and infidel politicians count all men ignorant and foolish, who hesitate to sacrifice honesty and justice to expediency; and persecutors deem it a public calamity, when numbers are converted to Jesus. They think themselves culpable, when, not using the most sanguinary methods of opposing the truth: they undertake to crush those with oppressive and overwhelming power, whom they cannot answer: they imagine that the excellency of the end will sanctify all the impieties, frauds, and murders, which are used to compass it: and they deem the life of innocent persons a trivial matter, compared with the peace and uniformity of the church; which too generally consist in gross superstition, usurped authority over men's consciences, and destructive heresies. But, while they seek to avert calamities by such means, they bring them upon themselves in the most tremendous manner.—The Lord will, however, honor his institutions, notwithstanding man's wickedness, and extort confessions to his truth from his enemies. Once, and but once, it was expedient that the innocent should suffer for the guilty; and the divine Savior willingly died for us, to gather us, as 'the children of God,' from all our dispersions, into his kingdom; may He gather far more and more into his church from every part of the earth! No devices of man can derange the purposes of God: while hypocrites amuse themselves with forms and controversies, and worldly men pursue their own projects, Jesus still communes with his disciples, and orders all things in subsequence to his own glory and their salvation.

create an occasion of expense any thing more valuable than another, that must be brought out for Christ. Note, Those who love Christ truly, love Him so much better than this world, as to be willing to lay out the best they have for Him.

2. Condescending: she not only bestowed her ointment upon Christ, but poured it upon Him with her own hands, which she might have ordered a servant to do; nay, she did not, as usual, anoint his head, but his feet. True love, as it does not spare charge, so it does not spare pains in honoring Christ. Considering what Christ has done for us, we are very ungrateful, if we think any service too hard or too mean, whereby He may be glorified.

3. There was faith working by this love, faith in Jesus as the Christ, the Anointed, who, being both Priest and King, was anointed as Aaron and David were. Note, God's Anointed should be our Anointed. Has God poured on Him the oil of gladness above his fellows? Let us pour on Him the ointment of our best affections. By consenting to Christ as our King, we must comply with God's designs, appointing Him our Head, whom He has appointed, Hos. 1:11.

The filling of the house with the pleasant odor may intimate, (1.) That those who entertain Christ in their hearts and houses, bring a sweet odor into them; Christ's presence brings with it an ointment and perfume which rejoice the heart. (2.) Honors done to Christ are comforts to all his friends and followers; they are to God and good men an offering of a sweet smelling savour.

The person that carpied, was Judas, one of his disciples; not one of their nature, but only one of their number. It is possible for the worst of men to lurk under the disguise of the best profession; and many pretend to stand in relation to Christ, who really have no kindness for Him. Judas was a preacher of the Gospel; yet discouraged and checked this instance of pious affection and devotion. Note, It is sad to see religion and holy zeal frozen upon by such as are obliged by their office to assist and encourage it. But this was he that should betray Christ. Note, Coldness of love to Christ, and a secret contempt of serious piety, are sad presages of final apostasy. Hypocrites, by the less instances of worldliness, discover themselves to be ready for a closure with greater temptations.

'Why was not this ointment, since it was designed for a pious use, sold for three hundred pence, (3l. 10s.) and given to the poor?' Here is, A, foul iniquity gilded over with a specious pretence; worldly wisdom passing censure

Martha served; she herself waited at table, in token of her great respect to the Master; though a person of some quality, she did not think it below her to serve, when Christ sat at meat; nor should we think it a disparagement to us, to stoop to any service whereby Christ may be honored. Christ had formerly reproved Martha for being troubled with much serving. But she did not therefore leave off serving, as, some, who, when they are reproved for one extreme, peevishly run into another; still she served; not as then at a distance, but within hearing of Christ's gracious words, reckoning those happy, who, as the queen of Sheba said concerning Solomon's servants, stood continually before him, to hear his wisdom; better be a waiter at Christ's table, than a guest at the table of a prince.

Lazarus was one of them that sat at meat. It proved the truth of his resurrection, as it did of Christ's, that there were those who did eat and drink with Him, Acts 10:41. Lazarus did not retire into a wilderness after his resurrection, as if, when he had made a visit to the other world, he must ever after be a hermit in this; he conversed familiarly with people, as others did. He sat at meat, as a monument of the miracle Christ had wrought. Those whom Christ has raised to spiritual life, are made to sit together with Him. See Eph. 2:5, 6.

Mary had this ointment by her, probably, for her own use; but the death and resurrection of her brother had quite weaned her from the use of all such things, and with this she anointed the feet of Jesus, and, as a further token of reverence for Him, and neglence of herself, wiped them with her hair, and this was taken notice of by all present, for the house was filled with the odor of the ointment. See Prov. 27:16.

Doubtless, she intended this as a token of her love to Christ, who had given real tokens of his love to her and her family; and thus she studies what she shall render. By this her love appears to have been,

1. Generous: so far from sparing necessary charges in his service, she is as ingenious to create an occasion of expense any thing more valuable than another, that must be brought out for Christ. Note, Those who love Christ truly, love Him so much better than this world, as to be willing to lay out the best they have for Him.

2. Condescending: she not only bestowed her ointment upon Christ, but poured it upon Him with her own hands, which she might have ordered a servant to do; nay, she did not, as usual, anoint his head, but his feet. upon pious zeal, as guilty of imprudence and mismanagement. Those who value themselves on their secular policy, and undervalue others for their serious piety, have more of the spirit of Judas than they would be thought to have. Here is charity to the poor made a color for opposing piety to Christ, and secretly made a cloak for covetousness. Many excuse them selves from laying out in charity, under pretence of laying up for it; whereas, if clouds be full of rain, they will empty themselves. Why not given to the poor? Because better bestowed on the Lord. Note, We must not conclude that those do no acceptable service, who do it not in our way; as if every thing must be imprudent and unfit, which does not take its measures from us. Proud men think all ill-advised who do not advise with them.

The evangelist remarks, by the direction of Him who searches the heart, This he said, not that he cared for the poor, but because he was a thief, and had the bag.

What were the poor to him, any further than he might serve his own ends, by being overseer of the poor? Some warmly contend for the power of the church, as others for its purity, when perhaps it may be said, Not that they care for the church, whether its true interest sink or swim; but, under pretence of this, they are advancing themselves. Simeon and Levi pretended zeal for circumcision, not that they cared for the seal of the covenant, any more than Jehu for the Lord of hosts, when he said, Come, see my zeal.

Judas said this from a principle of covetousness. The truth was, this ointment being designed for his Master, he would rather have it in money, to be put in the common stock he was entrusted with, and then he knew what to do with it.

Judas was treasurer of Christ's household, whence some think he was called Iscariot, the bag-bearer.

See what little estate Jesus and his disciples had to live upon; they had neither farms nor merchandise, barns or storehouses, only a bag; or, as some think, the word signifies a box, or coffer, wherein they kept just enough for their subsistence, giving the overplus, if any were, to the poor; this they carried about with them, wherever they went. This bag was supplied by the contributions of good people, and the Master and his disciples had all in common: let this lessen our esteem of wealth, deaden us to the punctilios of state and ceremony, and reconcile us to mean living, if that be our lot, that it was our Master's lot; for our sakes He became poor.

The steward of the little they had, was Judas. It was his office to receive and pay, and we do not find that he gave in any account. He was appointed to this office, either 1st. Because he was the least and lowest of all the disciples; it was not Peter or John that was made steward, but Judas, the meanest of them. Note, Secular employments, as they are a diversion, so they are a diminution, to a minister of the Gospel; see 1 Cor. 6:4. The ministers of state in Christ's kingdom refused to be concerned in the revenue, Acts 6:2. 2dly. Because he was desirous of the place. He loved in his heart to be fingering money, and therefore had the money-bag committed to him, 1. As a kindness, to please him, and thereby oblige him to be true to his Master. Subjects are sometimes disaffected to the government, because disappointed of preferment; but Judas has no cause to complain; the bag he chose, and the bag he had. Or, 2. To punish him for his secret wickedness, that was put into his hands, which would be a snare to him. let them alone. For Mary's justification, Christ puts a favorable construction upon what she did, which they that condemned it were not aware of; Against the day of my burying she has kept this. Or, She has reserved this for the day of my embalming. 'You do not grudge the ointment used for the embalming of friends, nor say that it should be sold, and given to the poor. Now this anointing either was so intended, or at least may be so interpreted; for the day of my burying is at hand, and she has anointed a body that is already as good as dead.' Note, '1.] Our Lord Jesus thought much and often of his death and burial; it is good for us to do so too. [2.] Providence often so opens a door of opportunity to Christians, and the Spirit of grace so opens their hearts, that the expressions of their pious zeal prove more seasonable, and more beautiful, than any foresight of their own could make them. [3.] Christ puts kind comments upon the pious words and actions of good people, and not only makes the best of what is amiss, but makes the most of what is good.

He gives a sufficient answer to Judas' objection, 2. 8. [1.] It is so ordered in the kingdom of Providence, that the poor ye have always with us; objects of charity (Deut. 15: 11.) there will be, as long as there is so much folly and affliction. [2.] It is so ordered in the kingdom of grace, that the church should not always have the bodily presence of Christ; 'Me ye have not always, but only for a little time.' Note, We need wisdom when two duties come in competition, to know which to prefer, circumstances must determine. Opportunities are to be improved, and those opportunities first and most vigorously, which are likely to be of the shortest continuance. That good duty which may be done at any time, ought to give way to that which cannot be done but just now.

Public notice was taken of our Lord at this supper; (v. 9.) Much people of the Jews knew He was there, and they came flocking thither; the more because He had been absent, and now broke out as the sun from behind a cloud.

They came to see Jesus, whose name was made considerable by the late miracle of raising Lazarus. They came, not to hear Him, but to gratify their curiosity, at Bethany, fearing He would not appear publicly at this passover. They came, not to seize Him, or inform against Him, though the government had prosecuted Him to an outlawry, but to see Him, and of the bag, for at best we are but stewards of it; and it was Judas, one of an ill character, and born to be hanged, (pardon the expression,) that was steward of the bag; the prosperity of fools destroys them.

He was a thief, had a thievish disposition. The reigning love of money is heart-theft, as much as anger and revenge are heart-murder. Perhaps, he had been guilty of embezzling his Master's stores. Some conjecture, that he was now contriving to fill his pockets, and run away, having heard Christ speak so much of troubles approaching, to which he could by no means reconcile himself. Note, They to whom the management and disposal of public money is committed, have need to be governed by steady principles of justice and honesty; for though some make a jest of cheating the government, or the church, if cheating be thieving, and communists being more considerable than particular persons, if robbing of them be the greater sin, the guilt of theft and the portion of thieves will be found no jesting matter. Judas, who had betrayed his trust, soon after betrayed his Master.

Christ justified what Mary did; (v. 7, 8.) Let her alone. Hereby He intimated, 1. His acceptance of her kindness. Though perfectly mortified to all the delights of sense, yet, as it was a token of her good-will, He signified Himself well-pleased with it. 2. His care that she should not be molested in it; Pardon her, so it may be read; 'excuse her; if an error, it is an error of her love.' Note, Christ would not have them discouraged, who sincerely design to please Him, though in their honest endeavors there be not all desirable discretion, Rom. 14: 3. Though we would not do as they do, yet show Him respect. Note, There are some in whose affections Christ will have an interest, in spite of all the attempts of his enemies. It being known where Christ was, multitudes came to Him. Note, Where the King is, there is the court; where Christ is, there will be the gathering of the people be, Luke 17: 37.

They came to see Lazarus and Christ together, a very inviting sight. Some came for the confirmation of their faith, to have the story from Lazarus' own mouth. Others came only to gratify their curiosity, that they might say they had seen a man who had been dead and buried, so that Lazarus served for a show, these holy-days, to those, who, like the Athenians, spent their time in telling and hearing new things. Perhaps some came to question Lazarus about the state of the dead; we ourselves have sometimes said, it may be, We would have gone a great way for one hour's discourse with Lazarus. But if any came on this errand, it is probable Lazarus was silent; however, the Scripture is silent on it; and we must not covet to be wise above what is written. Our Lord was present, a much fitter person for them to apply to than Lazarus; if we hear not Moses and the prophets, Christ and the apostles, concerning another world, neither should we be persuaded though Lazarus rose from the dead. We have a more sure word of prophecy.

The indignation of the chief priests at the growing interest of Jesus, and their plot to crush it; v. 10, 11. They consulted (or decreed) how they might put Lazarus also to death, because that by reason of him, many of the Jews went away, and believed on Jesus.

How vain and unsuccessful their attempts against Christ had hitherto been. They had done all they could to alienate the people from Him, and exasperate them against Him, yet many of their creatures, their admirers, were so overcome by the evidence of Christ's miracles, that they went away from the interest and party of the priests, and believed on Jesus. And it was by reason of Lazarus; his resurrection put life into their faith, convinced them that this Jesus was undoubtedly the Messiah, and had life in Himself, and power to give life.

This miracle confirmed them in the belief of his other miracles, which they had heard He wrought in Galilee; what was impossible to Him that could raise the dead?

How absurd and unreasonable this vote was—that Lazarus must be put to death. This is an instance of the most brutish rage; they were like a wild bull in a net, full of fury, laying about them without consideration. It was a sign that they neither feared God, nor regarded man. For,

If they had feared God, they would not have done such an act of defiance to Him. God will have Lazarus live by miracle, and they will have him die by malice. They cry, Away with such a fellow, it is not fit he should live; when God had so lately sent him back to the earth, declaring it highly fit he should live; what was this but walking contrary to God? They would put Lazarus to death, and challenge almighty power to raise him again, as if they could contend with God. 'Blind malice, to suppose that Christ, who could raise one that had died a na-

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8. No violence of persecutors will deter zealous believers from avowing their love and gratitude to their Savior. (Notes, & P. O. Luke 7: 36—50.)—When the heart is upright, every endeavor to honor Him will be accepted; though good men may censure it, as injudicious and unsuitable. But a high profession of religion sometimes covers the most contemptible avarice and dishonesty, or the most consummate wickedness.—Many plead for charity, in opposition to faith and love to Christ; not because they 'care for the poor,' but because it answers their selfish purposes. And in various ways, one part of religion is pleaded for, in preference to other parts: not that the advocates care for what they recommend; but because they aim to discredit what they dislike.—It behooves those who are entrusted with money, for pious or charitable uses, to watch and pray continually against covetousness.

Carrying the bag^s has always been a perilous, though generally a coveted service, especially to church-men: and alas! ('46) thieves have often been employed in it! The less men are disposed to suspect, or call us to account, in matters of this kind, the more scrupulous should we be in our own conduct; for if Satan can prevail with ministers, or professors of the Gospel, to venture on petty frauds, by pilfering from the poor, or embezzling holy things; he will soon gain a more decided victory, and expose them to open infamy and ruin.—We should not generally be much moved with the unjust censures which are cast upon us, if we knew the secret practices and motives of those who utter them: it is therefore commonly best, while we are careful to keep a clear conscience, silently to leave the Lord to answer for us.—Whatever other methods we may occasionally take, of honoring Christ with our substance; the relief of the poor is the stated method, and we have them always with us for that purpose. more inclined to religion than their neighbors, and were forward to honor Christ. Note, The more regard men have to God and religion in general, the better disposed they will be to entertain Christ and his religion. They were not rulers, or great men, that went out to meet Christ, but the commonalty; some would have called them a rabble; but Christ has chosen the weak and foolish things, (1 Cor. 1:27.) and is honored more by the multitude, than the magnificence of his followers; for He values men by their souls, not their names and titles of honor.

They had inquired for Him, (ch. 11:55, 56.) Will He not come up to the feast? Now they hear He is coming, (p. 12.) for none that seek Christ, seek in vain. When they heard He was coming they bestirred themselves to give Him an agreeable reception. Note, Tidings of the approach of Christ and his kingdom should awaken us to consider what is the work of the day, that it may be done in the day. Israel must prepare to meet their God, (Amos 4:12.) and the virgins to meet the bridegroom.

In what way they expressed their respects; they had not the keys of the city to present Him, nor the sword or mace to carry before Him, no civility to compliment Him with, but such as they had they gave Him; and even this despicable crowd was a faint resemblance of that glorious company which John saw, before the throne, and before the Lamb, Rev. 7: 9, 10. Though these were not before the throne, they were before the Lamb, the paschal Lamb, who now, according to the usual ceremony, four days before the feast, was set apart to be sacrificed for us. It is said of the celestial choir,

(1.) That they had palms in their hands; so had these branches of palm-trees. The palm-tree has ever been an emblem of victory and triumph; Ciceo calls one that had won many prizes—a man of many palms. Christ was by his death to conquer principalities and powers, and therefore should have the victor's palm borne before Him. The carrying of palm-branches was also part of the ceremony of the feast of tabernacles, (Lev. 23: 40. Neh. m. 8:15.) and their using this expression of joy in welcoming Jesus, intimates that all the feasts pointed at, and were accomplished in, his Gospel, and particularly the feast of tabernacles, Zech. 14:16.

(2.) That they cried with a loud voice, saying, Salvation to our God; (Rev. 7: 10.) so these shouted before Him, as is usual in popular welcomes, Hosanna, Blessed is the King of Israel that comes in the name of the Lord; and hosanna signifies salvation, Ps. 118: 25, 26. How well acquainted these common people were with the Scripture, and how pertinently they apply it to the Messiah. High thoughts of Christ will be best expressed in scripture-words.

They acknowledge Jesus to be the King of Israel, that comes in the name of the Lord. Though He went in poverty and disgrace, yet, contrary to the notions their scribes had given them of the Messiah, they own Him to be a tural death, could not raise one that had been slain! Lazarus is singled out to be the object of their special hatred, because God has distinguished him by the tokens of his peculiar love, as if they had made a league offensive and defensive with death and hell, and resolved to be severe upon all deserters. One would think they should rather have consulted how they might have joined in friendship with Lazarus and his family, and by their mediation have reconciled themselves to this Jesus whom they had persecuted; but the god of this world had blinded their minds.

If they had regarded man, they would not have done such an act of injustice to Lazarus, an innocent man, to whose charge they could not pretend to lay any crime. What bands are strong enough to hold those who can break through the sacred ties of common justice, and violate the maxims which even nature itself teaches? But the support of their own tyranny and superstition was thought sufficient, as in the church of Rome, not only to justify, but to consecrate the greatest villainies, and make them meritorious.

V. 12-19. This story of Christ's riding in triumph to Jerusalem is recorded by all the evangelists, as worthy of special remark; and in it we may observe, the respects paid to our Lord by the common people.

They that paid Him these respects, were much people—a great crowd of those that came up to the feast; not the inhabitants of Jerusalem, but the country people from remote parts: the nearer the temple of the Lord, the further from the Lord of the temple. Perhaps they had been Christ's hearers in the country, and admirers of Him there, and therefore were forward to testify their respects to Him at Jerusalem, where they knew He had many enemies. Note, Those that have a true value and veneration for Christ will neither be ashamed nor afraid to own Him before men, in any instance whereby they may do Him honor. Perhaps they were those more devout Jews that came up to the feast some time before, to purify themselves, that were

King, which speaks both his dignity and honor, which we must adore; and his dominion and power, which we must submit to. They own Him to be, 1st. A rightful King, coming in the name of the Lord, (Ps. 2: 6.) sent of God, not only as a prophet, but as a king. 2dly. The promised and long-expected King, Messiah, for He is King of Israel.

They heartily wish well to his kingdom, that is the meaning of hosanna; let the King of Israel prosper; as when Solomon was crowned, they cried, God save king Solomon, 1 Kings 1: 39. In crying hosanna they prayed for three things. 1st. That his kingdom might come, i. light, knowledge, power and efficacy. God speed the Gospel. 2dly. That it might be victorious over all opposition, Rev. 6: 2. 3dly. That it might continue. Hosanna is, Let the King live forever; though his kingdom be disturbed, let it never be destroyed, Ps. 72: 17.

They welcome Him to Jerusalem; Welcome is He that cometh; we are heartily glad to see Him; come in, Thou blessed of the Lord; and well may we attend Him with our blessings, who meets us with his. This welcome is like that, (Ps. 24: 7, 9.) Lift up your heads, O ye gates. Thus we must welcome Christ into our hearts, that is, must praise Him, and be well pleased in Him. As we should be heartily pleased with the being and attributes of God, and his relation to us, so we should be with the person and offices of the Lord Jesus, and his mediation between us and God. Faith saith, Blessed is He.

When He had found, or procured, a young ass, He sat thereon; it was but a poor sort of figure He made, He alone upon an ass, and a crowd of people about Him shouting Hosanna.

This was much more of state than He used to take; He used to travel on foot. Though his followers should be willing to take up with mean things, and not affect grandeur, yet it is allowed them to use the inferior creatures, according as God in his providence gives particular possession of that, over which h, by his covenant with Noah and his sons, He has given to man a general dominion.

If He would have made a public entry, according to the state of a man of high degree, He should have rode in a chariot like that of Solomon's, (Cant. 3: 9, 10.) with pillars of silver, the bottom of gold, and the covering of purple; but if we judge according to the fashion of this world, to be introduced thus was rather a disparagement than any honor to the King of Israel, for it seemed as if He would look great, and knew not honor. His kingdom was not of this world, and therefore came not with outward pomp. See,

(1.) The fulfilling of Scripture in this, As it is written, Fear not, daughter of Sion, p. 15. Zech. 9: 9. To Him bare all the prophets witness, and particularly to this concerning Him.

(2.) Even this minute circumstance, sitting on an ass's colt, was foretold of Zion's King, and Christ took care it should be punctually fulfilled. Note, [1.] Christ is Zion's King; the holy hill of Zion was of old destined to be the royal city of the Messiah. [2.] Zion's King does and will look after her, and come to her; though for a short time He retires, in due time He returns.

(3.) Though He comes but slowly, (He rode on a slow-paced animal,) yet He comes surely, and with such expressions of humility and condescension, as greatly encourage the addresses and expectations of his loyal subjects. Humble supplicants may reach to speak with Him. If this be a discouragement to Zion, that her King appears in no greater state or strength, let her know, that, though He comes to her, riding on an ass's colt, yet He goes forth against her enemies, riding on the heavens for her help, Deut. 33: 26.

Fear not. In the prophecy, Zion is bid to rejoice greatly, and to shout; here it is rendered. Fear not. Unbelieving fears are enemies to spiritual joys; if they be cured, conquered, joy

Perhaps Lazarus had purposely lived very retired, from the time they met him, to gratify their curiosity with a sight of him, till our Lord's return afforded them the opportunity. (11: 54-57.) Scott

They compared that prophecy with the event, and so came to understand both. Then remembered they that these things were written of Him by the prophets. Note, Such an admirable harmony exists between the Word and works of God, that the remembrance of what is written, will enable us to understand what is done; and the observation of what is done, will help us to understand what is written. As we have heard, so have we seen. The Scripture is every day fulfilling.

The people pay this respect to Jesus, though the government was so much against Him, because of that illustrious miracle He had lately wrought in raising Lazarus.

Observe what account, and what assurance they had of this miracle; no doubt, the city rang of it. But they who considered it as a proof of Christ's mission, and a ground of their faith in Him, that they might be well satisfied of the matter of fact, traced the report to the eye-witnesses of it. The people therefore that stood by when He called Lazarus out of his grave, being found out and examined, bare record, v. 17. They unanimously averred the thing to be true, and were ready to depose it upon oath, for so much is implied in the word. Note, The truth of Christ's miracles was evidenced by incontestable proofs. Probably those who had seen this miracle, published it unasked; also, to add to the triumphs of this solemn day; and Christ's coming in now from Bethany, where it was done, would put them in mind of it. Note, They who wish well to Christ's kingdom, should be forward to proclaim what they know, that may redound to his honor.

For this cause, as much as any other, the people met Him. Some, out of curiosity, desired to see one who had done such a wonderful work. Many a good sermon He had preached in Jerusalem, which drew not such crowds after Him as this one miracle. But, others, out of conscience, studied to comes of course; therefore Christ comes to his people, to silence their fears. If we cannot reach to the exultations of joy, we should labor to get from under the oppressions of fear. Rejoice greatly; at least, fear not.

The disciples understood not at first why Christ did this, and how the Scripture was fulfilled; but when Jesus was glorified, and thereupon the Spirit poured out, then they remembered that these things were written of Him in the Old Testament, and that they and others had, in pursuance thereof, done these things to Him.

See the imperfection of the disciples in their infant state; even they understood not these things at first; did not consider, when they fetched Him the ass, and set Him thereon, that they were performing the ceremony of the inauguration of Zion's King. The Scripture is often fulfilled by the agency of those, who have not themselves an eye to the Scripture, in what they do, Isa. 45:4. There are many excellent things, both in the Word and providence of God, which the disciples themselves do not at first understand, while they see men as trees walking. That which afterward is clear, at first was dark and doubtful. It well becomes Christ's disciples, when grown up to maturity in knowledge, frequently to reflect on the follies and weakness of their beginning, that free grace may have the glory of their proficiency, and they have compassion on the ignorant. When I was a child, I spake as a child.

See the improvement of the disciples in their adult state. Though once children, they were not always so, but went on to perfection.

They understood it, when Jesus was glorified; for, [1.] Till then they did not rightly apprehend the nature of his kingdom, but expected it to appear in external pomp, and therefore knew not how to apply the Scriptures which spake of so mean an appearance. Note, The right understanding of the spiritual nature of Christ's kingdom, its powers, glories, and victories, would prevent our misinterpreting the Scriptures that speak of it. [2.] Till then the Spirit was not poured out, who was to lead them into all truth. Note, The disciples of Christ are enabled to understand the Scriptures by the same Spirit that indited the Scriptures. The Spirit of do Him honor, as one sent of God. This miracle was reserved for one of the last, that it might confirm those who went before, and might gain Him this honor just before his sufferings; Christ's works were all not only well done (Mark 7:37,) but well timed.

The indignation of the Pharisees at this; some of them, probably, came, and they all soon heard of, Christ's public entry. The committee, appointed to find out expedients to crush Him, thought they had gained their point when He was retired into privacy, and that He would soon be forgotten in Jerusalem, but they now rage and fret, when they see they imagined but a vain thing.

They own their ill success, v. 19. They could not, with all their insinuations, alienate the people's affections from Him, nor with their menaces restrain them from showing their affection. Note, They who oppose Christ, and his kingdom, will be made to perceive that they prevail nothing. God will accomplish his own purposes, in spite of the little efforts of their impotent malice. Ye prevail nothing, or ye profit nothing. Note, Nothing is got by opposing Christ.

They own that He had got ground; The world is gone after Him; there is a vast crowd attending Him, a world of people. Yet here, like Caiaphas, ere they were aware, they prophesied that the world would go after Him; some of all sorts, some from all parts; nations shall be disciplined. This was said to express their vexation at the growth of his interest; their envy makes them fret. If the horn of the righteous be exalted with honor, the wicked see it, and are grieved, Ps. 112:9, 10. Considering how great these Pharisees were, and what abundance of respect was paid them, one would think they needed not grudge Christ so considerable an honor as was now done Him; but proud men would monopolize honor, like Haman. They excite themselves, and one another, to a more vigorous war against Christ. 'Dallying and delaying thus will never do. We must take some more effectual course, to stop this infection; it is time to try our utmost skill and force before the grievance grows past redress.' Thus the enemies of religion are made more resolute and active by being baffled; and shall its friends be disheartened with every disappointment, who know its cause is righteous, and will at last be victorious?

V. 20-26. Certain Greeks here honor Christ, by inquiring for Him with respect. Probably this was not the same day He rode into Jerusalem, (for that day was taken up in public work,) but a day or two after.

Some think these Greeks were Jews of the dispersion, of the twelve tribes scattered among the Gentiles, called Greeks, Hellenist Jews; but others think they were Gentiles, proselytes of the gate, as the eunuch and Cornelius. Pure, natural religion met with the best assistance among the Jews; therefore those among the Gentiles, who were piously inclined, joined them in their solemn meetings, as far as allowed. There were devout worshippers of the true God, even among them that were strangers to the commonwealth of Israel. This flocking of the Gentiles to the temple at Jerusalem, was in the latter ages of the Jewish church; a happy presage of the taking down of the partition-wall between Jews and Gentiles. The forbidding of the priests to accept any oblation or sacrifice from a Gentile, (which was done by Eleazar, son of Ananias, the high priest,) Josephus saith, was one of those things that brought the Ro-

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 9-19. There is nothing so infuriated but men, who have once decidedly engaged in persecution, and staked their credit in the cause, will attempt, to escape defeat, and the infamy and ruin connected with it. The success of the Gospel often enrages them to madness; and they speak and act, as if they really hoped to obtain a victory over almighty God Himself! (Note, Matt. 2:3-8. P. O. 1-8.) We should hence learn to avoid every measure, which has the most remote tendency to this dreadful evil.—But how miserable must they at length become, who are pained by the honor conferred on Zion's King! All things written of Him must be accomplished! [1742]

'all nations must bow down before Him; 'all his enemies must be put under his feet; and the whole world must either submit to Him, or be destroyed by Him. Yet the more He is glorified, the more exquisite will be the torture of those who hate Him, to all eternity. Happy then are they, and they only, who from their hearts can cry, 'Hosanna: Blessed is the King of Israel, who cometh in the name of the Lord!' and who as a rejoice in the meek and lowly triumphs of his grace, and in the prospect of his universal and everlasting kingdom of glory (Notes, 2 Thes. 1:5-10. o the faith, and the discipling of the nations.

Their address to Philip was, Sir, we would see Jesus. They gave him a title of respect, as worthy of honor, because he was in relation to Christ. Their business is, to see Jesus; not only see his face, that they might say, at home, they had seen one so much talked of; it is probable they had seen Him when in public; but would be taught by Him, which it was no easy thing to find Him at leisure for. Now they were come to worship at the feast, they would see Jesus. Note, In our attendance upon ordinances, and particularly the gospel-passover, the great desire of our souls should be to see Jesus; to see Him as ours, to keep up communion with Him, and derive grace from Him: we miss our end in coming, if we do not see Jesus.

Philip tells Andrew, likewise of Bethsaida, and a senior fellow in the college of apostles, contemporary with Peter, and consults him what was to be done; whether he thought the motion would be acceptable or no, because Christ had sometimes said He was not sent but to the house of Israel. They agree that it must be made; but then he would have Andrew go with him, remembering the favorable acceptance Christ had promised them, in case two should agree touching any thing they should ask, Matt. 18:19. Note, Christ's ministers should be helpful to one another, and concur in helping souls to Christ. Two are better than one. It would seem that Andrew and Philip brought this message to Christ, when He was teaching in public, for we read (v. 29.) of the people that stood by; but He was seldom alone.

Christ's acceptance of this honor done Him, was signified by what He said to the people hereupon, foretelling both the honor He Himself should have in being followed, (v. 23, 24.) and the honor they should have that followed Him, v. 25, 26. This was intended for the direction and encouragement of these Greeks, and all others that desired acquaintance with Him.

He foresees that plentiful harvest in the conversion of the Gentiles, of which this was the first-fruits. Christ said to those two disciples, who spake

Verse 20.

'The Gentiles usually worshipped the gods of any foreign city or nation, into which they came. They moreover made journeys to the most celebrated cities, in which were any temples, to worship there. Many passages are extant, not only in Josephus and Philo, but in Suetonius, evidencing, that persons of the noblest birth and highest rank, even of the family of Caesar, offered sacrifices in the temple of Jerusalem. And, indeed, many Gentiles at that time were diligent in researches after true religion, and, to attain a knowledge of it, used to frequent the synagogues, although they made no external profession of the Jewish religion, nor were circumcised. These are, in Acts 17:4, called "devout Greeks." And although the epithet "devout" is not here added, yet in the New Testament, things, though changed somewhat, retain their original names. Compare Matt. 23:6, where Simon, though heathen, is still called "the leper." So, also, those who in verse 42 of Acts 13, are called "the Gentiles," are, in the next verse, styled "religious proselytes." There is, then, no difficulty in supposing that "Greeks" here simply denotes proselytes. But these "Greeks" are said to be of those who had proceeded to Jerusalem at the passover, to celebrate the festival. Now, that the Gentiles were accustomed to do this, cannot be proved. Others, therefore, understand by these, the Gentile proselytes, called proselytes of the gate, for these Greeks, but doubted whether they should speed, The hour is come, when the Son of man shall be glorified, by the accession of the Gentiles to the church, and in order to that He must be rejected of the Jews.

The end designed hereby, is the glorifying of the Redeemer; 'And is it so? Do the Gentiles begin to inquire after?' Does the morning-star appear to them; and the day-spring begin to take hold of the ends of the earth? Then the hour is come for the glorifying of the Son of man.' This was no surprise to Christ, but a paradox to those about Him. Note, [1.] The effectual calling of the Gentiles into the church of God, greatly redounded to the glory of the Son of man. The multiplying of the redeemed, was the magnifying of the Redeemer. [2.] There was a set time for the glorifying of the Son of man, which came at last, when the days of his humiliation were numbered and finished, and He speaks of its approach with exultation and triumph; The hour is come.

The strange way in which this end was to be attained, was by the death of Christ, intimated in this simile; 'Verily, verily, I say unto you, to whom I have spoken of my death and sufferings, that except a corn of wheat fall, not only to, but into the ground, and die, be buried and lost, it abideth alone, and you never see any more of it; but if it die according to the course of nature, it bringeth forth much fruit; God giving to every seed its own body.' Christ is this Corn of wheat, the most valuable and useful grain.

The necessity of Christ's humiliation is intimated. He had never been the quickening Head and Root of the church, if He had not descended from heaven to this accursed earth, and ascended from earth to the accursed tree. He must pour out his soul unto death, else He cannot divide a portion with the great, Isa. 53:12. He shall have a seed given Him, but must shed his blood, to purchase and purify them; must win and wear them. It was necessary likewise, as a qualification for that glory, which He was to have by the accession of multitudes to his church; for if He had not by his sufferings made satisfaction for sin, and so brought in an everlasting righteousness, He had not been provided to entertain those that should come to Him, and therefore must abide alone.

The advantage of Christ's humiliation is illustrated. He fell to the ground in his incarnation, seemed to be buried alive in this earth, so much was his glory veiled; but that was not all, He died, this immortal Seed submitted to the laws of mortality, lay in the grave like seed under the clods; but as the seed comes up again green, fresh, and flourishing, and with great increase, so one dying Christ gathered to Himself thousands of living Christians, and He became their Root. The salvation of souls hitherto, and henceforward to the end of time, is all owing to the dying of this Corn of wheat. Hereby the Father and Son are glorified, the church replenished, the mystical body is kept up, and will at length be completed; and when time shall be no more, the Captain of our salvation, bringing many sons to glory by the virtue of his death, and being so made perfect by sufferings, shall be celebrated forever with the who were born and bred as Gentiles, but afterwards made profession of the Mosaic religion. So Titman. Such were those who desired an interview with Jesus. They had probably seen, or at least heard of, his triumphant entry into Jerusalem; were aware that the people regarded Him as the promised Messiah, and saluted Him as king of Israel; and knew that great was the expectation of all the followers of Christ, that He would soon establish his earthly kingdom. In its honors and advantages they therefore desired to participate; (as the sons of Zebedee, Matt. 20:20.) and therefore anxiously wished to recommend themselves to the notice and favor of Jesus. This wish they seem to have communicated to Philip and Andrew, as having especially expressed expectations of the speedy establishment of Christ's kingdom. Wherefore Jesus undeceives them. Verse 24.

[Die.] This is spoken according to the im, effect philosophy of that age. By death, says Lampe, is here meant, not the total destruction of parts, but only the dissolution and corruption of those which do not contain the germ, from which the new plant is produced. This is analogous to the death of man, by which, properly speaking, that alone turns to corruption which is not the germ of the body; this being preserved for resurrection by Divine Providence.

hate, that is, despise, as insufficient to make us happy, dread the temptations that are in them, and cheerfully part with them whenever they come in competition with the service of Christ, Acts 20:24. 21:13. Rev. 12:11. See here the power of godliness—it conquers the strongest natural affections; and the mystery of godliness—it is the greatest wisdom, and yet makes men hate their own lives. 2dly. Those who, in love to Christ, hate their own lives in this world, shall be abundantly recompensed in the resurrection of the just. He that hateth his life, shall keep it; he puts it into the hands of One that will keep it to life eternal, and restore it with as great an improvement, as the heavenly life can make of the earthly one.

If any man profess to serve Me, let him follow Me, as a servant his master; and where I am, there let my servant be; so some read it as part of the duty. Let him be, to attend upon Me; we read it as part of the promise, There shall he be in happiness with Me. And lest this should seem a small matter, He adds, If any man serve Me, him will my Father honor. The Greeks desired to see Jesus; but Christ lets them know that it was not enough to see Him, they must serve Him. He did not come into the world, to be gazed at, but is a King to be ruled by. He saith this for the encouragement of those who inquired after Him, to become his servants. In taking servants, it is usual to fix both the work and the wages; Christ does both here.

[1.] The work Christ expects is very easy and reasonable, and such as becomes his servants.

1st. Let them attend their Master's motions; let him follow Me. Christians must follow Christ, do the things that He saith; walk as He also walked; follow his conduct, by his providence and Spirit. We must go whither He leads us, and in the way He leads us; follow the Lamb whithersoever He goes before us. If any man serve Me, let him apply himself to the business, admiring praises of saints and angels, Heb. 2:10-13.

He foretells and promises abundant recompense to them who cordially embrace Him, his Gospel and interest, and make it appear that they do so, by faithfulness in suffering for, or in serving Him.

In suffering for Him, (v. 25.) He that loves his life better than Christ, shall lose it; but he that hates his life in this world, and prefers the favor of God and an interest in Christ before it, shall keep it unto life eternal. This doctrine Christ much insisted on, it being the great design of his religion to wean us from this world, by setting before us another world.

See here the fatal consequence of an inordinate love of life; many a man loses his life by over-loving it. He that so loves his animal life, as to indulge his appetite, and make provision for the flesh, to fulfil the lusts thereof, shortens his days, shall lose the life he is so fond of, and another infinitely better. He that is so much in love with the life of the body, its ornaments and delights, as, for fear of exposing it or them, to deny Christ, shall lose it; lose a real happiness in the other world, while he thinks to secure an imaginary one in this. Skin for skin a man may give for his life, and make a good bargain; but he that gives his soul, his God, his heaven, buys life too dear, and is guilty of his folly, who sold a birth-right for a mess of pottage.

See the recompense of a holy contempt of life. He that so hates the life of the body, as to venture that for the preserving of the life of his soul, shall find both in eternal life. Note, 1st. It is required of the disciples of Christ, that they hate their life in this world; a life in this world supposes a life in the other, and this is hated when it is loved less than that. Our life in this world includes all the enjoyments of our present state, riches, honors, pleasures, and long life in the possession of them: these we must and be always ready at my call.' Or, 'If any man do indeed serve Me, let him make an open and public profession of his relation to Me, by following Me, as the servant owns his master by following him in the streets.'

2dly. Let them attend their Master's repose; Where I am, there let my servant be, to wait upon Me. Christ is where his church is, in the assemblies of his saints, where his ordinances are administered; there let his servants be, to present themselves, and receive instructions from Him. Or, 'Where I am to be in heaven, there let the thoughts, and affections, and conversation of my servants be, where Christ sitteth,' Col. 3:1, 2.

[2.] The wages Christ promises his servants; they are very rich and noble.

1st. They shall be happy with Him; Where I am, there shall also my servant be. To be with Him, when in poverty and disgrace, would seem but poor preferment, and therefore, doubtless, He means being with Him in paradise, sitting with Him at his table above; on his throne; it is the happiness of heaven to be with Christ there, ch. 17:24. Christ speaks of heaven's happiness as if already in it, Where I am; because He was sure of it, and near to it. The same joy and glory which He thought recompense enough for all his services and sufferings, are proposed to his servants as the recompense of theirs. They that follow Him in the way, shall be with Him in the end.

2dly. They shall be honored by his Father; He will make them amends for all their pains and loss, by conferring an honor on them, such as becomes a great God to give, but far beyond what worms of the earth could expect. The Rewarder is God Himself, who takes the services done to the Lord Jesus as done to Himself. The reward is true, lasting honor; the honor that comes from God. It is said, (Prov. 27:18.) He that waits on his master, (humbly and diligently,) shall be honored. Those that wait on Christ, God will honor, though now under a veil. Thus far Christ's discourse has reference to those Greeks who desired to see Him, encouraging them to serve Him; what became of those Greeks, we are not told, but are willing to hope that they who thus asked the way to heaven, with their faces thitherward, found it, and walked in it.

V. 27-36. Honor is here done to Christ by the Father, in a voice from heaven, occasioned by the following part of his discourse, and gives occasion to a further conference with the people.

I. Christ addressed his Father, upon occasion of the trouble which seized his spirit at this time; (v. 27.) Now is my soul troubled. A strange word to come from Christ's mouth, and at this time surprising, for it comes in the midst of pleasing prospects, in which, one would think, He would have said, Now is my soul pleased. Note, Trouble of soul sometimes follows after great enlargements of spirit. In this world of mixture and change we must expect damps upon our joy, and the highest degree of comfort to be the next degree to trouble. When Paul had been in the third heaven, he had a thorn in the flesh.

Christ's dread of his approaching sufferings;

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 20-26. Those who are nearest to the means of grace, often ripen the most rapidly for vengeance, while sinners come from afar to inquire after Christ: and it is joyful, to hear the ignorant and careless desiring the instructions and prayers of ministers. To receive inquirers of this character is his glory and joy; and when they approach Him, 'He sees of the travail of his soul and is satisfied.' (Note, Is. 53:11, 12.)—So great was his love to us perishing rebels, that He would not abide alone in heavenly felicity; but chose to assume our nature, to submit to death in its most dreadful form, and to be laid in the grave; that He might return to glory, and be followed by an unnumerable multitude of those, whom He had 'redeemed unto God with his blood!' While we admire this love of our Redeemer, let us inquire whether our conduct and character prove us to be the increase of this 'Corn of wheat.' Selfish, ambitious, contentious, revengeful, or sensual professors of Christianity, are not the genuine produce from the holy Jesus. Such are doubtless the tares, which the enemy has sown in the field, and which will at last be separated and cast into the fire: while the wheat, who are conformed by divine grace to their Savior's likeness, shall be preserved to his heavenly kingdom. (Notes, Matt. 13:36-43. 2 Cor. 3:1-6. P. O.) Let us 'then examine whether 'Christ be in us, the Hope of glory;' and let us beg of Him to render us more and more indifferent about this life and its trifling concerns; that we may be ready to relinquish, venture, or suffer any thing, in order to obtain eternal life; and that we may serve the Lord Jesus with a willing mind, and follow his example. For where He is, there will all his true servants be forever, whatever station they have filled in his church on earth; and they will be honored by the Father before his holy angels, far above the most enlarged of their present expectations.

when we know not what to do, to turn our eyes to Him.

His prayer to the Father in this strait; Father, save Me from this hour—out of this hour: praying not so much that it might not come, as that He might be brought through it. This was the language of innocent nature, poured forth in prayer. Note, It is the duty and interest of troubled souls to have recourse to God by prayer, as a Father. Christ was voluntary in his sufferings, yet prayed to be saved from them. Note, Prayer against a trouble may very well consist with patience under it, and submission to the will of God. Observe, He calls his suffering, This hour, meaning the events of the time now at hand; hereby He intimates that the time of his suffering was, (1.) A set time, set to an hour, and He knew it. It was said twice before, that his hour was not yet come, but it was now so near that He might say it was come. (2.) A short time; an hour is soon over, so were Christ's sufferings; He could see through them to the joy set before Him.

He presently corrects Himself, and, as it were, recalls what He had said; But for this cause came I to this hour. Innocent nature got the first word, but divine wisdom and love the last. Note, They who would proceed regularly, must go upon second thoughts. With the second thought He checked Himself; For this cause came I to this hour; He does not silence Himself with this, that He could not avoid it, there was no remedy; but satisfies Himself, that He could not avoid it, for it was his own voluntary engagement, and the crown of his whole undertaking. Reference is here had to the divine counsels concerning his sufferings, by virtue of which, it behooved Him to submit and suffer. Note, This should reconcile us to the darkest hours of our lives, that we were all along designed for them; see 1 Thess. 3:3.

Upon the withdrawing of his former petition, He presents another; Father, glorify thy name; to the same purport with, Father, thy will be done, for God's will is his glory. This speaks more than barely a submission to the will of God, it is a consecration of his sufferings to the glory of God. It was a mediatorial word, and was spoken by Him as our Surety. The wrong which by sin we have done to God, is in his glory, his declarative glory; for in nothing else are we capable of doing Him injury. We were never able to make Him satisfaction for this wrong done Him, nor any creature for us; nothing therefore remained, but that God should get Him honor upon us in our utter ruin. Here therefore our Lord Jesus interposed, undertook to satisfy God's injured honor, and He did it by his humiliation; He denied Himself

None is my soul troubled. Now the black and dismal scene began, now were the first throes of the travail of his soul, now his soul began to be exceeding sorrowful. Note, (1.) The sin of our souls was the trouble of Christ's soul, when He undertook to redeem us, and to make his soul an offering for our sin. (2.) The trouble of his soul was designed to ease the trouble of ours; for, after this, He said to his disciples, (ch. 14: 1.) Let not your hearts be troubled; why should yours be troubled and mine too? Our Lord went on cheerfully in his work, in prospect of the joy set before Him, and yet submitted to trouble of soul. Holy mourning is consistent with spiritual joy, and the way to eternal joy. Christ was now troubled, now in sorrow, now in fear, for a season; but it would not be so always, nor long. The same is the comfort of Christians in their troubles. They are but for a moment, and will be turned into joy.

And what shall I say? This does not speak Him consulting with any other, as if He needed advice, but considering with Himself what was fit to be said now. When our souls are troubled, we must take heed of speaking unadvisedly, but debate with ourselves what we shall say. Christ speaks like one at a loss, as if what He should choose He wot not. There was a struggle between the work He had taken upon Him, which required sufferings, and the nature He had taken upon Him, which dreaded them; between these two He pauses with, What shall I say? He looked, and there was none to help. Calvin observes this as a great instance of Christ's humiliation, that He should speak thus like one at a plunge. The more entirely the Lord of glory emptied Himself, the brighter is the proof of the love He bare us. Thus He was in all points tempted as we are, to encourage us, in, and divested Himself of, the honors due the Son of God incarnate. Here He makes a tender of his satisfaction as an equivalent; Father, glorify thy name; let thy justice be honored upon the Sacrifice, not upon the sinner; let the debt be levied upon Me, I am solvent, the principal is not; thus He restored that which He took not away.

II. The Father heard Him, and this answer was given—by a voice from heaven. The Jews speak much of the daughter of a voice as one of those divers manners by which God in time past spake to the prophets; but we do not find any instance of his speaking thus to any but our Lord Jesus; it was an honor reserved for Him, Matt. 3: 17. 17: 5.

The answer was an express return to that petition, Father, glorify thy name. I have glorified it, and I will glorify it yet again. When we pray, Our Father, hallowed be thy name, this is a comfort to us, that it is an answered prayer; answered to Christ here, and, in Him, to all true believers. (1.) The name of God had been glorified in the life of Christ, in his doctrine and miracles, and all the examples He gave of holiness and goodness. (2.) It should be further glorified in the death and sufferings of Christ; his wisdom and power, his justice and holiness, his truth and goodness, were greatly glorified; the demands of a broken law were answered, the affront done to God's government satisfied for, and God declared Himself well pleased. What God has done for the glorifying of his own name, is an encouragement to us to expect what He will yet further do.

Of the standers-by, we may hope there were some whose minds were so well prepared to receive a divine revelation, that they understood what was said. But notice is here taken of the perverse suggestion of the multitude; some of them said that it thundered, others, who took notice that there was an articulate voice, said that certainly an angel spake to Him. Now this shows, 1. That it was a real thing, even in the judgment of those that were not at all well affected to Him. 2. That they were loath to admit so plain a proof of Christ's divine mission. They would rather say that it was this, or that, or any thing, than that God spake to Him in answer to his prayer; and yet, if it thundered with articulate sounds, (as Rev. 10: 3, 4.) was not that God's voice? Or, if angels spake to Him, are not they God's messengers? But thus God speaks once, yea twice, and man perceives it not.

The account our Savior Himself gives of this voice is, 'It came not because of Me, not merely for my encouragement and satisfaction,' (then it might have been whispered in his ear privately,) 'but for your sakes.' (1.) 'That all you who heard it, may believe that the Father hath sent Me.' What is said from heaven concerning Jesus, and the glorifying of the Father in Him, is said for our sakes, that we might submit to, and rest upon Him. (2.) 'That you, who are to follow Me in sufferings, may therein be comforted with the same comforts that carry Me on.' Let this encourage them to part with life itself for his sake, if called to it, that it should redound to the honor of God. Note, The promises and supports granted to Jesus in his sufferings, were intended for our sakes. For our sakes He sanctified Himself, and comforted Himself.

He that lay in the Father's bosom, knew his voice, and what was the meaning of it; two

'Some think the phrase, this world, meant the general wickedness then so prevalent among the Jews and Gentiles; a simple ignorance of divine truths; errors, unbelief, idolatry, vices and crimes of every sort, an, the misery resulting from them; the general body of sinners in the whole world; and by "the prince," either properly the evil spirit, i. e. Satan; or, as others think, improperly, and by personification, "the spirit of wickedness." For when, in the New Testament, mention is made of "the prince of this world," some would understand the devil, and are of opinion that he was so called, either from the manner of thinking and speaking, at that time in use among all nations, and more particularly the Jews, (especially after the Babylonish captivity,) who thought that the whole world, and peculiarly the air, was filled with demons, both good and evil; and that their prince called, by way of eminence, the devil, had a power over the bodies and external affairs of men, as also over their minds; and was the author of all evils, but especially of vice and sin, and thus held his chief dominion among the Gentiles; or, on this account, namely, since he is said to be the author of all sin and misery, by exciting men to sin, for which reason sinners are said to be the works of the devil. Others understand the "genius of the age," what we call a spirit of unbelief and iniquity; and the word translated prince is indeed so used in the New Testament, as in Eph. 2: 2, where this sense is clear; first, from his being called the prince of the power of the air, (or, as in some places, of darkness, i. e. wickedness;) and secondly, since in the preceding words there is the synonyme, "the course of this world," i. e. the genius and the manners of the age. Or when the apostle attaches power to Satan (Acts 26: 18) he explains it in Col. 1: 13, by the power of darkness, and opposes to it "the kingdom of his beloved Son." So that "the prince of this world" means the influence vice exerted over the minds of men." Tittman. (But see P. O. 47—33.)

lasting righteousness was thereby brought in, not for Jews only, but the whole world, 1 John 2:1, 2. Dan. 9:24. 3dly. It is a judgment of condemnation against the powers of darkness; see ch. 16:11. Judgment is put for the asserting of an invaded right. At the death of Christ there was a trial between the serpent and the promised seed, for the world, and the lordship of it; the devil had borne sway among the children of men, time out of mind; he now pleads prescription, grounding his claim also upon the forfeiture incurred by sin. We find him willing to have come to a composition; (Luke 4:6, 7.) he would have given the kingdoms of this world to Christ, provided He would hold them by, from, and under him: but Christ, by dying, takes off the forfeiture to divine justice, then fairly disputes the title, and recovers it in the court of heaven. Satan's dominion is declared to be an usurpation, and the world adjudged to the Lord Jesus as his right, Ps. 2: 6, 8.

None is the prince of this world cast out.

The devil is here called the prince of this world, because he rules over the men of the world by the things of the world; he is the ruler of the darkness of this world, that is, of this dark world, of those in it that walk in darkness, 2 Cor. 4: 4. Eph. 6: 12.

He is said to be now cast out; for, whatever had been done hitherto toward the weakening of the devil's kingdom, was done in the virtue of a Christ to come, and therefore is said to be done now. Christ, reconciling the world to God by his death, broke the power of death, and cast out Satan as a destroyer; Christ, reducing the world to God by the doctrine of his cross, broke the power of sin, and cast out Satan as a deceiver. The bruising of his heel was the breaking of the serpent's head, Gen. 3: 15. When his oracles were silenced, his temples forsaken, his idols famished, and the kingdoms of the world become Christ's kingdoms, then was the prince of this world cast out, as appears by comparing this with Rev. 12: 8-11. where it is said to be done by the blood of the Lamb. Christ's frequent casting of devils out of the bodies of people, was an indication of the great design of his undertaking.

(2.) By the death of Christ souls shall be converted, and that would be the casting out of Satan; If I be lifted up from the earth, I will draw all men unto Me.

The great design of our Lord Jesus was, to draw all men to Him, not the Jews only, who had been long in profession near to God, but the Gentiles also, who had been afar off; He was to be the desire of all nations, (Hag. 2: 7.) and to Him must the gathering of the people be. His enemies dreaded that the world would go after Him, notwithstanding their opposition. Christ is all in all in the conversion of a soul. 1st. It is Christ that draws; I will draw. It is sometimes ascribed to the Father, (ch. 6: 44.) but here to the Son, who is the Arm of the Lord. He does not drive by force, but draws with the cords of a man, (Hos. 11: 4. Jer. 31: 3.) as the lodestone; the soul is willing, things God intended, when He said that He would glorify his own name.

(1.) That, by the death of Christ, Satan should be conquered; (v. 31.) Now is the judgment. He speaks with a divine exultation, 'Now the year of my redeemed is come, and the time prefixed for the breaking of the serpent's head; now for that glorious achievement, so long thought of in the divine counsels, talked of in the written Word, so much the hope of saints, and the dread of devils.'

Now is the judgment of this world; 'Now is the crisis of this world.' The sick and diseased world is now upon the turning point, this is the critical day, upon which the trembling scale will turn for life or death, to all mankind; all that are not recovered by this, will be left hopeless. Or, rather, the death of Christ was the judgment of this world. 1st. A judgment of discovery and distinction. Men shall have their character according as the cross of Christ is to them; to some it is foolishness and a stumbling-block, and to others the wisdom and power of God; of which there was a figure in the thieves crucified with Him. By this, men are judged, what they think of the death of Christ. 2dly.

It is a judgment of favor and absolution. Christ upon the cross interposed as a Sacrifice for sin and a Surety for sinners, so that when He was judged, and iniquity laid upon Him, and He was wounded for our transgressions, it was as it were the judgment of this world, for an ever-but it is in a day of power. 2dly. It is to Christ that we are drawn; 'I will draw them to Me as the centre of their unity.' The soul that was at a distance from Christ, is brought into an acquaintance with Him; though shy and distrustful of Him, it is brought to love and trust Him; drawn up to his terms, into his arms. Christ was now going to heaven, and would draw men's hearts to Him thither.

The strange method He took to accomplish his design, by being lifted up from the earth. What He meant by that, to prevent mistake, we are told; (v. 33.) This He spoke, signifying by what death He should die, the death of the cross, though they had designed, and attempted to stone Him to death. He was lifted up as a spectacle to the world, between heaven and earth, as unworthy of either; yet the word here used signified an honorable advancement, If I be exalted; He reckoned his sufferings his honor. Whatever death we die, if we die in Christ, we shall be lifted up out of this dungeon, this den of lions, into the regions of light and love. We should learn of our Master to speak of dying with a holy pleasantness, and to say, 'We shall then be lifted up.'

Christ's drawing all men to Him, followed his being lifted up. It followed after it in time. The great increase of the church was after the death of Christ; while Christ lived, we read of thousands at a sermon miraculously fed, but it was after his death that we read of thousands at a sermon added to the church. It followed as a blessed consequence of it. Note, There is powerful virtue and efficacy in the death of Christ, to draw souls to Him. The cross of Christ, though to some a stumbling-stone, to others is a load-stone. Some make it an allusion to the drawing of fish into a net; the lifting up of Christ was as the spreading of the net; (Matt. 13: 47, 48.) or to the setting up of a standard, which draws soldiers together; or rather, it refers to the lifting up of the brazen serpent in the wilderness, which drew all those to it that were stung with fiery serpents, as soon as it was known that it was lifted up, and there was healing virtue in it. Oh, what flocking was there to it! So there was to Christ, when salvation through Him was preached to all nations; see ch. 3: 14, 15.

The people, though they had heard the voice from heaven, and the gracious words that proceeded out of his mouth, object, and pick quarrels with Him. Christ had called Himself, the Son of man, (v. 23.) which they knew to be one of the titles of the Messiah, Dan. 7: 13. He had also said, that the Son of man must be lifted up, which they understood of his dying, and, probably, He explained Himself so; and some think repeated what He said to Nicodemus, (ch. 3: 14.) So must the Son of man be lifted up. Against this,

They alleged those Scriptures which speak of the perpetuity of the Messiah, that He should be so far from being cut off in the midst of his days, that He should be a Priest forever, (Ps. 110: 4.) and a King forever, (Ps. 89: 29, &c.) that He should have length of days forever and ever, and his years as many generations; (Ps. 61: 6.) from all this they inferred that the Messiah should not die. Great knowledge in the letter of Scripture, if the heart be unsanctified, is capable of being abused to serve the cause of infidelity, and to fight against Christianity with

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 27-33. Even temporary pain and suffering are grievous; and the holy Jesus felt a reluctance of nature to the load of anguish, which He endured for our sins. We cannot therefore choose suffering for its own sake; reluctance of mind and inward perturbation will be felt on such occasions. The true believer will sometimes scarcely know what he shall say: his nature will plead, 'Father, save me from this hour;' (Note, 18: 10-14, v. 11.) but grace will enable him to add, 'Father, glorify thy name;' and, after the example of his crucified Lord, he will be resigned to suffering, that God may be glorified. This state of mind and heart, notwithstanding all its defects, will be graciously accepted through Him, who has glorified the Father, and will glorify Him, to all eternity.—In the great event of the death of Christ, faith beholds the world judged and condemned; Satan vanquished and deprived of his dominion; his slaves liberated, his works destroyed, his cause eventually ruined; and while we look to Jesus upon the cross, we find ourselves impelled by fear to flee from deserved wrath, allured by hope to seek unmerited mercy, and drawn by admiration and gratitude to renounce all other confidences, to break through all impediments, to cast away all our transgressions, and to give up all other interests, that we may enlist under the Redeemer's banner, and aspire to a participation of his glory. (Notes, 1: 29. Heb. 12: 2, 3.)

inds are stones of stumbling—as Christ crucified, and yet glorified; lifted up from the earth, yet drawing all men to Him.

They ask, hereupon, Who is this Son of man? This they asked tauntingly, as if now they had baffled Him. 'Thou sayest, The Son of man must die; we have proved the Messiah must not; where is then thy Messiahship? This Son of man, as Thou callest Thyself, cannot be the Messiah.' His meanness and poverty prejudiced them against Christ; they would rather have no Christ than a suffering one.

The objection was a perfect cavil; they might, if they pleased, answer it themselves. Man dies, and yet is immortal, and abideth forever, so the Son of man; therefore, instead of answering these fools according to their folly, He gives them a serious caution to take heed of trifling away the day of their opportunities, in such vain and fruitless cavils as these; 'Yet a little while, and but a little while, is the light with you; therefore be wise, and walk while ye have the light.'

In general, we may observe here, 1. The concern Christ has for the souls of men, and his desire of their welfare. With what tenderness does He here admonish those to look well to themselves, who were contriving ill against Him? Even when He endured the contradiction of sinners, He endeavored their conversion. See Prov. 29:10. 2. The method He takes with those objectors; with meekness instructing those that opposed themselves, 2 Tim. 2:25. Were but men's consciences awakened by a due concern about their everlasting state, and did they consider how little time they have to spend, and none to spare, they would not waste thoughts and time in cavils.

We have here,

(1.) The privilege and advantage of having Christ and his Gospel, with the shortness and uncertainty of the enjoyment of it; yet a little while is the light with you. Christ is this light; and some of the ancients suggest, that, in calling Himself the Light, He gives a tacit answer to their objection. His dying was as consistent with his abiding forever, as the setting of the sun is with his perpetuity. The duration of Christ's kingdom is compared to that of the sun and moon, Ps. 72:17. 89:36, 37. The ordinances of heaven are unchangeably fixed, yet the sun and moon set and are eclipsed; so Christ, the Sun of righteousness, abides forever, and yet was eclipsed by his sufferings, and was but a little while within our horizon. The Jews at this time had the light with them, they had Christ's presence, heard his preaching, saw his miracles. The Scripture is to us a light shining in a dark place. It was to be but a little while with them; Christ would shortly leave them, their visible church state would soon after be dissolved, and the kingdom of God taken from them, and blindness and hardness would happen to Israel. Note, It is good for us all to consider what a little while we are to have the light with us. Time is short, and perhaps opportunity not so long. The candlestick may be removed; however, we must be removed shortly. Yet a little while is the light of life with us; yet a little while is the light of the Gospel with us, the day of grace, the means of grace, the Spirit of grace, a very little while.

The warning to make the best of these advantages, because of the danger of losing them; Walk while ye have the light: as travellers make the best of their way forward, that they may not be benighted, because travelling in the night is unsafe. 'Come,' say they, 'let us mend our pace, while we have day-light.' Thus would should we be for our souls, who are journeying towards eternity. Note, [1.] It is our business to press forward toward heaven, and get nearer it by being made fitter for it. Our life is but a day, and we have a day's journey to go. [2.] The best time of walking is while we have the light. The day is the proper season for work, as the night is for rest. The proper time for getting grace is when the word of its own weapons. Their perverseness, in opposing this to what Jesus had said, will appear, if we consider, that, when they vouched the Scripture to prove that the Messiah abideth forever, they took no notice of those texts which speak of the Messiah's death: they had heard out of the law, that Messiah abideth forever; and had they never heard out of the law, that Messiah shall be cut off, (Dan. 9:26.) and that He shall pour out his soul unto death, (Isa. 53:12.) and particularly, that his hands and feet should be pierced? Note, We often run into great mistakes, and then defend them with scripture-arguments, by putting those things asunder, which God in his Word has put together; and opposing one truth, under pretence of supporting another. We have heard, out of the Gospel, that which exalts free grace; we have heard also that which enjoins duty, and we must cordially embrace both, and not set them at variance. When they opposed what Christ said concerning the sufferings of the Son of man, they took no notice of what He said concerning his glory and exaltation. They had heard out of the law, that Christ abideth forever; and had they not heard our Lord say that He should be glorified, that He should bring forth much fruit, and draw all men to Him? Had He not just now promised immortal honors to his followers, which supposed his abiding forever? But this they overlook. Thus unfair disputants oppose some parts of the opinion of an adversary, to which, if they would but take it entire, they could not but subscribe; and in the doctrine of Christ there are paradoxes, which to men of corrupt grace is preached to us, and the Spirit of grace strives with us; then is the time to take heed. [3.] We are highly concerned thus to improve opportunities, for fear lest our day be finished before we have finished our day's work and journey. Then darkness comes, that is, such an utter incapacity to make sure the great salvation, as renders the state of the careless sinner deplorable; so that if his work be undone then, it is likely to be undone forever.

The sad condition of those who have sinned away the Gospel, and are come to the period of their day of grace. They walk in darkness, and know neither where, nor whither they go; neither the way they are walking in, nor the end they are walking toward. He that is destitute of the light of the Gospel, not acquainted with its discoveries and directions, wanders endlessly in mistakes and errors, and is not aware of it. Set aside the instructions of the Christian doctrine, and we know little of the difference between good and evil. He is going to destruction, and knows not his danger, for he is either sleeping or dancing at the pit's brink.

The great duty and interest of every one of us, is inferred from all this: While ye have the light, believe in the light. The Jews had now Christ's presence with them, let them improve it; afterward they had the first offers of the Gospel by the apostles wherever they came; this is an admonition to them to accept the offer when it is made: Christ saith the same to us all who enjoy the Gospel. Note, It is the duty of every one to believe in the gospel-light, to receive it as a divine light, to subscribe to the truths it discovers, and to follow its conduct. Christ is the light; we must believe in Him as revealed to us; as a true light that will not deceive us. We are concerned to do this, while we have the Gospel to show us the way to Him. They that believe in the light, shall be the children of light, shall be owned as Christians, who are called children of light, (Luke 16:8. Eph. 5:8.) and of the day, 1 Thes. 5:5. They that have God for their Father, are children of light, for God is light; they are born from above, and heirs of heaven, for heaven is light.

Christ's retiring from them, hereupon; These things spake Jesus, and said no more at this time, but left this to their consideration, and departed, and did hide Himself from them. And this He did for their conviction and awakening. If they will not regard what He hath said, He will have nothing more to say to them. They are joined to their infidelity, as Ephraim to idols; let them alone. Note, Christ justly removes the means of grace from those that quarrel with them, and hides his face from a forward generation, Deut. 32:20. He hid Himself from their rage, retreating, it is probable, to Bethany, where He lodged. By this it appears, that what He said exasperated them, and they were made worse by that which should have made them better.

V. 37-41. We have here the honor done our Lord Jesus by the Old-Testament prophets, who foretold and lamented the infidelity of the many that believed not on Him. It was a dishonor and grief to Christ, that his doctrine met with so much opposition; but this takes off the wonder and reproach, makes the offence of it to cease, and it caused no disappointment to Christ, that herein the Scriptures were fulfilled. Two things are here said concerning this untractable people, and both were foretold by the evangelical prophet Isaiah, that they did not, and could not, believe.

They did not believe; Though He had done so many miracles before them. Observe,

The plenty of the means of conviction which Christ afforded them; He did miracles, so many miracles; it signifies both so many, and so great. It refers to all the miracles He had wrought formerly; nay, the blind and lame now came to Him into the temple, and He healed them, Matt. 21:14. His miracles were the great proof of his mission, and on their evidence He relied. He here insists upon their number and notoriety. The multitude of them was no, only a proof of his unexhausted power, but gave the greater opportunity to examine them; [747]

ed. The Gospel is here called their report; Who has believed our hearing, which we have heard, from God, and which you have heard from us; our report is the report of a matter of fact. It is foretold, that few comparatively of those to whom this report is brought, will be persuaded to credit it. Many hear, but few heed and embrace it; Who hath believed it? Here and there one, but none to speak of; not the wise, not the noble; it is to them but a report which wants confirmation. It is spoken of as a thing to be greatly lamented, that so few believe the report of the Gospel. A sorrowful account is brought to God by the messengers, of the cold entertainment they and their report had; as the servant came, and showed his lord all these things, Luke 14: 21. The reason why men believe not the report of the Gospel, is, the arm of the Lord is not revealed to them, they do not acquaint themselves with, and submit themselves to, the grace of God; they do not experimentally know the virtue and fellowship of Christ's death, in which the arm of the Lord is revealed. They saw Christ's miracles, but did not see the arm of the Lord revealed in them.

They could not believe, because Esaias said, He hath blinded their eyes. This is a hard saying, who can explain it? We are sure that God is infinitely just and merciful, and therefore we cannot think that there is in any impotency to good, resulting from the counsels of God, as lays them under a fatal necessity of being evil; God damns none by mere sovereignty, yet it is said, They could not believe. Austin, coming in course to the exposition of these words, expresses himself with a holy fear of entering upon an inquiry into this mystery. His judgments are just, but hidden. 1. They could not believe, that is, they would not; they were obstinately resolved in their infidelity; thus Chrysostom and Austin incline to understand it; and the former gives divers instances of Scripture of the putting of an impotency to signify the invincible refusal of the will, as Gen. 37: 4. They could not speak peaceably to Him. And ch. 7: 7. This is a moral impotency, like that of

The prophecy was not the motive, or the cause, of their wickedness; but it was the declaration of the purpose of God, which could not be defeated; as, therefore, this prophecy stood in Scripture against them, and others of like character, who hated the truth from love of sin. The event became certain: in which sense it is said, that they could not believe. (Note, 2 Thes. 2: 8-12.) Numbers indeed were given up to judicial blindness; yet others in the multitude were not; and the preceding exhortations and warnings would eventually be useful to many of these, as well as manifest the desperate enmity of the others. In fact, a large remnant, according to the election of grace, were afterwards converted, while the bulk of the nation was left to be blinded and hardened. (Notes, Acts 21: 17-21. Rom. 11: 1-10.) The unfailing certainty of predicted events must arise, not only from the infallible foreknowledge of God, but also from his fixed decree; unless it can be thought that He foreknows things over which He has no power, and which He cannot possibly alter! But if thousands and ten thousands more of the Jews, rulers and priests among the number, had embraced the Gospel, these prophecies would nevertheless have been accomplished in all the unbelieving part of the nation; as the prediction and promise of God, concerning Abraham's seed inheriting Canaan, were fulfilled, though the generation which came first out of Egypt perished in the wilderness through their unbelief. (Num. 14: 27-30, 34. Ps. 95: 10-17.) So that no hindrance to any man's complying with our Lord's exhortations arose from the prophecy or purpose of God; which related only to those who obstinately refused to comply with them. (39.) Could not, (Mark 1: 45.) "That is," says Theophylact, out of Chrysostom, "they would not." And yet, if you look to the thing itself, it is true, that the reprobate do not believe; because they will not believe; so that this is the nearest, and most direct cause of their unbelief. But the evangelist goes deeper, when he says, "They could not believe;" for as the reprobate will not believe, so it is certain that they cannot be willing, because the darkness in which they are born cannot comprehend the light." Beza. (Note, Acts 28: 23-29.) St. John adds, that the prophet said these things, when he saw His glory and spake of Him; (41.) evidently meaning Christ, of whom he discoursed both before and afterwards. The reference is made to that august vision which Isaiah had, of the one that is accustomed to do evil, Jer. 13: 23. But, 2. They could not, because Esaias had said, He hath blinded their eyes. Here the difficulty increases; it is certain that God is not the author of sin, and yet,

(1.) The righteous hand of God is sometimes to be acknowledged in the blindness and obstinacy of those who persist in impenitence and unbelief, by which they are justly punished for their former resistance of divine light, and rebellion against the divine law. If God withhold abused grace, and give men over to indulge lusts; if He permit the evil spirit to do his work on them that resisted the good Spirit; and if in his providence He lay stumbling-blocks in the way of sinners, which confirm their prejudices, then He blinds their eyes, and hardens their hearts, and these are spiritual judgments, like the giving up of idolatrous gentiles to vile affections, and degenerate Christians to strong delusions.

Observe the method of conversion implied here, and the steps taken in it. Sinners are brought to discern the reality, and have some knowledge of divine things; to understand with their heart, to apply these things to themselves; not only to assent, but to consent and accept; to be converted, and turned from sin to Christ, from the world and the flesh to God. Then God will heal, justify, and sanctify them; will pardon their sins, which are as bleeding wounds, and mortify their corruptions, which are as lurking diseases. When God denies his grace, nothing of this is done; the alienation of the mind from, and its aversion to, God and the divine life, grows into a rooted and invincible antipathy, and so the case becomes desperate.

(2.) Judicial blindness and hardness are in the Word of God threatened against those who persist in wickedness, and were particularly foretold concerning the Jewish church and nation. Known unto God are all his works, and all ours too. Christ knew before who would betray Him, and spake of it, ch. 6: 70. This is a confirmation of the truth of scripture-prophecies, and thus even the unbelief of the Jews may help to strengthen our faith. It is also intended for caution to particular persons, to beware lest that come upon them, which was spoken of in the prophets, Acts 13: 40.

(3.) What God has foretold will certainly come to pass, and so it might be said, that therefore they could not believe, because God by the prophets had foretold they would not; for such is the knowledge of God, that He cannot be deceived in what He foresees, and such his truth, that He cannot deceive in what He fore- glory of the Lord; and the worship of the attendant seraphim; and the prophet then saw "the glory of Christ, and spake of Him;" from which we confidently infer that Jesus is JEHOVAH. The word, in the first verse of the chapter referred to, is not JEHOVAH, but ADONAI; but it is JEHOVAH in the third verse; and the words in the fifth verse, "Thine eyes have seen the King, the Lord of hosts," are very remarkable. (Marg. Ref. e-g—Notes, 1. 18. Is. 6: 1-5.) "If these words," "These things said Isaiah, when he saw his glory," are not to be understood of Christ, what use have they, or to what purpose do they serve? There being no need to tell us, that Isaiah then saw the "glory of God the Father, and spake of Him." Whithy. Scott.

(35.) The arm of the Lord been revealed. This phrase may allude to the habit, generally worn by the Easterns and especially by persons of rank, which was a long robe without sleeves; so that when the arm was stretched out to perform any action requiring strength, it would appear uncovered. [It was customary for heroes, when preparing for battle, to uncover the arms; (Virg. Æn. 5. and Arrian?) also when giving orders to their soldiers. See Plautus. Lamps, in Bloomfield.] (Compare Is. 53: 1.) In this connection it seems strongly to imply, that whenever true faith is produced in the mind, it is to be considered as the effect of a divine energy. (See Eph. 1: 19. and Col. 2: 12.) Doddridge. "I take the arm of the Lord to signify his Spirit, who at other times is represented as the Finger of God, and the Hand of the Lord; Luke, 11: 20. and Acts 1: 21."

(39.) "In all ancient languages, especially the Hebrew, any one is often said to do anything, who tells, narrates, and shows a thing to be, or to do; and thus verbs active are to be understood declaratively." [Compare 2 Kings 1: 16.] The meaning, therefore, of Is. 6: 10. is this: Go, show and declare to the people that their heart is heavy, &c. equivalent to "This people's heart is gross," &c. And so the Sept. have expressed it, and have been followed by Matthew and Luke. But John expresses it simply, He hath blinded, &c., without adding who has done so; which may be understood from Isaiah; for he who is taxed with blindness must be the author of his blindness.

Tittman, in Bloomfield. "They could not believe." It is not meant that they had a will to believe, and could not, but that they set themselves against having such a will." Dr. Wall.

happos those chief rulers were true believers, though very weak, and their faith like smoking flax. Note, Some are better than they seem. Their faults are known, but their repentance is not; a man's goodness may be concealed by a culpable yet pardonable weakness, which he himself truly repents of. The kingdom of God comes not in all with a like observation; nor have all they that are good the faculty of showing it as some have.

See the power of the world in smothering these convictions. They believed in Christ, but durst not confess Him, for fear of excommunication. Observe here,

1. Wherein they were defective; they did not confess Christ. Note, There is cause to question the sincerity of that faith, which is either afraid or ashamed to show itself; for those who believe with the heart, ought to confess with the mouth, Rom. 10: 9.

2. What they feared; being put out of the synagogue; disgrace and damage; as if it would do them any harm to be expelled a synagogue, that had made itself a synagogue of Satan, and from which God was departing.

3. What was at the bottom of this fear; they loved the praise of men, as a more valuable good, and a more desirable end, than the praise of God; which was an implicit idolatry, like that (Rom. 1: 25.) of worshipping and serving the creature more than the Creator. They set the praise of men in one scale, and considered how good it was to give praise to men, and pay deference to the Pharisees, and receive praise from men; to be commended by the chief priests, and applauded by the people, as good sons of the church. And they would not confess Christ, lest they should thereby derogate from the reputation of the Pharisees, and forfeit their own, and hinder their preferment. And besides, the followers of Christ were looked upon with contempt, which they who had been used to honor could not bear. Perhaps if they had known one another's minds, they would have had more courage; but each one thought that, if he should declare himself in favor of Christ, he should stand alone; whereas if any one had had resolution to break the ice, he would have had more seconds than he thought. They put the praise of God in the other scale; they were sensible that by confessing Christ they should both give praise to God, and have praise from God; but, they gave the preference to the praise of men, and that turned the scale; sense prevailed above faith. Note, Love of the praise of men is a great prejudice to the power and practice of religion. Many come short of the glory of God, by a regard to it. As a by-end in that which is good, it will make a man a hypocrite when religion is in fashion, and credit is to be got by it; and as a base principle in that which is evil, it will make a man an apostate, when religion is in disgrace, and credit is to be lost for it, as here. See Rom. 2: 29.

The evangelist, having quoted the prophecy, shows (v. 41.) that it was intended to look further than the prophet's own days, and that its principal reference was to the days of the Messiah.

We read in the prophecy, that this was said to Esaias, Isa. 6: 9. But here we are told that it was said by him to the purpose. For nothing was said by him as a prophet, which was not first said to him; nor any thing said to him, which was not afterward said by him. See Isa. 21: 10.

The vision the prophet there had of the glory of God, is here said to be his seeing the glory of Jesus Christ; he saw his glory. Jesus Christ therefore is equal in power and glory with the Father, and his praises are equally celebrated. Christ had a glory before the foundation of the world, and Esaias saw this.

It is said that the prophet there spake of Him. It seems to have been spoken of the prophet himself, (for to him the instructions were there given,) yet it is here said to be spoken of Christ, for as all the prophets testified of Him, so they typified Him. This they spake of Him, that, as to many, his coming would be not only fruitless, but fatal, a savor of death unto death. It might be objected against his doctrine, if it was from heaven, why did not the Jews believe it? But this is an answer to it; It was not for want of evidence, but because their heart was made fat, and their ears heavy. It was spoken of Christ, that He should be glorified in the ruin of an unbelieving multitude, as well as in the salvation of a distinguished remnant.

V. 42, 43. Some honor was done to Christ by these rulers, for they were convinced that He was sent of God; but they did not do Him honor enough, for they had not courage to own their faith. Many professed more kindness for Christ than they had; these had more kindness for Him than they were willing to profess.

See the power of the Word in the convictions many of them were under, who did not wilfully shut their eyes against the light. They, as Nicodemus, believed on Him, as a teacher come from God. Note, The truth of the Gospel has perhaps a better interest in the consciences of men than we are aware, 1 Kings 19: 18. Perhaps those chief rulers were true believers, though very weak, and their faith like smoking flax. Note, Some are better than they seem. Their faults are known, but their repentance is not; a man's goodness may be concealed by a culpable yet pardonable weakness, which he himself truly repents of. V. 44-50. We have here the honor Christ asserted to Himself, in the account He gave of his mission. Probably, this discourse was not at the same time with that before, (for then He departed, v. 36.) but some time after, when He made another appearance; and as this evangelist records it, it was Christ's farewell sermon to the Jews; all that follows, was private with his disciples. Observe, He cried and said, Doth not wisdom cry, (Prov. 8: 1.) without? Prov. 1: 20. The raising of his voice, and crying, intimate his boldness in speaking; though they had not courage openly to profess faith in his doctrine, He had courage openly to publish it; if they were ashamed of it, He was not; but set his face as a flint, Isa. 50: 7. He cried as one that was serious and importunate in what He said, as willing to impart to them, not only the Gospel of God, but even his own soul. It denotes his desire that all might take notice of it. This being the last time of the publication of his Gospel by Himself in his person, He makes proclamation, 'Whoever will hear Me, let them come now.'

What is this closing summary of Christ's discourses? It is much like that of Moses, (Deut. 30: 15.) See, I have set before you life and death. Christ here takes leave of the temple, with a solemn declaration of three things.

I. The privileges and dignities which they have, that believe; this gives great encouragement to us to believe in Christ, and to profess that faith. It is a thing we need not be either shy of doing, or of owning; for,

By believing in Christ we are brought into acquaintance with God; He that believes on Me, and so sees Me, believes on Him that sent Me, and sees Him. He that believes on Christ, does not believe in a mere man, such as He was generally taken to be, but in the Son of God, equal in power and glory with the Father. Or rather, his faith does not terminate in Christ, but through Him is carried out to the Father that sent Him; to whom, as our end, we come by Christ as our way. The doctrine of Christ is believed and received as the truth of God. The rest of a believing soul is in God through rewards of his heavenly presence should be lost, to secure a little regard from those who will ever long be themselves the objects of everlasting shame and contempt! Ver. 44-46.

'Morus, Rosenmüller, Kuinoel, and Tittman, agree that these verses form another part of the discourse of John, in which he meant to show that the Jews had no more faith in the doctrines than in the miracles of Jesus; and this was entirely their own fault. This brief summary of the principal discourses of Christ, during his triennial ministry, is given (as is usual with John) in the words of our Lord 45 And ^{he} that seeth me, seeth him that sent me.

46 I ^{am} come a Light into the world, that whosoever believeth on me should not abide in darkness.

47 And if any man hear my words, and believe not, ^I judge him not: for I came not to judge the world, but to save the world.

48 He that ^{rejecteth} me, and receiveth not my words, hath one that judgeth him: ^{the} word that I have spoken, the same shall ^{judge} him in the last day.

49 For ^I have not spoken of myself; but the Father which sent me, he gave me a commandment, what I should say, and what I should speak.

50 And I know that ^{his} commandment is life everlasting: whatsoever I speak therefore, even as the Father said unto me, so I speak.

The constructive malignity of their unbelief is, not receiving Christ's Word; it is interpreted, (v. 43.) a rejecting of Christ. It denotes a rejection with contempt. Where the gospel-banner is displayed, no neutrality is admitted; every man is either a subject or an enemy.

The wonderful forbearance of our Lord Jesus, towards those who slighted Him; I judge him not, not now. Note, Christ was not hasty to take advantage against those who refused the first offers of his grace, but continued waiting to be gracious. He did not strike those dumb or dead, who contradicted Him, never made intercession against Israel, as Elias; though He had authority to judge, He suspended the execution of it, because He had work of another nature to do, first, and that was to save the world. (1.) To save effectually those that were given Him, before He came to judge mankind. (2.) To offer salvation to all the world, so that it is their own fault if they be not saved. He was to put away sin by the sacrifice of Himself. The executing of the power of a judge was not congruous with that undertaking, Acts 3:33. In his humiliation his judgment was taken away. See

The unavoidable judgment of unbelievers at the day of the revelation of the righteous judgment of God; unbelief will certainly be a damning sin. Some think, when Christ saith, I judge no man, He means that they are condemned already; there needs no process, judgment goes against them of course, Heb. 2:3. Christ needs not appear against them as their accuser, they are miserable if He do not appear for them as their Advocate; however, He tells them plainly, when and where they will be reckoned with.

There is one that judgeth them. Nothing is more dreadful than abused patience, and grace trampled on; though for a while mercy rejoiceth against judgment, yet there will be judgment without mercy.

Their final judgment is reserved to the last day; to that day of judgment Christ binds over all unbelievers, to answer then for all the contempts that have been put upon Him. Divine justice has appointed a day, and adjourns the sentence to that day, as Matt. 26:64.

The Word of Christ will judge them then; The words that I have spoken, how light soever you have made of them, the same shall judge the unbeliever in the last day; as the apostles, the preachers of Christ's Word, are said to judge, Luke 22:30. Christ's words will judge unbelievers two ways. [1.] As the evidence of their crime, they will convict them. Every word Christ spoke, every kind offer, will be produced as testimony. [2.] As the rule of their doom, they will condemn them; they shall be judged according to the tenor of that covenant Christ procured and published. That word of Christ, He that believeth not, shall be damned, will judge all unbelievers to eternal ruin; and there are many such like words.

III. A solemn declaration of the authority Christ had to demand our faith, and require us to receive his doctrine on pain of damnation, v. 49, 50. Where observe,

1. The commission which our Lord Jesus received from the Father to deliver his doctrine to the world; (v. 49.) I have not spoken of Myself, as a mere man, much less a common man; but the Father gave Me a commandment what I should say. This is the same with what He said, ch. 7:16. My doctrine is not mine, for I have not spoken of Myself. Christ, as Son of man, did not speak that which was of human contrivance; as Son of God, He did not act separately, but what He said was the result of the counsels of peace; as Mediator, his coming into the world was voluntary, and with his full consent, but not arbitrary, and of his own head. But God the Father gave Him his commission, as his agent and plenipotentiary to concert matters between Him and man, to set a treaty of peace on foot, and to settle the articles. His instructions, here called a commandment, for they were like those given an ambassador, directed Him not only what He might say, but what He must say. Note, Our Lord Jesus learned obedience Himself, before He taught it us, though He were a Son. The Lord God commanded the first Adam, and he by his disobedience ruined us; He commanded the second Adam, and He by his obedience saved us.

God commanded Him what He should say, and what He should speak; two words signifying the same thing, to denote that every word

For these very words have occurred, and been explained above, at 1:15. Cried denials, spoke openly, in the hearing of all. So Rom. 9:27. and elsewhere.

(47.) I judge him not. The word not only denotes to judge, or condemn, but expresses the effect of judgment or condemnation, namely, ruin and destruction; it is opposed to save. Our Lord means to say, He will not be the cause of condemnation; the blame of which must, therefore, rest with those who prefer darkness to light.

This summary consists of four capital points. Our Lord taught and demonstrated by words and deeds: 1. That He is the Legate of God, sent for the salvation of the human race. 2. That He is intimately conjoined and united with the Father, not only in respect of will and counsel, but of works and deeds; and thus, even in respect of His human nature, is, in short, the Son of God. 3. That He is the Savior of the human race, who will obtain for, and impart to, all that believe in Him, life and felicity. 4. That this doctrine concerning Himself, the Son of God, sent on earth by his Father, and the Savior of the human race, is indisputably true, and infinitely beneficial, as being the only means of attaining universal salvation. These four points are what theologians term the essential, primary, and fundamental articles of the Christian faith; and such as, if removed, leave the religion insufficient for salvation.

Tittman, in BLOOMFIELD. Many are liberal in their condemnation of the Jews, because they did not believe on the Son of God, but do not reflect that they are probably committing the same sort of transgression in circumstances which heighten their sin. Paradoxical as it may seem, it is nevertheless possible for a man to credit the four evangelists, and yet live and die an infidel, as far as his own salvation is concerned. Realize it is possible to hold the truth in unrighteousness.

CHAP. XIII.

Jesus washes the feet of his disciples; and requires them to imitate his example of humility and love, 1-17. He intimates that some of them would betray Him; and is taken to John points out Judas as the traitor, 18-26. Satan enters into Judas, who betrays the company, 27-30. Jesus speaks of his glorification, as at hand; and enjoins his disciples to love one another, 31-35. He forewarns Peter, who avowed his readiness to die with Him, that before the cock croweth, he would thrice deny Him, 36-38.

Now before the feast of the passover, when Jesus knew that his hour was come, that he should depart out of this world unto the Father, having loved his own which were in the world, he loved them unto the end.

kept back nothing that was profitable. Note, (1.) This is a great encouragement to faith; we may venture our souls upon the sayings of Christ, rightly understood. (2.) It is a great example of obedience. Christ said as He was hidden, and so must we; communicated what the Father had said to Him, and so must we. See Acts 4:20. This was his glory, that, as a Son, He was faithful to Him that appointed Him; and, by unfeigned belief of every word of Christ, and an entire subjection of soul to it, we must give Him the glory due by his name.

CHAP. XIII. v. 1-17. Probably Christ's washing his disciples' feet, and the discourse that followed, were the same night in which He bade

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 34-50. Those who have not faith cannot behold the Object of faith, even a crucified Redeemer, 'purchasing the church with his own blood;' and must be strangers to its influence, as shown to the soul by the Holy Spirit: they will therefore find a thousand cavils, in excuse for unbelief. They often insinuate that the Scripture contradicts itself; and then quote the authority of one sacred writer to invalidate the testimony of another: whereas their own partial and prejudiced understanding alone is to blame: for the simplest believer gradually learns to reconcile most of them; as easily as he can the prophecies of Christ on the cross, and Christ on his glorious throne.—It is generally best to avoid disputing with prejudiced objectors; and rather to remind them how short their time may be, to prepare for death and judgment. It behooves us all to 'walk in the light while we have' the light; and an obedient faith is far more suited to our case, than frivolous or disputatious speculations. Those who 'believe in the light' will be approved as 'the children of the light;' on all others, darkness will speedily come, and they will not know whether they are going, till they fall into 'the blackness of darkness forever.' For while men indulge their proud and infidel prejudices, rebelling against Scripture and their own consciences, and quenching the motions of the Holy Spirit; the Lord Jesus withdraws in anger, leaves them to reject his salvation, 'sends them a story of delusion to believe a lie,' and so they are finally blinded, hardened, and ruined. (P. O. 2 Thes. 2:5-12.) Such warnings have always been given by those, who 'saw his glory and spake of Him;' and the awful denunciations of the Word of God will as surely take effect on unbelievers, as his faithful

NOTES.

CHAP. XIII. v. 1, 2. 'After mature deliberation, I am inclined to think this was the paschal supper, for it was that at which Christ's hour was come, and at which He said, Now is the Son of man glorified, (1. and 31.) which must naturally intimate the nearest approach of his death. And in the close of this discourse at this supper He said, (14. 31.) Ariase, let us go hence, and He then arose to go to the garden where He was apprehended, as appears from the following parts of the history, for He continued his discourse, and concluded with a prayer, (ch. 17.) and then went forth with his disciples and entered a garden, and Judas knew the place, (ch. 18:1, 2. Besides, Christ's notifying his disciples of the traitor at this supper, accords with the discovery He made of him at the passover, as recorded, Matt. 26:21, &c. And what is said (v. 30.) of Judas' going out at night from this supper, well agrees to that night in which He betrayed his Lord, and trayed, and at the time He ate the passover, and instituted the Lord's supper. But whether before the solemnity, or after, or between the eating of the passover, and the institution of the Lord's supper, it is not agreed. This evangelist gathers those passages the others had omitted, and industriously omits those they had recorded; which occurs as difficulty in putting them together. If it were then, we suppose Judas went out, (v. 30.) to get his men ready to apprehend Jesus. But Dr. Lightfoot is of opinion, that this was done and said, even all that is recorded to the end of ch. 14. not at the passover-supper, for it is here said, (v. 1.) to be before the feast of the passover; but at the supper in Bethany, two days before the passover, (of which we read Matt. 26:2-6.) at which Mary the second time anointed Christ's head with the remainder of her box of ointment. Or, it might be at some other supper the night before the passover, not, as that was, in the house of Simon the leper, but in his own lodgings, where He had none but his disciples about Him.

Christ's washing his disciples' feet, was an action of a singular nature; a miracle of humility. Mary had just anointed his head; now, lest his acceptance of that should look like taking state, He presently balances it with this abasement. But why would Christ do this? If the disciples' feet needed washing, they could do it themselves; a wise man will not do a thing that looks odd and unusual, but for good causes. We are sure it was not done in a humor; the transaction was very solemn, and carried on with great seriousness; four reasons are intimated why Christ did this. 1. To testify his love to his disciples, v. 1, 2. 2. To give an instance of voluntary humility and condescension, v. 3-5. 3. To signify spiritual washing, referred to in his discourse with Peter, v. 6-11. 4. To set them an example, v. 12-17.

I. Christ washed his disciples' feet, to give a proof of that great love wherewith He loved them to the end, v. 1, 2.

This is true of his immediate followers, the promises will be fulfilled to his people. Every man, therefore should be peculiarly careful not to sin against conviction, from fear of reproach and persecution, from love of praise or reputation, or from regard to the friendship of the world. (Not; Jam. 4:4-6.) That will not be accounted true faith, which does not overcome this ambition, and teach men to value 'the praise of God' more than that of the world; and so induce its possessors to confess Christ before his enemies. Chief rulers are especially in danger of prevaricating; and thus they may become accomplices in the basest crimes; because the fear of God does not deliver them from the fear of men. (Notes, Prop. 29:25, 26. Matt. 10:27, 28.) But faith in Christ, and in the power, truth, and love of God, 'overcometh the world.' (Note, 1 John 5:4, 5.) Beholding in Jesus the glory of the Father, we learn to obey, love, and confide in Him. By daily looking to Him, who 'came a Light into the world,' we are gradually extricated from the darkness of ignorance, error, and misery; we learn to know the commandment of God our Savior to be everlasting life; and enjoy foretastes of that inheritance, and at length are admitted to it. (Notes, 2 Cor. 3:17, 18. 4:5, 6. 1 John 3:1-3. Rev. 21:22-27.) Yet the same Word will seal the condemnation of all, who reject and despise it; their present impunity serves only to harden them in incredulity; and the more gracious the truths, promises, and precepts are, which they now despise, the greater will be their confusion, and the severer their punishment, at the last day. 'From all hardness of heart, and contempt of thy Word and commandment, good Lord, deliver us.' SCOTT.

seems different from his first going to the chief priests to make the offer of betraying Him, spoken of in Matt. 26:14, 15. This account of the matter seems natural and easy, and keeps the history free from many perplexities otherwise attending it. And all that passed after this supper might easily be brought into the time between the paschal supper and his being betrayed.' GURSE.

Doddridge refers to the above note as valuable, and adds, that such a disposition of the story best suits several of the circumstances of the paschal supper; and that the propriety of it is especially evinced from the 38th verse, which must be spoken the very night Jesus was betrayed, and yet is so connected with this story of washing the disciples' feet by verses 21 and 31, that they cannot, without great violence, be separated. He observes also, 'it is in the first verse that we have peculiar energy according to this plan.' ED.

Christ has a cordial love for his own. He did love them with a love of good will, when He gave Himself for their redemption. He does love them with a love of complacency, when He admits them to communion with Himself. Though they are in this world, of darkness and distance, of sin and corruption, yet He loves them. He was now going to his own in heaven, the spirits of just men made perfect; but He seems most concerned for his own on earth, because they most needed his care: the sickly child is most indulged. [3.] Those whom Christ loves He loves to the end; He is constant in his love to his people; He rests in his love. He loves with an everlasting love, (Jer. 31:3.) from everlasting in the believers, to everlasting in the consequences of it. Nothing can separate a believer from the love of Christ; He loves his own, unto perfection, for He will perfect what concerns them, will bring them to that world where love is perfect.

Christ manifested his love to them by washing their feet, as the woman, (Luke 7:44.) showed her love to Christ by washing his feet. Thus He would show that his love to them was condescending, that in prosecution of its designs, He was willing to humble Himself; and that the glories of the exalted state, He was now entering on, should be no obstruction at all to the favor He bore his chosen: thus He would confirm the promise He had made to the saints, that He would make them sit down to meat, and would come forth, and serve them, (Luke 12:37.) would put honor upon them, as great and surprising as for the Lord to serve his servants. The disciples had just now betrayed the weakness of their love to Him, in grudging the ointment that was poured upon his head; (Matt. 26:8.) yet He presently gives this proof of his love to them. Our infirmities are foils to Christ's kindnesses, and set them off.

He chose this time to do it, a little before his last passover, for two reasons:

He knew that his long expected hour was come, when He should depart out of this world to the Father. Observe here,

The change that was to pass over our Lord Jesus; He must depart. This began at his death, but was completed at his ascension. As Christ Himself, so all believers, by virtue of their union with Him, when they depart out of the world, are absent from the body, go to the Father, are present with the Lord. It is a departure out of the world, this unkind, injurious, treacherous world; this world of labor, toil, temptation; this vale of tears; and it is going to the Father of spirits, and the fruition of Him.

(2.) Supper being ended. 'The reader will observe here, that I have rendered the clause, supper being come, which is the sense in which the word is often used elsewhere. (21:4. Luke 4:42. Acts 12:18. 16:35. 21:40.) It was much more natural to wash the feet of guests before than after supper. It was done before the passover: part of the discourse which John mentions after the feet were washed, is mentioned by the other evangelists, as passing at supper; nay, John himself, when he speaks (26) of Christ's dipping the sop, and giving it to J^hs, after this, plainly shows that supper was not ended.' Doddridge.

'Almost all the best critics of the last century have agreed in abandoning the sense—Supper being ended. Strictly speaking, the supper must have commenced, otherwise our Lord could not be said to rise from supper.' (See Note, Luke 22:12.)

Verse 3.

'Was come, &c.] 'How can God be said to come from God into the world, when He is always in the heavens? Or to leave the world, and go to the Father?' Socinian Objections. 'As to his divine nature, He is said to descend from heaven, not by a local descent, or by quitting heaven, but only by the manifestation of Himself upon his birth. And in this sense God Himself is often said to descend from heaven, when, by any divine work done on earth, He demonstrates his presence there; and He is also said to ascend into heaven afterwards. Why therefore may not God the Word be said to descend from heaven, and even dwell with men, (as God is said to dwell in the twelve. These were his own in the world, his family. Children He had none, to call his own, but He adopted them, and took them as his own. He had those that were his own in the other world, but He left them for a time, to look after his own in this world. These He loved, called them into fellowship with Himself, conversed familiarly with them, was always tender of them, their comfort and reputation. He allowed them to be free with Him, and bore with their infirmities. He continued his love to them as long as He lived, and after his resurrection. Though there were persons of distinction that espoused his cause, He did not lay aside his old friends for new ones. They were weak and defective in knowledge and grace, dull and forgetful; yet, though He reproved them often, He never ceased to love them.

It is true of all believers, for these twelve patriarchs were the representatives of all the tribes of God's Israel. Note, [1.] Our Lord Jesus has a people in the world, that are his own; they were given Him by the Father, He has purchased them, has set them apart for Himself; his own, for they have devoted themselves to Him as a peculiar people. His own: where his own were spoken of, that received Him not, it is his own things, as a man's cattle are his own, which he may, when he pleases, dispose of. But here it is, his own persons, as a man's wife and children are his own. [2.]

He did love them with a love of good will, when He gave Himself for their redemption. He does love them with a love of complacency, when He admits them to communion with Himself. Though they are in this world, of darkness and distance, of sin and corruption, yet He loves them. He was now going to his own in heaven, the spirits of just men made perfect; but He seems most concerned for his own on earth, because they most needed his care: the sickly child is most indulged. Thus He would show that his love to them was condescending, that in prosecution of its designs, He was willing to humble Himself; and that the glories of the exalted state, He was now entering on, should be no obstruction at all to the favor He bore his chosen: thus He would confirm the promise He had made to the saints, that He would make them sit down to meat, and would come forth, and serve them, (Luke 12:37.) would put honor upon them, as great and surprising as for the Lord to serve his servants. The disciples had just now betrayed the weakness of their love to Him, in grudging the ointment that was poured upon his head; (Matt. 26:8.) yet He presently gives this proof of his love to them. Our infirmities are foils to Christ's kindnesses, and set them off.

He chose this time to do it, a little before his last passover, for two reasons:

He knew that his long expected hour was come, when He should depart out of this world to the Father. Observe here,

The change that was to pass over our Lord Jesus; He must depart. This began at his death, but was completed at his ascension. As Christ Himself, so all believers, by virtue of their union with Him, when they depart out of the world, are absent from the body, go to the Father, are present with the Lord. It is a departure out of the world, this unkind, injurious, treacherous world; this world of labor, toil, temptation; this vale of tears; and it is going to the Father of spirits, and the fruition of Him.

The time of this change: his hour was come. It is sometimes called his enemies' hour. (Luke 22:53.) the hour of their triumph; sometimes his hour, the hour of his triumph. The time of his sufferings was fixed to an hour, and the continuance of them but for an hour.

His foresight of it; He knew from the beginning that his hour would come, but now He knew that it was come. We know not when our hour will come, and therefore what we have to do in habitual preparation for it ought never to be [left] undone; but when we know by the harbingers that our hour is come, we must apply ourselves to an actual preparation, as our Master did, 2 Pet. 3, 14.

It was in the immediate foresight of his departure that He washed his disciples' feet; that, as his head was anointed against the day of his burial, so their feet might be washed against the day of their consecration, by the descent of the Holy Ghost fifty days after, as the priests were washed, Lev. 8:6. When we see our day approaching, we should do what good we can to those we leave behind. The second reason for doing it now, was, the devil had now put it into the heart of Judas to betray Him, v. 2. These words in a parenthesis, trace Judas' treason to its original. What way of access the devil has to men's hearts, and mingles undiscovered with those thoughts which are natives of the heart, we cannot tell. But some sins are in their own nature so exceeding sinful, and there is so little temptation to them, that it is plain, Satan laid the egg of them in a heart disposed to be their nest. For Judas to betray such a Master so cheaply, and upon no provocation, was such downright enmity to God, as could not be forged but by Satan himself, who thereby thought to ruin the Redeemer's kingdom; but it proved the ruin of his own.

Judas being now resolved to betray Him, the time of his departure could not be far off; if this matter be determined, it is easy to infer with St. Paul, I am now ready to be offered. Note, The more malicious we perceive our enemies to be against us, the more industrious we should be to prepare for the worst. Judas being now in the snare, and the devil aiming at Peter, and the rest of them, (Luke 22:31.) Christ would fortify his own against him. If the wolf had seized one of the flock, it is time for the shepherd to look to the rest. Antidotes must be stirring, when the infection is begun. Lightfoot observes that the disciples had learned of Judas to murmur at the anointing of Christ; (compare ch. 12:4, &c. with Matt. 26:8.) lest they should learn worse, He fortifies them by a lesson of humility. Christ would hereby show that He did not design to cast them all off for the faults of one of their number. Though one had a devil, yet they should fare never the worse for that. Christ loves his church, though there are hypocrites in it.

II. Christ washed his disciples' feet; to give an instance of his own humility, and show how condescending He was, and how low He could stoop in love to his own. This is intimated, v. 3-5. Jesus knowing, and perhaps discoursing

'tabernacle and in the temple,) when the Logos dwelt in the human nature upon earth, and manifested his glory? And also to 'leave the world and go to the Father,' not only as properly doing this by the exaltation of his human nature; but by doing all his divine works 'now from heaven, where He sits in the majesty and glory of the Father' Whitby. 3:12, 13.

'Our Lord has, at 17:2, asserted his dominion over the whole human race, as also over the whole world, (see Matt. 28:18.) which neither was nor could be the reign of doctrine, (as some,) but of power. So the evangelist here.' BLOOMFIELD. And went to God.] 'Rather, "and was going to God." This form of expressing the imperfect tense in English, occasionally gives great precision to the sense.' Garments.] 'The pallium, the outer garment; De Dieu thinks, the two outer garments, the pallium and stola. The Hebrew themselves expressed, as here, the pallium in the plural, (for honor,) as it was very wide and flowing. Example of this use of the plural for the singular are very rare in the classics, yet Lampe produces one from Plutarch. There is an exactly similar use in our word clothes. De Dieu observes, there is no reason to suppose with Origen, that Jesus stripped Himself entirely, since next the body was the 'tunic,' and the 'drawers,' both covered by the 'stole,' or waistcoat, which was bound about by the 'belt,' or girdle: and over all this the 'pallium.' (Here translated garments.) BLOOMFIELD.

5 After that, he poureth water into a pason, and began to wash the disciples' feet, and to wipe them with the towel wherewith he was girded.

6 Then cometh he to Simon Peter: and Peter saith unto him, Lord, dost thou wash my feet?

7 Jesus answered and said unto him, What I do thou knowest not now; but thou shalt know hereafter.

to be an Agent for Him on earth, so He went to God to be an Agent for us in heaven; and it is a comfort to us to think how welcome He was there; He was brought near to the Ancient of days, Dan. 7: 13. And it was said to Him, Sit Thou at my right hand, Ps. 110: 1.

He knew all this; was not like a prince in the cradle, that knows nothing of the honor he is born to, or like Moses, who wist not that his face shone; He had a full view of the honors of his exalted state, yet stooped thus low. But how does this come in here?

[1.] As an inducement to Him now quickly to leave what lessons and legacies He had to leave, to his disciples.

[2.] As that which supported Him under suffering, and carried Him cheerfully through this sharp encounter. Judas was now betraying Him, and He knew it, and the consequence of it; yet, knowing also that He came from God, and went to God, He did not draw back, but went on cheerfully.

[3.] As a foil to his condescension, to make it the more admirable. The reasons of divine grace are sometimes represented in Scripture as strange; (as Isa. 57: 17, 18. Hos. 2: 13, 14.) so here that is given as an inducement to Christ to stoop, which should rather have been a reason for his taking state; for God's thoughts are not ours. Compare with this, those passages which preface signal instances of condescending grace, with the displays of divine glory, as Ps. 68: 4, 5. Isa. 57: 15. 66: 1, 2.

Here is the voluntary abasement of our Lord Jesus notwithstanding. Jesus knowing his own glory as God, and his own authority and power as Mediator, one would think it should follow, He rises from supper, lays aside his ordinary garments, calls for robes, bids them keep their distance, and do Him homage; no, quite contrary, when He considered this, He gave the greatest instance of humility. Note, (1.) A well grounded assurance of heaven and happiness, instead of puffing a man with pride, will make and keep him very humble. (2.) Those that would be found conformable to Christ, must study to keep their minds low in the midst of the greatest advancements.

The action itself was mean and servile, and that which servants of the lowest rank were employed in. Let thine handmaid (saith Abigail) be a servant to wash the feet of the servants of my Lord; let me be in the meanest employment, 1 Sam. 25: 41. If He had washed their hands or faces, it had been great condescension; (Elisha poured water on the hands of Elijah, 2 Kings 3: 11.) He would teach us to think nothing below us, wherein we may be serviceable to God's glory, and the good of our brethren.

The condescension was so much the greater, that He did this for his own disciples, who in themselves were of a low and despicable condition, not curious about their bodies. In relation to Him, they were such as should have washed his feet. Many, of great spirits otherwise, will do a mean thing to get favor with their superiors; they rise by stooping, and climb by cringing; but for Christ to do this to his disciples, could be no act of policy or complaisance, but pure humility.

He rose from supper to do it. Though we translate it, (v. 2.) supper being ended, it might be better read, there being a supper made, or He being at supper, for He sat down again, (v. 12.) and we find Him dipping a sop, (v. 26.) so that He did it in the midst of his meal, and thereby taught us, not to reckon it a disturbance, to be called from our meal to do God or our brother any real service, esteeming the discharge of our duty more than our necessary food, ch. 4: 34. Christ would not leave preaching, to oblige his nearest relations, (Mark 3: 33.) but would leave his supper, to show his love to his disciples. Christ did it, not that we might learn to be rude and slovenly, (cleanliness and godliness will do well together,) but to teach us not to indulge, but mortify, the delicacy of the appetite, giving good manners their due place, and no more.

II. put Himself into the garb of a servant, to do it; laid aside his loose, upper garments. We must address ourselves to duty as those that are of his honors as Mediator, and telling his friends that the Father had given all things into his hand, riseth from supper, and, to the great surprise of the company, washed his disciples' feet.

Glorious things are here said of Christ as Mediator.

The Father had given all things into his hands; had given Him a property in all, and a power over all, as Possessor of heaven and earth, in pursuance of the great designs of his undertaking; see Matt. 11: 27. The accommodation and arbitration of all matters in variance between God and man, were committed into his hands: and the administration of the kingdom of God among men, in all the branches of it, was committed to Him; so that all acts, both of government and judgment, were to pass through his hands; He is heir of all things.

He came from God: this implies that He was in the beginning with God, not only before He was born into this world, but before the world itself was born; and then when He came into the world, He came as God's Ambassador. He came as the Son of God, and the Sent of God. The Old-Testament prophets were raised up and employed for God, but Christ came directly from Him.

He went to God, to be glorified with Him, with the glory which He had with God from eternity. That which comes from God, shall go to God; they that are born from heaven, are bound for heaven. As Christ came from God resolved not to take state, but to take pains must divest ourselves of every thing that would either feed our pride, or hang in our way, and hinder us in what we have to do; must rid up the loins of our mind, as those in earnest.

He did it with all humble ceremony, went through all parts of the service discreetly; did it as if He had been used thus to serve; did it Himself, and had none to minister to Him in it. He girded Himself with the towel, as servants throw a napkin on their arm, or put an apron before them; poured water into the basin out of the water-pots, (ch. 2: 6.) and then washed their feet; and, to complete the service, wiped them. Some think He did not wash the feet of all, but only four or five of them, that being sufficient to answer the end; but I see nothing to countenance this conjecture, for in other places where He did make a difference, it is taken notice of; and his washing the feet of them all without exception, teaches us charity to all Christ's disciples, even the least.

Nothing appears to the contrary, but that He washed the feet of Judas among the rest, v. 26. It is the character of a widow indeed, that she had washed the saints' feet, (1 Tim. 5: 10.) and there is some comfort in that; but the blessed Jesus here washed the feet of the worst of sinners, who was at this time contriving to betray Him.

Many interpreters make Christ, washing his disciples' feet, a representation of his whole undertaking. He knew that He was equal with God, and all things were his; yet He rose from his table in glory, laid aside his robes of light, girded Himself with our nature, took upon Him the form of a servant, came not to be ministered to, but to minister, poured out his blood, his soul unto death, and thereby washed us from our sins, Rev. 1: 5.

III. Christ washed his disciples' feet, that He might signify the spiritual washing of the soul from sin. This is plainly intimated in his discourse with Peter upon it, v. 6-11.

It is most probable, when He went about this service, (which is all that is meant by his beginning to wash, v. 5.) that He took Peter first; and the rest would not have suffered it, if they had not first heard it explained in what passed between Christ and Peter.

Lord, (saith Peter, startled at the proposal,) dost Thou wash my feet? Here is an emphasis to be laid upon the persons, Thou and me; and the placing of the words is observable. What, Thou mine? These things are rather to be contemplated than uttered. Aug. What, Thou! our Lord and Master, the Son of God. Savior and Ruler of the world, for me, a worm of the earth, a sinful man, O Lord? Shall those hands wash my feet, which with a touch have cleansed lepers, given sight to the blind, and raised the dead? Very willingly would Peter have taken the basin and towel, and washed his Master's feet, and been proud of the honor, Luke 17: 7, 8. Note, Christ's condescensions to us, in noticing us by his grace, are justly matter of our admiration, ch. 14: 22. Who am I, Lord God? And what is my father's house?

What I do, thou knowest not now, but shall know hereafter. Here are two reasons why Peter must submit to it.

(1.) He was at present in the dark, and might not to oppose what he did not understand, but acquiesce in the wisdom of One who could give a reason for all He said and did. Christ would teach Peter implicit obedience: 'You must believe it well done, because I do it.' Note, Conscientiousness of the darkness we labor under, and our inability to judge of what God doeth, should make us modest in our censures of his proceed ing; see Heb. 11: 8.

(2.) There was something in it, the meaning of which he should hereafter know; 'Thou shalt know hereafter what need thou hast of it' being washed, when thou shalt be guilty of the heinous sin of denying me;' so some. 'Thou shalt know, when, in the discharge of the office of an apostle, thou wilt be employed in washing from thy charge the sins and defilements of earthly affections;' so Hammond. Note, [1.] Our Lord Jesus does many things which even his evidence of their hypocrisy all along. [4.] Christ sees it necessary to let his disciples know that they are not all clean; that we may all be jealous over ourselves, (Is it I? Lord, is it I, that am among the clean, yet not clean?) and that when hypocrites are discovered, it may be no surprise or stumbling to us.

IV. Christ washed his disciples' feet, to set us an example. This explanation He gave, when He had done it, v. 12-27. Observe with what solemnity,

He adjourned the explication till He had finished the transaction, [1.] To try their implicit obedience. What He did, they should not know till after, that they might learn to acquiesce in his will when they could not give a reason for it. [2.] It was proper to finish the riddle before He unriddled it. Thus, when his sufferings were finished, He had resumed the garments of his exalted state, and was ready to sit down again, then He opened the understandings of his disciples, and poured out his Spirit, Luke 24: 45, 46.

Before He explained it, He asked them if they would construe it. He put this question, not only to make them sensible of their ignorance, and the need they had to be instructed, (as Zech. 4: 5, 13.) but to raise their desires of instruction; 'I would have you know, and if you will give attention, I will tell you.' Note, it is the will of Christ that sacramental signs should be explained, and that his people should be acquainted with the meaning of them; otherwise, though ever so significant, to them who know not the thing signified, they are insignificant. Hence they are directed to ask, What mean ye by this service? Exod. 12: 26.

Observe what He grounds that which He had to say upon; (v. 13.) 'You call Me Master and Lord, you give Me those titles, in speaking of Me, and to Me, and you say well, for so I am; you are in the relation of scholars to Me, and I do the part of a Master to you.' Note, (1.) Jesus Christ is our Master and Lord; our Redeemer and Savior is, in order to that, our Lord and Master. He is our Teacher and Instructor, in all necessary truth and rules, as a Prophet revealing to us the will of God. He is our Lord, or Ruler and Owner. (2.) It becomes the disciples of Christ to call Him Master and Lord, not in compliment, but in reality; not by constraint, but with delight.

Our calling Christ Master and Lord, is an obligation on us to receive and observe the instructions He gives us. Christ would thus pre-engage their obedience to a command that was displeasing to flesh and blood. If Christ be our Master and Lord, by our own consent, we are bound in honor and honesty to be observant of Him.

Observe the lesson Christ hereby taught; Ye also ought to wash one another's feet, v. 14.

Some have understood this literally, and have thought these words amount to the institution of a standing ordinance in the church; that Christians should, in a religious manner, wash one another's feet, in token of condescending love to one another. Ambrose took it so, and practised it in the church of Milan. Austin saith, those Christians who do it not with their

be again put into a justified state, for then should they often be baptized. The evidence of a justified state may be clouded, and the comfort of it suspended, when yet the charter of it is not taken away. Though we have occasion to repeat daily, God's gifts and callings are without repentance. The heart may be sneep and garnished, and yet still remain the devil's palace; but if it be washed, it belongs to Christ, and He will not lose it.

See what ought to be the daily care of those who through grace are in a justified state; that is, to wash their feet; to cleanse themselves from the guilt they contract daily through infirmity and inadvertency, by the renewed exercise of repentance, with a believing application of the virtue of Christ's blood. We must also wash our feet by constant watchfulness against every thing defiling, for we must cleanse our way, and our feet, by taking heed thereto, Ps. 119: 9. The priests, when consecrated, were washed with water; and though they did not need afterward to be washed all over, yet, whenever they went in to minister, they must wash their feet and hands at the laver, on pain of death, Exod. 30: 19, 20. The provision for our cleansing should not make us presumptuous, but more cautious; I have washed my feet, how shall I defile them? From yesterday's pardon, we should fetch an argument against this day's temptation.

He pronounces his disciples clean, through the word He had spoken to them, ch. 15: 3. He washed them Himself, and then said, Ye are clean; but except Judas; not all; they were all baptized, even Judas, yet not all clean; many have the sign, that have not the thing signified. Note, [1.] Even among persons called disciples of Christ, professing relation to Him, there are some who are not clean, Prov. 30: 12. [2.] The Lord knows them that are his, and them that are not, 2 Tim. 2: 19. The eye of Christ can separate between the precious and the vile, the clean and the unclean. [3.] When those that have called themselves disciples, afterward prove traitors, their apostasy, at last, is a certain proof that they were never clean. [4.] Christ sees it necessary to let his disciples know that they are not all clean; that we may all be jealous over ourselves, (Is it I? Lord, is it I, that am among the clean, yet not clean?) and that when hypocrites are discovered, it may be no surprise or stumbling to us.

Our calling Christ Master and Lord, is an obligation on us to receive and observe the instructions He gives us. Christ would thus pre-engage their obedience to a command that was displeasing to flesh and blood. If Christ be our Master and Lord, by our own consent, we are bound in honor and honesty to be observant of Him.

Observe the lesson Christ hereby taught; Ye also ought to wash one another's feet, v. 14.

Some have understood this literally, and have thought these words amount to the institution of a standing ordinance in the church; that Christians should, in a religious manner, wash one another's feet, in token of condescending love to one another. Ambrose took it so, and practised it in the church of Milan. Austin saith, those Christians who do it not with their hands, yet (he hoped) did it with their hearts in humility; but he saith, it is much better to do it with the hands also, when there is occasion, as 1 Tim. 5: 10. What Christ has done Christians should not disdain to do. Calvin saith, that the pope, in the annual observing of this ceremony on Thursday in the passion week, is rather Christ's ape than his follower, for the duty enjoined, in conformity to Christ, was mutual; Wash one another's feet. And Jansenius saith, it is done—Frigidly, and unlike the primitive model.

But doubtless it is to be understood figuratively; it is an instructive sign, but not sacramental. This was a parable to the eye; and our Master, hereby, designed to teach us,

[1.] A humble condescension; like Him to be lowly in heart, (Matt. 11: 29.) and walk with all lowliness; we must think meanly of ourselves, and respectfully of our brethren, and deem nothing below us but sin; we must say of that which seems mean, but tends to the glory of God, and our brethren's good, as David, (2 Sam. 6: 22.) If this be to be vile, I will be yet more vile. Christ had often taught his disciples humility, and they had forgotten the lesson; but now He teaches them in such a way as surely they could never forget.

[2.] A condescension to be serviceable. To wash one another's feet is to stoop to the meanest offices, for the real benefit one of another, as Paul, who, though free from all, made himself servant of all; and Jesus, who came not to be ministered unto, but to minister. We must not grudge to take care and pains, and to spend time, and to diminish ourselves for the good of others to whom we are not under any particular obligation, even our inferiors, and such as are not in a capacity of making us any requital. Washing the feet after travel, contributes both to the decency of the person, and to his ease, so that to wash one another's feet, is to consult both the credit and the comfort one of another; to do what we can, both to advance our brethren's reputation and to make their minds easy. See 1 Cor. 10: 24. Heb. 6: 10. The duty is mutual; we must both accept help from, and afford help to our brethren.

[3.] A serviceableness to the sanctification one of another; Ye ought to wash one another's feet, from sin. We cannot satisfy for one another's sins, that is peculiar to Christ, but may help to purify one another from sin. We must in the first place wash ourselves; this charity must begin at home, (Matt. 7: 5.) but it must not end there, we must sorrow for the failings and follies of our brethren, much more their gross pollutions, (1 Cor. 5: 2.) must wash our brethren's polluted feet in tears. We must faithfully reprove, and do what we can to bring them to repentance, (Gal. 6: 1.) and must admonish them, to prevent their falling into the mire; this is washing their feet.

The enforcing of this command is from the example of Christ: If I, your Lord and Master, have done it to you, you ought to do it to one another.

I am your Master, and you are my disciples, you ought to learn of Me, (v. 15.) for in this, as in other things, I have given you an example, that you should do to others, as I have done to you.

What a good teacher Christ is. He teaches by example as well as doctrine, and came into this world, to set us a copy of all those graces and duties his holy religion teaches; and it is a copy without one false stroke. Hereby He made his own laws more intelligible and honorable. Christ is a commander like Gideon, who said to his soldiers, Look on me, and do likewise; (Judg. 7: 17.) like Abimelech, who said, What ye have seen me do, make haste and do as I have done; (Judg. 9: 48.) and like Cæsar, who called his soldiers, not—soldiers, but—fellow-soldiers, and whose usual word was, not Go, but Come.

As good scholars, we must do as He hath done; 1 John 4: 17. and 2: 6. Christ's example herein is to be followed by ministers in particular, in whom the graces of humility and holy love should especially appear, and by the place as his servants. If He were humble and condescending, it ill became them to be proud and assuming. Note, [1.] We must take heed lest Christ's condescensions to us, and advancements of us, occasion high thoughts of ourselves, or low thoughts of Him. We need to be put in mind of this, that we are not greater than our Lord. [2.] Whatever our Master was pleased to condescend to, in favor to us, we should much more condescend to, in conformity to Him. Christ, by humbling Himself, has dignified humility. When we see our Master servant, we cannot but see how ill it becomes us to be domineering.

Our Savior closes this part of his discourse with an intimation of the necessity of obedience: If ye know these things; or, Seeing ye know them, happy are ye if ye do them. Most people think, Happy are they that rise and rule. Washing one another's feet will never get preferments; but Christ saith, Happy they that sloop and obey. If ye know these things: that may be understood either as speaking doubtfully, whether they knew them or no; so strong was their conceit of a temporal kingdom, that it was a question whether they could entertain the notion of a duty so contrary to that conceit; or, as taking it for granted, that they did know these things; since they had such excellent precepts given them, recommended by such a pattern, it will be necessary to complete their happiness, that they practise accordingly.

This is applicable to the commands of Christ in general. Note, Though it is a great advantage to know our duty, yet we shall come short of happiness if we do not to it. Knowing is in order to doing; knowledge therefore not reduced to practice is vain and fruitless; nay, will aggravate the sin and ruin, Luke 12:47, 48. James 4:17. It is knowing and doing that will demonstrate us of Christ's kingdom, and wise builders. See Ps. 103:17, 18.

It is to be applied especially to this command of humility and serviceableness. Nothing is better known, or more readily acknowledged, than this, that we should be humble; and therefore, though many will own themselves passionate and intemperate, few will own themselves proud, for it is as inexcusable a sin, and as hateful, as any other; and yet how little is to be seen of true humility, and that mutual subjection and condescension, which the law of Christ insists so much upon! Most know these things so well as to expect that others should do according to them, but not so well as to do so themselves.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 12-17. If we would have the comfort of acceptance of Christ, we must inquire whether we understand the nature of what Jesus has done for sinners; and whether we are aiming to copy his example of love: whether we be delivered from self-importance and self-indulgence; and have learned to stoop, to labor, and to deny ourselves, in order to be serviceable to the last of our brethren. How many refuse to do as Christ has done before them, even where his example is most clearly given them to imitate! How many of his professed servants act, as if they were greater than their Lord! Instead of his lowly deportment, they affect state and consequence; they deem useful employ-

V. 18-30. Here is the discovery of Judas' plot. Christ knew it from the beginning; but now first discovered it to his disciples, who did not expect Christ should be betrayed, though He had often told them so, much less did they suspect that one of them should do it.

Christ gives a general intimation of it; (v. 8.) I cannot expect you will all do these things; for I know whom I have chosen, and whom I have passed by; but the Scripture will be fulfilled, (Ps. 41:9.) He that eateth bread with Me, hath lifted up his heel against Me. He doth not yet speak out the crime, or the criminal, but raiseth their expectations of a further discovery.

He intimates, that they were not all right. Note, The word of Christ is a distinguishing word, separating between cattle and cattle, and will distinguish thousands into hell, who flattered themselves with hopes of heaven. I speak not of you all, my followers. Note, There is a mixture of bad with good in the best societies; and will be till we come to the blessed society into which shall enter nothing unclean or disguised.

He Himself knew who were right, and who were not; I know whom I have chosen, among the many that are called with the common call. Note, Them that are chosen, Christ Himself had the choosing of: and He never forgets any, whom He has once had in his thoughts of love, 2 Tim. 2:19.

Christ took one into his family, whom He foresaw to be a traitor, and did not by effectual grace prevent his being so, that the Scripture might be fulfilled. Let it not therefore be a stumbling-block to any; for though it do not at all lessen Judas' offence, it may lessen our offence at it. The Jewish expositors generally understand David's complaint here of Ahithophel; Grotius thinks it intimates that the death of Judas would be like that of Ahithophel. But because that Psalm speaks of David's sickness, of which we read nothing at the time of Ahithophel's deserting him, it may better be understood of some other friend of his, that proved false to him. This our Savior applies to Judas.

Judas, as an apostle, was admitted to the highest privileges; he eat bread with Christ. He was familiar with Him, favored by Him, was one of his family, with whom He was intimately conversant. David saith of his treacherous friend, He did eat of my bread, but Christ, (being poor, He had no bread He could properly call his own,) saith, He did eat bread with Me; of such as He had by the kindness of ministering friends, his disciples had their share, Judas among the rest. Note, All that eat bread with Christ, are not his disciples indeed. See 1 Cor. 10:3-5.

Judas, as an apostate, was guilty of the basest treachery; spurned at Christ as wrestlers do at their adversaries, whom they would overthrow. Note, It is no new thing for Christ's seeming friends, to prove his real enemies. They eat not only the bread of his charity, but the bread of his covenant, yet rebel against Him, and thereby prove themselves guilty not only of the will neither justify uncharitableness, nor lose us the reward of our charity.

So Euthymius, and many others. But I think with Grotius it seems harsh, and assent to Wetstein, Lamps, Doddridge, &c., that it is a metaphor taken from kicking horses, oxen, &c., which sometimes mangle and even kill their benefactors, usually in a very shy and treacherous manner: in which consists most of the force of the allusion. This communion of bread has been in every age accounted an inviolable pledge of friendship. BLOOMFIELD.

We are here encouraged to receive ministers as sent of Christ; 'He that receiveth whomsoever I send, though weak and poor, and subject to like passions as others, (as by the law, so the Gospel, makes men priests that have infirmity,) yet if he deliver my message, and be regularly called and appointed to do so, and as an officer, give himself to the Word and prayer; he that entertains him, shall be owned as a friend of mine.' Christ was now leaving the world, but would leave an order of men, to deliver his Word, and those who receive that in the love of it, receive Him; to believe the doctrine of Christ, obey his law, and accept the salvation offered on the terms proposed, this is receiving those whom Christ sends, it is receiving Christ.

The reason ¹ He told them beforehand of the treachery of Judas; (v. 19.) 'Now I tell you before Judas has begun to put his plot in execution; and when it is come to pass, you may, instead of stumbling at it, be confirmed in your belief, that I am He that should come.'

By his foresight of things to come, of which in this, as in other instances, He gave incontestable proof, He proved Himself to be the true God, before whom all things are naked and open. Christ foretold that Judas would betray Him, when there was no ground to suspect such a thing, and so proved Himself a discernor of the thoughts and intents of the heart. The prophecies of the New Testament concerning the apostasy of the latter times, (2 Thes. 2. 1 Tim. 4. and in the Apocalypse,) being evidently accomplished, it is a proof that those writings were divinely inspired, and confirms our faith in the whole of Scripture.

By thus applying the types and prophecies of the Old Testament to Himself, He proved Himself the true Messiah, to whom all the prophets bare witness. He suffered as it was written, Luke 24: 25, 26. ch. 8: 28.

He encourages his apostles, and ministers; (v. 20.) He that receiveth whomsoever I send, receiveth Me. It is not easy to make out the coherence of those words here. 1. Christ had told his disciples they must humble and abase themselves. 'Now, though there be those that despise you for your condescension, there will be those that will honor you, and shall be honored for so doing.' Those who are dignified by Christ's commission, may be content to be vilified by the world. 2. It is intended to silence the scruples of those, who, because there was a traitor among the apostles, would be shy of receiving any of them; for if one of them was false to his Master, to whom would any of them be true? No, as Christ will think never the worse of them for Judas' crime, so He will own them, and will raise up such as shall receive them. They that had received Judas, when a preacher, and perhaps were converted and edified by his preaching, were never the worse, nor should reflect upon it with any regret, though he afterward proved a traitor; for he was one whom Christ sent. We cannot know what men are, much less what they will be, but those who appear to be sent of Christ, we must receive, till the contrary appear. Though some, by entertaining strangers, have entertained robbers unawares, yet we must still be hospitable, for thereby some have entertained angels. The abuses of our charity, though ever so discreet, will neither justify uncharitableness, nor lose us the reward of our charity.

Verses 23, 25.
The Hebrews anciently sat at table, but afterwards imitated the Per-and Chaldeans, who reclined on table-beds, or divans, while eating. Ancient females were not admitted to the tables of the men, trine of Christ, obey his law, and accept the salvation offered on the terms proposed, this is receiving those whom Christ sends, it is receiving Christ.

We are here encouraged to receive Christ as sent of God; He that thus receiveth Christ in his ministers, receiveth the Father also, for they come upon his errand likewise, baptizing in the name of the Father, as well as of the Son. Or, in general, He that receiveth Me, as his Prince and Savior, receiveth Him that sent Me, as his Portion and Felicity. In embracing Christ's religion, we embrace the only true religion.

Christ more particularly notifies to them the plot of one of their number against Him; (v. 21.) When Jesus had thus said in general, to prepare them for a more particular discovery, He was troubled in spirit, and showed it by some gesture or sign, and He testified, (with the solemnity of a witness on oath,) 'One of you shall betray Me.' None indeed could be said to betray Him but those in whom He reposed a confidence, the witnesses of his retirements. This did not determine Judas to the sin by any fatal necessity; for though the event did follow according to the prediction, yet not from the prediction. Christ is not the author of sin; yet as to this heinous sin of Judas,

1. Christ foretold it; for that which is secret and future, is naked and open before the eyes of Christ; 2 Kings 8: 12. Isa. 45: 8.

2. He foretold it, not only for the sake of the rest, but of Judas, that he might take warning, and recover himself out of the snare of the devil. Traitors proceed not in their plots, when they find they are discovered; surely Judas when he finds that his Master knows his design, will retreat; if not, it will aggravate his condemnation.

3. He spake of it with manifest concern; He was troubled in spirit. He had often spoken of his own sufferings and death, without such trouble of spirit as here. Note, The falls and miscarriages of disciples are a great trouble of spirit to their Master; 'What? One of you? that have received from Me such distinguished favors; you, that I had reason to think would be firm to Me, that have professed such respect for Me; what iniquity have you found in Me, that one of you should betray Me?' This went to his heart, as the unprofitableness of children grieves those who have nourished and brought them up, Isa. 1: 2. See Ps. 95: 10. Isa. 63: 10.

The disciples quickly take the alarm; By looking one upon another they discovered the trouble they were in upon this notice; it struck such an horror upon them, that they knew not which way to look, or what to say. They saw their Master troubled, and therefore they were troubled. This was at a feast where they were cheerfully entertained; but hence we must be taught to rejoice with trembling, as though we rejoiced not. When David wept for his son's rebellion, all his followers wept with him; (2 Sam. 15: 30.) so Christ's disciples here. Note, That which grieves Christ, is, and should

(at this day it would be considered an indecency throughout the East,) but had a table set in their own apartment; Esth. 1: 6, 9. Babylon and Persia must however be looked upon as exceptions, Dan. 5: 2? Jahn.] The general character of the meals seems to have been the same among the Greeks, Romans, and Hebrews. See Potter and Adam. The custom prevails now in the East, of sitting or reclining on the floor at meat. [The middle cushion and the centre position on any given cushion, was the most honorable.] Jahn.] The cut represents a common eating-table. The three tables form but one, and to each is a couch or klinium—three of these, united, to surround the three tables, formed the triclinium, (three beds.) These beds were mattresses stuffed; each guest reclines on his left elbow, using principally his right hand. It will thus be seen how John, as he was next to Jesus, lay in his bosom, and fell back on his breast, to whisper to him. The feet were readily reached by a person passing behind, as Luke 7: 38. Calmet, by Rob. Ed.

when he had dipped the sop, he gave it to Judas Iscariot, the son of Simon.

the fashion in those countries to sit at meat in a leaning posture, so that the second lay in the bosom of the first, and so on; it seems an extraordinary expression of endearment. Note, Some of Christ's disciples have more intimate communion with Him than others. The Father loved the Son, and laid Him in his bosom, (ch. 1:18.) and believers are in like manner one with Christ, ch. 17: 21. This honor all the saints shall have shortly in the bosom of Abraham. Those who lay themselves at Christ's feet, He will lay in his bosom.

He conceals his name, being himself the penman of the story; to show that he was pleased with it, he puts instead of his name, this title of honor, the disciple whom Jesus loved, as in David's and Solomon's court, there was one that was the king's friend; yet he does not write his name, to show he was not proud of it, nor would boast of it. So Paul saith, I knew a man in Christ.

2. Of all the disciples Peter was most forward to know; (v. 24.) sitting at some distance, he beckoned to John, by some sign to ask. Peter was generally the leading man, most apt to put himself forth; and where men's natural tempers lead them to be thus bold in answering and asking, if kept under the laws of humility and wisdom, they make very serviceable men. God gives his gifts variously; but that the forward men in the church may not think too well of themselves, nor the modest be discouraged, it must be noted that it was not Peter, but John, that was the beloved disciple. Peter was desirous to know, not only that he might be sure it was not he, but that, knowing who it was, they might withdraw from him, and if possible, prevent his design. It was desirable to know who in the church will deceive us; yet let this suffice—Christ knows. Peter himself did not ask, because John had a much fairer opportunity, from his seat at table, to whisper the question in Christ's ear, and receive a private answer. It is good to improve our interest in those that are near to Christ. Do we know any that we have reason to think lie in Christ's bosom? Let us beg of them to speak a good word for us.

The question was asked accordingly; John shows here, (1.) A regard to his fellow-disciple. Though Peter had not the honor he had at this time, John did not disdain his hint. Note, They who lie in Christ's bosom, may often learn from those who lie at his feet, something that will be profitable for them, and be reminded of what they did not themselves think of. Having opportunity, John gratified Peter herein. As every one hath received the gift, so let him minister the same for a common good, Rom. 12: 6.

(2.) A reverence of his Master. Though he whispered in Christ's ear, he called Him Lord; the familiarity he was admitted to, did not at all lessen his respect for his Master. Reverence in expression and decorum, are becoming in our secret devotions, as well as in public assemblies. The more intimate communion souls have with Christ, the more sensible they are of his worthiness, and their own unworthiness, Gen. 18: 27.

Christ gave a speedy answer to this question, but whispered it in John's ear; for he rest, it appears, (v. 25.) were still ignorant of the matter. He it is to whom I shall give a sop, a morsel, a crust; when I have dipped it in the sauce.

Christ notified the traitor by a sign: thus He would exercise the observation of John, and intimate what need his ministers have of a spirit of discerning; for false brethren are not made known to us by words, but by signs; by their fruits, by their spirits; it requires great diligence and care to form a right judgment of them.

That sop was a very proper sign, because it was the fulfilling of the Scripture, (v. 18.) that the traitor should be one that ate bread with Him. It likewise teaches us, [1.] That Christ sometimes gives sops to traitors; worldly riches, honors, and pleasures, are sops, (so to speak,) which Probe, a grief to all that are his; particularly the scandalous misarrangements of those that are called by his name: Who is offended, and I burn not?

Hereby they endeavored to discover the traitor; but while those who were faithful, had their consciences so clear, that they could lift up their faces without spot; he that was false, had his conscience so seared, that he was not ashamed, neither could he blush, and so no discovery could be made this way. Christ thus put his disciples into confusion for a time, to humble and prove them, and excite in them a jealousy of themselves, and an indignation at the baseness of Judas. It is good for us sometimes to be put to a pause.

The disciples were solicitous to get their Master to tell them particularly whom He meant; nothing but that can put them out of present pain, for each thought he had as much reason to suspect himself as any of his brethren; now,

1. Of all the disciples, John was most fit to ask, because He was the favorite, and sat next his Master; v. 23. It appears that this was John, by comparing ch. 21: 20.

Observe, The particular kindness Jesus had for him; he was known by this name, the disciple whom Jesus loved. He loved them all, (v. 1.) but John was particularly dear to Him. His name signifies gracious. Daniel, who was honored with the revelations of the Old Testament, as John of the New, was a man greatly beloved, Dan. 9: 23.

He was leaning on Jesus' bosom. It was vidence sometimes gives wicked men. Judas perhaps thought himself a favorite, because he had the sop, like Benjamin at Joseph's table, a mess by himself; thus the prosperity of fools, like a stupefying sop, helps to destroy them. [2.] We must not be outrageous against those whom we know to be very malicious against us. Christ carved to Judas as kindly as to any at the table, though He knew he was then plotting his death. If thine enemy hunger feed him, as Christ does.

Judas, instead of being convinced hereby of his wickedness, was the more confirmed in it, and the warning given him was to him a savor of death unto death; for the devil hereupon took possession of him; (v. 27.) not to make him melancholy, or drive him distracted, to hurry him into the fire, or the water; (happy for him, had that been the worst of it, or if, with the same, he had been choked in the sea;) but to possess him with a prevailing prejudice against Christ and his doctrine, and a contempt of Him, as one whose life was of small value; to excite in him a covetous desire of the wages of unrighteousness, and a resolution to stick at nothing to obtain them.

How is it said, that now Satan entered into him? Judas was all along a devil, (ch. 6: 70.) a son of perdition, but now Satan had a more abundant entrance into him. His purpose was now ripening into a fixed resolution; now he returned with seven other spirits more wicked than himself, Luke 11: 26. Note, Though the devil is in every wicked man that does his works, (Eph. 2: 2.) yet sometimes he enters more powerfully than at other times, when he puts them upon some enormous wickedness. Betrayers of Christ have much of the devil in them. Christ speaks of the sin of Judas as greater than that of any of his persecutors.

How came Satan to enter into him after the sop? Perhaps, aware it was the discovery of him, he became desperate. Many are made worse by the gifts of Christ, and are confirmed in impenitence by that which should have led them to repentance. The coals of fire heaped upon their heads, instead of melting, harden them.

Christ hereupon dismissed him, and delivered him up to his own heart's lusts; Then said Jesus unto him, That thou doest, do quickly. This is not to be understood as either advising him to his wickedness, or warranting him in it; but either as, 1. Abandoning him to the power of Satan. The various methods Christ had used for his conviction, were ineffectual; and therefore, 'What thou doest thou wilt do quickly; if resolved to ruin thyself, go on, and take what comes.' Note, When the evil spirit is willingly admitted, the good spirit justly withdraws. Or, 2. As challenging him to do his worst. Note, Our Lord was very forward to suffer and die for us, and was impatient of delay in his undertaking. Christ speaks of Judas' betraying Him as a thing he was now doing, though he was only purposing it. Those who are contriving and designing mischief, are, in God's account, doing mischief.

Those who were at table, understood not what He meant, because they did not hear what He whispered to John; (v. 23, 29.) No man at table, except John, knew for what intent He spake this to him.

They did not suspect that Christ said it to Judas as a traitor, because it did not enter into their heads that Judas was, or would prove so. Note, It is an excusable dulness in the disciples of Christ not to be quick sighted in their censures. Most are ready enough to say, when they hear harsh things spoken in general, now such a one is meant, and now such a one; but Christ's disciples were so well taught to love one another, that they could not easily learn to suspect one another; charity thanks no evil.

Their surmises discover for what purposes our Lord commonly directed payments to be made out of their little stock, and so teach us how to honor the Lord with our substance. They concluded something was to be laid out either, in Himself, and give Him honor. Note, 1st. In the exaltation of Christ there was a regard had to his humiliation, and a reward given for it. Because He humbled Himself, therefore God highly exalted Him. If the Father be so great a gainer in his glory by the death of Christ, the Son shall be no loser. See the covenant, Isa. 53:12. 2dly. Those who mind the business of glorifying God, shall be glorified with Him.

Here is something Christ instructs them in, concerning his sufferings, which was awakening, for as yet they were slow of heart to understand it; Little children, yet a little while I am with you, &c.

Two things Christ here suggests, to quicken his disciples to improve their present opportunities.

(1.) That they would find his stay in this world, with them, to be very short. Little children. This compellation speaks not so much their weakness as his tenderness; He speaks with the affection of a father, about to leave them, and to leave blessings with them; Know this then, that yet a little while I am with you. Whether we understand it of the time previous to his death, or the time to his ascension, it comes much to one; He had but little time to spend with them, and therefore, if they had any good question to ask, if they would have any advice, instruction, or comfort, let them speak quickly. We must make the best of the helps we have for our souls while we have them, because they will soon be taken from us, or we from them.

Let them not dote on his bodily presence, as if their happiness and comfort were bound up in that; they must think of living without it; not be always little children, but go alone. Ways and means are appointed but for a little while, and are not to be rested in, but pressed through to our rest, to which they refer.

(2.) That they would find it very difficult to follow Him to the other world. What He said to the Jews, (ch. 7: 34.) He saith to his disciples; for they have need to be quickened by the same considerations that are propounded for the convincing and awakening of sinners. Christ tells them here, [1.] Ye shall seek Me, that is, 'Shall wish ye had Me again with you.' We are often taught the worth of mercies by the want of them. Though the presence of the Comforter yielded real and effectual relief in straits and difficulties, yet it was not such a sensible satisfaction as his bodily presence. But observe, Christ said to the Jews, Ye shall seek Me and not find Me; but to the disciples He only saith, Ye shall seek Me, intimating, that they should not seek in vain. When they sought his body in the sepulchre, though they did not find it, they sought to good purpose. [2.] Whither He went they could not come; this suggests to them high thoughts of Him who was going to an invisible, inaccessible world, to dwell in light unapproachable; and also low thoughts of themselves, and serious thoughts of their future state. Christ tells them that they could not follow Him, (as Joshua told the people that they could not serve the Lord,) only to quicken them to diligence and care. They would not follow Him to his cross, for they had not courage and resolution; (as appeared when they all forsook Him and fled;) nor to his crown, for they had not a sufficiency of their own, nor were their work and warfare yet finished.

II. He discourses with them concerning the great duty of brotherly love; (v. 34, 35) Ye shall love one another. Judas was now gone out, and had them, in consideration of God's being greatly glorified by them, v. 32.

God glorified Him in his sufferings by signs and wonders, both in heaven and earth; which extorted even from his crucifiers an acknowledgment that He was the Son of God. But especially after his sufferings He glorified Him, when He set Him at his own right hand, gave Him a name above every name.

He will glorify Him in Himself. Either, 1st. In Christ Himself: in his own person, and not only in his kingdom among men. This supposes his speedy resurrection. A common person may be honored after his death, in his memory or posterity, but Christ was honored in Himself. Or, 2dly. In God Himself. God will glorify Him with Himself, as explained, ch. 17: 5. He shall sit down with the Father upon his throne, Rev. 3: 21. This is true glory.

He will glorify Him straightway. He looked on the joy and glory set before Him, not only as great, but as near; and his sorrows and sufferings soon over. Good services to earthly princes, often remain long unrewarded; but Christ had his preferments presently. It was but forty hours (or less) from his death to his resurrection, and forty days thence to his ascension, so that it might well be said He was straightway glorified, Ps. 16: 10.

All this, in consideration of God's being glorified in and by his sufferings; Seeing God is glorified in Him, and receives honor from his sufferings, God shall in like manner glorify Him in Himself, and give Him honor. Note, 1st. In the exaltation of Christ there was a regard had to his humiliation, and a reward given for it. Because He humbled Himself, therefore God highly exalted Him. If the Father be so great a gainer in his glory by the death of Christ, the Son shall be no loser. said, See how these Christians love one another. (3.) If the followers of Christ do not love one another, they not only cast an unjust reproach on their profession, but give just cause to suspect their sincerity. O Jesus I are these thy Christians, these passionate, malicious, spiteful, ill-natured people? Is this thy son's coat? When our brethren need help from us, and we have an opportunity of being serviceable to them, when they differ in opinion and practice from us, or are rivals with, or provoking to us, and we have an occasion to condescend and forgive; in such cases as this it will be known whether we have this badge of Christ's disciples.

V. 36—38. We have here, Peter's curiosity and confidence, and the check given them.

His question was bold and blunt. He overlooks the practical instructions Christ had given them concerning brotherly love, but fastens on that concerning which Christ purposely kept them in the dark. Note, It is a common fault, to be more inquisitive concerning things secret, which belong to God only, than concerning things revealed, which belong to us and our children; more desirous to have our curiosity gratified, than our consciences directed; to know what is done in heaven, than what we may do to get thither. Observe in the converse of Christians, how soon a discourse of that which is plain and edifying, is dropped, and no more said of it; while a matter of doubtful disputation runs into an endless strife of words.

Christ's answer was instructive. He did not gratify him with a particular account of the world He was going to, nor ever foretold his glories and joys so distinctly as his sufferings; but said as before, v. 33. Let that suffice, thou canst not follow Me now, but shalt hereafter.

We may understand it of his following Him to the cross; 'Thou hast not yet strength of faith and resolution to drink of my cup;' and it appeared so by his cowardice. For this reason, when Christ was seized, He provided for the safety of his disciples; Let these go their way, because they could not follow Him now. Christ considers the frame of his disciples, and will not ready. 'Hereby it will appear that you are indeed my followers by following me in this.' Note, Brotherly love is the badge of Christ's disciples. By this He knows them, by this they may know themselves, (1 John 3:14.) and by this others may know them; this He would have them noted for, as that wherein they excelled all others. For this their Master was famous; all that ever heard of Him, have heard of his great love; and therefore if you see any people more affectionate one to another, than is common, say, 'Certainly these are the followers of Christ; they have been with Jesus.'

By this it appears, (1.) That the heart of Christ was very much upon it, that his disciples should love one another; in this they must be singular; whereas the way of the world is, to be every one for himself; they should be hearty for one another. He does not say, By this shall men know that ye are my disciples—if ye work miracles; for a worker of miracles is but a cipher without charity; (1 Cor. 13: 1, 2.) but if ye love one another from a principle of self-denial and gratitude to Christ; this Christ would have to be the peculiarity of his religion, the principal note of the true church. (2.) It is the true honor of Christ's disciples to excel in brotherly love; and nothing will more effectually recommend them to the esteem and respect of others. See what a powerful attractive it was, Acts 2:46, 47. Tertullian speaks of it as the glory of the primitive church, that the Christians were known by their affection to one another. Their adversaries took notice of it, and give them work and hardship they are not as yet fit for; the day shall be as the strength is. Peter cannot follow Christ now, not being come to his full growth, but he shall follow Him hereafter; shall be crucified at last, like his Master. Let him not think that because he escapes suffering now, he shall never suffer. From missing the cross once, we must not infer we shall never meet it; we may be reserved for greater trials than we have yet known.

We may understand it of his following Him to the crown. Christ was now going to his glory, and Peter was very desirous to go with Him; 'No,' saith Christ, 'thou canst not, thou art not yet ripe for heaven, nor hast thou finished thy work on earth. The Forerunner must first enter to prepare a place for thee, but thou shalt follow Me after thou hast fought the good fight, and at the time appointed.' Note, Believers must not expect to be glorified as soon as they are effectually called, for there is a wilderness between the Red sea and Canaan.

Peter makes a daring protestation of constancy. He is not content to be left behind, but asks, 'Lord, why cannot I follow Thee now? Dost Thou question my sincerity and resolution? I promise Thee, if there be occasion, I will lay down my life for thy sake.' Some think Peter had a conceit, as the Jews had in a like case, (ch. 7: 35.) that Christ was designing a journey to some remote country, and declared his resolution to go with Him wherever He went; but, having so often heard his Master speak of his own sufferings, surely he could not understand Him any otherwise than of his going away by death; and he resolves, as Thomas, that he will go and die with Him; and better die with Him, than live without Him. What affection Peter had to Jesus, 'I will lay down my life for thy sake, and I can do no more.' I believe Peter spake as he thought, and, though inconsiderate, he was not insincere. Note, Christ should be dearer to us than our lives, which, therefore, when called to it, we should be willing to lay down for his sake, Acts 20: 24. How ill he took it to have it questioned; 'Why, Lord? Dost Thou suspect my fidelity?' 1 Sam. 29: 8. Note, True love hears its own sincerity arraigned with regret, as ch. 21: 17. Christ had indeed said that one of them was a devil, but he was discovered, and gone out, and therefore Peter thinks he may speak with more assurance of his own sincerity; 'Lord, I am resolved I will never leave Thee, and therefore why cannot I follow Thee?' We are apt to think that we can do any thing, and take it amiss to be told that this and the other we cannot do, whereas without Christ we can do nothing.

Christ gives him a surprising prediction of his inconstancy, v. 28. He has many ways of discovering those to themselves, whom He loves.

He upbraids Peter with his confidence; Wilt thou lay down thy life for my sake? Methinks, He seems to have said this with a smile, 'Pe-

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 31—38. While hypocrites and apostates 'bring upon themselves swift destruction,' the loss is wholly their own: for nothing can prevent the glory of the Redeemer, and that of the Father in Him. Even on the cross, the Savior acquired the most illustrious victories over Satan, the world, sin, and death. (Col. 2: 13—15.)—There He magnified the divine law, paid an inestimable ransom, and rescued millions from eternal misery, to the glory of the Father: therefore a name and a glory have been given Him, above all the inhabitants of heaven and earth; that 'all should honor the Son, even as they honor the Father.' (5: 20—23. Phil. 2: 9—11.) The thoughts of his glory, and of his love to us, should reconcile us to our distance and trials, while we continue in this world. We cannot now follow our Lord to heaven; yet if we truly believe, we 'shall follow Him hereafter,' notwithstanding our remaining errors, temptations, and conflicts: but we must await his time, perform our work, and be gradually humbled and purified for our inheritance.—Who, that seriously contemplates the state of the Christian church, or the spirit of those who seem most zealous for evangelical truth, would suppose, that mutual love, after the example of Jesus, is indeed the appointed criterion, by which all men should know and distinguish his disciples? Had a zealous zeal for doctrines, forms, parties, or mutual slanders, revilings, and anathemas rashly denounced, or exactness in the minutiae of a system, or a perverted ingenuity in multiplying Shibboleths, been the test of Christianity, modern appearances might suggest less melancholy reflections than now obtrude upon the pious mind. But the commandment 'to love one another, even as Christ hath loved us,' is still new and strange to most professed Christians: many seem never to have read it; few appear to understand, or practise it; and 'because iniquity abounds, the love of these few waxes cold.' Instead of exercising candor in judging of our brethren, that we may take in all, who appear to hate and repent of sin, to believe in a divine Savior, and love and follow after holiness; many seem to think, that a rigorous zeal for an orthodox system, or some external forms, ought to swallow up all meekness, candor, and kindness to those, who differ from them even in the smallest particulars! (P. O. 1 Cor. 12: 12—26. Eph. 4: 1—6.) Men in general notice any of the words of Christ rather than these: and self-preference, boasting, and judging others, supplant humble love which 'hoped all things.' (1 Cor. 13: 4—7. P. O. 1—7. P. O. Jam. 3: 13—18.) But this 'haughty spirit goes before a fall;' and some, whom the Lord loves, are left to feel and to show their weakness and folly; in order to humble them, to teach them more tenderness to their brethren, as well as more entire dependence on Christ. May we then endeavor to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace; 'to love one another with a pure heart fervently,' and 'walk humbly with God.'

He promises them power to do even greater works than He had done. And that He will grant all the prayers offered in his name, 12-14. He requires obedience as the proof of their love; and promises to give them the Comforter, the Holy Spirit, and much security and comfort, in communion with the Father and with Him, as comfort and making their abode with those that love Him, 15-26. He leaves his peace with them; and shows that his return to his Father was a proper ground for their rejoicing, 27-29; and He informs them of his approaching conflict with the prince of this world, in obedience to the Father, 30, 31.

Many things concurred to trouble the disciples. Christ had just told them of the unkindness He should receive from some of them, and this troubled them all. NOTES.

CHAP. XIV. v. 1. 'Let it not suffice you, that ye believe in one infinite and invisible God, but repose your hearts upon Me, the true and only Son of God, whom ye see clothed with flesh. And the rather now fasten your souls on Me, by a steadfast belief; for ye shall not find this humanity of mine subjected to many and great miseries, and given contempt, pain, and insult, even to an ignominious death: but let not your hearts be troubled, the issue of those things shall be glorious.' Bp. Hall.—As I find no example where the same word, in the same sentence, is used both in the Indicative and imperative mood, I had rather render these words in the same mode thus, 'Believe in God, believe also in Me.' Whitby.—(So Doddridge, Lampe, &c.) This criticism is probably well grounded. Campbell concurs in it, and adds, 'How frequently, in the book of Psalms, are the people of God, in the time of affliction, exhorted to trust in the Lord? Such exhortations, therefore, are not understood to imply a total want of faith in those to whom they are given.'—Yet Bp. Hall's view of the nature and object of that faith in Christ, to which the disciples were exhorted, is most satisfactory: He had just before predicted, Let it not ter, thy promises are too lavish to be relied on; thou dost not consider with what reluctance and struggle a life is laid down.' Christ hereby puts Peter upon second thoughts, not that he might retract his resolution, but that he might insert that necessary proviso, Thy grace enabling me, I will. 'Wilt thou undertake to die for Me? thou that tremblest to walk upon the water to Me? thou that, when sufferings were spoken of, criest out, Be it far from Thee, Lord?' It was an easier thing to leave thy hoats and nets, than to lay down thy life.' His Master Himself struggled when it came to that, and the disciple is not greater than his Lord. Note, It is good for us to shame ourselves out of presumptuous confidence. Shall a bruised reed set up for a pillar, or a sickly child for a champion? He plainly foretels his cowardice. To stop his boasting, Peter should say it again, Yea, Master, that I will, Christ solemnly asserts it with, Verily, verily, I say unto thee, The cock shall not crow till thou hast denied Me thrice. He does not say, as afterward, This night, for it seems to have been two nights before the passover; but, 'Shortly, the cock shall not have finished his crowing till thou hast again and again denied Me, and that for fear of suffering.' The crowing of the cock is mentioned, [1.] To intimate that the trial in which he would miscarry, would be in the night, which was improbable, but Christ's foretelling it was an instance of his infallible foresight. [2.] The crowing of the cock was to be the occasion of his repentance, which would not have been, had not Christ predicted this. Christ not only foresaw that Judas would betray Him, though he only in heart designed it; but that Peter would deny Him, though he did not design it. He knows not only the wickedness of sinners, but the weakness of saints.

We commonly give it as a reason, why the prophecies of Scripture are expressed darkly and figuratively, because, if they did plainly describe the event, the accomplishment would thereby either be defeated, or necessitated by a fatality inconsistent with human liberty; and yet this plain, circumstantial prophecy did neither; nor did in the least make Christ necessary to Peter's sin. But we may well imagine what a mortification it was to Peter's confidence to be told this, and in such a manner, that he durst not contradict it, else he would have said as Hazael, Is thy servant a dog? This could not but fill him with confusion. CHAP. XIV. v. 1-3. The disciples now began to be troubled, and Christ noticed it. Perhaps it was legible in their looks; it was said, (ch. 13: 22.) they looked one upon another with anxiety and concern, and Christ looked upon them all, and observed it. Jesus is acquainted with the secret wound that bleeds inwardly: He knows not only how we are afflicted, but how we stand affected under afflictions, and how near they lie to our hearts; He takes cognizance of all the trouble his people are at any time in danger of being overwhelmed with; He knows our souls in adversity.

Many things concurred to trouble the disciples. Christ had just told them of the unkindness He should receive from some of them, and this troubled them all. Peter, no doubt, looked very sorrowful, and all the rest were sorry for him and themselves too, not knowing whose turn it would be to be told next of some ill thing they should do. As to this, Christ comforts them; a godly jealousy over ourselves is of great use to keep us humble and watchful, yet it must not disquiet our spirits, and damp our holy joy.

He had just told them that He should not only go away from them, but go in a cloud of sufferings. They must shortly hear Him loaded with reproaches, and see Him barbarously abused, and put to death, and this will be as a sword in their bones; piercing through their own souls, for they had loved and chosen Him, and left all to follow Him. When we look on Christ pierced, we cannot but mourn and be in bitterness, though we see the glorious fruit of it; much more grievous must the sight be to them who could then look no further.

If Christ depart, they will think then themselves disappointed; for, looking that this had been He that would deliver Israel, and set up his secular kingdom in power and glory, they had lost all to follow Him. Now, if He leave the world in the same circumstances in which He had lived, and worse, they are quite defeated. They will think themselves sadly deserted and exposed. They knew by experience what little presence of mind they had in difficult emergencies, that they could count upon nothing but being ruined, and run down, if they part with their Master. In reference to all these, Let not your heart be troubled. The emphasis may significantly be laid,

1st. Upon the word troubled. Be not put into a hurry and confusion, like the troubled sea when it cannot rest. He does not say, 'Let not your hearts be sensible of grief, or sad,' but, 'Be not ruffled and discomposed, be not cast down and disquieted,' Ps. 42: 5.

2dly. Upon the word heart. 'Though the nation and city, though your little family and flock be troubled, let not your heart be troubled. Keep possession of your own souls, if of nothing else. The heart is the main fort; whatever you do, keep trouble from that, keep it with all diligence. The spirit must sustain the infirmity, therefore see that it be not wounded.'

3dly. Upon the word your. 'You that are my followers, my redeemed, sanctified ones, however others are overwhelmed with the sorrows of this time, he not you, for you know better; let the sinners in Zion tremble, but let the sons of Zion be joyful in their King.' Herein Christ's disciples should do more than others; they should keep their minds quiet, when every thing else is unquiet.

The remedy He prescribes against this trouble of mind, which He saw ready to prevail over them, is, believe. (1.) Some read it imperatively, 'Believe in God, and his perfections and providences, believe also in Me, and my mediation. Build with confidence upon the acknowledged principles of natural religion; that there is a God, most holy, wise, powerful, and good; who has the sovereign disposal of all events; and comfort yourselves likewise with the peculiar doctrines of that religion I have taught you.' But, we read the former as an acknowledgment, that they did believe in God, for which He commends them; 'But if you would effectually provide against a stormy day, believe also in Me.' Through Christ we are brought into covenant with God, and become interested in his favor, which otherwise as sinners we must despair of, and the remembrance of God would have been our trouble; but by believing in Christ as the Mediator between God and man, our belief in God becomes comfortable; and this is the will of God, that all men should honor the Son as they honor the Father, by believing in the Son, as they believe in the Father: those that rightly believe in God, will believe in Christ, whom He has made known to them; and believing in God through Christ, is an excellent mean of that all the disciples would forsake Him, and that Peter would thrice deny Him: (13: 36-38.) and therefore, faith in Him as a Savior, and in the mercy of God through Him for the pardon of these sins, would be especially requisite, to keep them from despair and its awful consequences. (Luke 22: 31-34. 1 John 2: 1, 2.)

Verse 2. 'Heaven is spoken of under the notion of a temple, in which are many mansions, (quiet and continued abodes, Doddridge,) where those are to abide who are made kings and priests unto God.' ('An allusion to the custom of Oriental monarchs, of assigning to their courtiers habitations within their immensely extensive, royal palaces.' Moshem.) 'Perhaps this intimates various degrees of glory.'—I go to prepare a place, &c. ('This was prepared in the purpose of God from the foundation of the world, (Matt. 25: 34. Eph. 1: 3-5.) but as that was founded on the mediation of Christ, it may be strictly said, that when He entered there as our High Priest and Forerunner, to present as he were, his own blood, He prepared it for the admission of his people. See Heb. 2: 23, 24.') R. OBITOR &

3 And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again, and receive you unto myself; that where I am, there ye may be also.

4 And whether I go ye know, and the way ye know.

keeping trouble from the heart. The joys of faith are the best remedies against the griefs of sense; it is a remedy with a promise annexed to it; the just shall live by faith; I had fainted unless I had believed.

Here is a particular direction, to act faith upon the promise of eternal life, v. 2, 3. For what did He direct them to trust to God, and in Him? For happiness to come, when this body, and this world shall be no more; and to last as long as the immortal soul and the eternal world shall last. This is proposed as a sovereign cordial under the troubles of this present time, to which the happiness of heaven is admirably adapted. All the saints have encouraged themselves with this in their greatest extremities, that heaven would make amends for all.

Believe and consider, that really there is such a happiness; v. 2. The happiness of heaven is here represented as mansions. [1.] In a Father's house; my Father's house; and Christ's Father is ours; so that, in right of their elder brother, all true believers shall be welcome to that happiness as to their home. It is his house, who is King of kings, and Lord of lords, dwells in light, and inhabits eternity. [2.] There are mansions there; that is, 1st. Distinct dwellings, an apartment for each; perhaps there is an allusion to the priests' chambers about the temple. In heaven there are accommodations for particular saints; though all shall be swallowed up in God, yet our individuality shall not be lost; every Israelite had his lot in Canaan, and every elder a seat, Rev. 4: 4. 2dly. Durable dwellings; abiding places. The house itself is lasting; our estate in it is not for a term of years, but a perpetuity. Here we are as at an inn, in heaven we shall gain a settlement. The disciples had quitted their houses to attend Christ, who had not where to lay his head, but the mansions in heaven will make them amends.

[3.] There are many mansions, for there are many sons to be brought to glory, and He exactly knows their number; nor will room be wanting. He had told Peter he should follow Him, (ch. 13: 36); but let not the rest be discouraged; in heaven, there are mansions for them all. Rehoboth, Gen. 26: 22.

An assurance of the reality of the happiness and the sincerity of its proposal to us; v. 2. 'If you had deceived yourselves, when you quitted your households, and ventured your lives for Me, in prospect of a happiness future and unseen, I would soon have undeceived you.' The assurance is built, 1. On the veracity of his word. 2. On the sincerity of his affection to them. As He is true, and would not impose upon them Himself, so He is kind, and would not suffer them to be imposed upon. If either there were no such mansions, or none designed for them, who had left all to follow Him, He would have given them timely notice of the mistake, that they might have made an honorable retreat to the world again. Note, Christ's good will to us is a great encouragement to our hope in Him. He loves us too well, and means us too well, to disappoint the expectations He has raised, or to leave those to be of all men most miserable, who have been of Him most observant.

Believe and consider, that the design of Christ's going away was to prepare a place in heaven for his disciples. I go as the Forerunner; I am to enter for you; that is, 1. To take possession for us, as our Advocate, and so secure our title. 2. To make provision for us as our Friend and Father. The happiness of heaven, though prepared before the foundation of the world, yet must be further fitted up for man in his fallen state. It consisting much in the presence of Christ, He must go before, to enter into that glory which his disciples were to share in. Heaven would be an unready place for a Christian, if Christ were not there. He went to prepare a table, thrones, for them, Luke 22: 30. Thus He designates the fitness of heaven's happiness for the saints.

Believe and consider, that therefore He would certainly come again in due time, to fetch them to that place; (v. 3.) 'If it be the errand of my journey, to prepare a place for you, you may be sure, when every thing is ready, I will come again, to receive you to Myself; so that you shall follow Me hereafter, that where I am, there ye may be also.' Comfortable words indeed.

1. Christ will come again; I do come; intimating the certainty of it, that He will come, and that He is daily coming. We say, we are coming, when we are busy in preparing for our coming, and so He is; all He does has reference and tendency to his second coming. Note, The belief of Christ's second coming, of which He has given us assurance, is an excellent preservative against trouble of heart, Phil. 4: 5. Jam. 5: 8.

2. He will come again, to receive all his faithful followers to Himself. He sends for them privately at death, and gathers them one by one; but they are to make their public entry in solemn state together at the last day, and then Christ Himself will come to receive and welcome them out of the abundance of his love; hereby testifying the utmost respect and endearment. Christ's coming is in order to our gathering together unto Him, 2 Thess. 2: 1.

3. Where He is, there they shall be also. Many other Scriptures speak the same, that the essence of heaven's happiness is being with Christ, ch. 17: 24. Phil. 1: 23. 1 Thess. 4: 17 Christ speaks of his being there as now present, that where I am; where I am to be shortly, to be eternally; there ye shall be shortly, eternally: not only there, in the same place, but there, in the same state: not only spectators of his glory, but sharers in it.

4. This may be inferred from his going to prepare a place for us, for his preparations shall not be in vain; He will not build and furnish lodgings, and let them stand empty; He will be the Finisher of that, of which He is the Author: if He have prepared the place for us, He will prepare us for it, and in due time put us in possession of it. As Christ's resurrection is the assurance of ours, so his ascension, victory, and glory, are in assurance of ours.

V. 4—11. Christ, having set heaven before them as the end, shows Himself as the way to it, and tells them that they were better acquainted both with the end, and with the way, than they thought; Ye know, that is, 1. 'Ye may know; it is none of the secret things which belong not to you; ye need not ascend into heaven, or go down into the deep, for the Word is nigh you, (Rom. 10: 6—8) level to you.' 2. 'Ye do know; ye know the home, and the way, though perhaps not as such. Ye have been told it, and cannot but know, if ye would consider.' Note, Christ is willing to make the best of his people's knowledge, though defective. He knows the good in them, better than they themselves, and is certain they have that knowledge, faith, and love, which they themselves are not sensible, or certain of.

This word of Christ gave occasion to two of his disciples to address Him, and He answers them both.

Thomas said, 'Lord, we know not whither Thou goest, to what place and state, and how can we know the way to follow Thee? Christ's testimony concerning their knowledge made them more sensible of their ignorance, and inquisitive after further light. Thomas here shows more modesty than Peter, who thought he could follow Christ now. His confession of ignorance was commendable enough; if good men know but in part, yet they are willing to own their defects; but, The cause of this ignorance was culpable. They knew not whither Christ went, because they dreamed of a temporal kingdom, notwithstanding He had said the contrary again and again. Hence their fancy ran upon his going to some remarkable city, Bethlehem, or Nazareth, or Capernaum, or some of the cities of the Gentiles, as David to Hebron, there to be anointed king, and to restore the kingdom of Israel; and which way this place lay, they could not tell. Thus we think ourselves more in the dark than we need be, concerning the future state of the church, because we expect its worldly prosperity, whereas the promise points at spiritual advancement. Had Thomas understood, as he might, that Christ was going to the invisible, spiritual world, he would not have said, we know not the way.

To this complaint of their ignorance, which included a desire to be taught, Christ gives a full answer, (v. 6, 7.) making good what He had said, that they would have needed no answer if they had understood themselves aright; for they knew Him, and He was the way; they knew the Father, and He was the end; and therefore, whither I go ye know, and the way ye know. Believe in God as the end, and in me as the way, (v. 1.) and ye do all ye should do.

Great things Christ here saith of Himself, v. 6.

Verse 3.
I will come again, &c.] This ultimately refers to Christ's appearance at the last day; yet it is a habitual circumstance, that the death of every particular believer, considering the universal power and providence of Christ, (Rev. 1: 18.) may be regarded as Christ's coming to fetch him home: whereas Satan is spoken of as having naturally the power of death. Heb. 2: 14.

end. In Him we must set out, go on, and finish. As the truth, He is the guide; as the life, He is the end of our way. 2. He is the true and living way; (Heb. 10: 20.) there is truth and life in it, as well as at the end of it. 3. He is the true way to life, the only true way; other ways may seem right, but the end of them is the way of death.

No man cometh to the Father but by Me. Fallen man must come to God, as a Judge, but not as a Father, otherwise than by Christ as Mediator. We cannot come to God by repentance and the acts of worship, without the Spirit and grace of Christ, nor come to God as our Father, without his merit and righteousness; He is the High Priest of our profession, our Advocate.

He speaks of his Father as the end; (v. 7.) 'If ye had known Me aright, ye should, or would, have known my Father also; and from henceforth, by the glory seen in Me, and the doctrine heard from Me, ye know Him and have seen Him.' Here is a tacit rebuke for their dulness in acquainting themselves with Christ, though his constant associates; If ye had known Me.—They did not know Him so well as they might and should have known Him. They knew Him to be the Christ, but did not follow on to know God in Him. He had said to the Jews, (ch. 8: 19.) If ye had known Me, ye would have known my Father also; and here the same to his disciples; for it is hard to say, which is more strange, the wilful ignorance of enemies to the light, or the defects and mistakes of the children of light, that have had such

1st. He is the way, the highway spoken of, Isa. 35: 8. Christ was his own way, for by his own blood He entered into the holy place, (Heb. 9: 12.) and he is our way, for we enter by Him. By his doctrine and example He teaches us our duty, by his merit and intercession He procures us our happiness, and so He is the way. In Him God and man are brought together. We could not get to the tree of life in the way of innocence; but Christ is another way to it. By Christ, an intercourse is settled and kept up between heaven and earth; the angels of God ascend and descend; our prayers go to God, and his blessings come to us by Him; this is the way that leads to rest, the good old way. The disciples followed Him, and Christ tells them that they followed the road, and, while they continued following Him, they would never be out of their way.

2dly. He is the truth: 1. As truth is opposed to figure and shadow. Christ is the substance of all the Old-Testament types, thence called figures of the truth, Heb. 9: 24. Christ is the true manna, (ch. 6: 32.) the true tabernacle, Heb. 8: 2. 2. As truth is opposed to error; his doctrine is true; when we inquire for truth, we need learn no more than the truth as it is in Jesus. 3. As truth is opposed to deceit; He is true to all that trust in Him, is truth itself, 2 Cor. 1: 20.

3dly. He is the life; for we are alive unto God, only in and through Him, Rom. 6: 11. Christ, formed in us, is to our souls, what our souls are to our bodies. He is the resurrection and the life.

Christ is the way, the truth, and the life; that is, 1. He is the beginning, the middle, and the end, out, go on, and finish. As the truth, He is the guide; as the life, He is the end of our way. 2. He is the true and living way; (Heb. 10: 20.) there is truth and life in it, as well as at the end of it. 3. He is the true way to life, the only true way; other ways may seem right, but the end of them is the way of death.

No man cometh to the Father but by Me. Fallen man must come to God, as a Judge, but not as a Father, otherwise than by Christ as Mediator. We cannot come to God by repentance and the acts of worship, without the Spirit and grace of Christ, nor come to God as our Father, without his merit and righteousness; He is the High Priest of our profession, our Advocate.

He speaks of his Father as the end; (v. 7.) 'If ye had known Me aright, ye should, or would, have known my Father also; and from henceforth, by the glory seen in Me, and the doctrine heard from Me, ye know Him and have seen Him.' Here is a tacit rebuke for their dulness in acquainting themselves with Christ, though his constant associates; If ye had known Me.—They did not know Him so well as they might and should have known Him. They knew Him to be the Christ, but did not follow on to know God in Him. He had said to the Jews, (ch. 8: 19.) If ye had known Me, ye would have known my Father also; and here the same to his disciples; for it is hard to say, which is more strange, the wilful ignorance of enemies to the light, or the defects and mistakes of the children of light, that have had such opportunities of knowledge. Had they known Christ aright, they would have known that his kingdom is spiritual; that He came down from and therefore must return to heaven: and then they would have known us Father also, whether He designed to go, when He said, I go to the Father. If we knew christianity better, we should better know natural religion.

He was well satisfied of their sincerity, notwithstanding the weakness of their understanding; 'And from henceforth, from this hint, (a key to all my instructions hitherto,) ye know Him and have seen Him, inasmuch as ye know Me, and have seen Me;' for in the face of Christ we see the glory of God, as we see a father in his son that resembles him. Christ tells his disciples, they were not so ignorant as they seemed; for, though little children, yet they had known the Father, 1 John 2: 13. Note, Many disciples of Christ have more knowledge and grace than they think, and Christ notices that good in them which they themselves are not aware of; for they that know God, do not all at once know that they know Him, 1 John 2: 3.

Philip requests some extraordinary discovery of the Father. He was not so forward to speak as some of them, and yet, from an earnest desire of further light, he cries, Show us the Father. Philip fastened upon the last words Christ said to Thomas, Ye have seen Him. 'Nay,' saith Philip, 'that is it we would have; show us the Father, and it sufficeth us.'

This supposes an earnest desire of acquaintance with God as a Father: the petition is, 'Show us the Father, in that relation to us;' and this he begs, not for himself only, but for his fellow-disciples. Jansenius saith, 'Though Philip did not mean it, yet the Holy Ghost, by his mouth, designed here to teach us, that the satisfaction of a soul consists in the fruition of God,' Ps. 16: 11. 17: 15. In the knowledge of God the understanding rests; in the knowledge of God as our Father the soul is satisfied; a sight of the Father is heaven upon earth.

As Philip speaks here, it intimates that he was not satisfied with such a discovery of the Father as Christ thought fit to give them, but would prescribe and press upon Him something further, some visible appearance of the glory of God, like that to Moses, (Exod. 33: 22.) and to the elders of Israel, Exod. 24: 9-11. It discovers, not only the weakness of his faith, but his ignorance of the gospel-way of manifesting the Father. A sight of God with their bodily eyes, he thinks, would suffice them, and yet those who did thus see Him were not suffi-

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-6. We cannot help feeling trouble under our trials and sins, and because of the apostasies and iniquities which we witness: but we should watch against dejection, and that inward disquietude, which excites distrust, and unfits for present duty. (Luke 21: 12-19, v. 19.) Faith in the promises and perfections of God, and in our Advocate, forms the proper method of keeping trouble from our hearts, and of producing joy in the midst of tribulation. We shall thus be animated, by the prospect of admission into mansions in our Father's house. This hope will never disappoint, this promise never deceive us: He has told us, that 'in the world we shall have tribulation,' and we may know what to expect; and He would not have permitted us to look for so glorious a felicity, if He had not intended to give it to us. But 'He is gone before to prepare a place for us.' He is as much performing the part of a faithful and affectionate Friend now, as when on earth He shed his blood for our sins: and He is as mindful of the concerns of all who look for Him, as He will be when He shall appear the second time without sin unto salvation.' We ought therefore, with all diligence, to use the appointed means of preparing for heaven; and to wait, in the patience of hope and the obedience of love, till He shall return to 'take us to Himself, that where He is, there we may be also.' But stubborn unbelievers have no place prepared in heaven, and no friend at death to receive their souls, or to welcome them at the resurrection: indeed a far different place, 'prepared for the devil and his angels,' awaits them; and their enemy stands ready to receive them to himself, that where he is, there they may be also; nor is there any one to prevent his success. As therefore all know, that they are liable to be turned out of their present residence at an hour's warning; surely, common sense demands of them, to seek admission into those mansions, which Jesus has provided for his people.—We are indeed far more faulty than Thomas, if with all our advantages, we know not whither the Savior is gone, or the way by which we must follow Him. Yet ignorance and uncertainty envelope the minds of even professed Christians, in this obvious and important matter: and numbers seek to enter heaven by ways of man's devising; while Jesus, 'the Way, the Truth, and the Life,' is wholly, or in great measure, neglected, if not despised and opposed. It will, however, be most certainly known at last, that no one of Adam's race ever found acceptance with God, or admission into heaven, who refused to seek them by faith in the atonement and mediation of Christ, by reliance on his Word, who is essential Truth, and by seeking life in his soul from Him, who is the Life itself. It greatly concerns all despisers of the grace proposed in the Gospel to reconsider this subject; and all who are beginning to seek the favor of God, and eternal life, should especially direct their attention to it, that they may not delay to come in that Way, by which alone sinners can find access to a holy God, and admission into the holy heaven. He gives him a maxim, which not only in general magnifies Christ, and leads to the knowledge of God in Him, but justifies what He had said, (v. 7.) Ye know the Father, and have seen Him; and answers what Philip had asked, Show us the Father. He that hath seen Me, hath seen the Father. Ist. All that saw Christ in the flesh, might have seen the Father in Him, if Satan had not blinded their minds, and kept them from a sight of Christ, as the image of God, 2 Cor. 4: 4. 2dly. All that saw Christ by faith, did see the Father in Him, though not at once aware of it. In the light of Christ's doctrine, they saw God as the Father of lights; in the miracles, they saw God as the God of power. The holiness of God shone in the purity of Christ's life, and his grace in all the acts of grace He did.

He refers him to what he had reason to believe; (v. 10, 11.) 'Hast thou not believed that I am in the Father, and the Father in Me, and therefore that in seeing Me thou hast seen the Father? If not, take my word for it, and believe it now.'

We are to believe: that I am in the Father, and the Father in Me; that is, as He had said, (ch. 10: 38.) I and my Father are one. He speaks of the Father and Himself as two persons, and yet so one as never any two were or can be. In knowing Christ, as God of God, Light of Light, very God of very God; begotten, not made, and as being of one substance with the Father, by whom all things were made, we know the Father; and in seeing Him thus, we see the Father. In Christ we behold more of the glory of God than Moses did at Horeb.

We must believe this, 1st. For his word's sake; The words that I speak to you, I speak not of myself. See ch. 7: 16. My doctrine is not mine. What He said, seemed to them careless as the word of man, speaking his own thoughts at his own pleasure; but the wisdom of God indited, and the will of God enforced it. He spoke not of Himself only, but the mind of God according to the eternal counsels.

2dly. For his works' sake: The Father that dwelleth in Me, He doeth them; and therefore believe Me for their sakes. Observe, 1. The Father is said to dwell in Him.—He abideth in Me, by the inseparable union of the divine and human nature; never had God such a temple to dwell in on earth, as the body of the Lord Jesus, (ch. 2: 21.) the true Shechinah, of which that in the tabernacle was but a type. The fulness of the Godhead dwelt in Him bodily, Col. 2: 9. The Father so dwells in Christ, that in Him He may be found, as a man where he dwells. Seek ye the Lord, in Christ, and He will be found. 2. He doeth the works. Many works of power, and works of mercy, Christ did, and the Father did them in Him; and the work of redemption in general was God's own work. 3. We are bound to believe this, for the very ced, but soon corrupted themselves, and made a graven image. Christ's institutions have provided better for the confirmation of our faith than our own inventions.

Christ refers him to what he had seen, v. 9. He upbraids him with his inadvocacy; 'Have I been so long time with you, above three years, and yet hast thou not known Me, Philip? Wilt thou ask for that which thou hast already?' v. 9. He reproves him,

1st. For not improving his acquaintance with Christ; 'Hast thou not known Me, Philip, whom thou hast so long conversed with? Philip, the first day he came to Him, declared that he knew Him to be the Messiah, (ch. 1: 45.) and yet to this day did not know the Father in Him. Many that have good knowledge in the Scripture, and divine things, fall short of the attainments justly expected from them, for want of compounding the ideas they have, and going on to perfection. Many know Christ, who yet do not know what they might know of Him, nor see what they should see in Him. Note, The longer we enjoy the means of knowledge and grace, the more inexcusable we are, if defective therein. Christ expects a proficiency in some measure according to our standing, that we should not be always babes. Let us thus reason with ourselves; 'Have I been so long a hearer of sermons, a student in the Scripture, a scholar in the school of Christ, and yet so weak in the knowledge of Christ, and so unskillful in the word of righteousness?'

2dly. He reproves his infirmity in the prayer, Show us the Father. Note, Herein appears much of the weakness of Christ's disciples, that they knew not what to pray for as they ought, (Rom. 8: 26.) but often ask amiss, (James 4: 3.) for that which either is not promised, or is already bestowed in the sense of the promise, as here.

works' sake. As we are to believe the being and perfections of God, for the sake of the works of creation; so we are to believe the revelation of God to man in Christ, for the sake of the works of the Redeemer; those mighty works, which, by showing forth themselves, (Matt. 14: 2.) show forth Him, and God in Him. Note, Christ's miracles are proofs of his mission, not only for the conviction of infidels, but for the confirmation of his disciples, ch. 2: 11. 5: 36. 10: 37.

V. 12-14. The disciples, as they were full of grief to think of parting with their Master, were full of care what would become of them when He was gone; while He was with them, He was a support to them, kept them in heart; but if He leave them, they will be as sheep having no shepherd. To silence these fears, Christ assures them that they should be clothed with powers sufficient to bear them out. As Christ had all power, they, in his name, should have great power, both in heaven and in earth.

1. Great power on earth, v. 12. This does not weaken the argument Christ had taken from his works to prove Himself one with the Father, (that others should do as great works,) but rather strengthens it; for the miracles the apostles wrought, were wrought in his name, and by faith in Him; and this magnifies his power more than any thing, that He not only wrought miracles Himself, but gave power to others to do so too.

They should be enabled to do such works as He had done, and should have a more ample power for doing them, than when first sent forth, Matt. 10: 8. Did Christ heal the sick, cleanse the lepers, raise the dead? So should they. Did He convince and convert sinners, and draw multitudes to Him? So should they. Though He should depart, the work should not fall to the ground, but be carried on as successfully as ever.

In the kingdom of nature they should work greater miracles, v. 12. No miracle is little; but some seem greater than others. Christ had healed with the hem of his garment, but Peter with his shadow, Acts 5: 15. Paul by the handkerchief that had touched him, Acts 19: 12. Christ wrought miracles for two or three years in one country, but his followers wrought miracles in his name for many ages in divers countries. Ye shall do greater works, if there were occasion, for the glory of God. The prayer of faith, if at any time necessary, should remove mountains.

They should obtain greater victories by the Gospel, than had been obtained while Christ was on earth. The truth is, the captivating of so great a part of the world to Christ, under such disadvantages, was the miracle of all. I think this refers especially to the gift of tongues, an immediate effect on the pouring out of the Spirit and a constant miracle upon the mind, in which words are framed, and made to serve so glorious an intention as that of spreading the Gospel to all nations in their own language. This was a greater sign to them which believed not, (1 Cor. 14: 22.) and more powerful for their conviction, than any other miracle.

The reason Christ gives for this, is, I go unto my Father. 1. 'Because I go, it will be requisite you should have such a power, lest the work suffer by my absence.' 2. 'Because I go, I shall be in a capacity to furnish you with such a power, for I go to the Father, to send the Comforter, from whom you shall receive power.' Acts 1: 8. The wonderful works they did in Christ's name, were part of the glories of his exalted state, when He ascended on high, Eph. 4: 8.

II. Great power in heaven: 'Whatsoever ye shall ask, that will I do, (v. 13, 14.) as Israel.

Verses 10, 11.

'See ch. 8: 15. Christ's referring to his works here, as often elsewhere, respects not merely his miracles themselves, but his sovereign, God-like way of performing them by his own divine power, which was he same in Him as in the Father: otherwise those works themselves were no proof of his being in the Father, and the Father in Him, or of the Father's dwelling in Him in any higher sense than the same might be affirmed of the apostles, who, He says in the next verse, should do the same, or greater works than these: much less could it be said, that he who had seen Him, had also seen the Father unless He had been partaker of the same nature with the Father, and had, in his acting like a divine person, exerted the very same power, as resides in the Father Himself, and that in such an absolute way as the Father Himself would have done it, had He appeared personally and visibly among men. For nothing like this was ever said of the apostles, or any other mere man: because they acted, not by their own, but by Christ's power.

be informed, directed, vindicated.' Occasions vary, but they shall be welcome to the throne of grace upon every occasion.

Ask in my name. To ask in Christ's name is, 1. To plead his merit and intercession, and depend on that plea. The Old-Testament saints had an eye to this when they prayed for the Lord's sake, (Dan. 9:17.) and for the sake of the Anointed, (Ps. 84:9.) but Christ's mediation is brought to a clearer light by the Gospel, and so we are enabled more expressly to ask in his name. When Christ dictated the Lord's prayer, this was not inserted, because they did not so fully understand this matter as when the Spirit was poured out. If we ask in our own name, we cannot expect to speed, for being sinners, we have an ill name there; but Christ's is a good name, well known in heaven, and very precious. 2. It is to aim at his glory, and seek that as our highest end in all our prayers.

What ye ask, that I will I do; v. 13. And again, (v. 14.) 'I will do it.' Ye may be sure I will: not only, I will give orders for it, I will do it; for He has not only the interest of an intercessor, but the power of a sovereign prince, who sits at the right hand of God, the hand of action, and has the doing of all in the kingdom of God. By faith in his name we may have what we will ask.

The reason why their prayers should speed so well; that the Father may be glorified in the Son. This they ought to aim at in asking. In this all our desires and prayers should meet, as in their centre; that God in Christ may be honored by our services, and in our salvation. Hallowed be thy name, is an answered prayer, and is put first, because if the heart be sincere in that, it does in a manner consecrate all other petitions. This Christ will aim at in granting, and for the sake of this will do what they ask, that hereby the glory of the Father in the Son may be manifested. The wisdom, power, and goodness of God were magnified in the Redeemer, when by power exerted in his name, his apostles were enabled to do great things, both in proof of their doctrine, and in its success.

V. 15-17. Christ here promises to send the Spirit, who should be their Comforter, and impress those things upon them. But, He promises to this a memorandum of duty; (v. 15.) If ye love Me, keep my commandments. Keep-that was a prince with God. You shall do such mighty works, because you have such an interest in Me, and in my Father.' Observe.

They were to keep up communion with Him, and fetch power from Him, when He was gone, by prayer. When friends are to be removed at a distance from each other, they provide for the settling of a correspondence; thus, when Christ was going to his Father, He tells his disciples how they might write to Him upon every occasion, and send by a safe and ready conveyance; 'Let Me hear from you by the prayer of faith, and you shall hear from Me by the Spirit.' This was the old way of intercourse with heaven, ever since men began to call upon the name of the Lord; but Christ by his death hath laid it more open to us. Here.

1. Humility is prescribed; Ye shall ask. Though they had quitted all for Christ, they could demand nothing of Him as a debt, but must be humble supplicants, beg or perish.

2. Liberty is allowed; Ask any thing that is good and proper for you; any thing, provided you know what you ask; you may ask for assistance in your work, for a mouth and wisdom, for preservation out of the hands of your enemies, for power to work miracles, for the success of the ministry in the conversion of souls; ask to ing the commandments of Christ, is here put for the practice of godliness in general, and for the faithful and diligent discharge of their office as apostles. Observe, 1. When Christ is comforting them, He bids them keep his commandments; we must not expect comfort but in the way of duty. The same word signifies both to exhort and to comfort. 2. When they were in care what they should do, now their Master was leaving them, He bids them keep his commandments, and then nothing could come amiss. In difficult times our care concerning the events of the day should be swallowed up in a care concerning the duty of the day. 3. When they were showing their love to Christ by grieving to think of his departure, He bids them, if they would show their love to Him, do it, not by weak passions, but by their conscientious care to perform their trust, and by a universal obedience to his commands; that is better than sacrifice or tears. Lovest thou Me? Feed my lambs. 4. When Christ has given them promises of the answer of their prayers, and the coming of the Comforter, He lays down this as a limitation of the promises, 'Provided ye keep my commandments, from a principle of love to Me.' Christ will not be an advocate for any but those that will be ruled and advised by Him as their counsel. Follow the conduct of the Spirit, and you shall have comfort of the Spirit.

It is promised that they shall have another Comforter. This is the great New-Testament promise, (Acts 1:4.) as that of the Messiah was of the Old Testament; a promise adapted to the present distress of the disciples, who were in sorrow. Observe,

The blessing promised, a Comforter. The word is used only in these discourses of Christ, and 1 John 2:1. where we translate it an advocate. Some would retain the Greek word, Paraclete; we read (Acts 9:31.) of the comfort (this same word) of the Holy Ghost, including his whole office as a Paraclete.

1. Ye shall have another Advocate. The office of the Spirit was to be Christ's Advocate with them, to plead his cause, and take care of his concerns, on earth, to be Christ's Vicar, as one of the ancients calls Him; and to be their Advocate with opposers. When Christ was with them, He spake for them as there was occasion; but now He is leaving them, the Spirit of the Father shall speak in them, Matt. 10:19, 20. The cause cannot miscarry, that is pleaded by such an advocate.

2. Ye shall have another Master, or Teacher, or Exhorter. While they had Christ with them, He excited and exhorted them to duty; now He is going, He leaves one with them that shall do this as effectually, though silently. A Patron, one that shall both instruct and protect you.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 7-14. In proportion as we know Jesus, we know the Father. Every true believer has, in a measure, thus known and seen Him: the character, doctrine, and cross of Christ form the glass, in which we must contemplate the glory of the invisible God. (17:1-3, v. 3. 2 Cor. 3:17, 18. P. O. 7-18, 4:6.) It is owing to inattention, that our discoveries are so feeble and few. Thus we are our own enemies, for this is the only satisfactory good, which can suffice to fill our enlarged capacities. If we could behold God in his essential glory, the discovery would overwhelm us: in the Person of Jesus alone can we see Him, as 'a just God and a Savior,' as glorious in holiness and abundant in mercy; and as the proper Object of our delightful contemplation, our confidence, our rejoicing, and adoration. May the doctrine and character, the miracles and prophecies, the sufferings and glory of our divine Redeemer; the great things He performed when on earth, and the still greater He has done by his believing servants, since his ascension into heaven, confirm our faith in Him, and assure us, that 'He is in the Father, and the Father in Him.' Even now, 'whatsoever we shall ask in his name,' as conducive to our good, and suited to our state, He will give it us: (Matt. 7:7-11. Jam. 5:16-18. 1 John 5:14, 15.) that, in the renewal of our souls to holiness, our resistance of temptation, our obedience under trials, and the conversion of sinners by our means, 'the Father may be glorified in the Son;' for these are great works in the sight of angels and of God Himself, however men may despise them. (P. O. Luke 15:1-10.) SCOTT.

Verse 13.

Whatsoever 'they should ask in his name,' as conducive to these important ends, He should bestow it upon them, by his own power and authority. Christ saith, 'Whatsoever ye thus ask, I will do; which, as it supposes in Him omnipotence, enabling Him to know the requests of all Christians upon earth; and omnipotence, enabling Him to assist them every where in the performance of the greatest works: so must it consequently imply an unity of essence betwixt the Father and the Son, and so the Father is glorified in the Son. Hence what is here, "I will do it," is, (16:23.) "the Father will give you." Note also, that whereas the Jews used to be a blessing... for the sake of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; though, being only mere men, they never prayed to them; the Christians not only prayed to the Father in the name of the Son, but invoked the Son also, as being one God with the Father: this being a periphrasis of Christians, that they were those who called on the name of Christ. (Acts 9:14, 21. Rom. 10:13.)

'And this seems here to be mentioned to confirm their faith in Him,' that He who so loved them, had power to do all things for them, 'Whitby.—What prophet ever used such language, as this of our Lord in these verses?' It is not in me: God shall give Pharaoh an answer of peace. (Gen. 41:16. Dan. 2:30. Acts 3:12.) The answer of the prayer of faith, in working miracles, seems to have been immediately intended; [so Dr. A. Clarke:] yet not to the exclusion of any other case, in which believers pray to the Father in the name of Christ, for promised blessings. (16:23, 24. Matt. 21:21, 22.) SCOTT.

Verse 14.

In my name. [That is, In my cause.] This whole discourse respects apostles. In v. 26, Jesus says, the Father will send the Spirit in my name; which denotes simply—for my cause, in my place, and to supply my place. And when, in ch. 16:24, He says, hitherto have ye asked nothing in my name, He means in his cause.

to be with them forever. [2.] 'With your successors, to the end of time.' [3.] If we take forever in its utmost extent, the promise will be accomplished in those consolations of God which will be the eternal joy of all the saints; pleasures forever.

This Comforter is the Spirit of truth, whom ye know, v. 16, 17. They might think it impossible to have a comforter equivalent to the Son of God; 'Yea,' saith Christ, 'ye shall have the Spirit of God, who is equal in power and glory with the Son.'

He is the Spirit: One who should do his work inwardly and invisibly, by working on men's spirits.

The Spirit of truth. True to you, and to his undertaking for you, which He will perform to the utmost. He will teach you the truth; will enlighten your minds with the knowledge of it, strengthen your belief of it, and increase your love to it. The Gentiles by their idolatries, and the Jews by their traditions, were led into gross errors; but the Spirit of truth shall not only lead you into all truth, but others by your ministry.' Christ is the truth, and He is the Spirit of Christ, with which He was anointed.

(2.) He is One whom the world cannot receive; but ye know Him. Therefore He abideth with you.

Christ's disciples are here distinguished from the world; for they are chosen and called out of a world lying in wickedness; are children and heirs of another world.

It is the misapprehension of those who are devoted to the world, that they cannot receive the Spirit of truth. The spirit of the world and of God are directly contrary the one to the other, (1 Cor. 2:12), for where the spirit of the world has become ascendant, the Spirit of God is excluded. Even the princes of this world, though, as princes, they had advantages of knowledge, yet, as princes of this world, labored under invincible prejudices, so that they knew not the things of the Spirit of God, 1 Cor. 2:8.

Men cannot receive the Spirit of truth, because they see Him not, neither know Him. His comforts are foolishness to them, as much as the cross of Christ; and the great things of the Gospel, like those of the law, [are] counted a strange thing. These are judgments far above, out of their sight. Speak to the children of this world of the operations of the Spirit, and you are as a barbarian to them.

The best knowledge of the Spirit of truth, is by experience; Ye know Him, for He dwelleth with you. Christ had dwelt with them, and by their

3. Another Comforter. Christ was expected as the consolation of Israel. One of the names of the Messiah among the Jews was, the Comforter. The Targum calls the days of the Messiah, the years of consolation. Christ was the Comforter of his disciples when with them, and now He was leaving them in their greatest need, He promises them another.

The same that gave the Son to be our Savior, will give his Spirit to be our Comforter, pursuant to the same design. The Son is said to send the Comforter, (ch. 15:26.) but the Father is the prime Agent.

This blessing is procured by the intercession of the Lord Jesus; He said, (v. 14.) I will do it; here He saith, I will pray for it, to show not only that He is both God and man, but also King and Priest. As priest He is ordained to make intercession, as king He is authorized by the Father to execute judgment. When Christ saith, I will pray the Father, it does not suppose that the Father is unwilling, or must be importuned, but only that the gift of the Spirit is a fruit of Christ's mediation, purchased by his merit, and taken out by his intercession. See

The continuance of this blessing; that He may abide with you forever. That is, [1.] 'As long as you live. Ye shall never know the want of a comforter, nor lament his departure, as you are now lamenting mine.' Note, It should support us under the loss of those comforts which were designed us for a time, that everlasting consolations are provided for us. It was not expedient that Christ should be with them forever, for they who were designed for public service must not always live a college life; they must disperse, and therefore a comforter that would be with them in all places alike, and howsoever distressed, was alone fit acquaintance with Him, they could not but know the Spirit of truth. They had themselves been endued with the Spirit in some measure. What enabled them to leave all to follow Christ, and to continue with Him in his temptations? What enabled them to preach the Gospel and work miracles, but the Spirit dwelling in them? The experiences of the saints are the explications of the promises; paradoxes to others are axioms to them.

They that have experimental acquaintance with the Spirit, have a comfortable assurance of his continuance; He dwelleth with you, and shall be in you. They that know Him, know how to value Him, and bid Him welcome; and therefore He shall be in them, as the light in the air, the sap in the tree, the soul in the body. Their communion with Him shall be intimate, their union with Him inseparable.

The gift of the Holy Ghost is a peculiar gift, bestowed upon the disciples of Christ in a distinguishing way; them, and not the world; it is to them hidden manna, and the white stone. No comforts comparable to those which make no show, or noise. This is the favor God bears his chosen; the heritage of those that fear his name.

V. 18—24. He promises to continue his care of them; (v. 18.) I will not leave you orphans, or fatherless, for though I leave you, yet I leave you this comfort, I will come to you. His departure grieved them; but it was not so bad as they apprehended; it was neither total, nor final.

1. Not total; 'Though I leave you without my bodily presence, I do not leave you without comfort.' Though children, and left little, they had received the adoption of sons, and his Father would be their Father, with whom those who otherwise would be fatherless, find mercy. Note, The case of true believers, though sometimes sorrowful, is never comfortless, because they are never orphans: for God is an everlasting Father.

2. Not final; I will come to you, I do come; that is, (1.) 'I will come speedily to you at my resurrection.' He had often said, The third day I will rise again. (2.) 'I will be coming daily to you in my Spirit'; in the tokens of his love, and visits of his grace, He is still coming. (3.) 'I will come certainly at the end of time, to introduce you into the joy of your Lord.' Note, The consideration of Christ's coming saves us from being comfortless in his removals from us; for if He depart for a season, it is that we may receive Him forever. Let this moderate our grief, The Lord is at hand.

He promises that their acquaintance and interest in Him should continue; (v. 19, 20.) Yet a little while, and the world sees Me no more; after his death, the world saw Him no more, for though He rose to life, He never showed Himself to all the people, Acts 10:41. The malignant world cried, Away with Him, crucify Him; so shall their doom be; they shall see Him no more. Those only that see Christ by faith, shall see Him forever; the world sees Him no more till his second coming; but his disciples have communion with Him in his absence.

Ye see Me, and shall continue to, when the world sees Me no more. They saw Him after his resurrection, for He showed Himself to them by many infallible proofs, Acts 1:3. They saw Him by faith after his ascension, at God's right hand, as Lord of all.

Because I live, ye shall live also. It grieved

Verse 16.

Comforter. The masculine personal pronoun, surely marks the personality of the Holy Spirit. By some mistake of his prompters, Mohammed seems to have confounded the Greek name of a Comforter, with another signifying very celebrated. His name Mohammed, signifies celebrated; another name, which he assumed, Achmed, an adjective from the same root, signifies, very celebrated.—He therefore affirmed that Jesus foretold his coming, as Achmed; and complains that Christians refused to receive him. Hence the ungrounded notion, that he professed to be the Holy Spirit.

Scorr.

The Spirit is here evidently spoken of as a distinct person from Christ. He is one Comforter and the Spirit, who, after his departure, should come from the Father, is another. Guise. Besides the several passages in Scripture, which speak of three persons in the Godhead, there are a great variety of texts which separately prove both the divinity and personality of the Holy Spirit. Thus in the present text, and ch. 15:

25. The Comforter is mentioned as a distinct person from the Father and Son. St. Peter uses the expressions, 'lying to the Holy Ghost,' and 'lying to God,' as equivalent, Acts 5:3, 4. The Holy Ghost is said to be eternal, (Heb. 9:14.) to teach all things, (John 14:26.) to guide into all truth, (John 16:13.) to search all things, yet the deep things of God, (1 Cor. 2:10.) to change us into the same image with Christ, (2 Cor. 3:18. Rom. 8:27. John 16:8. 1 Pet. 3:18. 1 Cor. 12:4—11.) In all these passages, the Holy Ghost is plainly spoken of, not merely as a quality or operation, but as a person, and the persons attributed to Him are such, that they can belong only to a divine person. for all that should believe in Him through their word. Her is,

(1.) Duty; having Christ's commandments, we must keep them; as Christians in name and profession, we have Christ's commandments sounding in our ears, written before our eyes; but this is not enough; we would approve ourselves Christians, we must keep them. Having them in our heads, we must keep them in our hearts and lives.

(2.) The dignity of those that do the duty of disciples. They are looked upon by Christ to be such as love Him. Not those that have the greatest wit, and know how to talk for Him, or the greatest estate to lay out for Him, but those that keep his commandments. Note, The surest evidence of love to Christ is, obedience to the laws of Christ. Such is the love of a subject to his sovereign, a dutiful, obedient love, a conformity to his will, and satisfaction in his wisdom.

II. In return. (for there is no love lost upon Christ.)

1. They shall have the Father's love; v. 21. We could not love God, if He did not first, out of good-will to us, give us grace to love Him; but there is a love of complacency promised to those that do love God, Prov. 8:17. He lets them know that He loves them. God so loves the Son, as to love all that love Him.

2. They shall have Christ's love; And I will love him, as Mediator. God will love him as a Father, I will love him as an elder Brother. The Creator will love him, and be the felicity of his being; the Redeemer will love him, and be the Protector of his well-being. In the nature of God, nothing shines more bright than this, that God is love. And in the undertaking them, that their Master was dying, and they counted on nothing else but to die with Him. No, saith Christ, I live; this God glories in, I live, saith the Lord, and Christ saith the same; for He has life in Himself. We are not comfortless, while we know that our Redeemer lives. Therefore, ye shall live also. Note, The life of Christians is bound up in the life of Christ; as sure and as long as He lives, they that by faith are united to Him, shall live also; live spiritually, in communion with God, hid with Christ; if the head and root live, the members and branches live also. They shall live eternally; their bodies shall rise, in virtue of Christ's resurrection; in the world to come, it cannot but be well with all that are his, Isa. 26:19.

Ye shall have the assurance of this; (v. 20.) At that day, when I am glorified, when the Spirit is poured out, ye shall know more clearly than now, that I am in my Father, and you in Me, and I in you.

These glorious mysteries will be fully known in heaven; At that day, when I shall receive you to Myself, you shall know perfectly that which now you see through a glass darkly. Now it appears not what we shall be, but then it will appear what we were.

They were now fully known after the pouring out of the Sp. it on the apostles; at that day divine light would shine, and their eyes would see more clearly, their knowledge would increase, be more distinct, like the blind man's at the second touch of Christ, who at first only saw men as trees walking.

They are known by all that receive the Spirit; for in this is founded their fellowship with the Father and his Son Jesus Christ. They know that Christ is in the Father, one with Him, by experience of what He has wrought for and in them; they find what admirable harmony there is between Christianity and natural religion, that that is grafted into this, and so they know that Christ is in the Father. That Christ is in them, experienced Christians know by the Spirit, 1 John 3:24. They know that they are in Christ, for the relation is mutual; Christ in them, and they in Christ, which speaks an inseparable union; therefore, because He lives, they shall live also. Note, 1st. Union with Christ is the life of believers, and their relation to Him, and to God through Him, is their felicity. 2dly. The knowledge of this union is their unspeakable satisfaction; they were now in Christ, and He in them; but He speaks of it as a further act of grace, that they should know, and have the comfort of it. An interest in Christ and the knowledge of it are sometimes separated.

He promises to love them, and manifest Himself to them, v. 21-24. Observe,

I. Whom Christ will accept, as lovers of Him; those that have his commandments, and keep them. By this Christ shows that the kind things here said to his disciples, were intended of Christ, nothing appears more glorious than this, that He loved us. Now both these are the crown and comfort, the grace and glory, which shall be to all them that love the Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity. Christ was leaving his disciples, but promises to continue his love to them; for He not only retains a kindness for believers, though absent, but is doing them kindness while absent, for He bears them a his heart, and ever intercedes for them.

3. They shall have the comfort of that love; I will manifest myself to him. Some understand it of Christ's showing Himself alive to his disciples after his resurrection, but it is promised to all that love Him and keep his commandments; there is a spiritual manifestation of Christ to all believers; when He enlightens their minds to know his love, (Eph. 3:18, 19.) enlivens their graces, and thus enlarges their comforts. When He clears up the evidences of their interest in Him, and gives them tokens of his love, experience of his tenderness, and earnestness of his kingdom and glory, then He manifests Himself to them; and Christ is manifested to none but those to whom He is pleased to manifest Himself.

At this promise one of the disciples expresses wonder, v. 22.

Judas, not Iscariot. Judah, or Judas, was a famous name; Judah was the most famous tribe in Israel; two of Christ's disciples were of that name, one was the traitor; the other, the brother of James, (Luke 6:16.) one of those akin to Christ, Matt. 13:55. He is called Lebbeus and Thaddeus; and was the penman of the last of the epistles, which in our translation, for distinction's sake, we call the Epistle of Jude. Observe, 1st. Names commend us not to God, nor do they make men worse; Judas the apostle was never the worse, nor Judas the apostate ever the better, for being namesakes. But, 2dly. The evangelist carefully distinguishes between them; he adds, not Iscariot. Let us not confound the precious and the vile.

Lord, how is it? Which speaks either, 1st. The weakness of his understanding. He expected a temporal kingdom of the Messiah, such as all the world would wonder after. How then, should it be confined to us only? Why is it that Thou wilt not show thyself openly, that the Gentiles may come to thy light, and kings to the brightness of thy rising? Note, We create difficulties to ourselves by mistaking the nature of Christ's kingdom, as if it were of this world. Or, 2dly. As speaking the strength of his affections, and the humble sense he had of Christ's distinguishing favor; Lord, how is it? He is amazed at the condescensions of divine grace, as David, 2 Sam. 7:18. What is there in us to deserve so great a favor? Note, 1. Christ's manifesting Himself to his disciples, is done in a distinguishing way; to them, and not to the world that sits in darkness, to the base, not to the mighty and noble; to babes, and not to the wise and prudent. Distinguishing favors are very obliging, considering who are passed by, and who are pitched upon. 2. It is justly marvellous in our eyes; it is unaccountable, and must be resolved into sovereign grace; Even so, Father, because it seemed good unto Thee.

Christ, in answer hereunto, explains and confirms what He had said, v. 23, 24. He overlooks what infirmity there was in what Judas spake, and goes on with his comforts.

He further explains the condition of the promise, which was, loving Him, and keeping his commandments. He shows what an inseparable connection there is between love and obedience; love is the root, obedience the fruit.

1st. Where a sincere love to Christ is in the heart, there will be obedience; If a man love Me, that love will be such a constraining principle in him, that he will keep my words. Where there is true love to Christ, there is a value for his favor, a veneration for his autho-

He gives a good reason to bind us to observe the condition, and encourage us to depend upon the promise; v. 24. To this purpose He had often spoken, ch. 7: 16, 8: 25, 12: 49. 1st. The stress of duty is laid upon the precept of Christ as our rule, and justly, for the word of Christ which we are to keep, is the Father's word, and his will the Father's will. 2dly. The stress of our comfort is laid upon the promise of Christ. But forasmuch as, in dependence upon that promise, we must deny ourselves, take up our cross, and quit all, it concerns us to inquire, whether the security be sufficient to venture our all upon; and this satisfies us it is, that the promise is not Christ's bare word, but the Father's which sent Him.

V. 25-27. These things have I spoken unto you, (the lessons taught them, since they entered his school,) being yet present with you. This intimates, that He retired what He had said, and that He had improved the opportunity of his bodily presence with them to the utmost. Encouragement is given them to expect another teacher, and that Christ would find a way of speaking to them, after his departure, v. 25, 26. Two things He here tells them further, concerning the sending of the Holy Ghost.

1. On whose account; The Father will send Him in my name; for my sake, at my special request; or, 'as my agent and representative.' He came in his Father's name, as his Ambassador; the Spirit comes in his name, to carry on his undertaking, and ripen things for his second coming. Hence He is called the Spirit of Christ, for He pleads his cause, and does his work.

2. On what errand; (1.) He shall teach you all things, necessary to learn or to teach others; as a Spirit of wisdom and revelation. If Christ's Teacher leave them now, when they have made so little proficiency, the Spirit shall teach them. For they that would teach the things of God, must first be taught of God. See Isa. 59: 2..

(2.) He shall bring all I have said to you to your remembrance. Many a lesson Christ had taught, which they had forgotten, and would have occasion for; many things they did not remember, because they did not understand their meaning: the Spirit shall not teach them a new Gospel, but bring to their minds what they had been taught, by leading them to understand it. All the apostles were to preach, and some to write, the things Jesus did and taught, for distant nations and future ages; now if left to themselves, some needful things might have been forgotten, others misrepresented, through the treachery of their memories; therefore the Spirit is promised to enable them truly to relate and record what Christ said to them. To all the saints the Spirit is given to be a remembrancer, and to Him by faith and prayer we should commit the keeping of what we hear and know.

Peace I leave with you. When Christ was about to leave the world, He committed his soul to his Father, his body to Joseph, to be decently interred, his clothes fell to the soldiers, his mother He left to the care of John; but what should He leave to his poor disciples, that had left all for Him? Silver and gold He had none; but He left them what was infinitely better, his peace; as a dying father leaves portions to his children; and it is a worthy portion.

Observe, 1. The legacy is, My peace. Peace is put for all good, and Christ has left us all that is really and truly good. Peace is put for reconciliation and love; the peace bequeathed is peace with God, and one another; peace in our own bosoms, seems to be especially meant; a tranquillity of mind arising from a sense of justification. It is the counterpart of pardon. Christ is Himself our Peace, Eph. 2: 14. It is the peace He purchased for us, and preached to us, and on which the angels congratulated men at his birth, Luke 2: 14.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 15-24. We have not indeed been favored with the Redeemer's personal presence; but are to hope for that of the Holy Spirit, sent by the Father, through his intercession, to 'abide with us forever.' His miraculous operations are not to be expected, nor are they needful for us; but as a Teacher, Sanctifier, and Comforter, He will always continue with his church; and, as the Source of holiness and felicity, will abide with every believer forever. (4: 10-15. P. O. 1-15.) Unconverted men, with all their wisdom, are unable to understand, desire, or receive, the influences of 'the Spirit of truth;' and we can scarcely expect to escape the appellation of enthusiasts or hypocrites, if we profess our faith and experience, in the most scriptural manner. But the true believer cannot be unacquainted with that 'Comforter, who dwelleth in him;' nor may he deny his obligations to Him and dependence on Him, from whose influences all his joys arise. Whatever losses such may sustain, or whatever troubles may await them, they shall not be left friendless: the absence of their Lord will be short, and his return sure; they see Him, whom the world perceives not; they believe and are assured, that 'He is in the Father, and they in Him, and He in them;' in his strength they labor, in his righteousness they are entitled to eternal life; and 'because He lives they shall live also, and be kept by his power through faith to complete salvation. (1 Pet. 1: 3-5.)—These privileges do not belong to all who profess, or even are zealous for, the truths of the Gospel; being confined to them, whose 'faith worketh by love,' and whose love to Jesus induces them 'to keep his commandments;' and they are enjoyed in proportion to the degree of love and obedience. Such persons are thus evidenced to be the subjects of the Father's electing love, the purchase of the Son, and partakers of the Holy Spirit, in regenerating grace. The divine image, renewed upon their souls, is delighted in by the Father and the Son; their holy affections and obedience honor the Gospel; and their communion with the Lord in ordinances, the light of his countenance, and the joy of his salvation, will make them know, 'how He manifests Himself to them as He doth not to the world;' while their conscious unworthiness will fill them with admiration of his condescension. But those who do not love Jesus, and who keep not his sayings, cannot know what these manifestations mean: they only proclaim their folly, if they deny the reality of them, because they never experienced them; (Prop. 14: 1.) 2 Pet. 1: 19, 1 John 5: 9, 10; and if any pretend to them, while living in allowed disobedience to Christ, they must be plainly told that they deceive themselves.

Verse 26.
Remembrance.] 'Here Christ promises that inspiration, which enabled them not only to give a true history of his life and death, but also gave them the most perfect recollection of all the words He had spoken to them, so that they have been able to transmit to posterity the identical words which Jesus uttered in his discourses.' Dr. A. CLARK.

27 'Peace I leave with you; my peace I give unto you: 'not as the world giveth, give I unto you. 'Let not your heart be troubled, neither let it be 'afraid.

28 Ye have 'heard how I said unto you, I go away, and come again unto you. 'If ye loved me, ye would rejoice because I said, 'I go unto the Father: for 'my Father is greater than I.

29 And 'now I have told you before it come to pass, that when it is come to pass, ye might believe.

30 Hereafter 'I will not talk much with you: for 'the prince of this world cometh, 'and hath nothing in me.

31 But 'that the world may know that I love the Father, and as the Father gave me commandment, even so I do. 'Arise, let us go hence.

2. It is bequeathed 'To you, my disciples and followers, who will be exposed to trouble; who are the sons of peace, and qualified to receive it.' This legacy was left to them as the representatives of the church, to them and all true Christians in all ages.

3. How it is left: Not as the world giveth, give I. That is, 'I do not compliment you with the formality, Peace be unto you; it is a real blessing. The smiles of the world cannot give it, nor its frowns take it away.' Or, 'The gifts I give you, are not such as this world gives to its votaries.' The world's gifts concern only the body and time; Christ's gifts enrich the soul for eternity: the world gives lying vanities, which cheat us; Christ gives substantial blessings, which will never fail us: the world gives and takes; Christ gives a good part that shall never be taken away. Infinitely more valuable than the peace which the world gives; which begins in ignorance, consists with sin, and ends in endless troubles; Christ's peace begins in grace, consists with no allowed sin, and ends at length in everlasting peace. It differs from the world's as does a deadly lethargy from a refreshing sleep.

4. Its use; Let not your heart be troubled, for any evils past or present, neither let it be afraid of any evil to come. Note, Those who are interested in the covenant of grace, and entitled to the peace Christ gives, ought not to yield to overwhelming grief and fear. This comes in as the conclusion of the whole matter; He had said, (v. 1.) Let not your heart be troubled, and here He repeats it as that for which He had now given sufficient reason.

V. 28-31. Christ gives another reason, why their hearts should not be troubled for his going away; because his was not. And here He tells them what enabled Him to endure the cross and despise the shame, that they might look unto Him, and run with patience. He comforted Himself.

I. That He should come again; 'Ye have heard how I have said, and now I say it again, I go away, and come again.' Note, What we have heard of the doctrine of Christ, especially concerning his second coming, we have need to be told again and again. When under the power of passion, grief, fear, or care, we forget it. See Phil. 4: 5. Christ encouraged Himself with this, in his sufferings and death, that He should come again, and the same should comfort us in our departure at death; we go to come again; the leave we then take of friends, is only a good-night, not a final farewell. See I Thess. 4: 13, 14.

II. That He went to his Father; 'If ye loved Me, as your sorrow indicates, ye would rejoice instead of mourning, because I go to the Father, which will be my advancement and your advantage; for my Father is greater than I.'

It is matter of joy to Christ's disciples, that He is gone to the Father, to take possession for orphans, and make intercession for transgressors. His departure had a bright, as well as a dark side. Therefore He sent this message after his resurrection, (ch. 20: 17.) I ascend to my Father and your Father.

The reason is, because the Father is greater than He, which, if it be a proper proof of that for which it is alleged, (as no doubt it is,) must be understood thus, that his state with his Father would be much more glorious than his present state; his returning to his Father would advance Him to a much higher condition than He was now in. Or, thus, His going to the Father Himself, and bringing all his followers to Him there, was the end of his undertaking, and therefore greater than the means. This Christ raises the thoughts and expectations of his disciples to something greater, than that in which now they thought on their nappiness bound up. The kingdom of the Father, wherein He shall be all in all, will be greater than the mediatorial kingdom.

Christ's disciples should show they love Him by rejoicing in his exaltation, rather than by lamenting his humiliation; and rejoicing that He is gone to his Father, where we shall be shortly with Him. Many that love Christ, let their love run in a wrong channel; they think if they love Him, they must be continually in pain because of Him; whereas they that love Him, should dwell at ease in Him, should rejoice in Christ Jesus.

III. 'I have told you before it come to pass, that I must die and rise again, and ascend to the Father, and send the Comforter, that, when it is come to pass, ye might believe.' See this reason, ch. 13: 19, 16: 4. Christ told his disciples of his death, (though He knew it would puzzle and grieve them,) because it would afterward redound to the confirmation of their faith in two things.

1. That He who foretold those things, had a divine prescience. Paul, when going to Jerusalem, knew not the things that did abide him there, but Christ did.

2. That the things foretold were according to the divine purpose, not sudden resolves, but the counterparts of an eternal counsel. Let them therefore not be troubled at that, which, by confirming their faith, would redound to their benefit; for the trial of our faith is very precious, though it cost us present heaviness, through manifold temptations, 1 Pet. 1: 6.

IV. He was sure of a victory over Satan, with whom He knew He was to struggle in his departure; (v. 30.) 'Henceforth I will not talk much with you, having not much to say, till the pouring out of the Spirit.' He talked much with them after this; (ch. 15: and 16:) but in comparison with what He had said, it was not much. His time was short, He therefore spake largely now. Note, We should always endeavor to talk to the purpose, because we may not have time to talk much. We know not how soon our breath will be stopped, and therefore should be always breathing something good. When we come to be sick and die, we may not be capable of talking much to those about us; therefore what good counsel we have to give, let us give it while in health.

One reason why He would not talk much with them, was, He had other work; The prince of this world comes; he called the devil so, ch. 12: 31. The disciples dreamed of their Master being the Prince of this world, and they worldly princes under Him. But Christ tells them that the prince of this world was his enemy, as

Verse 28.

It has been already seen, that the Word, as God and with God, is declared to be One with and equal to the Father. (1:1-3. 5: 17-29. 10: 26-31. v. 30.) In this respect Jesus could not say, 'My Father is greater than I'; indeed there can be no greater or less in the infinite perfection of Deity. But, as God the Son was manifested in human nature; and as in this sense He was about to finish his work, and go to receive his merited recompense, in being exalted to the mediatorial throne, the language is evidently proper, not only as to his human nature, but likewise in respect of his mediatorial character and kingdom, in which He acted as the Servant and Apostle of his Father; even as an ambassador, though equal in nature, is inferior in office, to the prince who commissions him. (Note, 16: 7.) In this sense it perfectly accords to the rest of Scripture; and it becometh all who love Him greatly to rejoice in his exaltation to glory, after his voluntary humiliation. (Marg. Ref. y-a-10: 32-39. Matt. 28: 18.) 'I am greater than I.' (Matt. 11: 11. 23: 11. Rom. 9: 12.) Superiority in rank, or office, with equality in nature, as men, is evidently intended in these and other instances. (16: 7.)

It certainly requires very little argument, and no sophistry, to reconcile this passage with the most orthodox notion of the Deity of Christ, as He is repeatedly speaking of his divine, and of his human nature. Of the former He says, (10: 30.) I and the Father are one, and of the latter He states, with the same truth, the Father is greater than I.

Verse 31.

'It is not probable that so interesting and important a discourse was pronounced in the street, or on the way to the garden; nor is there a hint to that effect in the course of the chapters; still less probable is it that our Lord should have poured forth so solemn a prayer as that which occupies the whole of ch. 17, under such circumstances. The portion in question must have been pronounced, either at the house in Jerusalem or in the garden; the former is most probable. Because the words arise, let us go hence, were pronounced, it does not follow that they should immediately have departed.'

CHAP. XV.

Jesus, by the parable of Himself as the true Vine, and his disciples as the branches, shew us the necessity of union and communion with Him, in order to fruitfulness; illustrates the conduct of God towards his church; and exhorts his disciples to abide in Him, 1-8. He shews the greatness of his love to them, 9-15; and that He has chosen them, that they may bring forth fruit which may remain. 16. He commands them to love one another, and warns them to expect hatred and persecutions from the world, which hates both Him and his Father, 17-25. He promises the Comforter, to confirm the testimony which they should bear to Him, 26, 27.

I AM the true Vine, and my Father is the Husbandman.

Him, and therefore, though he prevailed to crucify Him, could not prevail to terrify Him; though he hurried Him to death, yet not to despair. When Satan comes to disquiet us, he has something in us to perplex us with, for we have all sinned; but when He would disturb Christ, he found no occasion against Him. There was no corruption in Christ to give advantage to the prince of this world in his temptations; he could not crush his undertaking by drawing Him to sin, because there was nothing sinful in Him, no tinder for him to strike fire into; He was above the possibility of sinning. The more Satan's interest in us decays, the more comfortably may we expect sufferings and death.

V. His departure was in compliance with, and obedience to, his Father. Satan could not force life from Him, yet He would die; That the world may know that I love the Father; v. 31.

This confirms what He had often said, that his undertaking, as Mediator, was a demonstration to the world, (1.) Of his compliance with the Father. As it was an evidence of love to man, that He died for his salvation; so it was of love to God, that He died for his glory. As the Father loved the Son, and gave all things into his hands; so the Son loved the Father, and gave his spirit into his hand. (2.) Of his obedience to his Father; v. 31. Note, The best evidence of our love to the Father, is, our doing as He hath given us commandment. As Christ loved the Father, and obeyed Him, even to the death, so we must love and obey Christ. Christ's eye to the Father's commandment, obliging Him to suffer and die, bore Him up with cheerfulness, and overcame the reluctance of nature: this took off the offence of the cross, that what He did was by order from the Father; the command of God is sufficient to bear us out in that which is most disputed by others, and therefore should be sufficient to bear us up in that which is most difficult to ourselves; This is the will of Him that made Me, that sent Me.

That the world may know that I love the Father, Arise, let us go hence to the garden; so some; or to Jerusalem. When we talk of troubles at a distance, it is easy to say, Lord, I will follow Thee whithersoever Thou goest; but when an unavoidable cross lies in the way of duty, then to say, Arise, let us go to meet it; this lets the world know that we love the Father. If this discourse was at the close of the passover-supper, it would seem that at these words He rose from the table, and retired where He might the more freely carry on the discourse with his disciples in the following chapters, and pray with them. Dr. Goodwin's remark upon this, is, that Christ mentioning the great motive of his sufferings, his Father's commandment, was in haste to go forth to suffer and die, afraid of missing the time of Judas' meeting Him; Arise, let us go hence; but He looks upon the glass, as it were, sees it not quite out, sits down again, and preaches another sermon.

V. 25-31. Would we know the way of peace, we must fervently pray for the teaching of the Holy Spirit and depend on it: thus the words which Jesus has spoken will be brought to our remembrance, and we shall be enabled to understand, believe, and obey them; and our experience of their truth and goodness will solve difficulties insuperable to others. Thus we shall receive that legacy, which Jesus has bequeathed to all his disciples, even 'His peace,' the peace of God that passeth all understanding; and it will contribute more to our present comfort, than the friendship, or even the possession of the whole world; for it will guard our hearts against trouble and terror, in the most afflictive scenes of life, and in the hour of dissolution. (Phil. 4:5-7.) We may distinguish the peace He gives, from that of Pharisees and hypocrites, by its hum-were the princes of this world, actuated and ruled by him, 1 Cor. 2:8. But he has nothing in Me. Observe,

1. The devil had set upon Christ with his temptations, (Matt. 4:) had offered Him the kingdoms of this world, (if He would hold them as tributary to him, with an eye to which, Christ calls him in disdain, the prince of this world; then the devil departed from Him for a season; 'But now,' says Christ, 'I see him preparing to make a furious onset, and so to frighten from his undertaking, whom he could not entice.' Note, The foresight of a temptation gives us great advantage in resisting it; for, being forewarned, we should be fore-armed. While here, we may see Satan continually coming against us, and ought therefore to be always on our guard.

2. The assurance He had of good success in the conflict; He hath nothing in Me—nothing at all. There was no guilt in Christ to give authority to the prince of this world in his temptations. The devil is said to have the power of death; (Heb. 2:14.) the Jews called him the angel of death, as an executioner. Christ having done no evil, he had no legal power against

In these words He gives his disciples encouragement to follow Him. He does not say, I must go; but Let us go. He calls them out to no hardships, where He does not lead. They had promised they would not desert Him; Let us go then; let us see how you will make the words good.

He gives them an example, teaching them at all times, especially in suffering, to sit loose to all things here below, and often to think and speak of leaving them. Though we sit easy, in the delights of an agreeable conversation, we must not think of being here always; Arise, let us go hence. If it were at the close of the supper, it teaches us that the solemnities of our communion with God are not to be constant in this world. When we sit down under Christ's shadow with delight, and say, It is good to be here; yet we must think of rising and going down from the mount.

CHAP. XV. v. 1-8. It is generally agreed that Christ's discourse in this and the next chapter, was at the close of his last supper, the night in which He was betrayed, and it is a continued discourse, not interrupted as that in the foregoing chapter was; and what He chooses to discourse of is very pertinent to the present sad occasion of a farewell sermon. Now that He was about to leave them, I. They would be tempted to leave Him, and return to Moses again; and therefore, He tells them, how necessary it was that they should by faith adhere to Him, and abide in Him. II. They would be tempted to grow strange one to another; and therefore He presses it upon them to love one another, and to keep up that communion when He was gone, which had hitherto been their comfort.

III. They would be tempted to shrink from their apostleship, when they met with hardships; and therefore He prepares them to bear the shock of the world's ill-will. There are four words, to which his discourse in this chapter may be reduced: 1. Fruit, v. 1-8. 2. Love, v. 9-17. 3. Hatred, v. 18-25. 4. The Comforter, v. 26, 27.

Here Christ discourses concerning the fruits of the Spirit, which his disciples were to bring forth, under the similitude of a vine.

Jesus Christ is the true Vine. It is an instance of the humility of Christ, that He is pleased to speak of Himself under low and humble comparisons. He that is the Sun of righteousness, and the bright and morning Star, compares Himself to a vine.

1. He is the Vine, planted in the vineyard, not a spontaneous product; for He is the Word made flesh. The vine has an unpromising outside; Christ had no form, nor comeliness, Isa. 53:2. It is a spreading plant, and Christ will be known, Salvation to the ends of the earth. The fruit of the vine honors God, and cheers man; (Judg. 9:13.) so does the fruit of Christ's mediation; it is better than gold, Prov. 8:19. Whatever excellency there is in any creature, serviceable to man, it is but a shadow of that grace which is in Christ, for his people's good.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

bling and sanctifying effects; and by its enabling us to unite tenderness of conscience with trust in God's mercy, and submission to his will. Let us rejoice, that our Savior has, in our nature, entered into 'the joy set before Him,' being 'ascended to his Father and our Father, to our God and his God.' (20:11-17, p. 17.) 'Let us compare his words with our experience and observation, for the daily confirmation of our faith. Let us rejoice in his victories over 'the prince of this world;' and though the enemy has still a strong party in our souls, yet, depending on the Redeemer's grace, let us prosecute his victories, both by resisting temptation, and opposing the cause of sin and Satan; let us copy the example of the Savior's love and obedience; and be ready to encounter hardship and danger, and to go hence by death, whenever He shall please. SCOTT.

NOTES.

CHAP. XV. v. 1. The close of the preceding chapter intimates that our Lord and his disciples then arose from table, as about to leave the house and retire to Gethsemane; yet probably they did not set out till He had finished this discourse, and the prayer with which He closed it. (14:31, 18:1.) Perhaps the fruit of the vine, of which they had been talking, was the sight of a spreading vine, gave occasion to this illustration of that union, between Christ and his disciples, which had been been mentioned. (14:18-20.) The nation of Israel, the worshippers of JERUSALEM, had frequently been represented as 'a vine'; but Jesus declared that He was 'the true Vine.' (Marg. Ref. a, b.—Ps. 80:8—13. Is. 5:1-7. Jer. 2:20, 21.) For that nation had been only a type of the true Israel, the seed of Abraham; which consists of Christ, and believers as one with Him. (Rom. 4:9-17. 11: Cui. 3:15-29.) He therefore was 'the true Vine,' the substance of that shadow; and all the fruitful branches of that vine, which had produced good

2 Every branch in me that beareth not fruit, he taketh away: and every branch that beareth fruit he purgeth it, that it may bring forth more fruit.

3 Now ye are clean through the word which I have spoken unto you.

4 Abide in me, and I in you. As the branch cannot bear fruit of itself except it abide in the vine; no more can ye, except ye abide in me.

5 I am the Vine, ye are the branches: he that abideth in me, and I in him, the same bringeth forth much fruit; for without me ye can do nothing.

6 If a man abide not in me, he is cast forth as a branch, and is withered; and men gather them, and cast them into the fire, and they are burned.

2. He is the true Vine, really a fruitful plant, a plant of renown; not like that wild vine, which deceived those who gathered of it, 2 Kings 4: 39. Unfruitful trees are said to lie, (Hab. 3: 17, marg.) but Christ is that true vine typified by Judah's vine, which enriched him with the blood of the grape, (Gen. 49: 11.) by Joseph's vine, the branches of which run over the wall, (Gen. 49: 22.) by Israel's vine, under which he dwelt safely, 1 Kings 4: 25.

Believers are branches of this vine, which supposes that Christ is the root: the root is unseen, and our life is hid with Christ; the root bears the tree, (Rom. 11: 18.) diffuses sap to it, and is all in all to its fruitfulness; and in Christ are all supplies. The branches of the vine are many, on one side and on the other; yet, meeting in the root, are all but one vine; thus all good Christians, though in place and opinion distant from each other, meet in Christ, the Centre of their unity. Believers, like the branches of the vine, are insufficient to stand of themselves. See Ezek. 15: 2.

The Father is the Husbandman—the land-worker. Though the earth is the Lord's, it yields Him no fruit unless He work it. God has not only a property in, but a care of, the vine and all the branches. He hath planted, and watered, and gives the increase; for we are God's husbandry, 1 Cor. 3: 9. See Isa. 5: 1, 2, 7, 23. He had an eye upon Christ, the Root, and upheld Him, and made Him to flourish out of a dry ground. He has an eye upon the branches, and prunes, and watches over them. Never was any husbandman so wise, so watchful about his vineyard, as God about his church, which therefore must needs prosper.

The duty taught by this similitude, is, to bring forth fruit, and, in order to that, to abide in Christ.

From a vine we look for grapes, (Isa. 5: 2.) and from a Christian for Christianity, that is, the fruit; a Christian temper, disposition, life and conversation, Christian devotions and Christian designs. We must honor God, and do good, and exemplify the religion we profess; this is bearing fruit. The disciples here must be fruitful, as Christians, in all the fruits of righteousness, and as apostles, in diffusing that knowledge.

The doom of the unfruitful; (v. 2.) they are taken away. It is here intimated, that there are many who pass for branches in Christ, who yet bear no fruit. Were they really united to Christ by faith, they would bear fruit; but, being only tied to Him by the thread of an outward profession, they will soon be seen to be dry branches; unfruitful professors are unfaithful professors; professors, and no more. It might be read, Every branch that beareth not fruit in Me, and it comes much to one; for they that do not bear fruit in Christ, are as if they bore no fruit at all, Hos. 10: 1. It is here threatened, that they shall be taken away, in justice to them and in kindness to the rest of the branches. From him that has not real union with Christ, and fruit produced thereby, shall be taken away even when he seemed to have, Luke 8: 18. Some think this refers primarily to Judas.

The promise to the fruitful; He purgeth them, that they may bring forth more fruit. Note, 1. Further fruitfulness is the blessed reward of former fruitfulness. The first blessing was, Be fruitful; and it is still a great blessing. 2. Even fruitful branches, in order to their further fruitfulness, have need of purging, or pruning; He taketh away that which is superfluous and luxuriant, which hinders its growth and fruitfulness. The best have in them that which is peccant, something which should be taken away; some notions, passions, or humors, that need to be purged away, which Christ has promised to do by His Word, Spirit, and Providence, by degrees, in the proper season. 3. The purging of fruitful branches, in order to their greater fruitfulness, is the care and work of the great Husbandman, for his own glory.

The benefits believers have by the doctrine of Christ, the power of which they should labor to exemplify; (v. 3.) Now ye are clean.

Their society was clean, now Judas was expelled: by that word of Christ, What thou doest, do quickly. The Word of Christ is a distinguishing Word, and separates between the precious and the vile; it will purify the church of the first-born in the great dividing day.

They were each of them clean, that is, sanctified; (ch. 17: 17.) that faith by which they received the Word of Christ, purified their hearts, Acts 15: 9. The Spirit of grace by the Word refined them from the world, the flesh, and the leaven of the scribes and Pharisees. Apply it to all believers. The Word of Christ is spoken to them; there is a cleansing virtue in it, as it works grace, and works out corruption; it cleanses, as fire cleanses the gold from its dross, and as physic the body from disease. We evidence that we are cleansed by the Word, when we bring forth fruit unto holiness. Perhaps, here is an allusion to the law concerning vineyards in Canaan; the fruit of them was as unclean, and uncircumcised, the first three years after it was planted; and the fourth year it was to be holiness of praise unto the Lord; and then it was clean, Lev. 19: 23, 24. The disciples had now been three years under Christ's instruction; and now ye are clean.

Glory will redound to God by our fruitfulness; comfort and honor will come to ourselves by it, v. 8. Herein our Father will be glorified. The fruitfulness of the apostles, in the discharge of their office, would be to the glory of God in the conversion of souls, Rom. 15: 9, 16. The fruitfulness of Christians, in a narrower sphere, is to the glory of God. By the eminent good works of Christians many are brought to glorify our Father which is in heaven.

So shall we be Christ's disciples indeed, making it to appear that we are really what we call ourselves. So shall we evidence our discipleship, and be to our Master for a name, and a praise, Jer. 13: 11. So shall we be owned by our Master in the great day, and share in the joy of our Lord. And the more we abound in that which is good, the more He is glorified.

In order to fruitfulness, we must abide in Christ, (v. 4.) keep up our union with Him by faith, and do all we do in religion in virtue of that union. Note, It is the great concern of all Christ's disciples, to keep up a dependence upon Christ, and communion with Him; habitually to adhere to, and derive from Him. Those that come to Christ, must abide in Him; 'Abide in Me, by faith; and I in you, by my Spirit; and then fear not but I will abide in you'; for the communion between Christ and believers never fails on his side. We must abide in Christ's Word by a regard to it, and it in us as a light to our feet. We must abide in Christ's merit as our righteousness and plea, and it in us as our support and comfort. The knot of the branch abides in the vine, and the sap of the vine abides in the branch, so there is a constant communication between them.

So necessary is it to our happiness, that we be fruitful, that the best argument to engage us to abide in Christ, is, that otherwise we cannot be fruitful, v. 4, 5.

Abiding in Christ is in order to our doing much good. He that is constant in the exercise of faith and love to Him, that lives upon his promises, and is led by his Spirit, bringeth forth much fruit, is very serviceable to God's glory, and his own account in the great day. Note, Union with Christ is productive of all good. A life of faith in the Son of God is incomparably the most excellent life a man can live in this world; it is regular and even, pure and heavenly, useful and comfortable, and all that answers the end of life.

It is necessary to our doing any good. It is not only a mean of cultivating the good already fruit, had been rendered so by grace derived from Him. The union of the divine and human nature in the person of Christ, and the fulness of the Spirit in Him, resemble the root of the vine, deriving the fertilizing juices from a rich soil, and his mediatorial work, like the stem, conveys these to all believers, to render them fruitful. Like the vine, the Redeemer appears to the proud and unbelieving, mean and despicable: while the wise of this world, and the mighty, are counted like the stately cedar, or the sturdy oak; but the fruit of this Vine, and of its branches, is far more valuable than all other productions of the earth. (Is. 4: 2. 53: 2, 3. Ez. 15: 6-8.)

Verse 6. If a man abide not in Me! 'It is strange any should think this text a conclusive argument against the doctrine of perseverance, when to be in Christ (v. 2.) so plainly signifies making an external profession of Christianity, whether vain or sincere.'

7 If ye abide in me, and my words abide in you, ye shall ask what ye will, and it shall be done unto you.

9 As the Father hath loved me, so have I loved you: continue ye in my love.

10 If ye keep my commandments, ye shall abide in my love; even as I have kept my Father's commandments, and abide in his love.

seize for himself. When the Spirit of the Lord was departed from Saul, an evil spirit possessed him.

They cast them into the fire, that is, they are cast into the fire; and they who seduce them to sin, do in effect cast them there; for they made them children of hell. Fire is the fittest place for withered branches, good for nothing else, Ezek. 15: 2, 4.

They are burned, of course; but it is here added very emphatically, and makes the threatening terrible, they will not be consumed in a moment, like thorns under a pot, (Ecc. 7: 6.) but are burning forever in a fire, which not only cannot be quenched, but will never spend itself. This comes of quitting Christ; this is the end of barren trees. Apostates are twice dead; (Jude 12.) and when it is said, They are cast into the fire and burned, it speaks as if they were twice damned. Some apply men's gathering them, to the ministry of the angels in the great day, when they shall gather out of Christ's kingdom all things that offend, and shall bundle the tares for the fire.

The privilege they have, that abide in Christ, v. 7.

1. Our union with Christ is maintained by the Word; If ye abide in Me, He had said before, and I in you; here He explains Himself, and my words abide in you; for it is in the Word that Christ is set before us, and offered to us, Rom. 10: 6-8. It is in the Word that we receive Him; and where the Word of Christ dwells richly, there Christ dwells. If the Word be our constant guide, if it be in us at home, then we abide in Christ, and He in us.

V. 1--8. In the person and salvation of Christ, the Lord has made provision for the sanctification, as well as the pardon and justification, of all who believe; but all others must die unholy. He is the true Vine, whom God has planted, and waters continually. As professed Christians, we appear to belong to this Vine; but woe to them, who have no other union, than what consists in notions, sacraments, and forms. Such branches do not bear good fruit; perhaps indeed very bad fruit; and one after another of them is taken away, and left as fuel to the fire of divine wrath. But even such branches as bear fruit have many remaining hinderances to fruitfulness; and the care of the Husbandman consists in purging them, that they may bring forth more fruit; so that it may be expected, that true believers will grow under this heavenly culture; and if sharp means be employed to promote their sanctification, they will, when in their right mind, be thankful for them. They also earnestly desire and fervently pray to be enabled to abide in Christ, that He may abide in them, by His Word and Spirit; and they attend on ordinances, as means of cementing this union. They know, that only by persevering faith in Christ can they possess the assurance that they are clean; they dread nothing so much, as being found at last in us; but it is the root and spring of all good; Without Me ye can do nothing: not only no great thing, heal the sick, or raise the dead, but nothing. Note, We have as necessary a dependence upon the Mediator for spiritual life, as we have upon the Creator for all the actions of natural life; for, as to both, it is in the divine power, that we live, move, and have our being.

Abstracted from the merit of Christ, we can do nothing towards our justification; and from the Spirit of Christ, nothing towards our sanctification. Without Christ ye can do nothing aright, nothing that will please God, or profit ourselves, 2 Cor. 3: 5. We depend upon Christ, not only as the vine upon the wall, for support; but as the branch of the root, for sap. Observe,

The fatal consequences of forsaking Christ, v. 6. A description of the fearful state of hypocrites that are not in Christ; and of apostates that abide not in Christ.

They are cast forth as withered branches, plucked off because they cumber the tree. It is just that they should have no benefit by Christ, who think they have no need of Him; and that they who reject Him, should be rejected by Him; those that abide not in Christ, shall be abandoned by Him; they are left to themselves, to fall into scandalous sin, and then are justly cast out of the communion of the faithful.

They are withered, as a branch broken from the tree. They that abide not in Christ, though they may flourish a while in a passable profession, yet in a little time wither and come to nothing. Their parts and gifts wither, their zeal and devotion, their credit and reputation, their hopes and comforts wither, Job 8: 11-13. Note, They that bear no fruit, after a while will bear no leaves. How soon is that fig-tree withered away, which Christ has cursed!

Men gather them. Satan's agents and emissaries pick them up, and make an easy prey of them. They that fall off from Christ, presently fall in with sinners; and the sheep that wander from Christ's fold, the devil stands ready to seize for himself. When the Spirit of the Lord was departed from Saul, an

2. Our communion with Christ is maintained by prayer; Ye shall ask what ye will, and it shall be done to you. And what can we desire more than to have what we will for asking? Note, They that abide in Christ, as their hearts' delight, shall have, through Christ, their hearts' desire. If we have Christ, we shall want nothing that is good for us. Two things are implied in this promise: 1st. That if we abide in Christ, and his Word in us, we will not ask any thing but what is proper. The promises abiding in us, lie ready to be turned into prayers; and the prayers so regulated, cannot but speed. 2dly. If we abide in Christ and his Word, we shall have such an interest in God's favor and Christ's mediation, that we shall have an answer of peace to all our prayers.

V. 9-17. Christ, who is love itself, is here discoursing concerning love; a fourfold love.

1. Concerning the Father's love to Him, He here tells us,

1. That the Father loved Him as Mediator; This is my beloved Son. He was the Son of his love. He loved Him, and gave all things into his hand; and yet so loved the world, as to deliver Him up for us all. When entering on his sufferings, Christ comforted Himself with this, that his Father loved Him. The one whom God loves as a Father, may despise the hatred of the world.

2. He abode in his Father's love, v. 10. He continually loved his Father, and was beloved of Him. Even when made sin and a curse for us, and it pleased the Lord to bruise Him, He abode in his Father's love. See Ps. 89: 33. Because He continued to love his Father, He went cheerfully through his sufferings, and therefore his Father continued to love Him.

3. Therefore He abode in his Father's love, because He kept his Father's law, (v. 10.) as Mediator. His soul delighted in law, because He did not fail in his undertaking, nor was discouraged, Isa. 42: 1, 4. We having broken the law of creation, and thereby thrown ourselves out of the love of God; Christ satisfied for us by obeying the law of redemption, and so abode in his love, and restored us to it.

II. Concerning his own love to his disciples. Though He leaves them, He loves them.

The pattern of this love, v. 9. A strange expression of the condescending grace of Christ! As the Father loved Him, who was most worthy, He loved them, who were most unworthy. The Father loved Him as his Son, and He loves them as his children. The Father gave all things into his hand; so, with Himself, He freely giveth us all things. The Father loved Him as Mediator, head of the church, the great trustee of divine grace, which He had, not for Himself only, but for the benefit of those for whom He was intrusted. 'I have been a faithful trustee. As the Father has committed his love to Me, so I transmit it to you.' Therefore the Father was well pleased with Him, that He might be well pleased with us in Him; and loved Him, that in Him, as beloved, He might make us accepted, Eph. 1: 6.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

among the unfruitful branches, to wither and be cast into the fire; this fear, and the desire of being made fruitful and useful, ornaments to the Gospel and blessings to mankind, dictate such prayers as will surely be answered.—True Christians long to bring forth more fruit; they know that the will and the power must come from Christ, without whom they can do nothing; they find by experience, that any interruption in the exercise of faith and the prayer of faith, abates the vigor of every holy affection; makes way for the renewed energy of sinful inclinations; and robs them of all spiritual consolation. On the other hand, when they live by faith in the Son of God, they are fruitful and joyful; they glorify God, and possess the assurance, that they are true disciples; and are manifested as such in the consciences of others. (Notes, 2 Cor. 1: 12-14. 5: 9-12. 1 John 3: 18-24.) Let us then live more simply on the fullness of Christ, and grow more and more fruitful in every good word and work; let us be upon our guard against those, who profess to abide in the living Vine, but produce wild and poisonous grapes, instead of the fruits of righteousness, which are by Jesus Christ unto the praise and glory of God. (Note Phil. 1: 9-11, v. 11.)

Scot

11 These things have I spoken unto you, that my joy might remain in you, and that your joy might be full.

12 ¶ This is my commandment, That ye love one another, as I have loved you.

13 Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends.

14 Ye are my friends, if ye do whatsoever I command you.

15 Henceforth I call you not servants; for the servant knoweth not what his lord doeth; but I have called you friends; for all things that I have heard of my Father I have made known unto you.

16 Ye have not chosen me, but I have chosen you, and ordained you, that ye should go and bring forth fruit, and that your fruit should remain; that whatsoever ye shall ask of the

The proofs and products of this love are four: 1. Christ loved his disciples, for He laid down his life for them, v. 13. Christ is Bail for us, body for body, life for life; though He knew our insolvency, and foresaw how dear the engagement would cost Him. Observe,

(1.) The extent of the love of the children of men to one another; and the highest proof of it is, laying down one's life for a friend; and there have been some such heroic achievements of love. If all that a man has he will give for his life, he that gives that for his friend, gives all; this may sometimes be our duty, 1 John 3: 16. Paul was ambitious of the honor; (Phil. 2: 17.) and for a good man some will even dare to die, Rom. 5: 7. It is love in the highest degree, which is strong as death.

(2.) The excellency of Christ's love beyond all other. Others have laid down their lives, content that they should be taken from them; Christ was not merely passive, but made it his own act. The life others have laid down, has been but of equal value with the life for which it was laid down, and perhaps less valuable; but Christ is of infinitely more worth than ten thousand of us. Others have laid down their lives for their friends, but Christ laid down his for us, when we were enemies, Rom. 5: 8. Those hearts must be harder than iron or stone, which are not softened by such incomparable sweetness of divine love. Calvin.

2. Christ loved his disciples, for He took them into a covenant of friendship with Himself; (v. 14, 15.) 'If ye approve yourselves by obedience my disciples indeed, ye are, and shall be treated as friends.' Note, The followers of Christ are his friends; He is pleased to call them so. They that do the duty of his servants, are advanced to the dignity of friends. David had one servant in his court, Solomon one in his, that was, in a particular manner, the king's friend; (2 Sam. 15: 37. 1 Kings 4: 5.) but this honor have all Christ's servants. We may in some particular instances befriend a stranger; but we espouse all the interests of a friend, and concern ourselves in all his cares: thus Christ takes believers to be his friends, visits them, converses with them, bears with them; is afflicted in their afflictions, takes pleasure in their prosperity, pleads for them in heaven. Have friends but one soul? He that is joined to the Lord, is one Spirit, 1 Cor. 6: 17. Though they often show themselves unfriendly, He is a Friend at all times.

He will not call them servants, though they call Him Master and Lord. They that would be like Christ in humility, must not take pride in insisting upon their authority and superiority, but remember that their servants are their fellow-servants. But He will call them friends; will not only love them, but let them know it; for in his tongue is the love of kindness. After his resurrection He seems to speak with more affectionate tenderness of and to his disciples than before; Go to my brethren, (ch. 20: 17.) Children, have ye any meat, ch. 21: 5. But, though Christ called them his friends, they called themselves his servants: Peter, a servant of Christ, (1 Pet. 1: 1.) and so James ch. 1: 1. The more Christ honors us, the more honor we should study to do Him; the higher in his eyes, the lower in our own.

3. Christ loved his disciples, for He was very free in communicating his mind to them; (v. 15.) Henceforth ye shall not be kept so much in the dark, like servants, told their present work intimacy with Him, employed in such an embassy, and endued with such power from on high? It was not owing to their wisdom and goodness in choosing Him for their Master, but to his favor and grace in choosing them for disciples. It is fit that Christ should have the choosing of his own ministers; still He does it by his providence and Spirit. Though ministers make that holy calling their own choice, Christ's choice is prior to theirs. Of all that are chosen to grace and glory, it may be said, They have not chosen Christ, but He has chosen them, Deut. 7: 7, 8.

I have ordained you, put you into the ministry, 1 Tim. 1: 12. By this it appeared He took them for his friends, that He crowned their heads with such honor, and filled their hands with such a trust. He reposed a mighty confidence in them, when He made them his ambassadors, to negotiate the affairs of his kingdom in this world, and ministers of state in the administration of it.

The treasure of the Gospel was committed to them,

1st. That it might be propagated;—that ye should go, as under a yoke or burthen, for the ministry is a work, and ye that go about it, must resolve to undergo a great deal; that ye may go from place to place, and bring forth fruit. They were ordained, not to sit still, but to go about, to be diligent in their work, and lay themselves out in doing good. They were ordained, not to beat the air, but to be instrumental for the bringing of nations to Christ, Rom. 1: 13. Note, Those whom Christ ordains, should and shall be fruitful; should labor, and shall not labor in vain.

2dly. That the fruit should remain, the good effect of their labors continue in the world to the end of time. The church of Christ was not to be a short-lived thing, as many sects of philosophers; it did not come up in a night, nor should it perish in a night, but be as the days of heaven. The sermons and writings of the apostles are transmitted to us, and we at this day are built upon that foundation; ever since the Christian church was founded by the ministry of the apostles and seventy disciples, as one generation of ministers and Christians has passed away, another has come. By virtue of that great charter, (Matt. 28: 19.) Christ has a church in the world, which, as lawyers say of bodies corporate, does not die, but lives in succession.

Lastly, His love to them appeared in the interest they had at the throne of grace; Whatsoever ye shall ask of my Father in my name, He will give it you. Probably, this refers in the first place to the power of working miracles, which was to be drawn out by prayer. 'Whatever gifts are necessary to your labors, whatever help from heaven ye have occasion for, it is but ask and have.' Three things are here hinted for our encouragement in prayer: 1. That we have a God to go to, who is a Father; Christ here calls Him the Father, both mine and yours; and the Spirit teaches us to cry, Abba, Father. 2. We come in a good name. Whatever errand we come upon to the throne of grace, according to God's will, we may with humble boldness mention Christ's name; and plead that we are related to Him, and He is concerned for us. 3. An answer of peace is promised us. What ye come for, shall be given you. This great promise made to that great duty, keeps up a comfortable and gainful intercourse between heaven and earth.

III. Christ, in consideration of the great wherewith He had loved them, exhorts them,

1. To continue his love, v. 9. We must place our happiness in the continuance of Christ's love to us, and make it our business to give continued proofs of our love to Christ, that nothing may tempt us to withdraw from Him, or provoke Him to withdraw from us. Note, All that love Christ, should be always loving Him, and to fill the joy of his people; see 1 John 1:4. He tells them,

3. To evidence their love to Him, by keeping his commandments; (v. 10.) your love, and then they may be sure of the continuance of his love to them. Observe here, (1.) The promise; 'Ye shall abide in my love, as at home; as in a resting-place, as in a strong-hold. Ye shall have grace and strength to persevere in loving Me.' If the same hand that first shed abroad the love of Christ in our hearts, did not keep us in that love, we should, through the love of the world, go out of love with Christ Himself. (2.) The condition of the promise; 'If ye keep my commandments, not only by a constant conformity to them, but by a faithful delivery of them to others. They were to keep them as trustees of that great deposit, for they were to teach all things that Christ had commanded, Matt. 28: 20. This commandment they must keep without spot, (1 Tim. 6: 14.) and thus must show that they abide in his love.

To induce them to this He urges,

[1.] His own example; v. 10. Christ submitted to the law of mediation, to teach us to submit to the laws of the Mediator, for we cannot otherwise preserve our relation to Him.

[2.] The necessity of it to their interest in Him; v. 14. Note, 1st. Those only will be accounted Christ's faithful friends, that approve themselves his obedient servants; for they that will not have Him to reign over them, shall be treated as his enemies. Friendship involves a fellowship of aversions and taking all occasions to show it, and love to the end. The disciples were to go out upon a sermon for Christ full of troubles; but says Christ, 'Keep up your love to Me, and then all the troubles you meet with will be easy. I.e.: hem not quench your love, but quicken it.'

2. To let his joy remain in them, and fill them, v. 11. That my joy in you may remain. If they bring forth much fruit, and continue in his love, He will continue to rejoice in them. Note, Fruitful and faithful disciples are the joy of the Lord Jesus, Zeph. 3: 17. As there is a transport of joy in heaven in the conversion of sinners, so there is a remaining joy in the perseverance of saints.

Or, that your joy in Me, may remain. It is the will of Christ that his disciples should continually rejoice in Him, Phil. 4: 4. The joy of the hypocrite is but for a moment, but the joy of those who abide in Christ's love is a continual feast. The Word of the Lord endureth forever, so do the joys founded on it.

'That your joy might be full; not only that ye might be full of joy, but that your joy in Me and in my love may rise higher and higher, till it come to perfection, when ye enter into the joy of your Lord.' Note, 1. They only that have Christ's joy remaining in them, have their joy full; worldly joys scarce it, but never satisfy; it is only wisdom's joy that fills the soul, Ps. 36: 8. 2. The design of Christ in his Word is see 1 John 1: 4. He tells them, 3. To evidence their love to Him, by keeping his commandments; (v. 10.) your love, and then they may be sure of the continuance of his love to them. Observe here, (1.) Those only will be accounted Christ's faithful friends, that approve themselves his obedient servants; for they that will not have Him to reign over them, shall be treated as his enemies. Friendship involves a fellowship of aversions and attachments. 2dly. Universal obedience to Christ is the only acceptable obedience; not excepting, much less excepting against, any command.

IV. The disciples' love one to another, en joined as an evidence of their love to Christ. This is his commandment, that we love one another, (v. 12.) and again, v. 17. No one duty of religion is more frequently, or pathetically urged upon us, by our Lord, than that of mutual love.

It is here recommended by Christ's pattern, (v. 12.) as I have loved you. Christ's love to us should engage our love to each other; in that manner, and from that motive, we should love one another, and, because, Christ has loved us. He here specifies some of the expressions of his love to them; He called them friends, communicated his mind to them, was ready to give them what they asked; Go ye and do likewise.

It is required by his precept. He has made it one of the statutes of his kingdom. Observe how differently it is expressed in these two verses, and both very emphatical. 1. This is my commandment, (v. 12.) as if this were the most necessary of all the commandments. As under the law the prohibition of idolatry was the commandment more insisted on than any other, foreseeing the people's addictedness to that sin; so Christ, foreseeing the addictedness of the Christian church to uncharitableness, has laid most stress upon this precept. 2. These things I command you, v. 17. He speaks as if about to give them many things in charge, and yet names this only, that ye love one another; not only because this includes many duties, but because it will have a good influence upon all.

V. 18-25. Christ discourses concerning hatred, which is the character and genius of the devil's kingdom, as love is of the kingdom of Christ.

This hatred is found in the children of this world, (as distinguished from the children of God,) who are in the interests of the god of this world, whose image they bear, and to whose power they are subject; all, whether Jews or Gentiles, who would not come into the church of Christ, which He visibly separates from this evil world. The calling these the world, speaks, 1. Their number; there were a world of people that opposed Christ and Christianity. Lord, how were they increased, that troubled the Son

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 9-16. While we admire the love of Jesus to us, according to the Father's love of Him; let us follow his example of obedience, that we may continue in his love; and as He 'rejoices over us to do us good,' so may our joy in Him and his salvation be full, by communion with Him, and a conscientious walk before Him. (Note, 1 John 1: 3, 4. 2 John 12, 13.)—Let us often recollect, what a gracious Lord we serve. It is his 'commandment that we love one another, as He hath loved us; and no love of man, to his dearest friend, ever equalled, or even was comparable, to his love to us, when strangers and enemies.' What admiration must have pervaded the hosts of heaven, when a friendship was proposed, between the Object of their adorations, and sinful men! when He assumed human nature, and laid down his life for us! when He quickened us by his grace, and made us willing to be his disciples and friends! (Note, 1 John 3: 1-3.) and when they observe his unreserved affection, making known to us his purposes, and noticing our mean concerns! But they alone are the Redeemer's friends, who 'do whatsoever He commands them.' He has stated this evidence, and insisted on this return of friendship; and it is presumption to claim the privilege, while we allow ourselves in disobedience.—If we choose Him, we should remember, that this is the effect of his previous choice of us. He has also appointed each of us his place and work; that we may bring forth fruit, in holy lives, and the faithful and diligent improvement of our several talents; and as the fruit produced by the apostles still remains for our good, so the effect of our feeble endeavors may conduce to the benefit of others, long after we are gone to our rest. Even in our case, some to whom God has made us useful, may, after our decease, be useful to others, and they to others, in increasing numbers; as the produce of a few grains of wheat, sown again and again, from year to year, may at length yield an increase which baffles all calculation. Thus faithful ministers, able writers, and champions for the truth, nay, apostolical missionaries, may spring from the seed which we have sown; and how far this may extend, or how long it may remain, or what numbers may eventually derive benefit from it, who can tell?—Let us then be 'steadfast, unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, forasmuch as we know that our labor is not in vain in the Lord.' (1 Cor. 15: 58.) at the same time 'continuing in prayer, and watching thereunto with thanksgiving.' (Col. 4: 2.) See &c.

Verses 17-21.

'This seems a strong intimation, that even in nations which profess Christianity, if true religion fall, as it very possibly may, to a low ebb; they who exert themselves for the revival of it, must, on the principle here laid down, expect opposition: and that the passages of scripture relating to persecution are not so peculiar to the first ages, or to Christians living in idolatrous countries, as some have supposed. Would to God, the malignity to be found in some of us against our brethren did not too plainly illustrate this remark. Men will probably experience the truth of it, in proportion to the degeneracy of those around them; and to the vigor with which they bear testimony against prevailing errors.' Doddridge. 'The world,' which thus hated Christ and his apostles, or that part of it especially intended, were the professed worshippers of God, as much as nominal Christians now are: they were the teachers and rulers of the people of God, according to the law; and were far more zealous for religion, according to their views of it, than professed Christians and ministers are at present. Now, if true religion be the same as it then was; if it be preached and exemplified in the same manner, and with the same zeal, as in the primitive times; and if the spirit of the world be the same in every age and nation; persecution must be the consequence—except as lukewarmness, and indifference about all religion, paralyze the carnal enmity of the heart; or as wise laws bind the hands of those, who would persecute if they might; and even then their tongues and pens will show their deep and slanderous malignity against the truth and its zealous friends. The indiscretions and mistakes of the persons concerned, may give the occasion and advantage to their enemies; but perfect wisdom, meekness, and love would not abate the enmity itself, nay, would greatly exasperate it. (18.) Hatred me before it hated you. 1: 15, 30. Matt. 22: 38. Mark 6: 21. 1 Tim. 1: 15, 16. (19.) I have chosen, &c.] See on 16. To be 'chosen out of the world' must imply far more, than to be chosen as an apostle: for Judas was neither chosen nor called 'out of the world,' though chosen to be an apostle.

20 Remember * the word that I said unto you, the servant is not greater than his Lord. If they have persecuted me, they will also persecute you: 'if they have kept my saying, they will keep your's also.

did Cain hate Abel, but because his works were righteous? Esau hated Jacob, because of the blessing; Joseph's brethren hated him, because his Father loved him; Saul hated David, because the Lord was with him; Ahab hated Micahiah, because of his prophecies; such are the causeless causes of the world's hatred.

2. The fruits of that enmity. 1st. They will persecute you, for hatred is a restless passion. It is the common lot of those who will live godly in Christ Jesus, to suffer persecution, 2 Tim. 3:12. Christ foresaw what ill-usage his ambassadors would meet with in the world, and yet, for the sake of a few that by their ministry were to be called out of the world, He sent them forth as sheep in the midst of wolves. 2dly. Another fruit of their enmity is implied, that they would reject their doctrine; when Christ says, If they have kept my sayings, they will keep yours. He means, they will keep and regard yours, no more than they have regarded and kept mine. Note, The preachers of the Gospel cannot but take the despising of their message to be the greatest injury that can be done to themselves; as it was a great affront to Jeremiah, to say, Let us not give heed to any of his words, Jer. 18:18.

3. The causes of that enmity. 1st. Because they do not belong to it; (v. 9.) 'If ye were of the world, of its spirit, and in its interests, the world would love you, as its own; but because ye are called out of the world, it hates you and ever will.' Note, 1. We are not to wonder, if persons devoted to the world, are caressed by it as its friends; most men bless the conculous, Ps. 10:3, 49:18. 2. Nor are we to wonder, if those that are delivered from the world, are malign'd by it as its enemies; when Israel is rescued out of Egypt, the Egyptians will pursue them. Observe, The reason why Christ's disciples are not of the world, is not because they have by their own wisdom and virtue distinguished themselves from the world, but because Christ hath set them apart for Himself. The glory which, by virtue of this choice, they are designed for, sets them above the world, and makes them the objects of its envy. The saints shall judge the world, and the upright have dominion, and therefore they are hated. The grace they are endued with, by virtue of this choice, sets them against the world; they swim against the stream of the world, they witness against it, and are not conformed to it. This would support them under all the calamities the world's hatred would bring on them, that they were hated, because they were the chosen ones of the Lord Jesus. Now, this was no just cause for the world's hatred of them. If we do any thing to make ourselves hateful, we have reason to lament it; but if men hate us for that for which they should love and value us, we have reason to pity them, but no reason to perplex ourselves. Nay, this was just cause for their own joy rather.

2dly, 'Another cause of the world's hating you, will be, because you belong to Christ, (v. 21) for my name's sake.' Here is the core of the controversy; whatever is pretended, this is the ground of the quarrel, they hate Christ's disciples because they bear his name, and bear up his name in the world. Note, 1. It is the character of Christ's disciples, that they stand up for his name. The name into which they were baptized, is that which they will live and of David! 2. It speaks their confederacy and combination; these numerous hosts are embodied as one, Ps. 83:5. Jews and Gentiles, that could agree in nothing else, agreed to persecute Christ's ministers. 3. It speaks their spirit and disposition; they are men of the world, (Ps. 17:13, 14.) wholly devoted to this world, and never thinking of another. The people of God are taught to hate the sin of sinners, not their persons, to love and do good to all. A malicious, spiteful, envious spirit, is not the spirit of Christ, but of the world.

This hatred is levelled against the disciples of Christ, against Christ Himself, and against the Father.

The world hates the disciples of Christ. The world hateth you, (v. 19.) and He speaks of it as what they must expect, v. 18, as 1 John 3:13. Christ had expressed his great kindness for them as friends; but, lest they should be puffed up with this, there was given them, as to Paul, a thorn in the flesh, that is, as explained there, reproaches and persecutions for Christ's sake, 2 Cor. 12:7, 10. He had appointed them their work, but tells them what hardships they should meet with in it, to prepare them. He had charged them to love one another, and need enough they had to do it, for the world would hate them; to be kind to one another, for they would have great unkindness, and ill-will from those without. 'Keep peace among yourselves, and that will fortify you against the world's quarrels with you.' See,

1. The world's enmity against the followers of Christ; it hateth them. Note, Whom Christ blest, the world curseth. The favorites and heirs of heaven have never been the darlings of this world, since enmity was put between the seed of the woman and of the serpent. Why die by. 2. It has commonly been the lot of those that appear for Christ's name, to suffer for so doing; to suffer many things, and hard things. 3. It is matter of comfort to the greatest sufferers, if they suffer for Christ's name sake, 1 Pet. 4:14. Happy indeed are they, considering not only the honor imprinted upon those sufferings, (Acts 5:41.) but the comfort infused into them, and especially the crown of glory to which they lead. If we suffer with Christ, and for Christ, we shall reign with Him.

2dly, The world's ignorance is the true cause of its enmity to the disciples of Christ; v. 21. 1. They know not God. If men had but a due acquaintance with the first principles of natural religion, though they would not embrace Christianity, yet they could not hate and persecute it. Those have no knowledge, who eat up God's people, Ps. 14:4. 2. They know not God, as He that sent our Lord Jesus, and authorized Him to be the Mediator of peace. We do not rightly know God, if we do not know Him in Christ, and they who persecute those whom He sends, make it to appear they know not that He was sent of God. See 1 Cor. 2:8.

The world hates Christ Himself. This is spoken of here to mitigate the trouble of his followers, arising from the world's hatred, and to make it the less strange and grievous; (v. 18.) Ye know that it hated Me before you. We read it as signifying priority of time; but it may be read as speaking his superiority over them; 'Ye know that it hated Me, your first, your Leader, and Commander.' 1. If Christ, who excelled in goodness, and was perfectly innocent, and beneficent, was hated, can we expect any virtue or merit of ours should screen us from malice? 2. If the founder of our religion met with opposition in planting it, his servants and followers can look for no other in propagating it.

For this He refers them, (v. 20.) to his own word, at their admission into discipleship. I would help us to understand Christ's latter sayings, to compare them with the former. Nor would any thing contribute more to make us easy, than remembering the words of Christ, which will expound his providences.

The servant is not greater than his Lord. This He had said to them, Matt. 10:24. Christ is our Lord, and therefore we must attend all his motions, and acquiesce in all his disposals. The plainest truths are sometimes the strongest arguments for the hardest duties; Elihu answers a multitude of Job's murmurings, with this one self-evident truth, God is greater than man, Job 33:12. So here,

'If they have persecuted Me, as ye have seen, and are likely to see much more, they will also persecute you;' for, 1. 'Ye will do the same that I have done, to provoke them; ye will reprove them for their sins, call them to repentance, and give them rules of holy living, which they will not bear.' 2. 'Ye cannot do more than I have done to oblige them; after so great an instance, let none wonder if they suffer ill for doing well.' He adds, 'If they have kept my sayings, they will keep yours also; as there have been a few, and but a few, that have been wrought upon by my preaching, so there will be by yours a few, and but a few.' Some give another sense of this: 'If they have lain in wait for my sayings, with a design to insnare Me, they will in like manner lie in wait to entangle you in your talk.'

To hate and persecute the apostles was bad enough, but to hate and persecute Christ Himself, was much worse. The world is generally in an ill name in Scripture, and nothing can put it into a worse name than this, that it hated Jesus Christ. There is a world of people that are haters of Christ. Two things He insists on to aggravate their wickedness.

1. There was the greatest reason why they should love Him; men's good words and works recommend them. His words merited their

Verse 22.
 They had not had sin, &c. 'It is so evident from the word of God, (see Rom. 1:20, 21, and 2:12-15,) as well as from the reason of things, that sin may be imputed to those who have no revelation, that it is most evident, this is only a hebraism; as when, according to the pathetic manner of speaking, especially 'n use among the carnal nations, that is said to be nothing at all, which, when compared with something else, is inconsiderably small. See Ps. 20:9, Isa. 40:17, 1 Cor. 1:28, &c.'

commission from heaven, could work miracles, ch. 3: 2. And no prophet ever wrought such miracles. Moses and Elias wrought miracles by a derived power: but Christ, as a Son, by his own power. This amazed the people, that with authority He commanded diseases and devils; (Mark 1:27.) they owned they never saw the like, Mark 2:12. They were all works of mercy; and this seems especially intended here, for He is upbraiding them with this, that they hated Him. One so universally useful, more than ever any man was, it might be thought, should have been universally beloved, and yet even He is hated. 3. The works of Christ enhance the guilt of sinners to the last degree. If they had only heard his words, and not seen his works; if we had only his sermons upon record, and not his miracles, unbelief might have pleaded want of proof; but now it has no excuse. Nay, the rejecting of Christ both by them and us, has in it the sin, not only of obstinate unbelief, but of base ingratitude. They saw Christ to be most amiable, and studious to do them kindness; yet they studied to do Him mischief. And we see in His Word that great love wherewith He loved us, and yet are not wrought upon by it.

There was no reason why they should hate Him. Some say, and do what is recommending at one time, yet, at another, what is disobliging; but our Lord not only did much to merit men's good-will, but never did any thing justly to incur their displeasure; this He pleads by quoting love; (v. 22.) 'If I had not spoken unto them, to court their love, they had not had sin, their opposition had not amounted to a hatred of Me; their sin had been comparatively no sin. But now that I have said so much to recommend Myself to their best affection, they have no excuse for their sin.' Observe,

(1.) The advantage they have, that enjoy the Gospel; Christ in it comes and speaks to them; He spake in person to that generation, and is still speaking to us by our Bibles and ministers, and as one that has authority over, and affection for us. Every word of his is pure, carries with it a commanding majesty, and yet a condescending tenderness.

(2.) Their excuse that enjoy not the Gospel; 'If I had not spoken to them, if they had never heard of Christ and salvation, they had not had sin.' (1.) Not this kind of sin. They had not been chargeable with contempt of Christ. As sin is not imputed where there is no law, so unbelief is not imputed where there is no Gospel; and where it is imputed, it is thus far the only damning sin, that, being a sin against the remedy, other sins would not damn, if the guilt of them were not bound on with this. (2.) Not such a degree of sin. If they had not had the Gospel among them, their other sins had not been so bad; for the times of ignorance God winked at, Luke 12:47, 48.

(3.) The aggravated guilt they lie under, to whom Christ has spoken in vain; they have no cloak for their sin, are altogether inexcusable, and at the judgment will be speechless. Note, The clearer the discoveries made us of the grace and truth of Christ, the more said to us, that is convincing and endearing, the greater our sin if we do not love and believe in Him. The Word of Christ strips sin of its cloak, that it may appear sin.

2. His works were such as merited their love, as well as his words; (v. 24.) 'If I had not done among them, before their eyes, such works as no other man ever did, they had not had sin; their unbelief and enmity had been excusable; and they might have had some color to say that my word was not to be credited, if not otherwise confirmed; but He produced satisfactory proofs of his mission, works which no other man did. Note, 1. As the Creator demonstrates his power and godhead by his works, (Rom. 1:20,) so doth the Redeemer. His works of wonder, and of grace, prove Him sent of God, and on a kind errand. 2. Christ's works were such as no man ever did. No person that had not a commission from heaven, could work miracles, ch. 3: 2. And no prophet ever wrought such miracles. Moses and Elias wrought miracles by a derived power: but Christ, as a Son, by his own power. This amazed the people, that with authority He commanded diseases and devils; (Mark 1:27.) they owned they never saw the like, Mark 2:12. They were all works of mercy; and this seems especially intended here, for He is upbraiding them with this, that they hated Him. If they had only heard his words, and not seen his works; if we had only his sermons upon record, and not his miracles, unbelief might have pleaded want of proof; but now it has no excuse. Nay, the rejecting of Christ both by them and us, has in it the sin, not only of obstinate unbelief, but of base ingratitude. And we see in His Word that great love wherewith He loved us, and yet are not wrought upon by it.

Verse 23.

Hath my Father also.) 'How much is it to be wished that those who make light of Christ, while they pretend a great veneration for the Father, would seriously attend to this weighty admonition, lest haply they be found to fight against God. Acts 5:39.' FODDRIDGE.

Verse 26.

The Holy Spirit is here said to proceed from the Father; and many suppose this to refer, not only to his being sent forth from the Father and the Son, (as the Son was from the Father,) a messenger, to apply the salvation of Christ to the hearts of his people; but to what is called his 'eternal procession' from the Father; by which is meant something in a measure answering to the eternal generation of the Son, yet distinct from it. But these are incomprehensible mysteries; and (though inserted in most of the ancient creeds and formularies) seem not to be explicitly revealed: perhaps it is therefore better to abstain wholly, than to attempt any explanation of such subjects;

a Scripture for it; (v. 25.) 'This comes to pass, this unreasonable hatred of Me, and of my disciples for my sake, that the world might be fulfilled, which is written in their law' (that is, in the Old Testament, which is a law, and was received by them as a law,) 'They hated me without a cause;' this David speaks of himself as a type of Christ, Ps. 35: 19. 69: 4. Isa. 53: 3-9. Note, 1st. Enmity to Christ is unreasonable. We think the haughty and froward deserve to be hated, but Christ is meek and lowly, compassionate and tender towards also that, under color of complaisance, are malicious, envious, and revengeful; but Christ devoted Himself to the service of those that abused Him; toiled for others' ease, and impoverished Himself to enrich us. Thus we think hateful, that are hateful to kings and provinces, and disturbers of the public peace; but Christ, on the contrary, was the greatest blessing imaginable to his country. He testified indeed, that their works were evil, with a design to make them good, but to hate Him for that cause was to hate Him without a cause. 2dly. Herein the Scripture was fulfilled, and the antitype answered the type. Saul and his courtiers hated David without a cause, for he had been serviceable to him with his harp and sword; Absalom and his party hated him, though to him he had been an indulgent father, and a great benefactor. Thus, too, was the Son of David hated and hunted most unjustly. They that hated Christ did not design therein to fulfil the Scripture; but God, in permitting it, had that in his eye; and it confirms our faith in Christ as the Messiah, that even this was foretold, and accomplished in Him. We must not think it strange or hard, if it have a further accomplishment in us. We are apt to justify our complaints of injuries done us, with this, that they are causeless, whereas the more they are so, the more like they are to the sufferings of Christ, and may be the more easily borne.

In Christ, the world hates God Himself; this is twice said here; (v. 23.) He that hateth Me, though he thinks his hatred goes no further, yet really hates my Father also. And again, (v. 24.) They have seen and hated both Me and my Father. Note, 1. There are those that hate God, notwithstanding the beauty of his nature, and the bounty of his providence; they are enraged at his justice, as the devils, that believe it and tremble, are vexed at his dominion, and would gladly break his bands asunder. They who cannot bring themselves to deny that there is a God, and yet wish there were none, see and hate Him. 2. Hatred of Christ will be adjudged hatred of God, for He is in his person his Father's express Image, and in his office, his Agent and Ambassador. God will have all men honor the Son as they honor the Father, and therefore what entertainment the Son has, that the Father has. Hence it is easy to infer, that those who are enemies to the Christian religion, however they may cry up natural religion, are really enemies to all religion. Devils are in effect atheists, and they that ridicule the Gospel, would, if they could, extinguish even natural light, and shake off all obligations of conscience and the fear of God. Let an unbelieving, malignant world know that their enmity to the Gospel of Christ, will be looked upon in the great day as an enmity to God Himself; and let all that suffer for righteousness' sake, according to the will of God, take comfort from this; if God Himself be struck at through which, not being clearly revealed, cannot otherwise be understood.

Whom I will send unto you from the Father.] 'Our Lord said, at ch. 16: 16. I will pray the Father, and He shall give you another Comforter. He, therefore, who in one capacity prays that the Comforter may be sent, in another is the Person who sends Him being joined in authority and power with the Father. "I and the Father are one." Many are the passages of this kind in Scripture, which can only be explained and reconciled by that great Christian doctrine, the twofold nature of Christ.' Ep. HOSKIN.

CHAP. XVI.

Jesus again warns his disciples to expect persecution, 1-3. He states, that He foretells these things, because He was about to leave them, and they were beginning their sorrow, and assuring them that this would be expedient for them, as He would send the Comforter, 4-7. He explains the nature and effects of the Spirit's influences, 8-15. He intimates his own death, resurrection, and ascension; with assurances, that their sorrow should soon be turned into joy, and that their prayers in his name should be accepted, 16-22. They profess their faith in Him; He foretells that they will desert Him in his extremity of suffering; yet promises them his peace, amidst their tribulation in the world, 23-33.

THESE things have I spoken unto you, that ye should not be offended.

ly Ghost, than in any one verse beside, in the Bible; and being baptized into his name, we are concerned to acquaint ourselves with Him, as far as He is revealed.

Here is an account of Him in his subsistence. He is the Spirit of truth, which proceedeth from the Father. Here, 1. He is spoken of as a distinct person; not a quality or property, but a person under the proper name of a Spirit, and proper title of the Spirit of truth, a title fitly given Him where He is brought in testifying. 2. As a divine person, that proceedeth from the Father, by outgoings that were of old from everlasting. The spirit or breath of man, called the breath of life, proceeds from the man, and by it modified he delivers his mind, by it invigorated he sometimes exerts his strength. Thus the Spirit is the emanation of divine light, and the energy of divine power. The rays of the sun, by which it diffuses its influence, proceed from the sun, yet are one with it. The Nicene Creed says, the Spirit proceeded from the Father and the Son, for He is called the Spirit of the Son, (Gal. 4: 6.) and the Son is here said to send Him. The Greek church choose rather to say, from the Father by the Son.

He will come in a more plentiful effusion of his gifts, and power, than had ever yet been. Christ had been long the—He that should come; now the Spirit is so. I will send Him to you from the Father. He had said, (ch. 14: 16.) I will pray the Father, and He shall send you the Comforter; that speaks the Spirit to be the fruit of the intercession Christ makes within the veil: here He says, I will send Him; that speaks Him to be the fruit of his dominion within the veil. The Spirit was sent, 1. By Christ as Mediator, now ascended on high to give gifts unto men. 2. From the Father: 'Not only from heaven, my Father's house,' (the Spirit was given in a sound from heaven, Acts 2: 2.) 'but according to my Father's will, with his concurring authority.' 3. 'To the apostles, to instruct, enable, and carry them through their sufferings. He was given to them and their successors, both in Christianity and in the ministry; according to the promise, Isa. 59: 21.

His office and operations, are two;

1. He is the Comforter, or Advocate. An advocate for Christ, to maintain his cause against the world's infidelity, a comforter to the saints against the world's hatred.

2. He is also a witness for Jesus Christ; He shall testify of Me. He is one of the three that bear record in heaven, and the first of the three that bear witness on earth, (1 John 5: 7, 8. He instructed the apostles, and enabled them to work miracles; He indited the Scriptures, the standing witnesses that testify of Christ, ch. 5: 39. The power of the ministry is derived from the Spirit, for He qualifies ministers; and the power of Christianity too, for He sanctifies Christians, and in both testifies of Christ.

It is here promised that the apostles also, by the Spirit's assistance, should have the honor of being Christ's witnesses; v. 27. Note, The Spirit's working is not to supersede, but to encourage ours. Though the Spirit testify, ministers also must bear their testimony, and people at-them, they need not be either ashamed of their cause, or afraid of the issue.

V. 26, 27. Christ having spoken of the opposition his Gospel was likely to meet with in the world, and the hardships that would be put upon the preachers of it, lest any should fear that they and it would be run down by that violent torrent, here intimates what effectual provision was made to support it, both by the principal testimony of the Spirit, (v. 26.) and the subordinate testimony of the apostles; (v. 27.) and testimonies are the proper supports of truth.

It is here promised that the Spirit shall maintain the cause of Christ in the world. Christ, when He was reviled, committed his injured cause to his Father, and did not lose by his silence, for the Comforter pleaded it powerfully, and carried it triumphantly. 'When the Comforter or Advocate is come, which proceedeth from the Father, and whom I will send to supply the want of my bodily presence, He shall testify of Me, against those that hate Me without cause.'

We have more in this verse concerning the Holy Ghost, than in any one verse beside, in the Bible; and being baptized into his name, we are concerned to acquaint ourselves with Him, as far as He is revealed.

Here is an account of Him in his subsistence. He is the Spirit of truth, which proceedeth from the Father. Here, 1. It is here promised that the apostles also, by the Spirit's assistance, should have the honor of being Christ's witnesses; v. 27. Note, The Spirit's working is not to supersede, but to encourage ours. Though the Spirit testify, ministers also must bear their testimony, and people attend to it: for the Spirit of grace works by the means of grace. The apostles were the first witnesses in the trial between Christ and the prince of this world, which issued in the ejection of the intruder. They were to attest the truth concerning Christ, for the recovering of his just right, and the maintaining of his crown. Though they fled when they should have been witnesses for Him upon his trial, yet after the Spirit was poured out, they appeared courageous in vindication of the cause of Christ. The truth of the Christian religion was to be proved very much by the evidence of matter of fact, especially Christ's resurrection, of which the apostles were in a particular manner chosen witnesses, (Acts 10: 41.) and bore their testimony accordingly, Acts 3: 15: 5: 32. Christ's ministers are his witnesses. Honor is put upon them hereby—that they should be workers together with God; 'The Spirit shall testify of Me, and you also, under the conduct of, and in concurrence with the Spirit, (who will preserve you from mistake in what you relate on your own knowledge, and will inform you of what you cannot know but by revelation,) shall bear witness.' This might encourage them against the hatred and contempt of the world, that Christ had honored, and would own them.

Ye have been with Me from the beginning. They not only heard his public sermons, but had constant private converse with him. He went about doing good, and while others saw his works that He did in their own town and country only, they that went about with Him were witnesses of them all. They had likewise opportunity of observing the unspotted purity of his conversation, and could witness for Him that they never saw in Him any thing of human frailty. Note, 1. We have great reason to receive the record the apostles gave of Christ, for they did not speak by hear-say, but of what they had the greatest assurance, 2 Pet. 1: 16. 1 John 1: 1, 3. 2. Those are best able to witness for Christ, that have been with Him, by faith, love, and a life of communion with God in Him. Ministers must first learn Christ, and then preach Him. Those speak best of the things of God, that speak experimentally. It is particularly a great advantage to have been acquainted with Christ, from the beginning, to understand all things from the very first, (Luke 1: 3.) to have been with Him from the beginning of our days. Early acquaintance, and constant converse with the Gospel, will make a man as a good householder.

CHAP. XVI. v. 1-6. Christ dealt faithfully with his disciples when He sent them forth, for He told them the worst, that they might count the cost.

I. He here gives them a reason why He alarmed them with the expectation of trouble; Christ's disciples are apt to be offended at the cross; and the offence of the cross is a dangerous temptation, even to good men, either to turn back from the ways of God, or out of them, or go heavily in them; to quit either integrity or comfort. A suffering time is not without reason called an hour of temptation.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 17-27. It is of great importance that Christians should unite with their brethren in love, and zealous endeavors to promote the cause of the Gospel: and let us not be dismayed by the hatred of the world, which can 'love only its own,' but must dislike those whom Christ 'has chosen out of the world,' who bear his image, profess his truth, and obey his commandments. We cannot experience worse usage than our Master met with: and we ought not to be offended, or grow weary of well-doing, if we meet with no better. The more we resemble Him, the greater enmity will ungodly men feel against us: yet we should be thankful for the restraints which Providence has placed to persecution; and we ought carefully to avoid exciting needless opposition, by rashness, turbulence, or intermeddling with things not properly belonging to us. But, if we suffer for Christ's sake, and from those who 'hate Him and the Father that sent Him,' we should 'rejoice and be exceeding glad.'—How little do many persons think, that in rejecting the doctrine of Christ, as our Prophet, Priest, and King, they prove themselves ignorant of God, whom they profess to worship; that they are in fact setting up the creature of their imagination and reasonings, in the place of 'the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ;' and that their opposition to the scriptural view of the person and atonement of the Son of God, springs from determined enmity to the character and law of JEHOVAH. Thus it was with the Jews, 'who saw and hated' both the Son of God, and the Father who sent Him: thus it is, at this day, with many who have the Scriptures in their hand, the evidences of their divine original clearly set before them, and perhaps the Gospel faithfully preached to them; whose guilt is thus aggravated, and 'they have no cloak for their sins,' as they evidently hate Christ, 'the Light of the world,' because their deeds are evil, and their whole disposition and conduct are opposite to his precepts. But even in these persons the Scripture is fulfilled: while, by the conversion of many, and the holy lives of numbers who profess the Gospel, 'the Comforter, even the Spirit of truth,' still bears testimony to Christ, and confirms that of those faithful ministers, who preach his salvation, after the example and doctrine of those 'who were with Him from the beginning.'

2 They 'sha.' put you out of the synagogues: yea, 'the time cometh, that whosoever killeth you will think that he doeth God service.

3 And these things will they do unto you, 'because they have not known the Father, nor me.

4 But these things have I told you, 'that when the time shall come, ye may remember that I told you of them. And these things I said not unto you at the beginning, 'because I was with you.

6 But because I have said these things unto you, 'sorrow hath filled your heart.

By giving notice of trouble, He designed to remove the terror and surprise of it. Of all the adversaries of our peace in this world of troubles, none insult us more violently, nor put our troops more into disorder, than disappointment: but we can easily welcome a guest we expect, and being forewarned, are fore-armed.

II. He foretells particularly what they should suffer: (v. 2.) Behold two swords drawn against the followers of Jesus.

1. The sword of ecclesiastical censure; drawn by the Jews, the only pretenders to church-power. They shall cast you out of their synagogues, make you excommunicates. (1.) 'Out of the particular synagogues ye were members of.' At first, they scourged them in their synagogues as contemners of the law, (Matt. 10: 17.) and at length, cast them out as incorrigible. (2.) 'They shall cast you out of the national church of the Jews; shall put you into the condition of an outlaw,' 'look upon you as Samaritans, heathen men and publicans.' Note, It has often been the lot of Christ's disciples to be unjustly excommunicated. Many a good truth has been branded with an anathema, and many a child of God delivered to Satan.

2. The sword of civil power: 'The time cometh, the hour is come; now things are likely to be worse with you than hitherto; when expelled as heretics, they will kill you, and think they do God service, and others will think so too.'

(1.) You will find them really cruel. Christ's sheep have been accounted as sheep for the slaughter; the twelve apostles were all put to death, except John. Christ had said, (ch. 15: 27.) Ye shall bear witness, 'ye shall be martyrs, shall seal the truth with your hearts' blood.

(2.) You will find them seemingly conscientious: thinking they do God service; they will seem to offer a sacrifice to God; as those that cast out God's servants of old, and said, Let the Lord be glorified, Isa. 66: 5. Note, [1.] It is possible for real enemies to God's service, to pretend zeal for it. The devil's work has often been done in God's livery, and one of the most mischievous enemies Christianity ever had, sits in the temple of God. Nay, [2.] It is common to patronize enmity to religion with a color of duty to God, and service to his church. God's people have suffered the greatest hardships from conscientious persecutors. Paul verily thought he ought to do what he did against the name of Jesus. This does not at all lessen the sin of the persecutors, for villainies will never be consecrated by putting the name of God to them; but it increases the sufferings of the persecuted, to die under the character of enemies to God; but there will be a resurrection of names, as well as of bodies, at the great day.

III. He gives them the true reason of the world's enmity against them; (v. 3.) 'These things will they do unto you, not because you have done them harm, but because they have not known the Father, nor Me. Let this comfort you, that none will be your enemies but the worst of men.' Note, 1. Many that pretend to know God, are wretchedly ignorant of Him. They that pretended to do Him service, thought they knew Him, but it was a wrong notion they had of Him. Israel transgressed the covenant, and yet cried, My God, we know Thee, Hos. 8: 1, 2. Those who are ignorant of Christ, cannot have any right knowledge of God. In vain do men pretend to know God and religion, while they slight Christ and Christianity. 3. Those are very ignorant of God and Christ, that think it an acceptable service to persecute good people. They that know Christ, know that He came not to destroy men's lives, but to save them; that He rules by the power of truth and love, not of fire and sword. Never was such a persecuting church as that which makes ignorance the mother of devotion.

IV. He tells them,

1. Why He told them of it now; (v. 4.) not to discourage them, or add to their sorrow; nor that they might contrive how to avoid their danger, but that, when the time shall come, you may remember that I told you. Note, In suffering times, it will be of use to remember what Christ has told us of sufferings. (1.) That our belief of his foresight and faithfulness may be confirmed; and, (2.) That the trouble may be the less grievous, for we were told of it before, and took up our profession in expectation of it, so that it ought not to surprise us, nor be looked upon as a wrong to us. As Christ in his sufferings, so his followers in theirs, should have an eye to the fulfilling of Scripture.

2. Why He did not tell them of it sooner; 'I spake not this to you when you and I were first acquainted, because I was with you.' While with them, He bore the shock of the world's malignice, and stood in the front of battle; against Him the powers of darkness levelled all their force, not against small or great, but only against the King of Israel, and therefore He did not need then to say so much to them of suffering, because it did not fall much to their share; but we find that from the beginning He bid them prepare for sufferings; and therefore, (2.) It seems rather to be meant of the promise of another Comforter. This He had said little of, because He was Himself with them to instruct, and comfort them, and then they needed not the promise of the Spirit's extraordinary presence. The children of the bride-chamber would not have so much need of a comforter till the bridegroom should be taken away.

V. He expresses a concern for the sadness of his disciples, 'None I am to be no longer with you, but go my way to Him that sent Me, to repose after this fatigue; and none of you asketh Me with courage, Whither goest thou? But, instead of inquiring after that which would comfort you, you pore upon that which looks melancholy, and sorrow has filled your heart.'

He had told them He was about to leave them; not driven away by force, but voluntarily; his life was not extorted from Him, but deposited by Him. He went to Him that sent Him, to give an account of his negotiation. When we depart from this world, we go to Him that sent us into it, which should make us solicitous to live to good purposes, remembering we have a commission to execute, which must be returned at a certain day.

He had told them what they must suffer; now, if these were the legacies He had to leave them, who had left all for Him, they would be tempted to think they had made a sorry bargain, and were for the present, in consternation about it, in which their Master sympathizes with them, yet blames them.

1. As bareness of the means of comfort; None of you asks Me, Whither goest Thou? Peter had started that question, (ch. 13: 36.) and Thomas had seconded it; (ch. 14: 5.) but they did not seek for fuller satisfaction; they did not continue knocking. What a compassionate teacher Christ is; how condescending to the weak and ignorant. Many a teacher will not endure that the learner should ask the same question twice; if He cannot take a thing quickly, let him go without it; but our Lord knows how to deal with babes, that must be taught with precept upon precept. If the disciples here would have inquired, they would have found that his going away was for his advancement, (and therefore should not inordinately trouble them,) and for their advantage; and therefore their sufferings for Him should not trouble them; for a sight of Jesus at the right hand of God, would support them, as it did Stephen. Note, A humble inquiry into the darkest dispensations of Providence, would help to reconcile us to them, and to grieve the less, because of them; it will silence us to ask, Whence come they? but will abundantly satisfy us to ask, Whither go they? for we know they work for good, Rom. 8: 28.

2. As pining too much upon the occasions of their grief; v. 6. Christ had said enough to fill them with joy; (ch. 15: 11.) but, by looking at that only which made against them, they were so full of sorrow, there was no room left for joy. Note, It is the fault and folly of melancholy Christians, to dwell only on the dark side of the cloud; to meditate nothing but terror, and be deaf to the voice of joy and gladness. That which filled the disciples' hearts with sorrow, and hindered the operation of the cordials Christ administered, was, too great an affection to this present life. They were big with hopes of external glory, that they should shine and reign; and now, instead of that, to hear of nothing but bonds and afflictions, filled them with sorrow. Nothing is a greater prejudice to our joy in God, than the love of the whether we think so or not. He deals not with us according to the folly of our own choice, but graciously overrules it, and gives us the medicine we are loath to take, because He knows it is good for us.

It was expedient, because it was in order to the sending of the Spirit.

If I go not away, the Comforter will not come. 1st. So it was settled in the divine counsels, and the measures must not be altered; shall the earth be forsaken for them? He that gives freely, may recall one gift before He bestows another; while we would fondly hold all. 2dly. It is congruous enough that the ambassador extraordinary should be recalled, before the envoy come, that is constantly to reside. 3dly. The sending of the Spirit was to be the fruit of Christ's purchase, and that purchase was to be made by his death, which was his going away. 4thly. It was to be in answer to his intercession within the veil. See ch. 14: 16. Thus must this gift be both paid for, and prayed for, by our Lord, that we might put the greater value upon it. 5thly. The great argument the Spirit was to use in convincing the world, must be, Christ's ascension to heaven, and his welcome there. See v. 10, and ch. 7: 39. Lastly, The disciples must be weaned from his bodily presence, which they were too apt to dote upon, before they were duly prepared to receive the spiritual aids and comforts of a new dispensation.

If I depart, I will send Him to you; as though He had said, 'Trust Me to provide effectually that you shall be no losers by my departure.' The glorified Redeemer is not unmindful of his church on earth, nor will ever leave it without necessary supports. Though He departs, He sends the Comforter: nay, He departs on purpose to send Him.

The presence of Christ's Spirit in his church is so much more desirable than his bodily presence, that it was really expedient for us that He should go away, to send the Comforter. His corporal presence could be but in one place at one time, but his Spirit is in all places, at all times. Christ's bodily presence draws men's eyes; his life-giving Spirit their hearts.

The coming of the Spirit was absolutely necessary to carry on Christ's interest on earth; (v. 8.) And when He is come, He will reprove, or, as the margin reads it, convince the world, by your ministry, concerning sin, righteousness, and judgment.

V. 7-15. As it was usual with the Old-Testament prophets to comfort the church, in its calamities, with the promise of the Messiah, (Isa. 9: 6. Mic. 5: 5. Zech. 3: 8.) so, the Messiah being come, the promise of the Spirit was the great cordial, and is still.

Christ's departure was absolutely necessary to the Comforter's coming, v. 7. The disciples were so loath to believe this, that Christ asserted with more than ordinary solemnity; I tell you the truth. He here tells them, a strange doctrine, but if true, comfortable enough, and showing how absurd their sorrow was; It is expedient, not only for Me, but for you also, that I go away. Note, 1. Those things often seem grievous, that are really expedient for us; and particularly our going away when we have finished our course. 2. Our Lord Jesus is all ways for that which is most expedient for us.

He deals not with us according to the folly of our own choice, but graciously overrules it, and gives us the medicine we are loath to take, because He knows it is good for us.

It was expedient, because it was in order to the sending of the Spirit.

If I go not away, the Comforter will not come. 1st. So it was settled in the divine counsels, and the measures must not be altered; shall the earth be forsaken for them? He that gives freely, may recall one gift before He bestows another; while we would fondly hold all. 2dly. It is congruous enough that the ambassador extraordinary should be recalled, before the envoy come, that is constantly to reside. 3dly. The sending of the Spirit was to be the fruit of Christ's purchase, and that purchase was to be made by his death, which was his going away. 4thly. It was to be in answer to his intercession within the veil. See ch. 14: 16. Thus must this gift be both paid for, and prayed for, by our Lord, that we might put the greater value upon it. 5thly. The great argument the Spirit was to use in convincing the world, must be, Christ's ascension to heaven, and his welcome there. See v. 10, and ch. 7: 39. Lastly, The disciples must be weaned from his bodily presence, which they were too apt to dote upon, before they were duly prepared to receive the spiritual aids and comforts of a new dispensation.

If I depart, I will send Him to you; as though He had said, 'Trust Me to provide effectually that you shall be no losers by my departure.' The glorified Redeemer is not unmindful of his church on earth, nor will ever leave it without necessary supports. Though He departs, He sends the Comforter: nay, He departs on purpose to send Him.

The presence of Christ's Spirit in his church is so much more desirable than his bodily presence, that it was really expedient for us that He should go away, to send the Comforter. His corporal presence could be but in one place at one time, but his Spirit is in all places, at all times. Christ's bodily presence draws men's eyes; his life-giving Spirit their hearts.

The coming of the Spirit was absolutely necessary to carry on Christ's interest on earth; (v. 8.) And when He is come, He will reprove, or, as the margin reads it, convince the world, by your ministry, concerning sin, righteousness, and judgment.

The office of the Spirit, and his errand, is, 1. To reprove. The Spirit, by the Word and conscience, is a reprover; ministers are reprovers by office, and by them the Spirit reproveth. 2. To convince. It is a law term, and speaks the office of the judge in summing up the evidence, and setting a matter that has been canvassed in a clear light. He shall convince, that is, 'put to silence the adversaries of Christ, by demonstrating the fallacy of what they maintain, and the truth of what they oppose.' Note, Convincing work is the Spirit's work. He can do it effectually, and none but He; man may open the cause, but the Spirit only can open the heart. The Spirit is called the Comforter, (v. 7.) and here it is said, He shall convince. The method of the Spirit is first to convince, and then to comfort; first to open the wound, and then apply healing medicines. Or, taking conviction more generally, for a demonstration of what is right, it intimates that the Spirit's comforts are solid, and grounded upon truth.

They whom He is to reprove and convince, are the world, both Jew and Gentile. 1. He shall give the world the most powerful means of conviction, for the apostles shall go into all the world, by the Spirit, to preach the Gospel, fully proved. He shall sufficiently provide for silencing the objections and prejudices of the world against the Gospel. Many an infidel was convinced of all, and judged of all, 1 Cor. 14: 24. 2. He shall effectually convince many in the world, some in every age, in every place, in order to their conversion to Christ. This encouraged the disciples, in reference to the difficulties they were likely to meet with, (1.) That they should see good done, Satan's kingdom fall like lightning, which would be their joy, as it was his. Even this malignant world the Spirit shall work upon: and the conviction of sinners is the comfort of faithful ministers. (2.) This would be the fruit of their services and sufferings, these should contribute much to this good work.

The Spirit is sent to convince sinners of sin, (v. 9.) not barely to tell them of it; in conviction there is more than that, it is to prove it upon them, and force them to own it, as they (ch. 3: 9.) that were convicted of their own con-

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-7. How fallacious is the common opinion, that God will accept every man who is sincere in his religion, whatever it may be! For the most bigoted and cruel persecutors have often been very sincere, in their way; indeed no less than the more candid and philosophical opposers of 'the truth, as it is in Jesus.' They have murdered the worshippers of God, by tens of thousands, and imagined they were offering Him an acceptable sacrifice! (1 Tim. 1: 15, 16.) But did these men sincerely desire to know the truth and do the will of God? Did they humbly and impartially examine his Word, and pray to be taught by his Spirit, that they might know what He would have them to do? Did they sincerely embrace the truth, and obey the will of God; without being influenced by temporal interests, or by fear of persecution? Were they sincerely willing to obtain the favor of God, and devote themselves to his service, without regarding consequences?—Without this state of heart and tenor of conduct, what is called sincerity may be a compound of prejudice, ignorance, self-confidence, policy, and malignant passions: and the event will prove, that, after all their pretences and advantages, such men were strangers and enemies both 'to the Father and the Son'; and that they hated the light, because their deeds were evil.—The prophecies, however, so prepare the believer's mind for these events, that, instead of being stumbled at them, he sees in them the truth of revelation, and an illustration of its doctrines; especially in respect of the 'deceitfulness and desperate wickedness of the human heart'; the subtlety of Satan, and the awful justice of God, in giving up his enemies to strong delusions, and leaving them to perish with a 'lie in their right hand.' (8: 41-47. Jer. 17: 9, 10. 2 Thes. 3: 8-12. Rev. 12: 7-12, v. 9, 13-17.)—But let us remember, that humble docility, implicit belief of the Scripture, and a disposition unreservedly to do the will of God, are essential to 'godly sincerity.' (2 Cor. 1: 12.) This will lead men to come to the Father through his Son; and to 'set their affections on things above where Jesus sitteth at the right hand of God'; thus they will learn to rejoice in his exaltation, and in the hope of being with Him to share his glory.—If this be our character and experience, we should remember, that our hearts are often filled with sorrow at events highly advantageous. This was the case with the apostles: the atonement, ascension, and intercession of the Redeemer, and the presence of the Comforter, were not only more desirable than Christ's personal presence; but were absolutely necessary to them, and to all, in order to salvation: yet no removal of a beloved relation, or Christian friend, or minister, can possibly appear comparable to that loss, which the apostles supposed they must sustain, when their Lord should be removed from them.

Verse 7.

'Our Lord not only promised that He would 'pray the Father' to send the Comforter, but also that He Himself, as One with the Father, and as exalted for that purpose to his mediatorial throne, would send Him. This certainly does not imply that the Holy Spirit is naturally inferior to the Son of God; neither does the mission of the Son prove that He is naturally inferior to the Father. An ambassador is not naturally inferior to the prince who sends him; and his being a subject is a mere circumstance, not essential to his office: but in that office he appears relatively inferior to his prince, and, as such, acts by commission, and observes his instructions. To this he is bound by the nature of the service, though he might be perfectly voluntary in taking it upon him. This illustration may help our conceptions of the equality of the three Persons in the sacred Trinity; and of the relative and voluntary inferiority of the Son and Spirit, as to their respective offices in man's redemption.

Verse 8-11.

'In these words is a great manifestation of our Savior's divine knowledge and wisdom. The greatest sin in the world, is sin against the Gospel, contempt of, and opposition to Christ; and the greatest evidence of man's sin, is his ill treatment of Christ, his Gospel, and followers. In this most clearly appears the malignity of sin, and particularly that violent opposition to the pouring out of the Spirit of God. As the Spirit's coming occasions this, so it eventually convicts the world of wickedness. Persons savingly taught by the Spirit are, in the first place, convicted of sin, especially their sin against Christ, or against God as revealing Himself in the Gospel. Thus, immediately after the pouring out of the Spirit on the day of Pentecost, the Jews thus were

9 Of sin, because they believe not on me;

11 Of judgment, because the prince of this world is judged.

not, be convinced but that He was a bad man, which strengthened their prejudices against his doctrine; but He is justified by the Spirit, (1 Tim. 3:16.) is proved a righteous man, and not a deceiver; and then the point is in effect gained; for He is either the great Redeemer, or greatly deceives; but a deceiver we are sure He is not.

Now by what argument will the Spirit convince men of the sincerity of our Lord? 1st. Their seeing Him no more, will contribute to remove their prejudices; they shall see Him no more, in the likeness of sinful flesh, in the form of a serpent, which made them slight Him. Moses was more respected after his removal than before. But, 2dly. His going to the Father would be a full conviction of it. The coming of the Spirit, according to the promise, was a proof of Christ's exaltation to God's right hand, (Acts 2:33.) the demonstration of his righteousness; for the holy God would never set a deceiver at his right hand.—Or,

[2.] Of Christ's righteousness, communicated to us for our justification and vivification; Dan. 9:24.

1st. The Spirit shall convince men of this righteousness, having by convictions of sin showed them their need of a righteousness; lest that drive them to despair, He will show them where it is to be had, and how they may, on sciences; Make them to know their abominations. The Spirit convinces of the fact of sin, that we have done so and so; of the fault of sin, that we have done ill in doing so; of the folly of sin, that we have acted against right reason, and our true interest; of the filth of sin, that we are become odious to God; of the fountain of sin, the corrupt nature; and lastly, of the fruit of sin, that the end thereof is death. The Spirit demonstrates that all the world is guilty before God.

The Spirit, in conviction, fastens especially upon the sin of not believing in Christ,

1st. As the great, reigning sin. There was, and is, a world of people, that believe not in Christ, and are not sensible it is their sin; natural conscience tells them that murder and theft are sins; but it is a supernatural work of the Spirit to convince them that it is a sin to suspend their belief of the Gospel, and to reject the salvation offered by it. Natural religion leaves us under this obligation, that whatever divine revelation shall be made to us at any time, with sufficient evidence to prove it divine, we accept, and submit to it; which law they transgress, who, when God speaketh to us by his Son, refuse Him that speaketh; and therefore it is sin.

2dly. It is the great, ruining sin. Every sin is so in its own nature, no sin is so to them that believe in Christ; so that it is unbelief that damns sinners; because of that, they cannot enter into rest; cannot escape the wrath of God; it is a sin against the remedy.

3dly. It is at the bottom of all sin; so Calvin takes it. The Spirit shall convince the world, that the true reason why sin reigns among them, is, they are not by faith united to Christ. Let us not suppose that, apart from Christ, we have a drop of rectitude. Calvin.

The Spirit convinces of righteousness, v. 10.

[1.] Of Christ's personal righteousness. He shall convince the world, that Jesus of Nazareth was Christ the righteous, (1 John 2:1. Luke 23:47.) Certainly this was a righteous man. His enemies put Him under the worst character, and multitudes were not, or would believing, he acquitted from guilt, and accepted as righteous in God's sight. It was hard to convince those of this righteousness, that went about to establish their own; (Rom. 10:3.) but the Spirit will do it.

2dly. Christ's ascension is the argument to convince men of his righteousness; I go to the Father, and, as evidence of my welcome with Him, you shall see Me no more; we are now sure He is at the right hand of God, and are sure of being justified through Him.

The Spirit convinces of judgment, v. 11.

1. The devil, the prince of this world, was judged; discovered to be a deceiver and destroyer; and as such, judgment was entered against him, and execution in part done. He was cast out of the Gentile world, when his oracles were silenced, and his altars deserted; cast out of the bodies of many, in Christ's name, which miraculous power continued long in the church; he was cast out of the souls of people by the grace of God working with the Gospel; he fell as lightning from heaven.

2. This is a good argument wherewith the Spirit convinces the world of judgment, Matt. 12:18. By the judgment of the prince of this world, it appears that Christ is stronger than Satan, and can disarm him, and set up his throne upon the ruins of his. He shall show that Christ's errand into the world, was to set things right, and introduce reformation and regeneration; and He proves it by this, that the prince of this world, the great master of misrule, is judged and expelled. All will be well when his power is broken, who made the mischief. He shall convince the world that all judgment is committed to Him, and that He is Lord of all; which is evidently this, that He has judged the prince of this world, broken the serpent's head, destroyed him, and the power of death, and spoiled principalities. If Satan be thus subdued by Christ, we may be sure no other power can stand before Him. He shall convince of the final day of judgment; all the obstinate enemies of Christ's Gospel shall be reckoned with at last; for the devil, their ringleader, is judged.

The coming of the Spirit would be of unspeakable advantage to the disciples themselves; the Spirit has work to do, not only on the enemies of Christ, but upon his servants, to instruct and comfort them; and therefore was expedient for them that He should go away.

He intimates the tender sense He had of their weakness; (v. 12.) I have yet many things to say unto you, (things which He could and would have said,) but ye cannot bear them now. See what a teacher Christ is! None like Him for copiousness; when He has said much, He hath still many things more to say; treasures of wisdom and knowledge are hid in Him; we are not straitened in Him, if we be not straitened in ourselves. None like Him for compassion; He would have told them more of the things pertaining to the king-awakened were convinced of this sin, of rejecting and crucifying Christ, and for this were pricked in their hearts, and said, "Men and brethren, what shall we do?" (Acts 2: also 3:13, 14, &c.) When Saul was converted, he was convinced of, and repented for this sin, Acts 9:4, 5. In most places where the apostles preached, there first arose great opposition, and the Gospel finally prevailed against it, opposers were converted, and the sin they were especially convinced of was opposition to Christ. So the jailer, and, in all ages, such as are humbled by the Spirit of God, and brought to repentance, are convinced of their sins against the Gospel. Of righteousness, because I go to my Father.] Christ's ascension, to live and reign in heaven, was the brightest evidence that He suffered wrongfully. It confirmed the righteousness and veracity of his words, his doctrines, his design in coming into the world, his promises. This ascension, taken as a completing and crowning of the grand affair of redemption, with its antecedents and disclosures, particularly the divinity and infinite dignity of the person of Christ, manifests the greatest evidence of the righteousness and holiness of God, in saving sinners. It conveys by far the greatest manifestation, and brightest effulgence of the moral perfection and glory of the divine Being, that ever was. Of Judgment, &c.] Satan has usurped the throne, and set up himself as the prince of this world. It is the greatest evidence of Christ's might and kingly power, as Captain of the salvation of his people, to overcome and dethrone this enemy, and the greatest manifestation of his high judicial authority, to judge and condemn this great rebel, and head of all the rebellion in the universe, and to execute vengeance upon him. A conviction of these three things, is the substance of that conviction, by the Spirit, implied in saving faith. The Spirit's conviction of sin, righteousness, and judgment, is always implied in the saving knowledge of good and evil; which is the true knowledge of ourselves, and of God in Christ. This knowledge is the light of the divine glory in the face of Jesus, and the foundation of all true compliance with the Gospel in heart.

But this prince of this world was condemned, (as the world may be regarded,) inasmuch as his power was broken and diminished, and therefore his hatred was frustrated, and his counsels at last decided to naught. And this was done by the Holy Spirit through the ministry of the apostles; who taught that the only means of attaining salvation, was faith in Christ. The power of Jewish malice was broken especially by the destruction of the temple, and the ruin of the Jewish state. So Titman?

a truth, is more than barely to know it; it is to be intimately and experimentally acquainted with it; to be strongly affected with it; not only to have the notion of it in our heads, but the relish, and power of it in our hearts; it denotes a gradual discovery of truth shining more and more; 'He shall lead you by those truths that are plain and easy, to those that are more difficult.'

But how into all truth? The meaning is,

1st. Into the whole truth relating to 'their embassy; whatever was needful for them to know, they should be fully instructed in; what truths they were to teach others, He would teach them, and enable them both to explain and to defend.

2dly. Into nothing but the truth; All that He shall guide you into, shall be truth; (1 John 2:27.) the anointing is truth.

1. 'The Spirit shall teach nothing but the truth, for He shall not speak of Himself any doctrine distinct from mine, but whatsoever He shall hear, and knows to be the mind of the Father, that, only, shall He speak.' This intimates, (1.) That we may rely upon the testimony of the Spirit, in the Word and by the apostles. The Spirit knows and searches all things, even the deep things of God, and the apostles received that Spirit; (1 Cor. 2:10, 11.) so that we may venture our souls upon the Spirit's Word. (2.) The testimony of the Spirit always concurs with the Word of Christ, for He does not speak of Himself, has no separate interest of his own, but as in essence, so in record, is one with the Father and the Son, 1 John 5:7. Men's word and spirit oft disagree, but the eternal Word and the eternal Spirit never.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 8-15 Every professed Christian ought to inquire, whether the Holy Spirit has 'begun a good work' in his heart. When about to come as a Comforter, He generally occasions a temporary, poignant sorrow; He always produces deep humiliation, often attended with terror and distress. For, without abasing convictions of sin, and a discovery of our guilt and danger, we never understand the value of Christ's salvation: but when brought to a just estimate of our own character, general conduct, and best duties, we perceive the preciousness of the Redeemer's obedience, atonement, and intercession. We also discover the sinfulness of unbelief, and neglect of the Gospel: and if at any time we are tempted to despair, through a sense of guilt and depravity; we are aware that this would be a more fatal and atrocious offence, than all our other transgressions. Thus we learn to value and rely upon Christ, for righteousness and sanctification; and to prepare to meet Him with comfort and rejoicing hope, when He shall come to judgment. The 'prince of this world,' and all who continue his servants, will then be cast into the lake of fire, the blackness of darkness forever. Every one who is 'delivered from the power of darkness, and translated into the kingdom of God's dear Son,' knew what it is to be thus 'convinced of sin, of righteousness, and of judgment.' This is essential to true religion, and to salvation through Him, 'who was made sin for us, though He knew no sin, that we might be made the righteousness of God in Him.' (2 Cor. 5:18-21, v. 21.)—If then this be the peculiar work of the Holy Spirit in redemption, his servants, and 'workers together with Him,' should use all proper means to produce these convictions: they should often and particularly lay open the law of God, as 'the ministration of condemnation;' (2 Cor. 3:7-11. Gal. 3:10-14.) They should show the evil of sin, the way of justification by faith in Christ, the consequences of unbelief; and the solemn transactions and event of 'the day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men.' On these subjects, all who would be honored as instruments in converting sinners, should be frequent, copious, alarming, encouraging, and distinguishing. But in matters less essential, they would do well, after the example of Christ, not to

2. 'He shall teach you all truth, and keep back nothing that is profitable for you, for He will show you things to come.' The Spirit was in the apostles, a Spirit of prophecy; it was foretold He should be so, Joel 2:25. The Spirit showed them things to come, as Acts 11:28. 20:23. 21:11. The Spirit spoke of the apostasy of the latter times, 1 Tim. 4:1. John, when in the Spirit, had things to come showed Him in vision. This was a great satisfaction to their minds, and of use to them in their conduct, and also a great confirmation of their mission. We should not grudge, says one, that the Spirit does not now show us things to come, in this world, as He did the apostles; let it suffice, that in the Word He hath showed us things to come in the other world, which are our chief concern.

The sending of the Spirit was the glorifying of Christ, v. 14, 15. God the Father glorified Him in heaven, and the Spirit, on earth. It was the honor of the Redeemer, that the Spirit was both sent in his name, and on his errand, to carry on and perfect his undertaking. All the gifts and graces of the Spirit, the preaching and writing of the apostles, under his influence, the tongues, and miracles, were to glorify Christ.

The Spirit glorified Christ, by leading his followers into the truth as it is in Jesus, Eph. 4:21. He assures them, 1st. That the Spirit should communicate the things of Christ to them; He shall receive of mine, and shall show it unto you. As in essence He proceeded from the Son, so in influence and operation He derives from Him. He shall take of that which is mine. All that the Spirit applies to us, for instruction and comfort, for strength and quickening, all He seals to us, belonged to Christ, and was received from Him. He bought it, and therefore had reason to call it his own; it was given Him as the Head of the church, to be derived from Him to all his members. The Spirit came not to erect a new kingdom, but to advance that which Christ had erected, to maintain the same interest, and pursue the same design; those therefore who pretend to the Spirit, yet vilify Christ, give themselves the lie, for He came to glorify Christ.

2dly. That herein the things of God should be communicated to us; lest any should think press them on their auditories, before they are 'able to bear them,' or to make a good use of them; and incalculable them gradually, and as the Spirit removes prejudices and darkness from the mind, and enables it to receive them.—The Holy Spirit comes forth from the Father, to 'glorify Christ' among men. We need not then wonder, that so many deny his Deity and atonement, or treat his prophetic or kingly authority with neglect or contempt: for they imagine, that the work of the Holy Spirit was confined to the primitive ages, and that all dependence upon his influences at present at least borders on enthusiasm. Could they ascertain this position, it would follow, that Jesus could 'be glorified' only in the primitive times.—In proportion as men overlook, or do not trust, expect, and pray for, the influences of the Holy Spirit, Christ is neglected and dishonored, even by those who call themselves his disciples.—On the other hand, if men profess to be influenced by the Holy Spirit, and yet do not honor Christ; but either treat his Word with contempt, or place their dependence elsewhere than on his atoning blood, or disgrace Him by their unholy lives; it is plain that they are deceivers, or deceived. Where this Teacher and Comforter resides, He shows the Savior, in all his offices, to be glorious and precious; leads men to depend on and glory in Him; constrains them, by love, to devote themselves to his service, and to honor Him by their lives, and the improvement of their talents, to recommend and promote his cause: He enables them to see, that 'all things which the Father hath' are the Son's also; that in 'honoring Him they honor the Father that sent Him;' and that all the power and perfection of Deity are in Christ, for the completion of that design for which He suffered. We should therefore have more admiring views of our Redeemer, and more lively affections towards Him, did we more entirely depend on the Holy Spirit, more frequently and earnestly pray to 'our heavenly Father, to give us his Holy Spirit, as He has promised' (Luke 11:13.) and were we more careful neither to grieve Him by our sins, nor to quench his sacred influences by our negligence. Thus we should learn to rejoice in Christ Jesus amidst all our tribulations. (Rom. 8:3-5.)

sion, which scattered the ignorance and mistakes they were almost lost in, and gave them a clearer insight into the mysteries of Christ's Gospel. The Spirit's coming was Christ's visit to his disciples, not transient but permanent, and such a visit as abundantly retrieved the sight of Him. 3. At his second coming. They saw Him again as they removed one by one to Him at death, and when He shall come in the clouds, at the end of time, every eye shall see Him. It might be truly said, that this was but a little while; for what is time, to eternity? 2 Pet. 3:8, 9.

The reason given is, 'I must leave you for a time, because I go to the Father, my business calls Me to the upper world, and be content, for my business is yours.' 'Therefore you shall see Me again shortly, for the Father will not detain Me to your prejudice.' It would seem, all this refers rather to his going away at death, and return at his resurrection, than his going away at his ascension, and return at the end of time; for his death was their grief, not his ascension, (Luke 24:52.) and between his death and resurrection it was indeed a little while. And it may be read, not, yet a little while, but for a little while ye shall not see Me, namely, the three days of his lying in the grave; and again, for a little while ye shall see Me, namely, the forty days between his resurrection and ascension. Thus we may say of our ministers and Christian friends, Yet a little while, and we shall not see them, either they must leave us, or we them, and yet we part not forever.

The disciples were perplexed at this; (v. 17, 18.) Some said, softly, among themselves, either some of the weakest, that were least able, or some of the most inquisitive, that were most desirous to understand Him, What is this that He saith to us? Though Christ had often spoken thus before, still they were in the dark; though precept be upon precept, it is in vain, unless God give the understanding.

The disciples could not understand so plain a saying, to which Christ had already given them a key; having so often told them plainly, that He should be killed, and the third day rise again; yet, say they, We cannot tell what He saith; for, 1. Sorrow had filled their heart, and made them unapt to receive impressions of comfort. The darkness of ignorance and of melancholy commonly thicken one another; mistakes cause griefs, and then griefs confirm mistakes. 2. The notion of Christ's secular kingdom was so deeply rooted in them, that they could make no sense of those sayings, which they knew not how to reconcile with that notion. When we think the Scripture must be made to agree with the false ideas we have imbibed, no wonder we complain of its difficulty; but when our reasonings are captivated to revelation, the matter is easy. 3. It would seem, that which puzzled them was, the little while. They could not conceive how He should leave them quickly, when his stay had been so short. Thus it is hard to represent to ourselves that change as near which yet we know will come certainly, and may come suddenly. When told, Yet a little while, and we must go hence; Yet a little while, and we must give up our account; we know not how to digest it; for we always took the vision to be for a great while to come, Ezek. 12:27.

V. 16-22. Our Lord, for the comfort of his sorrowful disciples, promises to visit them again. A little while, and ye that have seen Me so long, and still desire to see Me, shall not see Me; therefore if they had any question to ask, they must ask quickly. Note, It is good to consider how near to a period our seasons of grace are, that we may be quickened to improve them while they continue. Now our eyes see our teachers, see the days of the Son of man; but, perhaps, yet a little while and we shall not see them. They lost the sight of Christ, 1. At his death, when He withdrew from this world, and never after showed Himself openly in it. The most that death does to our Christian friends, is, to take them out of sight, not out of being, nor out of bliss. 2. At his ascension, when He withdrew from them, (who after his resurrection, had for some time conversed with Him,) out of their sight; a cloud received Him, and, though they looked up steadfastly after Him, they saw Him no more, Acts 1:9, 10. 2 Kings 2:12. See 2 Cor. 5:16.

They should speedily recover the sight of Him; Again a little while, and ye shall see Me, and therefore ye ought not to sorrow as those that have no hope; his farewell was not final, they should see Him again, 1. At his resurrection, when He shewed Himself alive, by many infallible proofs, and this in a very little while, not forty hours. See Hos. 6:2. 2. By the pouring out of the Spirit, soon after his ascension, which scattered the ignorance and mistakes they were almost lost in, and gave them a clearer insight into the mysteries of Christ's Gospel. The Spirit's coming was Christ's visit to his disciples, not transient but permanent, and such a visit as abundantly retrieved the sight of Him. 3. At his second coming. They saw Him again as they removed one by one to Him at death, and when He shall come in the clouds, at the end of time, every eye shall see Him. The disciples were perplexed at this; (v. 17, 18.) Some said, softly, among themselves, either some of the weakest, that were least able, or some of the most inquisitive, that were most desirous to understand Him, What is this that He saith to us? Though Christ had often spoken thus before, still they were in the dark; though precept be upon precept, it is in vain, unless God give the understanding.

The disciples could not understand so plain a saying, to which Christ had already given them a key; having so often told them plainly, that He should be killed, and the third day rise again; yet, say they, We cannot tell what He saith; for, 1. Sorrow had filled their heart, and made them unapt to receive impressions of comfort. The darkness of ignorance and of melancholy commonly thicken one another; mistakes cause griefs, and then griefs confirm mistakes. 2. The notion of Christ's secular kingdom was so deeply rooted in them, that they could make no sense of those sayings, which they knew not how to reconcile with that notion. When we think the Scripture must be made to agree with the false ideas we have imbibed, no wonder we complain of its difficulty; but when our reasonings are captivated to revelation, the matter is easy. 3. It would seem, that which puzzled them was, the little while. They could not conceive how He should leave them quickly, when his stay had been so short. Thus it is hard to represent to ourselves that change as near which yet we know will come certainly, and may come suddenly. When told, Yet a little while, and we must go hence; Yet a little while, and we must give up our account; we know not how to digest it; for we always took the vision to be for a great while to come, Ezek. 12:27.

When at a loss about the meaning of Christ's words, they conferred upon it and asked help of one another. By converse we borrow the light of others, and improve our own. How exactly they repeat Christ's words. Though we cannot fully solve every difficulty in Scripture, yet we must not therefore throw it by, but revolve what we cannot explain, and wait till God shall reveal even this unto us.

Christ explained what He had said, (v. 19.) because He knew they were desirous to ask Him. Note, The knots we cannot untie, we must bring to Him who alone can give understanding. Christ knew they were desirous to ask, but were bashful. Note, Christ takes cognizance of pious desires, though they be not as yet offered up, the groanings that cannot be uttered, and even presents them with the blessings of his goodness. Christ instructed those who were desirous to ask, though they did not ask. Before we call, He answers.

Another reason why Christ explained it, was, He observed them canvassing this matter among themselves; 'I will make it easy to you. This intimates whom Christ will teach: 1. The humble that confess their ignorance. 2. The diligent, that use the means they have; 'Do ye inquire? You shall be taught. To him that hath, shall be given.'

He explained it, not by a nice and critical descent upon the words, but by bringing the thing more closely to them; He had told them of not seeing Him, and seeing Him; they did not apprehend that, therefore He explains it by their sorrowing and rejoicing, because we commonly measure things according as they affect us; (v. 20.) Ye shall weep and lament, for my departure, but the world shall rejoice in it; ye shall be sorrowful, while I am absent, but, on my return, your sorrow will be turned into joy. But He says nothing of the little while, because He saw that perplexed them more than any thing; and it is no matter to know the times and seasons. Note, Believers have joy or sorrow, according as they have or have not a sight of Christ, and the tokens of his presence.

Ye shall weep and lament, and ye shall be sorrowful. The sufferings of Christ, whom they loved, could not but be the sorrow of his disciples; when they slept, it was for sorrow, Luke 22:45. They wept in sad apprehension for themselves. They grieved to lose Him for whom they had left all, expecting so much. Christ has given notice to his disciples both beforehand to expect sorrow, that they may treasure up comforts accordingly.

But the world shall rejoice. The grief of saints, is the joy of sinners. 1st. Strangers to his resurrection, (v. 20, 22.) and would introduce them to a state of comfortable converse with God by prayer, and a joy of which none should deprive them, (v. 23-27.) He adds, (v. 28.) that He was quickly leaving the world, to go and reside with the Father, from whom He came; thereby intimating that temporal reign was to be expected. And if we suppose Him thus to have glanced obliquely at the most secret sentiments of their hearts, it will account for that confession of his omniscience which immediately follows this 28th verse, (v. 29, 30.) the reason of which would not appear merely from his discovery, that they doubted about something, which their countenances and whispers might show.

20 Verily, verily, I say unto you, 'That ye shall weep and lament,' but the world shall rejoice: and ye shall be sorrowful, but your sorrow shall be turned into joy.

21 A woman when she is in travail hath sorrow, because her hour is come: but, as soon as she is delivered of the child, she remembereth no more the anguish, for joy that a man is born into the world.

22 And ye now therefore have sorrow; but I will see you again, and your heart shall rejoice, and your joy no man taketh from you.

rounded with thorns; all the children of men are foolish children, being the heaviness of her that bore them from the very first. This comes of sin.

2. The fruit of the blessing; the joy for a child born, so the word is. If God had not preserved the blessing in force after the fall, Be fruitful and multiply, parents could never have looked on their children with comfort; but the fruit of a blessing is matter of joy; the birth of a living child is; (1.) The parents' joy. Jer. 20: 15. Though children are certain cares, uncertain comforts, and often prove the greatest crosses, it is natural to rejoice at their birth. Were we sure that our children, like John, should be filled with the Holy Ghost, we might, like his parents, have joy and gladness in their birth, Luke 1: 14, 15. But when we consider, not only that they are born in sin, but, as here express-

Christ, will continue in carnal mirth, and not at all interest themselves in these sorrows. It is nothing to them that pass by, Lam. 1: 12. Nay, 2dly. Christ's enemies will therefore rejoice, because they hope they have conquered Him, and ruined his interest. When the chief priests had Christ upon the cross; we may suppose they made merry over Him, as they that dwell on earth over the slain witnesses, Rev. 11: 10. Let it not surprise us to see others triumphing, when we are trembling for the ark.

But your sorrow shall be turned into joy. As the joy of the hypocrite, so the sorrow of the true Christian, is but for a moment. The disciples were glad when they saw the Lord. His resurrection was life from the dead to them, and their sorrow for Christ's sufferings was turned into a joy of such a nature as could not be damped by any sufferings of their own. They were sorrowful, and yet always rejoicing; (2 Cor. 6: 10.) had sorrowful lives, and yet joyful hearts.

This applies to all the faithful followers of the Lamb.

1. Their condition and disposition are mournful; sorrows are their lot, and seriousness their temper: those who are acquainted with Christ, must, like Him, be acquainted with grief; they weep and lament for what others make light of, their own sins, and the sins of those about them; they mourn with sufferers that mourn, and for sinners that mourn not for themselves.

2. The world, at the same time, goes away with all the mirth; they so spend their days, that one would think they neither knew sorrow, nor feared it. Carnal mirth and pleasures are surely none of the best things, for then the worst men would not have so large a share of them, and the favorites of heaven be such strangers to them.

3. Spiritual mourning will shortly be turned into eternal rejoicing. Gladness is sown for the upright in heart, that sown in tears, and without doubt they shall shortly reap in joy. Their sorrow will not only be followed with joy, but turned into it; for the most precious comforts take rise from pious griefs.

This He illustrates by a similitude, v. 21. Observe,

1. The fruit of the curse; (Gen. 3: 16.) In sorrow (i. e. pain as here) thou shalt bring forth. The greatest griefs and pains are compared to these; (Ps. 48: 6. Isa. 13: 8. 21: 3. Jer. 4: 31: 6, 24.) and they are inevitable, 1 Thes. 5: 3. See what this world is; all its roses are sured, into the world, a world of snares, and a vale of tears, we shall see reason to rejoice with trembling, lest it prove better for them that they had never been born. (2.) It is such joy as makes the anguish not to be remembered, or remembered as waters that pass away, Job 11: 15. Gen. 41: 51. This very properly sets forth, [1.] The sorrows of Christ's disciples, in this world, are like travelling pains, sure and sharp, but not to last long, and in order to a joyful produce; the church is described as in pain to be delivered, (Rev. 12: 2.) and the whole creation. Rom. 8: 22. And, [2.] Their joys after these sorrows, will wipe away all tears, for the former things are passed away, Rev. 21: 4. When born into that world, and reaping the fruit of their services and sorrows, the toil and anguish of this world will be no more remembered, as Christ's were not, when He saw of the travail of his soul to his satisfaction, Isa. 53: 11.

The application of the similitude; (v. 22.) 'Ye now have sorrow, and are likely to have more, but I will see you again, and all will be well.'

Here again He tells them of their sorrow; 'Ye now have sorrow, because I am leaving you.' Note, Christ's withdrawals are just cause of grief to his disciples. And Christ notices those griefs, has a bottle for the tears, and a book for the sighs, of all gracious mourners.

He, more largely than before, assures them of a return of joy, Ps. 30: 5, 11. He went through his own griefs, and bore ours, for the joy set before Him; and would have us encourage ourselves with the same prospect.

'I will see you again. I will make you a visit, and minister comfort to you.' Note, 1. Christ will return to those that wait for Him, though for a small moment He has seemed to forsake them, Isa. 54: 7. They shall not only see Him in his glory, but He will visit them in their meanness. 2. Christ's returns are returns of joy to his disciples; clouded evidences are cleared up, interrupted communion revived.

Your heart shall rejoice. Divine consolations put gladness into the heart. Joy in the heart is solid; secret, and a stranger does not intermeddle therewith; it is sweet, gives a good man satisfaction in himself: sure, not easily broken in upon.

Your joy no man taketh from you. Men will attempt it, but shall not prevail. Some understand it of them that are glorified; they that are entered into the joy of their Lord, shall go no more out. We are liable to be robbed of our joys on earth by a thousand accidents, but heavenly joys are everlasting. I rather understand it of the spiritual joys of the sanctified, particularly the apostles' joy in their apostleship. Thanks be to God, says Paul, in the name of the rest, who always causes us to triumph, 2 Cor. 2: 14. If the bonds, banishments, tortures, and deaths of a malicious world would have taken it from them, they had lost it; but when they took every thing else, they could not take this; as sorrowful, yet always rejoicing. They

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 16-22. For a little while, believers must be absent from their Savior; and may be often called to mourn for sin, and to pass through manifold tribulations; while the world around them rejoices in carnal mirth, and destructive prosperity, or perhaps in the success of atrocious iniquities! But their joys and the believer's sorrows are alike transient: they have their fears and forebodings to damp their mirth; he has his hopes and anticipations to alleviate his afflictions: and, as a sorrow is coming on them, which none can mitigate or terminate; so the believer is the heir of an unalienable joy.—It might have excited in us astonishment and distress, if we had seen the apostles weeping over their crucified Lord, and the enemies of God glorying in their success: but where is now the joy of his murderers, or the sorrow of his friends? These have seen Him again, and are filled with consolation. Such will be the event of every believer's trials: may we then choose that good part, which can never be taken from us.

Scott.

Verse 23, 24:

To suppose that Christ meant to forbid them to address Him in prayer, when He said, 'Ye shall ask Me nothing,' is a direct censur on the apostles and primitive Christians, when acting under the immediate influence of the Holy Spirit. (Acts 7: 54-60. v. 59, 60. 2 Cor. 12: 7-10. v. 8, 9. 1 Thes. 3: 11-13. 2 Thes. 2: 16, 17.) The disciples had been used to inquire of their Lord, as Man, in all their difficulties; but this would speedily and finally be terminated, and they would be taught to apply to God by prayer, through his mediation. But to address the Father in the name of Christ, or to address the Son, as God dwelling in human nature, and 'reconciling the world to Himself,' must be equivalent, if indeed the Father and the Son are One Deity. (10: 26-31. v. 30.) The apostles, hearing this, declared that He had now spoken plainly, without any proverb: yet, according to the system of some professed Christians, He scarcely ever spoke any thing so obscure or inexplicable: but it is evident, that those who deny the Deity of Christ do not agree with the apostles in interpreting his words. (Marg. Ref. e, f.—3: 12, 13. 6: 60-65. 13: 1-5, v. 3. 17: 4, 5.)

In that day, &c. 'Here is a plain reference to their wanting to ask Him what He meant by a little while, &c. (v. 19.) And here Christ says, "In that day when the Spirit shall have come, and shall have taught you all things, and satisfied all your doubts, ye shall have no more need to ask Me any further questions." He is far from designing, by this, to forbid their praying to Him, for not only Stephen and the apostles did this after He was gone to heaven; but it is made the distinguishing character of Christians, that they call upon Him, or upon his name. Acts 9: 14. Rom. 10: 12-14. 1 Cor. 1: 2.

Father, for that is the happiness of heaven, but to see God? To know God as the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, is the greatest mystery with the contemplation of which the understanding can please itself; and to know Him as our Father, is the greatest happiness, with the choice and enjoyment of which the will and affections can please themselves.

Of this He had hitherto spoken in proverbs, wise sayings, but figurative, and sung in generals. Christ had spoken many things very plainly to them, and expounded his parables privately to the disciples; but, considering their dullness, and unaptness to receive what He said to them, He might be said to speak in proverbs; what He said to them was as a book sealed, Isa. 29:11. Comparing the discoveries made, in what He had spoken to their ears, with what He would make when He would put his Spirit into their hearts; all hitherto had been by proverbs. They would think themselves in a new world, when reflecting on their former notions as confused and enigmatical, compared with their present clear knowledge of divine things. The ministration of the letter was nothing to that of the Spirit, 2 Cor. 3:8-11. Confining it to what He had said of the Father, and his counsels, what He had said was very dark, compared with what was shortly to be revealed, Col. 2:2.

He would speak to them plainly, with freedom, of the Father. When the Spirit was poured out, the apostles attained to greater knowledge of divine things, as appears by the utterance the Spirit gave them, (Acts 2:4.) and what the Spirit showed them, Christ is here said to show them, for as the Father speaks by the Son, so the Son by the Spirit. But this promise will be fully accomplished in heaven, where we shall see the Father, face to face, not as now, through a glass darkly; (1 Cor. 13:12.) which is comforting under present darkness, by reason of which we cannot order our speech, not often disorder it. While here, we have many questions to ask concerning God and the invisible world; but in that day we shall ask no more questions.

II. He promises they should request nothing in vain. It is taken for granted that all Christ's disciples give themselves to prayer. He had taught them by his precept and pattern to be much in prayer; their instruction, strength, success, must be fetched in by prayer.

Here is an express promise of a grant, v. 23. Its preface leaves no room to question it; Verily, verily, I say unto you. The promise itself is incomparably rich and sweet, v. 23, ch. 14:13. What would we more?

We are here taught how to seek; we must have an eye to God as a Father, and come as children to Him; and to Christ as a Mediator, and come as clients. Asking of the Father includes a sense of spiritual wants and a desire of spiritual blessings, with a conviction that they are to be had from God only. It includes humility of address, with a believing confidence could not rob them of their joy, because they could not separate them from the love of Christ, nor rob them of their God, nor of their treasure in heaven.

V. 23-27. An answer is here promised, for their further comfort. There are two ways of asking; inquiring and requesting. Christ speaks of both.

I. They should not need to inquire; (v. 23.) In that day ye shall ask Me nothing; no questions; ye shall have such a clear knowledge of gospel-mysteries, that ye shall not need to inquire; (as Heb. 8:11. They shall not teach; ye shall have more knowledge on a sudden than hitherto by diligent attendance.) They had asked ignorant questions, (as ch. 9:2.) ambitious, (as Matt. 18:1.) distrustful, (as Matt. 19:27.) impertinent, (as ch. 21:21.) curious, (as Acts 1:6.) but after the Spirit was poured out, nothing of all this. In Acts we seldom find them asking questions, as David, Shall I do this? Or, Shall I go thither? For they were constantly under divine guidance. In that weighty case of preaching the Gospel to the Gentiles, Peter went, nothing doubting, Acts 10:20. We should aim at such a full assurance of understanding, that we may not hesitate, but be constantly led in a plain path both of truth and duty.

For this He gives a reason; (v. 25.) These things have I spoken to you in proverbs, in a way you have thought not so plain as you could wish, but the time cometh, when I shall show you as plainly as you can desire, of the Father, without need of questions.

The great thing Christ would lead them into, was, the knowledge of God; I will show you the Father and bring you acquainted with Him. This is what Christ designs to give, and all true Christians desire. When Christ would speak the greatest favor intended his disciples, He tells them He would show them plainly the Father, for that is the happiness of heaven, but to see God? To know God as the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, is the greatest mystery with the contemplation of which the understanding can please itself; and to know Him as our Father, is the greatest happiness, with the choice and enjoyment of which the will and affections can please themselves.

Of this He had hitherto spoken in proverbs, wise sayings, but figurative, and sung in generals. Christ had spoken many things very plainly to them, and expounded his parables privately to the disciples; but, considering their dullness, and unaptness to receive what He said to them, He might be said to speak in proverbs; what He said to them was as a book sealed, Isa. 29:11. Comparing the discoveries made, in what He had spoken to their ears, with what He would make when He would put his Spirit into their hearts; all hitherto had been by proverbs. They would think themselves in a new world, when reflecting on their former notions as confused and enigmatical, compared with their present clear knowledge of divine things. The ministration of the letter was nothing to that of the Spirit, 2 Cor. 3:8-11. Confining it to what He had said of the Father, and his counsels, what He had said was very dark, compared with what was shortly to be revealed, Col. 2:2.

He would speak to them plainly, with freedom, of the Father. When the Spirit was poured out, the apostles attained to greater knowledge of divine things, as appears by the utterance the Spirit gave them, (Acts 2:4.) and what the Spirit showed them, Christ is here said to show them, for as the Father speaks by the Son, so the Son by the Spirit. But this promise will be fully accomplished in heaven, where we shall see the Father, face to face, not as now, through a glass darkly; (1 Cor. 13:12.) which is comforting under present darkness, by reason of which we cannot order our speech, not often disorder it. While here, we have many questions to ask concerning God and the invisible world; but in that day we shall ask no more questions.

II. He promises they should request nothing in vain. It is taken for granted that all Christ's disciples give themselves to prayer. He had taught them by his precept and pattern to be much in prayer; their instruction, strength, success, must be fetched in by prayer.

Here is an express promise of a grant, v. 23. Its preface leaves no room to question it; Verily, verily, I say unto you. The promise itself is incomparably rich and sweet, v. 23, ch. 14:13. What would we more?

We are here taught how to seek; we must have an eye to God as a Father, and come as children to Him; and to Christ as a Mediator, and come as clients. Asking of the Father includes a sense of spiritual wants and a desire of spiritual blessings, with a conviction that they are to be had from God only. It includes humility of address, with a believing confidence in Him, as able and ready to help us. Asking in Christ's name includes an acknowledgment of unworthiness to receive any favor, a complacency in God's method of correspondence with us by his Son, and an entire dependence on Christ as the Lord our righteousness.

We are taught how we shall speed, We are more than we wish to have what we want, nay, what we will, in conformity to God's will, for asking? He will give it you, from whom proceedeth every good and perfect gift. What Christ purchased by his death, He needed not, but intended it for, and consigned it to, his followers; and the valuable consideration He gave, being accepted, He draws a bill, as it were, on the treasury in heaven, which we are to present by prayer, and in his name ask for what is purchased and promised. Christ had promised illumination, but they must pray for it, and did so, Acts 1:14. He had promised perfection hereafter, but what shall they do in the mean time? They must continue praying. Perfect fruition is reserved for our rest; asking and receiving are the comfort of our pilgrimage.

It is thought sufficient if great men permit addresses, but Christ calls upon us to petition, v. 24.

Hitherto have ye asked nothing in my name. Either, 1. Nothing to what you might have asked, and will ask when the Spirit is poured out. What a generous benefactor our Lord is; He gives liberally, and so far from upbraiding us with the frequency and largeness of his gifts, rather upbraids us with the seldomness and straitness of our requests; Ye have asked nothing in comparison of what you want, and what I have to give, and have promised to give. We are bid to open our mouth wide. Or, 2. They prayed many a prayer, but never so expressly in the name of Christ as He now directs them to; for He had not as yet offered up that great sacrifice, in the virtue of which our prayers were to be accepted, the incense whereof was to perfume all our devotions. Hitherto they had cast out devils, and healed diseases, in the name of Christ, as a King and a Prophet, but they could not as yet distinctly pray in his name as a Priest.

Ask, and ye shall receive, that your joy may be full. Here, 1. He directs them to ask for all they needed, all He had promised. 2. He assures them that they shall receive. What we ask from a principle of grace, God will graciously give. There is something more in that than in the promise, that He will give it. He will not only give it, but give you the comfort and benefit of it, a heart to eat of it, Eccl. 6:2. 3. That hereby their joy shall be full. Which speaks, 1st. The effect of the prayer of faith. Would we have our joy as full as it is capable of being in this world, we must be much in prayer. When bid to rejoice evermore, it follows immediately, Pray without ceasing. See how high we are to aim in prayer—not only at peace; but a fullness of joy. Or, 2dly. The effects of the answer of prayer: Ask, and ye shall receive what will fill your joy. Christ's gifts fill the treasures of the soul, they fill its joys, Prov. 8:21. Ask for the Holy Ghost, and ye shall receive it; and whereas other knowledge increases sorrow, (Eccl. 1:18.) the knowledge He gives will increase, fill, your joy.

The grounds on which they might hope, (v. 26, 27.) summed up in short by the apostle, (1 John 2:1.) We have an advocate with the Father.

We have an Advocate; Christ saw cause at present not to insist upon that, only to make the following encouragement shine the brighter; Suppose I should not tell you that I will undertake to solicit every particular cause you have there, yet it may be a general ground of

He will give it you. [Is it true then, that, literally speaking, whatever we ask God, He will give us? Such is not the meaning of the promise, for we may ask for many things sinful in themselves, or hurtful in their application. It is the end of all the dispensations of our heavenly Father to promote his own glory, and therein the holiness and happiness of his people. In this sense is the promise to be understood, that if they are conducive to the promotion of God's glory, and the holiness and happiness of his people, all these things will He give us. Whatsoever may appear to us the best means for attaining these ends, it is reasonable we should pray for; still we should always pray with a firm persuasion that our own judgment as to the means must be infinitely below that of the Judge of all the earth, and should, therefore, be convinced, that however He may appear to refuse our petitions, He is really and effectually granting them; though, perhaps the effects of prayer are not perceptible to the bodily eye, and can be discovered only by the eye of faith, which discerns the fulfillment of the spirit of a petition, where it may not be agreeable to the divine wisdom to vouchsafe a compliance with its letter.] Bp. May 27 For the Father himself loveth you, because ye have loved me, and have believed that I came out from God.

28 I came forth from the Father, and am come into the world: again, I leave the world, and go to the Father.

as that which recommended Me, and believed in Me, when the world hated and rejected Me; and ye shall be distinguished, who have thus distinguished yourselves. See what advantage Christ's disciples have; the Father loves them, because they love Christ; so well pleased is He in Him, that He is well pleased with all his friends. Observe

What encouragement this gave them in prayer. It cautions us against hard thoughts of God. When we are taught in prayer to plead Christ's merit and intercession, it is not as if all the kindness were in Christ only, and in God nothing but wrath: the Father's love and good-will appointed the Mediator; so that we owe Christ's merit to God's mercy. Let it cherish and confirm in us good thoughts of God. Believers, that love Christ, ought to know that God loves them, and therefore to come boldly to Him as children to a loving Father.

V. 23-33. We have here,

1. A plain declaration of Christ's mission from the Father, and return to Him; v. 23. This is the conclusion of the whole matter. Nothing had He more inculcated upon them, than these two things,—the Alpha and Omega of the mystery of godliness, (1 Tim. 3:16.) that the Redeemer, in his entrance, was God manifest in the flesh, and, in his exit, was received up into glory. These two great truths are here put into a few words. Brief summaries of Christian doctrine are of great use to beginners. The principles of the oracles of God brought into a little compass in creeds and catechisms, have, like the beams of the sun contracted in a burning-glass, conveyed divine light and heat with wonderful power. Such we have, (Job 28: 23. Eccl. 12: 13. 1 Tim. 1: 15. Tit. 2: 11, 12. 1 John 5: 11.) much in a little. They are compared and set the one against the other. There is an admirable harmony in divine truths; they corroborate and illustrate one another; Christ's coming and his going do so; Christ had commended his disciples for believing that He came from God, (v. 27.) and from thence infers the necessity and equity of his returning to God, which therefore should not seem either strange or sad. Note, The due improvement of what we know and ~~own~~ would help us to understand what seems difficult and doubtful. Christ will return no more to the world, till He comes to put an end to it; still He is spiritually present with his church, and will be to the end.

The disciples' satisfaction in this; (v. 29, 30.) Lo, now speakest Thou plainly. This one word did them more good than all the rest, though He had said many things likely enough to fasten upon them. The Spirit, as the wind, blows when and where, and by what word, He pleases; perhaps a word that has been spoken once, yea twice, and not perceived, yet, being often repeated, takes hold at last.

When in the dark concerning what He said, they did not say, Lo, now speakest Thou obscurely, as blaming Him; but now that they apprehend his meaning, they give Him glory for condescending to their capacity. Divine truths are then most likely to do good, when spoken plainly, 1 Cor. 2: 4. Note, When Christ is pleased to speak plainly to our souls, and to bring us with open face to behold his glory, we have reason to rejoice in it.

Now we are sure. We believe that Thou camest forth from God. He had said, (v. 27.) that they did not believe this; 'Lord,' (say they,) 'we do believe it, have cause to, and know that we believe it.

The motive of their faith was his omniscience. This proved Him a teacher from God, and more than a prophet, that He knew all things, which they were convinced of by this, that He resolved the doubts hid in their hearts, and answered the scruples they had not confessed. Note, Those know Christ best, that know Him by experience; that can say of his power, It works in me; of his love, He loved me. And this proves Christ not only to have a divine mission, but to be a divine Person; that He is a discernor of the thoughts and intents of the heart, therefore the essential, eternal Word, Heb. 4: 12, 13. He has made all the churches to know that He searches the reins and the heart, Rev. 2: 23. This confirmed the faith of the disciples here, as it made the first impression upon the woman of Samaria, that Christ told her all things that ever she did, (ch. 4: 29.) and upon Nathaniel, that Christ saw him under the fig-tree, ch. 1. 48, 49.

These words, and needest not that any man should ask thee, may speak, either, Christ's aptness to teach, as He prevents us with his instructions, is communicative of the treasures of wisdom and knowledge hid in Him, and needs not to be importuned; or, His ability to teach; 'Thou needest not, to have the learners' doubts told thee.' The best teachers can answer what is spoken only, but Christ what is thought, what we are afraid to ask, as the disciples were, Mark 9: 32. Thus He can have compassion, Heb. 5: 2. See

The gentle rebuke Christ gave the disciples for their confidence, that they now understood Him, v. 31, 32. Observing how they triumphed in their attainments, He said, 'Do ye now look upon yourselves as advanced and confirmed disciples? Do ye now think to make no more blunders? Alas! ye know not your weakness; ye will very shortly be scattered every man to his own,' &c. Here is,

1. A question to put them upon consideration; Do ye now believe? (1.) 'If now, why not sooner? Have ye not heard the same things before?' They who after many instructions are at last persuaded to believe, have reason to be ashamed that they believed not sooner. (2.) 'If now, why not ever? Where will your faith be in an hour of temptation?' As far as there is inconstancy in our faith, there is cause to question the sincerity of it, and to ask, 'Do we indeed believe?'

2. A prediction of their fall; how confident soever they were now of their stability, in a little time they would all desert Him; which was fulfilled that very night, when, on his being seized, all his disciples forsook Him and fled, Matt. 26: 56. They were scattered, (1.) From one another; they provided every one for his own safety, without concern for each other. Troublous times are times of scattering to Christian societies; in the cloudy and dark day the flock of Christ is dispersed, Ezek. 34: 12. So Christ, as a society, is not visible. (2.) From Him; Ye shall leave Me alone. They should have been witnesses for Him upon his trial, should have ministered to Him in his sufferings; if they could have given Him no comfort, they might have done Him some credit; but they were ashamed of his chain, and afraid of sharing with Him in his sufferings. Note, Many a good cause, when distressed by enemies, is deserted by its friends. The disciples had continued with Christ in his other temptations, and yet turned their back upon Him now; those that are tried, do not always prove trusty. If at any time we find our friends unkind to us, let us remember that Christ's were so to Him.

They were scattered every man to his own; not to their own possessions or habitations, those were in Galilee; but to their own friends and acquaintance in Jerusalem; every one went where he fancied he should be most safe. Note, Those will not dare to suffer for religion, that seek their own things more than the things of Christ, and that look upon the things of this world as their own pro-

Him, Isa. 50: 7. When He complained of his Father's forsaking Him, He called Him My God, and presently after was so well assured of his favorable presence with Him as to commit his Spirit into his hand. This He had comforted Himself with all along; (ch. 8, 29.) He that sent Me, is with Me, the Father hath not left Me alone, and especially now at last. This assists our faith in the acceptableness of Christ's satisfaction: no doubt the Father was well pleased in Him, for He went with Him from first to last.

[2.] All believers, by virtue of their union with Chr st, when alone, are not alone, but the Father is with them. 1st. When solitude is their choice, as Isaac in the field, Nathaniel under the fig-tree, Peter upon the house-top, meditating and praying. They that converse with God in solitude, are never less alone than when alone. God and a good heart are good company. 2dly. When solitude is their affliction, their enemies lay them alone, and their friends leave them so; their company, like Job's, is made desolate; yet they are not so much alone as they are thought to be; the Father is with them, as He was with Joseph in his bonds, and with John in his banishment. In their greatest troubles they are as one whom his father pities, whom his mother comforts. While we have God's favorable presence with us, we are happy, and ought to be easy, though all the world forsake us. We do not render due honor to God, unless we deem Him alone all-sufficient. Calvin.

He comforts them with a promise of peace in Him, by virtue of his victory over the world, p. 33. Observe,

1. The end Christ aimed at in preaching this farewell sermon to his disciples, was, that in Him they might have peace. He did not hereby intend to give them a full view of the doctrine they were shortly to be made masters of by the spirit, but only to satisfy them for the present that his departure was for the best. Or, Christ had said all this, that by enjoying Him they might have the best enjoyment of themselves.

Note, (1.) It is Christ's will that his disciples have peace within, whatever be their troubles without. (2.) Peace in Christ is the only true peace, and in Him alone believers have it, for this man shall be the peace, Mic. 5: 5. Through Him we have peace with God, and in Him peace in our own minds. (3.) The word of Christ aims at this, that in Him we may have peace. Peace is the fruit of the lips, of his lips, Isa. 57: 19.

2. The entertainment they were likely to meet in the world; 'Never expect outward peace'; though sent to proclaim peace on earth, and good-will to men, they must expect trouble on earth, and ill-will from men. Note, Tribulation has been the lot of Christ's disciples in this world. Men persecute them because they are so good, and God corrects them because they are no better. Men design to cut them off from the earth, and God designs by affliction to make them meet for heaven; and thus they shall have tribulation.

3dly. He spake of it as a thing very near. The hour was already come, in a manner. Note, A little time may produce great changes, both concerning us and in us.

Yet I am not alone. He would not be thought to complain of their deserting Him, as if it were any real damage; for He should be sure of his Father's presence, which was every thing; The Father is with Me. We may consider this;

[1.] As a privilege peculiar to the Lord Jesus; the Father was with Him in his sufferings as He never was with any, for still He was in the bosom of the Father. The divine nature did not desert the human nature, but put invincible comfort and inestimable value into his sufferings. The Father had engaged to be with Him in his whole undertaking, (Ps. 89: 21, &c.) and to preserve Him; (Isa. 49: 3.) this emboldened

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 23—33. We are encouraged to come at all times, especially when depressed with sorrow, to God, in the Redeemer's name; that we may ask and receive, till our affliction be turned into 'the fulness of joy!' 'Darkness will become light before us'; those things, which seemed most obscure, will appear plain: we shall have increasing evidence, that the Father Himself loves us, as those who, taught and drawn by his preventing grace, love and believe in his Son. We shall perceive that He knows, and anticipates, our desires; delights to hear and answer our prayers; and that even our manifold infirmities and offences will not cause Him to cease from loving us, and communicating all needful blessings to us. But 'while we think we stand, let us take heed lest we fall'; we know not how we should act, if brought into temptation; we ought therefore to watch and pray without ceasing, that we may not be left to ourselves.—We must seek our peace and comfort in Christ; not in the world, which we must conflict with as an enemy, in whatever form it appears; an enemy which we must overcome, or we shall fatally be overcome by it: and we should expect tribulation as long as we continue here on earth. But, relying on our Savior, and looking constantly to Him, we may go forward with confidence; assured of being made more than conquerors, through the love and power of our omnipotent, faithful, unchangeable Friend.

SCOTT.

Vers 33.

I have overcome the world. 'By "the world," we must here understand the evil of the world, its wickedness, troubles, and temptations, all in it that we have reason to fear and avoid, for the sake of our safety, or our happiness in this life and the next. And these Christ overcame by expiating sin upon the cross, and enabling the faithful, by the assistance of his grace, to subdue their corrupt passions, by Himself submitting to poverty, sorrow, and even death itself, and by displaying those heavenly virtues which shine in his whole character and conversation.'

Abp. TILLOTSON.

'These last discourses are excellently adapted to the intent for which John wrote the whole Gospel: since they contain the most evident and illustrious proofs of the Divinity of Christ's person, and the excellence of his work, both which John meant to demonstrate from his words and deeds themselves. In the discourses our Lord has declared in many ways the exalted nature of his person; as when He says, "He that seeth Me, seeth the Father; what the Father hath, I have"; and when He says, "He went out from the bosom of the Father, came upon the earth, and is now returning to the Father, from whom He had departed; that his words are not his own, but the Father's; that He came, not only in order to teach, but to lay down his life for others; and that by Him alone is there an entrance to eternal life, &c. From all which John has established the fact he meant to prove, that Jesus is the true Messiah, the Son of God, and the Savior of the human race.'

TITTMAN.

CHAP. XVII.

Jesus prays the Father to glorify Him, that He may glorify the Father, and give eternal life, which is found in knowing the Father and the Son, to His disciples, 1-5; to preserve the spiritual unity of faith and love, after His ascension, 6-12; and from the world and all evil, 13-16; and to sanctify them by the truth, 17-19. He intercedes for them, and all who should believe in Him through their word; that they might be united in love and love, to the most intimate communion with the Father and the Son, and be brought to share His glory in heaven, 20-26.

THESE words spake Jesus, and lifted up his eyes to heaven, and said, Father, the hour is come: glorify thy Son, that thy Son also may glorify thee:

a. 1141. Ps. 121:1, 2. 123:1. Is. 38: 14. Luke 18:13.
b. 730. 8:20. 12:23, 27, 28. 13:1. 16: 7. Mark 14:2. Luke 22:53.
c. 4, 5. 7:39. 11:4. 13:31, 32. Acts 3: 13. Pet. 2:9-11. 1 Pet. 1:21.

3. It was a family-prayer. Christ's disciples were his family, and, to set a good example before masters of families, He not only, as a son of Abraham, taught his household, (Gen. 18: 19.) but, as a son of David, blessed his household, 2 Sam. 6: 20.

4. It was a parting prayer; when parting with our friends, it is good to part with prayer, Acts 20: 36. Christ's parting, by death, should be sanctified and sweetened by prayer. Dying Jacob blessed the twelve patriarchs, Moses, when dying, the twelve tribes, and here, the dying Jesus the twelve apostles.

5. The prayer was a preface to his sacrifice, now about to be offered on earth, specifying the favors and blessings designed to be purchased by the merit of his death, for those that were his. Christ prayed then as a priest now offering sacrifice, in virtue of which all prayers were to be made.

6. It was a specimen of his intercession, within the veil. Not that in his exalted state He addresses Himself to his Father by way of humble petition, as when on earth. His intercession in heaven is a presenting of his merit to his Father, for the benefit of all his chosen ones.

He lifted up his eyes to heaven, as ch. 11: 41. not that Christ needed thus to engage his own attention, but He was pleased thus to sanctify this gesture to those that use it, and justify it against those that ridicule it. It is significant of the lifting up of the soul to God in prayer, Ps. 25: 1. Up with your hearts, was, anciently, a call to prayer, up to heaven; thither we must direct our desires.

Christ prays to God as a Father. All that have the Spirit of adoption, are taught to cry, Abba, Father, Rom. 8: 15. Gal. 4: 6. And it is our duty, for we have liberty of access to God, ground of confidence in Him, and great expectations from Him. Christ calls Him holy Father, (v. 11.) and righteous Father, v. 25. It will be of great use in prayer, both for direction and encouragement, to call God what we hope to find Him.

He prayed for Himself first; though Christ, as God, was prayed to, Christ, as man, prayed; thus it became Him to fulfil all righteousness. It was said to Him, as it is to us, Ask, and I will give thee, Ps. 2: 8. What He had purchased He must ask for; and shall we expect to have what we never merited, but have a thousand times forfeited, unless we pray for it? This honors prayer; it was Christ's messenger, the way in which even He corresponded with Heaven. It likewise gives great encouragement to praying people, and cause to hope that even the prayer of the destitute shall not be despised; time was, when our Advocate had a cause of his own to solicit, on the success of which depended his honor as Mediator; and this He was to solicit in the method prescribed to us, prayer and supplication, (Heb. 5: 7.) so that He knows the heart of a petitioner, Ex. 23: 9.

Christ began with prayer for Himself, and afterward prayed for his disciples; this charity must begin at home, though it must not end there. We must love and pray for our neighbor as ourselves, and therefore in a right manner love and pray for ourselves first.

His prayer for Himself was much shorter than that for his disciples. Our prayers for the church must not be crowded into a corner; in making supplication for all saints, we have room to enlarge, and should not straiten ourselves.

The two petitions of Christ for Himself, are one—that He might be glorified. But the petition is twice made, because it has a double reference; 1. To the prosecution of his undertaking; Glorify Me, that I may glorify Thee, in what is agreed to be yet done, v. 1-3. And, 2. To the performance of his undertaking hitherto; Glorify Me, for I have glorified Thee.

NOTES.

CHAP. XVII. v. 1-3. 'Christ, the eternal High Priest, being about to offer Himself, by solemn prayers consecrates Himself as the sacrifice, and us with Him, to God the Father. This prayer, therefore, after He had been the foundation of the church of God from the creation of the world, is now, and will be, to the consummation of all things.' Beza. (3.) The only true God. 'These words cannot be reasonably supposed to exclude Him from a true divinity, who is in Scripture styled the true God. (1 John 5: 20) He is styled the only true God, in exclusion of those whom the false persuasion of the Gentiles had introduced.' Whitby put into our possession; all is yours, even the world. Christ having overcome the world, believers are to pursue the victory, and divide the spoil. This is by faith, 1 John 5: 4. We are more than conquerors through Him that loved us.

SCOTT.

CHAP. XVII. v. 1-5. Many a solemn prayer Christ made in the days of his flesh; (sometimes He continued all night in prayer;) but no one is recorded so fully as this.

When He had spoken these words, the foregoing farewell to his disciples, He prayed this prayer in their hearing.

1. It was a prayer after sermon; when He had spoken from God to them, He addressed God for them. Note, We must pray for those we preach to. He that was to prophesy upon the dry bones, was also to pray, Come, O breathe, and breathe upon them. And the word preached should be prayed over, for God gives the increase.

2. It was a prayer after sacrament; after Christ and his disciples had eaten the passover and Lord's supper together, and He had given them a suitable exhortation, He closed the solemnity with prayer; that God would preserve the good impressions of the ordinance upon them.

Christ's disciples were his family, and, to set a good example before masters of families, He not only, as a son of Abraham, taught his household, (Gen. 18: 19.) but, as a son of David, blessed his household, 2 Sam. 6: 20.

4. It was a parting prayer; when parting with our friends, it is good to part with prayer, Acts 20: 36. Christ's parting, by death, should be sanctified and sweetened by prayer. Dying Jacob blessed the twelve patriarchs, Moses, when dying, the twelve tribes, and here, the dying Jesus the twelve apostles.

5. The prayer was a preface to his sacrifice, now about to be offered on earth, specifying the favors and blessings designed to be purchased by the merit of his death, for those that were his. Christ prayed then as a priest now offering sacrifice, in virtue of which all prayers were to be made.

6. It was a specimen of his intercession, within the veil. Not that in his exalted state He addresses Himself to his Father by way of humble petition, as when on earth. His intercession in heaven is a presenting of his merit to his Father, for the benefit of all his chosen ones.

He lifted up his eyes to heaven, as ch. 11: 41. not that Christ needed thus to engage his own attention, but He was pleased thus to sanctify this gesture to those that use it, and justify it against those that ridicule it. It is significant of the lifting up of the soul to God in prayer, Ps. 25: 1. Up with your hearts, was, anciently, a call to prayer, up to heaven; thither we must direct our desires.

Christ prays to God as a Father. All that have the Spirit of adoption, are taught to cry, Abba, Father, Rom. 8: 15. Gal. 4: 6. And it is our duty, for we have liberty of access to God, ground of confidence in Him, and great expectations from Him. Christ calls Him holy Father, (v. 11.) and righteous Father, v. 25. It will be of great use in prayer, both for direction and encouragement, to call God what we hope to find Him.

He prayed for Himself first; though Christ, as God, was prayed to, Christ, as man, prayed; thus it became Him to fulfil all righteousness. It was said to Him, as it is to us, Ask, and I will give thee, Ps. 2: 8. What He had purchased He must ask for; and shall we expect to have what we never merited, but have a thousand times forfeited, unless we pray for it? This honors prayer; it was Christ's messenger, the way in which even He corresponded with Heaven. It likewise gives great encouragement to praying people, and cause to hope that even the prayer of the destitute shall not be despised; time was, when our Advocate had a cause of his own to solicit, on the success of which depended his honor as Mediator; and this He was to solicit in the method prescribed to us, prayer and supplication, (Heb. 5: 7.) so that He knows the heart of a petitioner, Ex. 23: 9.

Christ began with prayer for Himself, and afterward prayed for his disciples; this charity must begin at home, though it must not end there. We must love and pray for our neighbor as ourselves, and therefore in a right manner love and pray for ourselves first.

His prayer for Himself was much shorter than that for his disciples. Our prayers for the church must not be crowded into a corner; in making supplication for all saints, we have room to enlarge, and should not straiten ourselves.

The two petitions of Christ for Himself, are one—that He might be glorified. But the petition is twice made, because it has a double reference; 1. To the prosecution of his undertaking; Glorify Me, that I may glorify Thee, in what is agreed to be yet done, v. 1-3. And, 2. To the performance of his undertaking hitherto; Glorify Me, for I have glorified Thee.

I have done my part; now, Lord, do thine; v. 4: 5.

Glorify thy Son according to thy promise that thy Son may glorify Thee according to his undertaking, v. 1. 'The hour is come when all the powers of darkness will combine to vilify thy Son; now, Father, glorify Him on earth; which was done, 1. Even in his sufferings, by the signs and wonders which attended them. When they that came to take Him, were thunder-struck with a word, when Judas confessed Him innocent, and sealed that confession with his own guilty blood, when the judge's wife asleep, and the judge himself awake, pronounced Him righteous, when the sun was darkened, and the veil of the temple rent, then the Father not only justified, but glorified the Son. 2. Even by his sufferings; when He was crucified, He was magnified, and glorified, ch. 13: 31. It was in his cross that He conquered Satan and death; his thorns were a crown, and Pilate in the inscription wrote more than he thought. But, 3. Much more after his sufferings; the Father glorified the Son when He raised Him from the dead, showed Him openly to chosen witnesses, and poured out the Spirit to support his cause, and set up his kingdom.

He pleads, to enforce this request,

1. Relation; Glorify thy Son; thy Son as Mediator. In consideration of this, the heathen are given Him for his inheritance; for Thou art my Son, Ps. 2: 7, 8. The devil had tempted Him to renounce his sonship with an offer of the kingdoms of this world; but He rejected it with disdain, and depended on his Father for preferment, and here applies for it. Note, They that have received the adoption of sons, may in faith pray for the inheritance of sons; if sanctified, then glorified; Father, glorify thy Son.

2. He pleads the time; The hour is come: the season fixed to an hour. The hour of Christ's passion was determined in the counsel of God. He had often said his hour was not yet come; but now it was, and He knew it. Man knows not his time, (Ec. 9: 12.) but the Son of man did. He calls it this hour, (ch. 12: 27.) and here the hour; compare Mark 14: 35. ch. 16: 21. For, the hour of the Redeemer's death, which was also the hour of his birth, was the most remarkable hour, and, without doubt, the most critical that ever was. Never did any hour challenge such expectations of it before, nor such reflections upon it after.

'The hour is come, in the midst of which I need to be owned.' Now is the crisis; the decisive battle between heaven and hell; that great cause, in which God's honor and man's happiness are embarked, must now be won or lost forever. 'Now glorify thy Son, give Him victory over principalities and powers, let the bruising of his heel be the breaking of the serpent's head, let thy Son be upheld, and not fail or be discouraged.' When Joshua went forth conquering and to conquer, it is said, The Lord magnified Joshua; so He glorified his Son, when He made the cross his triumphant chariot.

'The hour is come, in the close of which I expect to be crowned; when I am to be glorified, and set at thy right hand.' Between Him and that glory there intervened a bloody scene of suffering; but, being short, He made little of it; He did not expect glory till the hour was come. Christians in a trying hour, particularly a dying hour, may thus plead; 'Appear for me, now the earthly tabernacle is to be dissolved, the hour is come, that I should be glorified;' 2 Cor. 5: 1.

3. He pleads the Father's own concern therein—that thy Son may glorify Thee; for He had consecrated his whole undertaking to his Father's honor; He desired to be carried triumph-

(3.) 'Some have abused this passage to impugn the divinity of Christ. But in the words immediately preceding, Jesus asserts that to Him is delivered, by the Father, dominion over the human race, so that He has the power of bestowing eternal life. And a little after, He claims the glory He had before the creation of the world.' (A Hebrew phraseology, for eternity.) Now, could Jesus have asserted all this of Himself, and at the same time have been nothing more than a mere man? If He has, (and we see He has here expressly,) how could He, with any regard to truth, decline the divinity of Son of God, equal to the Father, and God Himself? But in this passage He testifies, that whosoever would attain eternal life, should know the true God

2 As ^d thou hast given him power over all flesh, that he should give eternal life to as many as thou hast given him:

3 And ^e this is life eternal; that they might know thee ^b the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent.

4. He pleads his commission; Gloryify thy Son, as Thou hast given Him power; in the execution of the powers Thou hast given Him; or, that thy Son may gloryify Thee according to the power given Him. Observe

The origin of the Mediator's power; Thou hast given Him power. Man must, in order to his recovery, be taken under a new model of government, erected by a special commission of heaven, constituting Christ sole Arbitrator of the grand difference that was, and sole Guarantee of the grand alliance that was to be between God and man; so He received his official power; which was to be executed in a way distinct from his power and government as Creator. Note, The church's king is no usurper, as the prince of this world is.

He has power over all flesh. (1.) Over all mankind. The powers of the upper and unseen world of spirits, are subject to Him: (1 Pet. 3: 22,) but, mediating between God and man, He here pleads his power over all flesh. They were men whom He was to subdue and save, and therefore that rank of beings was put under his feet.

(2.) Over mankind, corrupt and fallen, called flesh, Gen. 6: 3. If he had not in this sense been flesh, he had not needed a Redeemer. All power over, and all judgment concerning, this sinful race is committed to Christ; power to bind or loose, acquit or condemn; to forgive sins, or not. Christ, as Mediator, has the government of the whole world put into his hand, is King of nations, has power even over those that know Him not, nor obey his Gospel; whom He does not rule, He overrules, Ps. 22: 23. 72: 8. Matt. 28: 18. ch. 3: 35.

The grand design of this power; that He should give eternal life to as many as Thou hast given Him. Here is the mystery of our salvation laid open.

(1.) The Father makes over the elect to the Redeemer, as his charge and trust, the crown and recompense of his undertaking. He has a sovereign power over all the race, but a peculiar interest in the chosen remnant: all things were put under his feet, but they were delivered into his hand.

(2.) The Son undertakes to secure the happiness of those that were given Him; to give eternal life to them. How great the authority of the Redeemer! He has lives and crowns to give, eternal lives, immortal crowns that never andly through his sufferings to his glory, that He might gloryify the Father. (1.) By the death of the cross. The great intention of his sufferings was, to retrieve his Father's injured honor among men, and, by his satisfaction, to come up to the glory of God, which man, by his sin, came short of; 'Father, own Me in my sufferings, that I may honor Thee by them.' (2.) By the doctrine of the cross, now shortly to be published to the world. He prays that his Father would so grace his sufferings, as not only to take off the offence of the cross, but to make it to them that are saved, the wisdom of God, and the power of God. If God had not glorified Christ, by raising Him from the dead, his undertaking had been crushed.

Hereby He hath taught us, [1.] In our prayers, designs, and desires, to aim at the honor of God. It being our chief end to gloryify God, other things must be sought in subserenity to it. 'Do this for thy servant, that thy servant may gloryify Thee. Give me health, that I may gloryify Thee with my body; success, that I may gloryify Thee with my estate.' Hallowed be thy name, must be our first petition, and must fix our end in all other petitions, 1 Pet. 4: 11. [2.] He hath taught us what to expect. If we sincerely set ourselves to gloryify our Father, He will enable us to gloryify Him; give us grace sufficient, and opportunity. But more than Him, it is just with Him to leave us to our own counsels, and then, instead of honoring, we shall shame ourselves.

He pleads his commission; Gloryify thy Son, as Thou hast given Him power; in the execution of the powers Thou hast given Him; or, that thy Son may gloryify Thee according to the power given Him. Observe

The origin of the Mediator's power; Thou hast given Him power. Man must, in order to his recovery, be taken under a new model of government, erected by a special commission of heaven, constituting Christ sole Arbitrator of the grand difference that was, and sole Guarantee of the grand alliance that was to be between God and man; so He received his official power; which was to be executed in a way distinct from his power and government as Creator. Matt. 28: 18. ch. 3: 35.

The grand design of this power; that He should give eternal life to as many as Thou hast given Him. Here is the mystery of our salvation laid open.

(1.) The Father makes over the elect to the Redeemer, as his charge and trust, the crown and recompense of his undertaking. He has a sovereign power over all the race, but a peculiar interest in the chosen remnant: all things were put under his feet, but they were delivered into his hand.

(2.) The Son undertakes to secure the happiness of those that were given Him; to give eternal life to them. How great the authority of the Redeemer! He has lives and crowns to give, eternal lives, immortal crowns that never fade. How gracious He is, in giving eternal life to those whom He undertakes to save. 1st. He sanctifies them in this world, gives them the spiritual life, which is eternal life in the bud ch. 4: 14. Grace in the soul, is heaven in the soul. 2dly. He will gloryify them in the other world; their happiness shall be completed in the vision and fruition of God. This only is mentioned, because it supposes all the other parts of his undertaking, teaching them, satisfying them, sanctifying them, and preparing them for that eternal life; and indeed, all the other were in order to this; we are called to his kingdom and glory, and begotten to the inheritance; what is last in execution was first in intention, and that is eternal life.

(3.) The subserenity of the Redeemer's universal dominion to this, v. 2. Note, Christ's dominion over the children of men, is in order to the salvation of the children of God. All things are for their sakes, 2 Cor. 4: 15. All Christ's laws, ordinances, and promises, which are given to all, are designed effectually to convey spiritual life, and secure eternal life, to all that were given to Christ; He is Head over all things to the church. The kingdoms of Providence and grace are put into the same hand, that all things may concur for good to the called.

Here is a further explication of this grand design; (v. 3.) 'This is life eternal, which I am empowered to give; this is the nature of it, this the way leading to it, to know Thee the only true God, and all the discoveries of natural religion, and Jesus Christ whom Thou hast sent, as Mediator, and the doctrines and laws of that holy religion, which He instituted for the recovery of man.'

The great end which the Christian religion sets before us, is eternal life, the happiness of an immortal soul in the vision and fruition of God. This, He was to reveal to all, and secure to all, that were given Him. By the Gospel, life and immortality are brought to light, to hand, a life transcending this as much in excellency as in duration.

The sure way of attaining this end is, by the right knowledge of God and Christ; This is life eternal, to know Thee; which may be taken two ways. 1st. Life eternal lies in the knowledge of God and Christ; the present principle of this life is the believing knowledge of God and Christ; the future perfection of that life will be the intuitive knowledge of God and Christ: they that are brought into union with Christ, and live a life of communion with God in Christ, know, in some measure, by experience, what eternal life is, and will say, 'If this be heaven, heaven is sweet.' See Ps. 17: 15. 2dly. The way in which Christ gives eternal life, is by the knowledge of Him that has called us; (2 Pet. 1: 3.) and this is the way in which we receive it.

The Christian religion shows the way to heaven, and Jesus Christ. Now the Greek translated know, as is well known and universally admitted, must here, (as in many other passages of Scripture,) denote not only to know, but to worship. But this worship can be suitable only to the true God: yet Christ expressly refers it not only to the Father, but to Himself. He neither discriminates, nor could mean to discriminate, Himself and the Father, or the worship due to each; but claims equal worship for both; as He had plainly done at 5: 23. Now if He has made, and commanded Himself to be accounted, equal to the Father, how could He, in one and the same place, say that He is inferior to the Father? Jesus revealed the true God, not such as He is in general, but such as He is unto men, not in respect of his nature, and divine essence, but his decrees and counsels; for in respect to nature, God cannot be known; (1 Tim. 6: 16.) not in reference to his attributes and works of power, but works of grace, exhibited by Christ: with the former knowledge, men were well acquainted; that the Jews had, and the Gentiles could attain unto; (Rom. 1: 19, 20,) but the latter (as we are told by Paul, 1 Cor. 2: 7.) was hidden, and no one ever possessed it, learnt it from others, or could form any conception of it. And this knowledge concerning God, our Lord has called the name of the Father, (v. 6, 11, 12, 26.) and his words: (v. 8.) finally, truth, v. 17, 19. Such then has Jesus revealed Himself by words and deeds, namely, as the Son of God, who was in heaven, and came from heaven in order to procure for, and confer salvation upon men. This, then, is the true God, and the true Christ; this, is the true knowledge of God and Christ, and as such, do God and Jesus claim to be worshipped, namely, as God who sent, as the Son who was sent by the Father for man's salvation. Any other knowledge of God is but of the right sort, nor sufficient for one who professes the name of Christ, and aspires to the salvation obtained by Him. He, indeed, who acknowledges God as the supreme Deity, and the Creator and Governor of all things, and expects salvation from Him as such, acknowledges God not aright, not after the manner in which his Son has manifested Him, and has taught and commanded that He should be acknowledged and worshipped. He who recognizes in Jesus merely a holy man, of extraordinary endowments, intellectual and moral, a teacher of religion, does not acknowledge Him aright, that is, not after the manner in which Jesus has manifested Himself, and commanded Himself to be worshipped. We know or worship God then truly and aright, only when we acknowledge Him such as He hath revealed Himself by his Son Jesus Christ; and we know Jesus truly and aright, only when we acknowledge Him such as He hath professed Himself, and such as his Father hath demonstrated Him. To 'know the only true God,' is to acknowledge, that the true God, out of his ineffable love to the human race, decreed from eternity to save it by his own Son, and to that end sent Him on the earth, and committed the whole work of salvation into his hands; and that he is to acknowledge Him with effect, as not only, in return for this love, to worship God with our whole heart and mind, but also seek our salvation from this love of God by his Son. To know Christ, is to know Him as a Savior, the sole Giver of salvation, and to worship Him as such.

That Christ here speaks of the only true God, in distinction from idols, and not to the exclusion of Himself, appears from his speaking of Himself, as the object of the same fiducial knowledge with the Father, and from his distinguishing Himself from the Father, not by any essential title, but merely by his office-character, viz: Jesus Christ, whom Thou hast sent. And the same apostle, who recorded this prayer, expressly says of Christ, This is the true God, and eternal life, in opposition to idols. 1 John 5: 20, 21.

4. I have glorified thee on the earth: I have finished the work which thou gavest me to do.

5. And now, O Father, glorify thou me with thine own self, with the glory which I had with thee before the world was.

would have been life eternal to him; but now he is fallen, to know God is to know Him as a righteous Judge; we are therefore concerned to know Christ as our Redeemer, by whom alone we can now have access to God; it is life eternal to believe in Christ; and this He gives to as many as were given Him. See ch. 6: 39, 40. Those who are acquainted with God and Christ, are already in the suburbs of life eternal.

Christ prays to be glorified, in consideration of having glorified the Father hitherto, v. 4, 5. The former petition was, Glorify Me in this world; the latter is, Glorify Me in the other world. I have glorified Thee on the earth, and now glorify Thou Me.

With what contrition Christ reflects on the life He had lived on earth; v. 4. He does not complain of poverty and disgrace, what a weary life He had, as ever any man of sorrows had; He overlooks this, in reviewing the service He had done his Father, and the progress made in his undertaking. This is here recorded.

1. For the honor of Christ, that his life in all respects answered the end of his coming. Note, (1.) Our Lord had work given Him to do by Him that sent Him, and assisted Him; He came not into the world to live at ease, but to go about doing good unto to fulfil all righteousness. (2.) Though He had not, as yet, gone through the last part of his undertaking, yet He was so near being made perfect through sufferings, that He might say, I have finished it. The word signifies his performing every part of his undertaking in the most perfect manner. (3.) He glorified his Father, in that his work is perfect, and the same is the glory of the Redeemer; the Son to glorify the Father, by abasing Himself, was strange; yet it was contrived that so He should glorify Him; I have glorified Thee on the earth, in such a way as men on earth could bear the manifestation of thy glory.

2. It is recorded that we all may follow his example. (1.) We must make it our business to do the work God has appointed us to do, according to our capacity and sphere of activity; we must each do all the good we can. (2.) We must aim at the glory of God in all. We must glorify Him on the earth, which He has given unto the children of men; demanding only this rent; on the earth, where we are, in a state of probation for eternity. (3.) We must persevere herein to the end of our days; we must not sit down till we have finished our work, and accomplished, as a hireling, our day.

3. It is recorded for encouragement to all that rest upon Him. And He that finished his work for us, as a complete Savior, will finish it in us to the day of Christ.

See with what confidence He expects the joy set before Him; (v. 5.) Now, O Father, glorify Thou Me. He depends upon it, and cannot be denied.

Glorify Thou Me, as before, v. 1. All repetitions in prayer are not vain repetitions; Christ prayed, saying the same words, (Matt. 26: 44.) and yet prayed more earnestly. What his Father had promised Him, and He was assured of, He must pray for; promises are not designed to supersede prayers, but to be the guide of our desire, and the ground of our hopes. Christ's being glorified, includes all the honors, powers, and joys of his exalted state.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-5. Fervent prayer forms the proper conclusion of religious instructions, and the preparation for approaching trials: and our hearts should habitually be lifted up to God, that He would glorify Himself in and by us; prosper our endeavors to honor Him; support us in resisting temptations; and carry us through all difficulties to his heavenly kingdom. (2 The. 1: 5-12, v. 10-12. P. O.) But our supplications must be presented through our great High Priest, who 'hath power over all flesh;' and gives eternal life to his chosen people, and will consign unbelievers to everlasting punishment. For, however men may deny or overlook it, 'eternal life' cannot be obtained by any of our race, except through 'the knowledge of God,' revealed in Jesus, and through his meritorious obedience

Veres 4, 5.

To suppose with the Socinians, as some who were far remote from Socinianism, or from being disposed to derogate from the Savior's glory, have done, that nothing more is meant, than God's decree of glorifying the man Christ Jesus, not only enervates the language, but induces obscenity and impropriety; and sanctions a method of explaining away the Scriptures, of pernicious tendency: for thus the elect may be spoken of in similar language, as indeed some have ventured

1. By directing us to God, as the Author and felicity of our being; for Christ died to bring us to God, to love, obey, and trust in Him, as our Owner, Ruler, and Benefactor, to devote ourselves to Him as our sovereign Lord, depend on Him as our chief God, and direct all to his praise as our highest End; this is life eternal. God is here called the only true God, to distinguish Him from the gods of the heathen, which were counterfeiters and pretenders, not from the Son, of whom it is said, He is the true God and eternal life, (1 John 5: 20.) and who in this text is proposed as the object of the same religious regard with the Father. It is certain there is but one only living and true God, and the God we adore is He. He is the true God, not a mere name or notion; the only true God; and his service is the only true religion.

2. By directing us to Christ, as the Mediator between God and man. If man had continued innocent, the knowledge of the only true God

It is a glory with God; not only, Glorify my name on earth, but Glorify Me with thine own Self. It was heaven, to be with his Father; Prov. 8: 30. Dan. 7: 13. Heb. 8: 1. Note, Christ's brightest glories were to be displayed within the veil, where the Father manifests his glory. The praises of the upper world are offered to Him that sits upon the throne, and to the Lamb in conjunction; (Rev. 5: 13.) and the prayers of the lower world draw out grace and peace from God our Father, and our Lord Jesus Christ in conjunction; thus the Father has glorified Him with Himself.

It is the glory He had with God before the world was. By this it appears, (1.) That Christ, as God, had a being before the world was, co-eternal with the Father; our religion acquaints us with one that was before all things, and by whom all things consist. (2.) His glory with the Father is from everlasting, as well as his existence with the Father; for He was from eternity the brightness of his Father's glory, Heb. 1: 3. As God's making the world only declared his glory, but made no real additions to it; so Christ undertook the work of redemption, not because He needed glory, for He had a glory with the Father before the world, but because we needed glory. (3.) Christ in his state of humiliation divested Himself of this glory, and drew a veil over it: though He was still God, yet He was God manifest in the flesh. (4.) In his exalted state He resumed this glory, and clad Himself again with his robes of light. Having performed his undertaking, He did, as it were, redeem a pledge, by this demand, Glorify Thou Me. He prays that even his human nature might be advanced to the highest honor it was capable of, his body a glorious body; and that the glory of the God-head might be manifested in the person of the Mediator, Emmanuel, God-man. He had despised the kingdoms of this world and the glory of them, when Satan offered them to Him, and therefore might the more boldly claim the glories of the other world. Let the same mind be in us. 'Lord, give the glories of this world to whom Thou wilt, but let me have my portion of glory in the world to come.'

1. It was equitable, and admirably becoming, that if God were glorified in Him, He should glorify Him in Himself, ch. 13: 32. Such infinite value was there in what Christ did to glorify his Father, that He merited all the glories of his exalted state.

2. It was according to the covenant between them, that if the Son would make his soul an offering for sin, He should divide the spoil with the strong, (Isa. 53: 10, 12.) and the kingdom should be his: it was for the joy set before Him, that He endured the cross: and now, in his exalted state, He still expects the completing of his exaltation, Heb. 10: 13.

3. It was the most proper evidence of his Father's approving the work He had finished. By the glorifying of Christ we are satisfied that God was satisfied, and well pleased in Him.

and death; in which 'He glorified the Father on earth,' and 'finished the work which was given Him to do.'—By leaving 'the glory which He had with the Father before the world was,' by his ascension to heaven to be reinstated in his glory, and by the doctrine which He committed to his apostles, He has manifested God to man (6); and believers 'behold that glory as in a glass, till they are changed into the same image from glory to glory, by the Spirit of the Lord.'—This knowledge, however, widely differs from those notions, which pass off for it is humbling, and sanctifying; the source of all spiritual worship and obedience; the hope, evidence, and earnest of eternal life, and the meetness for Heaven.

to speak of their eternal justification. (Note, Rom. 8: 28-31, v. 30.)—Bring my human nature into a participation of the glory, which I, the Logos, had with Thee before the beginning of the world.' These phylact.

(5.) The glory which I had with Thee before the world was. To suppose that this refers only to that glory which he had in his decrees, seems to sink and contract it as a mere shadow of the genuine purpose.

SCOTT.

6 ¶ I have manifested thy name unto the men which thou gavest me out of the world: ^athine they were, and thou gavest them me; ^band they have kept thy word.

7 Now ^cthey have known that all things, whatsoever thou hast given me, ^dare of thee:

8 For ^eI have given unto them the words which thou gavest me; and they have ^freceived them, ^gand have known surely that I came out from thee, and they have believed that thou didst send me.

4. Thus we must be taught that those only who glorify God on earth, and persevere in the work God hath given them to do, shall be glorified with the Father. Not that we can merit that glory, as Christ did, but our glorifying God is required as an evidence of our interest in Christ, through whom eternal life is God's free gift.

V. 6—10. I pray not for the world. Note, There is a world of people that Jesus Christ did not pray for. It is not meant of the world in general, (He prays for that here, (v. 21.) That the world may believe that Thou hast sent Me), nor is it meant of the Gentiles, in distinction from the Jews; but the world is opposed to the elect. Take the world for a heap of unwinnowed corn; God loves it, Christ prays and dies for it, for a blessing is in it; but the Lord perfectly knows them that are his, and extracts them; the world is the remaining heap of chaff; Christ neither prays nor dies for it, but the wind drives it away. These are called the world, because they are governed by the spirit of this world; for these, Christ does not pray; there are some things which He intercedes for with God, on their behalf, as the dresser for the barren tree; but they have no part or lot in the blessings here prayed for. He does not say, I pray against the world, as Elias against Israel; but, I leave them to themselves; they are not in the Lamb's book of life, and therefore not in the breast-plate of the High Priest. Miserable is the condition of such, as of those whom the prophet was forbidden to pray for, Jer. 7: 16. We that know not who are chosen, and who passed by, must pray for all men, 1 Tim. 2: 1, 4. While there is life, there is hope. See 1 Sam. 12: 23.

He prays for those that were given Him, meaning primarily the disciples; but it extends to all who receive and believe the words of Christ, v. 6, 8. He prays for all that should believe on Him; (v. 20.) and not only the petitions that follow, but those also which went before, to all believers; for He calls things that are, must be construed to extend to them as well as though they were.

Thine they were, and Thou gavest them Me; (v. 6.) and again (v. 9.) Them which Thou hast given Me. ^aFather, those I am now praying for, are such as Thou hast intrusted Me with, and what I have to say for them is in pursuance of the charge I have received concerning them.

This is meant primarily of the disciples who were given to Christ as pupils, to be educated; and as his agents, when He went to heaven, to publish his Gospel, and plant his church. When they left all to follow Him, this was the secret spring, they were given to Him, else they had not given themselves to Him. Note, The apostleship and ministry, which are Christ's gift to the church, were first the Father's gift to Christ. As, under the law, the Levites were given to Aaron, (Num. 3: 9.) to the great High Priest of our profession the Father gave the apostles first, and ministers in every age. See Eph. 4: 8, 11. Ps. 68: 18. Christ received this gift for men, that He might give it to men. This puts great honor upon the ministry of the Gospel, and magnifies that office, so much vilified; and it lays a mighty obligation upon ministers.

But the elect are elsewhere said to be given to Christ; (ch. 6: 37, 39.) and He often laid stress upon this, that those He was to save were given Him as his charge; to his care they were committed, from his hand they were expected, and concerning them He received commandments.

Thine they were. Three ways: 1st. Their being was derived from Him. When given to Christ to be vessels of honor, they were in his hand, as clay in the hand of the potter, to be disposed of as God's wisdom saw most for God's glory. 2dly. They were criminals, and their being was forfeited to Him. They must have been made sacrifices to justice, when chosen to be monuments of mercy; might justly have been delivered to the tormentors, when delivered to the Savior. 3dly. They were chosen, and their lives and being were reserved for Him; set apart for God. This He insists upon again, (v. 7.) All things whatsoever Thou hast given Me, are of Thee; which, though it may take in all that appertained to his office as Mediator, seems especially to be meant of those that were given Him; 'They are of Thee, their name, their well-being is of Thee; and therefore, I bring them all to Thee, that they may be for Thee.'

Thou gavest them Me, as sheep to the shepherd, patients to the physician, children to a tutor; thus He will deliver up his charge; (Heb. 2: 13.) The children Thou hast given Me. They were delivered to Christ, 1st. That not one of the little ones might perish, and that the purpose of God according to election might stand. 2dly. That the undertaking of Christ might not be fruitless; that He should see of the travail of his soul and be satisfied, (Isa. 53: 10, 11.) and might not spend his strength, and shed his blood, for nought, (Isa. 49: 4.) We may plead, 'Lord, keep my graces, keep my comforts, for mine they were, and Thou gavest them Me.'

I have manifested thy name to them. I have given unto them the words which Thou gavest Me, v. 8.

The great design of Christ's doctrine was, to manifest God's name, (ch. 1: 18.) to instruct the ignorant, and rectify mistakes concerning God. See

His faithful discharge of this undertaking: 1. He loved it. The truth of his doctrine agreed with the instructions He received from his Father. He gave not only the things, but the very words that were given Him. Ministers, in wording their message, must have an eye to the words which the Holy Ghost teaches. The tendency of his doctrine was, to manifest God's name. He did not seek Himself, but aimed to magnify his Father. Note, 1st. It is Christ's prerogative, to manifest God's name to the souls of men. No man knows the Father, but He to whom the Son will reveal Him, Matt. 11: 27. He only has acquaintance with the Father, and is able to open the truth; and He only has access to the spirits of men, and is able to open the understanding. Ministers may publish the name of the Lord, but Christ only can manifest that name. By the Word of Christ, God is revealed to us; by the Spirit of Christ, God is revealed in us. Ministers may speak the words of God to us, but Christ can give us his words, as food, as treasure. 2dly. Sooner or later, Christ will manifest God's name to all that were given Him, and will give them his Word, to be the support of their spiritual life, and the earnest of their bliss.

The good effect of his care and pains; v. 6, 7, 8.

'They have received the words I gave them, as the ground the seed, and the earth the rain.' The Word was to them an ingrafted Word.

'They have kept thy Word, have continued in it; have conformed to it.' Christ's commandment is kept, only when it is obeyed. They that were to teach others the commands of Christ, ought to be themselves observant of them. It was requisite that they should keep what was committed to them, for it was to be transmitted by them to every place for every age.

'They have understood the Word.' They have been aware that Thou art the original Author of this holy religion: that all things whatsoever Thou hast given Me are of Thee. Christ's offices and powers, the gifts of the Spirit, without measure, were from God; designed for his own glory in man's salvation. Note, It is a great satisfaction, in our reliance on Christ, that all He is and has, all He said and did, all He is doing and will do, are of God, 1 Cor. 1: 30. If the righteousness be of God's appointing, we shall be justified; if the grace be of his dispensing, we shall be sanctified.

To believe is, to know surely. The disciples were defective in knowledge; yet Christ, who knew them better than they knew themselves, passes his word for them that they did believe, v. 8. Note, We may know that surely, which we do not know fully; the certainty of the things which are not seen, though we cannot particularly describe them. We walk by faith, which knows surely, not yet by sight, which knows clearly.

We are to believe, that Jesus Christ came down from God; that He is the Ambassador of the eternal King; so that the Christian religion is of equal authority with natural religion; therefore the doctrines of Christ are to be received as divine truths, his commands as laws, and his promises as divine securities.

Christ speaks of this here, 1. As pleased with it. Though his disciples' dullness and weakness had grieved Him; their adherence to Him, their gradual improvement, and their great attainments at last, were his joy. Christ delights in the proficiency of his scholars. He accepts the sincerity of their faith, and graciously passes by its infirmity. He is willing to make the best of us; thereby encouraging our faith, and teaching us charity.

2. He pleads it with his Father, that they had given themselves to Him. Note, The improvement of grace, is a good plea for further grace: To him that hath shall be given. 'Them that keep Christ's Word, and believe on Him, Christ will commend, and recommend to his Father.'

He pleads the Father's own interest in them; (v. 9.) I pray for them, for they are thine; He and the Father have a joint and mutual interest in what pertained to each; All mine are thine

9 I ^apray for them: I pray not for the world, ^abut for them which thou hast given me; for they are thine.

10 And ^aall mine are thine, and thine are mine; ^aand I am glorified in them.

11 And now ^aI am no more in the world; ^abut these are in the world, and I come to thee. ^aHoly Father, ^akeep through ^athine own name those whom thou hast given me, ^athat they may be one, as we are.

aid at his feet, to be serviceable to Him. What we have may be comfortably committed to God's care and blessing, when it is cheerfully submitted to his disposal; ^a'Lord, take care of what I have, for it is all thine.'

I am glorified in them. 1. I have been; what little honor Christ has in this world, was among his disciples; He had been glorified by their attendance, and obedience, their preaching and working miracles in his name; therefore I pray for them. Note, Those shall have an interest in Christ's intercession, in and by whom He is glorified.

2. 'I am to be glorified in them; they are to bear up my name.' The apostles preached and wrought miracles in Christ's name; the Spirit in them glorified Christ, ch. 16:14. (1) What little interest Christ has in this world, lies in his church; therefore all its affairs lie near his heart. (2.) 'Therefore I commit them to the Father, who has engaged to glorify the Son, and, upon that account, will have an eye to those in whom He is glorified.' That in which God and Christ are glorified, may, with confidence, be committed to God's special care.

V. 11—16. The particular petitions which Christ put up for his disciples, relate to spiritual blessings. He does not pray that they might be rich and great in the world, but that they might be kept from sin, furnished for duty, and brought safe to heaven. Note, The prosperity of the soul is the best prosperity; for, what relates to that Christ came to purchase and bestow, and so teaches us to seek, in the first place, both for others and for ourselves. They are such blessings as were suited to their present state. Note, Christ's intercession is always pertinent. Our Advocate with the Father is acquainted with all the particulars of our wants, dangers and difficulties: He knew Peter's peril, which he himself was not aware of; (Luke 22:32.) I have prayed for thee. He is full in the petitions, fills his mouth with arguments, to teach us fervency and importunity in prayer, and to dwell upon our errands at the throne of grace; as Jacob, I will not let Thee go, except Thou bless me.

The first thing Christ prays for, for his disciples, is their preservation; He commits them all to his Father's custody. Keeping supposes danger, and their danger arose from the world; from the evil of which He begs they might be kept. There were two ways of their being delivered from the world:

1. By taking them out of it; He does not pray that they might be so delivered, (v. 15.) that is,

(1.) 'I pray not that they may speedily be removed by death.' If the world vex them, the readiest way to secure them would be, to hasten them to a better world. Christ would not pray so for his disciples, for two reasons.

and thine are mine. Note, 1. All that receive Christ's Word, are taken into covenant-relation to the Father; Christ presents them to Him, and they, through Christ, present themselves to Him. Christ has redeemed us, not to Himself only, but to God, by his blood, Rev. 5: 9, 10. They are first-fruits unto God, Rev. 14: 4. 2. This is a good plea in prayer, Christ here pleads it, They are thine; we may plead it for ourselves, I am thine, save me; and for others, (as Moses, Exod. 32: 11.) 'They are thy people. Wilt Thou not secure them, secure thine interest in them, that they may not depart from Thee? They are thine, own them as thine.'

All mine are thine, and thine are mine. This speaks the Father and the Son to be, 1. One in essence. Every creature must say to God, All mine are thine; but none can say to Him, All thine are mine, but He that is the same in substance with Him, and equal in power and glory. 2. One in interest; no separate or divided interests between them.

1st. What the Father has as Creator, is delivered to the Son, in suberviency to his undertaking. All things are delivered to Him; (Matt. 11: 27.) nothing was excepted, but He that did put all things under Him.

2dly. What the Son has, as Redeemer, is designed for the Father, and shall shortly be delivered up to Him. All the benefits of redemption, purchased by the Son, are intended for the Father's praise; in his glory all the lines of his undertaking centre. The Son owns none for his that are not devoted to the service of the Father; nor will any thing be accepted as a service to the Christian religion, which clashes with the dictates of natural religion. Every believer may say, All thine are mine; if God be ours in covenant, all He is and has is engaged for our good; and in an unlimited sense, every believer does say, Lord, all mine are thine; all

[1.] He came to conquer, not to countenance those intemperate passions which make men impatient of life. It is his will that we should take up our cross, and not avoid it. [2.] He had work for them to do in the world; the world, though sick of them, (Acts 22: 22.) and not worthy of them, (Heb. 11: 38.) yet could ill spare them. In pity therefore to this dark world, Christ would not have these lights removed out of it, especially for the sake of those in the world, that were to believe in Him through their word. Let not them be taken out of the world, when their Master is; they must each, in his own order, die a martyr, but not till they have finished their testimony. Note, 1st. The taking of good people out of the world is a thing by no means to be desired, but dreaded rather, and laid to heart, Isa. 57: 1. 2dly. Though Christ loves his disciples, He does not send for them to heaven, as soon as they are effectually called, but leaves them to do good, and glorify God on earth, and be ripened for heaven. Many good people are spared to live, because they can ill be spared to die.

(2.) 'I pray not that they may be exempted from the troubles of this world, and taken to some place of ease and safety, there to live undisturbed. Not that, being freed from trouble, they may bask in luxurious ease, but that, by the help of God, they may be preserved in danger; so Calvin. Not that they may be kept from all conflict with the world, but that they may not be overcome by it; not that, as Jeremiah wished, they might leave their people, and go from them, (Jer. 9: 2.) but that, like Ezekiel, their faces may be strong against the faces of wicked men, Ezek. 3: 8. It is more the honor of a Christian soldier, by faith to overcome the world, than by a monastic vow to retreat from it; and more for the honor of Christ to serve Him in a city than in a cell.

Another way is, by keeping them from the corruption in the world; and He prays they may be thus kept, v. 11, 15.

Holy Father, keep those whom thou hast given Me. Christ was leaving them; but let them not think their defence departed; no, He, in their hearing, commits them to his and their Father. Note, It is the unspeakable comfort of all believers, that Christ Himself has committed them to the care of God. Those cannot but be safe, whom God keeps, and He cannot but keep those whom the Son commits to Him; in the virtue of which we may commit the keeping of our souls to God, 1 Pet. 4: 19. 2 Tim. 1: 12. 'Keep their lives, till they have done their work; keep their comforts, and let them not be broken in upon by the hardships they meet with; keep up their interest in the world.' To this prayer is owing the wonderful preservation of the ministry and church in the world unto this day; if God had not kept up both, they had been extinguished long ago. He puts them under the divine tuition, that they might not themselves run away from duty, or be led aside by their own hearts. We need God's power not only to put us into a state of grace, but to keep us in it. See ch. 10: 28, 29. 1 Pet. 1: 5.

He speaks to God as a holy Father. In committing ourselves and others to the divine care, we may take encouragement, 1. From his holiness, which is engaged for the preservation of his holy ones: He hath sworn by his holiness, Ps. 89: 35. If He be a holy God, and hate sin, He will make those that are his, holy, and keep them from sin, who hate it. 2. From this relation of a Father to us through Christ. If He be a Father, He will take care of his own children; who else should?

He speaks of them as those whom the Father

Verse 11.

'Name is used in Scripture sometimes for person, (Rev. 3: 4.) sometimes for family, (Ps. 76: 1.) and sometimes, when applied to God, for his power, or other perfections, Ps. 81: 7. When mention is made of making known God's name to the heathen, we always understand it to mean, declaring to them his nature and attributes, as the only true God: only thus do we find men of revealing his name in the Old Testament. Here Christ speaks to Jews, (v. 6) and the phrase plainly suggests, that additional light was conveyed to them, which they could not have derived from the old dispensation. We must understand this phrase, of instruction relative to life and immortality, and the recovery of sinners through Christ's mediation, which may well be called revealing God, or which, in the Hebrew idiom, is the same, the name of God, to the disciples. If, then, by the name of God, (v. 6, and 26,) be meant the great foundations of the Christian institution, the being preserved or kept in it, (v. 11, 12.) must mean their being enabled to continue in the faith and practice of that religion.'

Keep them from the evil; or out of it. He had taught them to pray daily, Deliver us from evil, and this would encourage them to pray.

1. 'Keep them from the evil one, and all his instruments: that he may not have leave to sift them, or that their faith may not fail: that the destroyer may not drive them to despair.'

2. 'Keep them from the evil thing, that is, sin; from every thing that looks like it, or leads to it. Keep them, that they do no evil,' 2 Cor. 13:7. Sin is that evil which, above any other, we should dread and deprecate.

3. 'Keep them from the evil of the world, and of tribulation, so that it may have no sting, no malignity; not that they might be kept from affliction; but kept through it, that there might be no evil in it to harm them. Observe,

The reasons with which He enforces these requests for their preservation. He pleads that hitherto He had kept them, (v. 12.) in the true faith, and the service of God.

Christ faithfully discharged his undertaking concerning his disciples; while He was with them, He kept them in God's name, preserved them from dangerous errors or sins; from the Pharisees, who would have compassed sea and land to make proselytes of them; He kept them from deserting Him, and returning to the little all they had left: He had them still under his eye when He sent them to preach; went not his heart with them? Many that followed Him awhile, took offence and went off; but He kept the twelve, that they also should not go away. He kept them from falling into the hands of enemies that sought their lives; kept them when He surrendered Himself, ch. 18: 9. While had given Him. What we receive as our Father's gifts, we may comfortably remit to our Father's care. 'Father, keep the graces and comforts Thou hast given Me; the children Thou hast given Me; the ministry I have received.'

Keep them through thine own name. That is, For thy name's sake; so some. 'Thy name and honor are concerned in their preservation as well as mine, for both will suffer by it if they either revolt or sink.' The Old-Testament saints often pleaded, for thy name's sake; more concerned for the honor of God's name than for any interest of their own.

Keep them in thy name; so others. 'In the knowledge and fear, in the profession and service of thy name, whatever it cost them; let them ever be faithful to it; keep them in thy truths and ordinances, in the way of thy commandments.'

Keep them by or through thy name; 'by thine own power, in thine own hand; keep them Thyself, let them be thine immediate care. Keep them by those means of preservation which Thou hast appointed, and by which Thou hast made Thyself known. Keep them by Thy Word and ordinances; let thy name be their strong tower; thy tabernacle their pavilion.'

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 6-12. The regard of the Savior to those who were 'given Him out of the world,' cannot be overlooked by the attentive reader: and the things spoken of them are not peculiar to the apostles, but take in all, who receive and keep his Word, are firmly persuaded that his doctrine and works were from the Father, and believe in Him for the salvation of their souls. For these persons particularly He 'came into the world;' for them He labored and suffered, rose again and reigns; for them He continually intercedes, and not for the world at large: in them He will eternally be glorified with the Father, whose also they are; as 'all things that the Father hath' are the Son's likewise. No sinner, however, need be discouraged; for the Savior is able and willing to 'save to the uttermost all who come to God by Him.' Convictions and desires are 'hopeful tokens; and when they lead a man to the throne of grace, in reliance on the intercession of Christ, the express promises of God become his security, and the work already wrought in Him evidences, that He has been 'chosen unto salvation, through sanctification of the Spirit, and belief of the truth;' nor can any one, whatever he professes or preaches, know his election of God, except by that 'faith which worketh by love,' and by its fruits. (1 Thes. 1: 1-4 v. 3, 4. 2 Pet. 1: 5-11.)—For many have called Christ Lord, and seemed to be the children of God; who at length proved 'sons of perdition.' Such examples should excite to serious self-examination and prayer: but should not distress the believer, who, though he 'cannot do the things he would,' is conscious of integrity in his professed repentance, and faith in Christ, and desire of living to his glory. These, through the intercession of Christ, shall be 'kept by the power of God,' to the glory of his name, and in his worship and service, 'through faith, unto salvation.' None of them ever were or will be lost: for 'the sons of perdition' only seemed to be of them, but never were with them in judgment, disposition, and affection. (1 John 2: 18, 19.)

SCOTT.

Verse 12.

The son of perdition. (2 Thes. 2: 3, 4.) "'The son of perdition" signifies one, who deservedly perishes: as "a son of death," (2 Sam. 12: 5.) "children of hell," (Matt. 23: 15.) and "children of wrath," (Eph. 2: 3.) signify persons justly obnoxious to death, hell, and "wrath." Doddridge.

In vs. 57. 4. the faithless and idolatrous Israelites are called children of transgression, or sons of perdition; the Greek being the same as is here used. The Hebrew signifies apostasy. Hence also in 2 Thes. 2: 3. The phrase here used, signifies an apostate from the Christian faith. That the Scripture might be fulfilled. (1. e. This happened not fortuitously, but by the wise counsel of God. Bp. Pearce explains, "by the loss of Him, the Scripture is fulfilled;" or, "what the Psalmist said in Scripture (Ps. 41: 9) may be applied to Him." And he refers to Ps. 109: 8, compared with Acts 1: 20. Most modern commentators are of opinion, that our Lord has no particular passage in view, (as Ps. 41: 10, which He at another time applies to this passage in John. 13: 18.) but rather alludes to the prophecies in general concerning his passion. Surenhusius, however, thinks there is reference to Ps. 69 and 100.

But the son of perdition. 'I am surprised that so many divines should infer from these words, that the giving to Christ in the proceeding clauses, cannot imply an election to glory, because it is here intimated that Judas, who perished, was given as well as the rest. But persons conversant in the original might easily have observed, that if this text will prove that Judas was in the number of those given to Christ, in the same manner Luke 4: 26, 27, will prove, directly contrary to plain fact, and the whole tenor of the argument, that the woman of Sarepta was a widow in Israel, and Naaman the Syrian a leper in Israel: John 3: 13, that Christ ascended into heaven before He began his ministry, and Rev. 21: 27, that there are some of the most abominable of mankind whose names are written in the book of life. In all which it is plain that the particle "but" is not used strictly as an exceptive particle.'

In the preceding verses, those who were given to Christ are stated to have 'kept his word,' and 'believed in Him;' but Judas had always been a hypocrite, and was now a traitor and apostate; and therefore Christ could not mean to include him in that number. (6: 66-71, & 70, 71, 13: 18-30, & 18, 21, 27-30.) And if in this verse we understand by those 'given to Christ,' such as were given Him to be his apostles, without reference to faith, or 'the election of grace;' we can not explain the preceding verses in that sense, because they are verified in none but true believers, of which number Judas never had been.

should court our stay? With a holy triumph should we say, 'Now I am no more in this world, no more vexed with its thorns, endangered by its snares; I shall wander no more in this howling wilderness, be tossed no more on this stormy sea; now I can cheerfully give it a final farewell.'

Now I come to Thee. To get clear of the world is but the half of the comfort of a dying Christ, of a dying Christian; the far better half is to think of going to the Father, to the immediate, everlasting enjoyment of Him. When we go, to be absent from the body, it is to be present with the Lord, like children fetched home to their father's house. 'Now come I to Thee, whom my soul thirsteth after; Thee, the Fountain of light and life, the crown and centre of bliss; my longings shall be satisfied, my hopes accomplished, my happiness completed.'

With what tender concern He speaks of those He left behind: 'But these are in the world. I have found what an evil world it is, what will become of these dear little ones that must stay in it! Holy Father, keep them; they will want my presence, let them have thine. I am sending them out into the world: they must launch forth into the deep, and have business to do in these great waters, and will be lost if Thou do not keep them.'

Our Lord Jesus hears the names of his own which are in the world upon his breast-plate, and has graven them with the nails of his cross upon the palms of his hands; when He is out of their sight, they are not out of his, much less out of his mind. We should have such pity for those that are launching into the world when we have got almost through it; and for those that are left behind in it when we are leaving it.

When Christ would express the utmost need his disciples had of divine preservation, He only says, They are in the world; that speaks danger enough to those who are bound for heaven, whom a flattering world would divert and seduce, and a malignant world hate and persecute.

He pleads what a satisfaction it would be to them to know themselves safe, and to Him to see them easy, v. 13. Observe,

1. Christ earnestly desired the fullness of joy for his disciples. He was leaving them in tears and troubles, and yet took care to fulfil their joy. When they thought their joy in Him was at an end, it was advanced nearer to perfection than ever. We are here taught, (1.) To found our joy in Christ; 'It is my joy; I am the matter of it.' Christ's a Christian's joy; joy in the world is withering with it, joy in Christ is everlasting. (2.) To build up our joy with diligence, is the duty as well as privilege of believers; no part of the Christian life is pressed upon us more earnestly, Phil. 3:1. 4:4. (3.) Christ would have us aim at the perfection of this joy.

2. In order hereunto, He solemnly committed them to his Father's keeping, and took them for witnesses that He did so; These things I speak in the world, while yet with them. His intercession in heaven would have been as effectual in itself; but saying this in the world, would be a greater satisfaction to them. Note, (1.) Christ has not only treasured up future comforts for his disciples, but has given them present satisfactions. He here condescended to publish his last will and testament, and (unlike many a testator) lets them know what legacies He had left them, and how well they were secured. (2.) Christ's intercession for us is enough to fulfil our joy in Him; nothing more effectual to silence fears and mistrusts, and to furnish strong consolation, than this, that He always appears in the presence of God for us; therefore the apostle puts a yea rather upon this, Rom. 8:34. And see Heb. 7: 25 plausible course of profession, than those that, like Judas, love the bag. But Christ's distinguishing Judas from those that were given Him, (for the Greek is adversative, not exceptive,) intimates that religion ought not to suffer for the treachery of those that are false to it, 1 John 2: 17.

2. The Scripture was fulfilled; the sin of Judas was foreseen in God's counsel, and foretold in his Word, and the event would certainly follow after the prediction as a consequence, though it cannot be said necessarily to follow from it as an effect. See Ps. 41: 9. 69: 25. 109: 8. One would be amazed at the treachery of the apostates, were we not told it before.

He pleads that He was now under a necessity of leaving them, and could no longer watch over them as He had hitherto; (v. 11.) 'Keep them now, that I may not lose the labor I bestowed upon them while with them. Keep them, that they may be one with us, as we are with each other.'

With what pleasure, with what an air of triumph and exultation, He speaks of his own departure, with reference both to the world He left, and the world He removed to. 'Now I am no more in the world. Farewell to this troublesome world, the welcome hour is at hand when I shall be no more in it. Having finished the work I had to do in it, I have done with it; nothing remains now but to hasten from it.' Note, It should be a pleasure to those that have their home in the other world, to think of being no more in this world; for what is there here, that

He pleads the ill usage they were likely to meet with in the world, for his sake; (v. 14.) 'I have given them thy Word, to be published to the world, and they have believed it themselves, and accepted the trust of transmitting it to the world; therefore the world hath hated them, as also because they are not of the world, any more than I.'

Though as yet they had given but little opposition to the world, yet it hates them; much more when they would turn the world upside down; 'Father, stand their friend; they will have many enemies. In the midst of those fiery darts, let them be compassed with thy favor as with a shield.' It is God's honor to take part with the weaker side, and help the helpless. Lord be merciful to them, for men would swallow them up.

One reason of the world's enmity is, they had received the Word of God as sent them by Christ, when the greatest part of the world rejected it, and set themselves against those who preached and professed it. Note, They that receive Christ's good will and good word, must expect the world's ill will and ill word. Ministers have been in a particular manner hated by the world, because they call men out of it, and teach them not to conform to it; 'Father keep them, for it is for thy sake that they are exposed.' Thus the Psalmist pleads, For thy sake I have borne reproach, Ps. 69: 7. Note, Those that keep the word of Christ's patience, are entitled to special protection in the hour of temptation, Rev. 3: 10. That cause which makes a martyr, may well make a joy! I sufferer.

Another reason is, they are not of this world. They to whom the Word of Christ comes in power, are not of the world; it weans them from the wealth, and turns them against the wickedness of the world.

He pleads their conformity to Himself in a holy non-conformity to the world: (v. 16.) They may in faith commit themselves to God, 1. Who are as Christ was in this world, and tread in his steps. God will love those that are like Christ. 2. Who do not engage themselves in the world's interest, nor devote themselves to its service. Observe,

1. Christ was not of this world; He never had been of it, and least of all, now He was upon the point of leaving it. This speaks, 1st. His state; He was none of the world's favorites, or grantees; worldly possessions He had none, not where to lay his head; nor worldly power, He was no judge or divider. Secondly, His Spirit; He was perfectly dead to the world, the prince of this world had nothing in Him; the things of this world were nothing to Him; not honor, for He made Himself of no reputation; not riches, for our sakes He became poor; not pleasures, for He acquainted Himself with grief. See ch. 8: 23.

2. Therefore true Christians are not of this world. The Spirit of Christ in them is opposite to the spirit of the world. 1st. It is their lot to be despised by the world; they are not in favor with it, any more than their Master. 2dly. It is their privilege to be delivered from the world; as Abraham out of the land of his nativity. 3dly. It is their duty and character to be dead to the world. Their most pleasing converse is, and should be, with another world, and their prevailing concern about the business of it. Christ's disciples were weak, yet this He could say for them, They were not of the world; therefore He recommends them to the care of heaven.

V. 17-19. The next thing He prayed for them, was, that they might be sanctified.

Sanctify them through thy truth, through thy Word for thy Word is truth itself. He desires they may be sanctified both as Christians and as ministers.

1. As Christians. Father, make them holy; that will be their preservation, 1 Thess. 5: 23.

stands in the written Word, is not only pure truth, without mixture, but entire truth without deficiency. (2.) This Word of truth should be the outward and ordinary means of sanctification; not of itself, for then it would always sanctify, but as the instrument which the Spirit commonly uses in beginning and carrying on that good work; it is the seed of the new birth, (1 Pet. 1:23.) the foot of the new life, 1 Pet. 2:1, 2.

2. As ministers. 'Sanctify them, set them apart for thy service; let their call to the apostleship be ratified in heaven.' Prophets were said to be sanctified, (Jer. 1:5.) and apostles, 2 Pet. 1:21. Priests and Levites were so. (1.) 'Qualify them with Christian graces and ministerial gifts, as able ministers of the New Testament.' (2.) 'Separate them to the office, Rom. 1:1. I have called them, they have consented; Father, say Amen to it.' (3.) 'Own them in the office; let thy hand go with them; sanctify them by, or in truth, as truth is opposed to figure and shadow; sanctify them really, not ceremonially, by anointing and sacrifice. Sanctify them to thy truth, to be the preachers of thy truth to the world; as the priests were sanctified to serve at the altar,' 1 Cor. 9:13, 14. Note, [1.] Christ intercedes for his ministers with particular concern, and recommends to his Father's grace those stars He carries in his right hand. [2.] The great thing to be asked of God for ministers, is, that they may be sanctified, effectually separated from the world, entirely devoted to God, and experimentally acquainted with the influence of that Word upon their own hearts, which they preach to others. Let them have the Urim and Thummim, light and integrity.

Two pleas enforce the petition for sanctification. 1. Their mission; v. 18. Christ speaks with great assurance of his own mission; Thou hast sent Me into the world. The Author of the Christian religion had his commission from the original and object of all religion. He was sent of God to say what He said, do what He did, and be what He is to those that believe on Him; which was his comfort in his undertaking, and may be ours, in our dependence upon Him.

He speaks with great satisfaction of the commission He had given his disciples; 'I send them on the same errand; to preach the same doctrine, and to confirm it with the same proofs, with a charge to commit to other faithful men that which was committed to them.' He gave them their commission, (ch. 20:21.) with a reference to his own, and it magnifies the office, that there is some affinity between the commission given to ministers, and that given to the Mediator; He is called an Apostle, (Heb. 3:1.) a Minister, (Rom. 15:8.) a Messenger, Mal. 3:1. Only they are sent as servants, He as a Son.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 13-19. The disciples of Christ live at present in a world, which hates and despises them: yet the recollection of his words, and the experience of his faithfulness, may fill them with joy in Him and in each other, amidst their tribulations. They should be willing to die, but not impatiently desire it: for their Advocate does not intercede for their immediate removal, but that they 'may be kept from evil.' They are not, however, left here to pursue any of those objects, which the men of the world pursue; but to glorify God, to 'serve their generation,' to finish their work, and 'to be perfected through sufferings,' after the example of 'the Captain of their salvation.' They should therefore hope and pray that the grace, which has separated them from the world, may preserve them from the evil

This is a reason, 1. Why Christ was concerned so much for them; He had Himself put them into a difficult office, which required great abilities. Note, Whom Christ sends He will stand by, and interest Himself in those whom He employs; what He calls is to, He will fit us for, and sustain us through. 2. He committed them to his Father, because He was concerned in the cause, their mission being a prosecution of his. Christ received gifts for men, (Ps. 68:18.) and then gave them to men; (Eph. 4:8.) and therefore prays aid of his Father to uphold those gifts. The Father sanctified Him when He sent Him into the world, ch. 10:36.) Now they being sent as He was, let them also be sanctified.

2. The merit He had for them is also pleaded; v. 19. Here is,

(1.) Christ's designation of Himself to the work and office of Mediator; I sanctified Myself: He entirely devoted Himself to the undertaking, especially to the offering up of Himself without spot unto God. He, as the priest and altar, sanctified Himself as the sacrifice. When He said, Father, glorify thy name; thy will be done; I commit my spirit into thy hands; He made the satisfaction He had engaged to make, and so sanctified Himself. This He pleads, for his intercession is made in virtue of his satisfaction; by his own blood He entered into the holy place, (Heb. 9:12.) as the high priest, on the day of atonement, sprinkled the blood of the sacrifice at the same time that He burnt incense within the veil, Lev. 16:12, 14. (2.) Christ's design of kindness to his disciples; it is for their sakes, that they may be sanctified, that is, that they may be martyrs; so some. 'I sacrificed Myself, that they may be sacrificed to the glory of God and the church's good.' Paul speaks of his being offered, 2 Tim. 4:6. Phil. 2:17. Whatever, in the death of the saints, is precious in the sight of the Lord, is owing to the death of Jesus. But I rather take it more generally, that they may be saints and ministers, duly qualified and accepted of God.

[1.] The office of the ministry is the purchase of Christ's blood, and one of the fruits of his satisfaction. The priests under the law were consecrated with the blood of bulls and goats, but ministers with the blood of Jesus.

[2.] The holiness of Christians is the fruit of Christ's death, by which the gift of the Holy Ghost was purchased; He gave Himself for his church, to sanctify it, Eph. 5:26. And He that designed the end, designed also the means, that they might be sanctified by the truth, to which Christ came into the world to bear witness, and died to confirm. The word of truth receives its sanctifying power from the death of Christ. Some read it, that they be sanctified in truth, that is, truly; for as God must be served, so, in order to that, we must be sanctified in the Spirit, and in truth. This Christ has prayed for, for all that are his; for this is his will, even their sanctification.

of it, and from the snares of the wicked one: they should seek to be sanctified more and more, through the Word of truth, that they may unreservedly serve Him, who 'through the eternal Spirit offered Himself without spot to God,' 'to purge their consciences from dead works, that they might serve the living God' (Heb. 9:11-14, v. 13, 14.) and they should carefully examine, whether the doctrines they hold have a sanctifying effect upon their hearts and lives. For, as divine truth is of a holy nature, if our religious opinions do not make us hate sin, and long and pray for holiness, we may be sure, either that they are not divine truths, or that we do not receive them by a living faith, under the teaching of the Holy Spirit. Scott.

Truth. 1. The head and sum of divine doctrine. See v. 3. the only true way to eternal life. Tittman. This clause seems added for the instruct in of the apostles, in order to excite them to devote all their strength to, nay, even lay down their lives for, this truth. In this view, the words merit the serious attention of all who have undertaken the sacerdotal office.

'The sense of the passage may be thus expressed: "As Thou hast sent Me into the world, (to manifest the Father, his counsels and decrees, for the salvation of men,) so have I also (in like manner) sent them into the world, (in order that they may manifest both the Father and the Son.)" That they may accomplish this, our Lord entreats for them the assistance of the Father, v. 17. But He Himself laid the foundation, when He said, indeed, for them I have consecrated Myself, i. e. I have dedicated and devoted Myself to them, to promote their sanctification, that they also may be devoted to the truth.' Tittman and Kuinoel. 'The disciples did this, since they devoted themselves to Christ and his religion, lived unto Christ, and suffered and died in his cause; all which may be comprehended in the expressive words of Paul, "Christ is my life." lievers, but for the meanest and weakest; even those that in the eye of the world are inconsiderable. As Divine Providence extends itself to the meanest creature, so Divine Grace to the meanest Christian. The good Shepherd has an eye even to the poor of the flock.

5. Christ in his mediation had an actual regard to those of the chosen remnant yet unborn, the people that should be created, (Ps. 22:31.) the other sheep which He must yet bring, Jer. 1:5. Prayers are filed in heaven for them beforehand, by Him who declareth the end from the beginning, and velleth things that are not as though they were.

The intent of this prayer; (v. 21.) that they all may be one. The same was said before, (v. 11.) that they may be one as we are, and again, v. 22. The heart of Christ was much upon this. Some think that the oneness prayed for, (v. 11.) has special reference to the disciples as ministers, that they might be one in their testimony to Christ; and that the harmony of the evangelists, and concurrence of the first preachers of the Gospel, are owing to this prayer. Let them be not of one heart, but one mouth, speaking the same thing. The unity of gospel-ministers is the beauty and strength of the gospel-interest.

But it is certain that the oneness prayed for, (v. 21.) respects all believers. It is the prayer of Christ for all that are his, and we may be sure it is an answered prayer. It includes three things;

1. That they might all be incorporated in one body. Though they live in distant places, and in several ages, and cannot have personal acquaintance or correspondence, yet let them be united in Me their common Head. As Christ died, so He prayed, to gather them all in one, ch. 11. 52. Eph. 1:10.

2. That they might all be animated by one Spirit; plainly implied in—that they may be one in us. Union with the Father and Son is obtained and kept up only by the Holy Ghost. He that is joined to the Lord, is one spirit, 1 Cor. 6:17. Let them all be stamped with the same image and super-scription, and influenced by the same power.

3. That they might be knit together in love and charity. That they all may be one, (1.) In judgment and sentiment; not in every little thing; it is neither possible nor needful, but in the great things of God—that God's favor is better than life; that sin is the worst of evils, Christ the best of friends; that there is another life after this; and the like. (2.) In disposition and inclination. All that are sanctified, have the same divine nature and image; they have all a new heart, and it is one heart. (3.) In designs and aims. Every true Christian, as far as he is so, eyes the glory of God as his

Verses 20, 21.

It should be observed, from our Lord's words, that his religion may easily be found, entire and unadulterated, in the writings of his apostles, and of those who, by their sanction, wrote the other part of the New Testament. Indeed where else can we look for the words of the apostles? What standard of their doctrine have we, if the New Testament be not that standard? The miracles which they wrought proved the truth of Christianity: but if they were not inspired infallibly to communicate to the world the true doctrine of that holy religion without addition, adulteration, or omission; where shall we with certainty learn the nature of it? or how is sure, that we are not deluded by some misrepresentation?—It is peculiarly worthy of observation, that the absurd claims of popes and councils in this respect, and the plausible reasons of such moderns as want to improve Christianity by human reason, are maintained by the same vain supposition; namely, that the Scripture of itself is either insufficient, or in some degree uncertain, or too obscure, to answer the purpose. Men are apt to say, 'It will be soon or agh for us to embrace the Gospel, when the professors are agreed among themselves in what it consists;' and those who are not aware of the advantage, which infidels and ungodly men have made of the divisions and controversies among Christians, [796]

V. 20—23. Next to their purity He prays for their unity; for the wisdom from above is first pure, then peaceable; and amity is amiable indeed, when like the ointment on Aaron's head, and the dew on Zion's hill.

Who are included in this prayer? (v. 20.) 'Not these only that are now my disciples,' (the eleven, the seventy, with others, men and women that followed Him,) 'but for them also which shall believe on Me through their word, preached or written: I pray for them all, that they all may be one in their interest in this prayer, and receive benefit by it.' Note, 1. Those only are interested in the mediation of Christ, that do, or shall, believe in Him. By this they are described, and it comprehends the character and duty of a Christian. They that lived then, saw, and believed, but they in after-ages have not seen, and yet have believed.

2. Souls are brought to believe on Christ, through the Word, and for this end Christ appointed the Scriptures, and a standing ministry in the church, to raise up a seed.

3. It is certainly and infallibly known to Christ who shall believe on Him. He does not here pray at a venture, upon a contingency depending on the treacherous will of man, which pretends to be free, but by reason of sin is in bondage with its children; the matter was reduced to a certainty, by the divine purpose; He knew whom He prayed for, who, being ordered to eternal life, were entered in the Lamb's book, Acts 13:48.

4. Christ intercedes not only for eminent believers, but for the meanest and weakest; even those that in the eye of the world are inconsiderable. As Divine Providence extends itself to the meanest creature, so Divine Grace to the meanest Christian. The good Shepherd has an eye even to the poor of the flock.

5. Christ in his mediation had an actual regard to those of the chosen remnant yet unborn, the people that should be created, (Ps. 22:31.) the other sheep which He must yet bring, Jer. 1:5. Prayers are filed in heaven for them beforehand, by Him who declareth the end from the beginning, and velleth things that are not as though they were.

The intent of this prayer; (v. 21.) that they all may be one. The same was said before, (v. 11.) that they may be one as we are, and again, v. 22. The heart of Christ was much upon this. Some think that the oneness prayed for, (v. 11.) has special reference to the disciples as ministers, that they might be one in their testimony to Christ; and that the harmony of the evangelists, and concurrence of the first preachers of the Gospel, are owing to this prayer. Let them be not of one heart, but one mouth, speaking the same thing. The unity of gospel-ministers is the beauty and strength of the gospel-interest.

But it is certain that the oneness prayed for, (v. 21.) respects all believers. It is the prayer of Christ for all that are his, and we may be sure it is an answered prayer. It includes three things;

1. That they might all be incorporated in one body. Though they live in distant places, and in several ages, and cannot have personal acquaintance or correspondence, yet let them be united in Me their common Head. As Christ died, so He prayed, to gather them all in one, ch. 11. 52. Eph. 1:10.

2. That they might all be animated by one Spirit; plainly implied in—that they may be one in us. Union with the Father and Son is obtained and kept up only by the Holy Ghost. He that is joined to the Lord, is one spirit, 1 Cor. 6:17. Let them all be stamped with the same image and super-scription, and influenced by the same power.

3. That they might be knit together in love and charity. That they all may be one, (1.) In judgment and sentiment; not in every little thing; it is neither possible nor needful, but in the great things of God—that God's favor is better than life; that sin is the worst of evils, Christ the best of friends; that there is another life after this; and the like. (2.) In disposition and inclination. All that are sanctified, have the same divine nature and image; they have all a new heart, and it is one heart. (3.) In designs and aims. Every true Christian, as far as he is so, eyes the glory of God as his highest end, and the glory of heaven as his chief good. (4.) In desires and prayers; though they differ in words and the manner of expressions, yet, having all received the same Spirit of adoption, and observing the same rule, they pray for the same things. (5.) In love. Every true Christian has that in him, which inclines him to love all Christians as such. Christ prays for that communion of saints which we profess to believe; the fellowship all believers have with God, and their intimate union with the saints in heaven and earth, 1 John 1:3. But this prayer will not have its complete answer till all the saints come to heaven; for then, and not till then, they shall be perfect in one, v. 23. Eph. 4:13.

It is taken for granted, that the Father and Son are one, in nature and essence, equal in power and glory, in mutual endearments. The Father loveth the Son, and the Son always pleased the Father. They are one in design and operation. The intimacy of this oneness is expressed in these words, 'Thou in Me, and I in Thee.' This He often mentions for support under present sufferings, when his enemies were ready to fall upon Him, and his friends to desert Him; yet He was in the Father, and the Father in Him.

This is insisted on in Christ's prayer for his disciples' oneness, showing how He desired they might be one. Believers are one, in some measure, as God and Christ are; for, 1. The union of believers is a strict and close union; they are united by a divine nature. 2. It is a holy union, in the Holy Spirit, for holy ends; not a body politic for any secular purpose. 3. It is, and will be at last, a complete union. Father and Son have the same attributes, properties, and perfections; so have believers now, as far as they are sanctified; and when grace shall be perfected in glory, they will be exactly consonant to each other, all changed into the same image.

That they may be one in us. There is one God and one Mediator; and herein believers are one, they all agree to depend on the favor of this one God as their felicity, and the merit of this one Mediator as their righteousness. That is a conspiracy, not an union, which doth not centre in God as the End, and Christ as the Way. All who are truly united to God and Christ, who are one, will soon be united to one another.

The Creator and Redeemer are one in interest and design; but to what purpose are they so, if all believers were not one body with Christ? Christ's design was to reduce revolted mankind to God; 'Father, let all that believe be one, that in one body they may be reconciled;' (Eph. 2:15, 16.) which speaks of the uniting of Jews and Gentiles in the church; that great mystery, that the Gentiles should be fellow-heirs, and of the same body, (Eph. 3:6.) to which I think this prayer of Christ principally refers, it being one great thing He aimed at in his dying.

Those words, I in them, and Thou in Me, show what that union is. 1. Union with Christ; I in them. Christ, dwelling in the hearts of believers, is the life and soul of the new man. 2. Union with God through Him; Thou in Me; so as by Me to be in them. 3. Union with each other, resulting from those that they hereby may be made perfect in one. We are complete in Him.

against religion, must have been very little acquainted with their writings, and made but few observations on the conduct of mankind. Here nominal Christians, indeed, give the most extensive occasion to the objections; but real believers are far from being sufficiently circumspect in this particular. 'This plainly intimates, that dissensions among Christians would be the means of bringing the truth and excellence of the Christian religion into question.' Doddridge (Matt. 13:7-9, 15-17. Luke 17:3, 4.)

Verses 22, 23.

Whatever differences prevailed in the primitive church, there is not the smallest trace of any real disunion, even in judgment, among the apostles; except for a while, concerning the admission of uncircumcised Gentiles into the church; and that matter was soon amicably settled. (Acts 11:1-18. 15:7-21.) They were all always, as far as we can learn, 'perfectly joined together in the same mind and judgment;' and this, by an abundant measure of the illuminating and sanctifying Spirit of God; as well as by that infallible inspiration by which they delivered the doctrine of their Lord. This was an especial honor conferred on them; and a remarkable accomplishment of this intercession considered as a prophetic. (2 Pet. 3:1-4, 17. 4:16. 1 John 4:1-6. Jude 17-18.)

23 ²¹ I in them, and thou in me, that they may be ²² made perfect in one; and ²³ that the world may know that thou hast sent me, ²⁴ and hast loved them, as thou hast loved me.

24 Father, ²⁵ I will that they also, whom thou hast given me, be with me where I am; ²⁶ that they may behold my glory, which thou hast given me: ²⁷ for thou lovedst me before the foundation of the world.

Christ, and of what they hope for in one heaven, they may be of one mind and one mouth. Worldly glory sets men at variance; for if some be advanced, others are eclipsed, and therefore, while the disciples dreamed of a temporal kingdom, they were ever quarrelling; but Christ's subjects, being all made to our God kings and priests, there is no occasion for contest or emulation. The more Christians are taken up with the glory Christ has given them, the less desirous they will be of vain-glory, and, consequently, the less disposed to quarrel.

He pleads the influence of their oneness on others. This is twice urged; (v. 21.) that the world may believe that Thou hast sent Me. And again, (v. 23.) that the world may know it; for without knowledge there can be no true faith. Believers must know what they believe, and why they believe it. They who believe at a venture, venture too far. Christ here shows His good-will to mankind. Herein, as in every thing, He is of his Father's mind, that He would have all men to be saved, and come to the knowledge of the truth, 1 Tim. 2:4. 2 Pet. 3:9. It is His will that all means should be used, for the conviction and conversion of the world. We know not who are chosen, but must, in our places, do our utmost to further men's salvation, and take heed of doing any thing to hinder it.

The church's oneness will evidence the truth of Christianity, and bring many to embrace it. In general, it will recommend Christianity to the world.

1. The embodying of Christians in one society will greatly promote Christianity, when the world shall see so many, of those that were its children, called out of its family, distinguished from others, and changed from what they sometime were; when they shall see this society raised by the foolishness of preaching, and kept up by miracles of divine providence and grace, and how admirably well it is modelled and constituted, they will be ready to say, We will go with you, for we see that God is with you.

2. The uniting of Christians in love and charity, is the beauty of their profession, and invites others to join with them, Acts 2:42, 43. 4:32, 33. When Christianity, instead of causing quarrels about itself, makes all other strifes to cease, when it cools the fiery, smooths the rugged, and disposes men to be kind and loving, courteous and beneficent, to all men; studious to promote peace in all relations and societies: this will recommend it to all that have any thing either of natural religion or natural affection in them.

In particular, it will beget in men good thoughts, 1. Of Christ: They will know and believe that Thou hast sent Me. By this it will appear that Christ was sent of God, that his religion prevails to join so many, of different capacities, tempers, and interests in other things, in one body by faith, with one heart by love. Certainly He was sent by the God of power, who fashions men's hearts alike, and the God of love and peace.

2. Of Christians: They will know that Thou hast loved them as Thou hast loved Me. Here is, (1.) The privilege of believers; the Father Himself loveth them with a love resembling his love to his Son. (2.) The evidence of their interest in this privilege, is their being one. By this it will appear that God loves us, if we love one another with a pure heart; for wherever the love of God is shed abroad in the heart, it will change it into the same image. How much good it would do the world, to know better how dear to God all good Christians are! The Jews had a saying, If the world did but know the worth of good men, they would hedge them about with pearls. Those that have so much of God's love, should have more of ours.

Verse 24.

I will. 'I treat.' Kuivvel. 'I would.' Campbell. Besa. Broomfield.

The language of this verse has been considered by many expositors, ancient and modern, as a claim, grounded on a covenant, the terms of which would, on the part of Christ, in a few hours be perfectly fulfilled. He does not therefore say, I pray, or beseech; but, 'I will;' as

The design of Christ in all his communications of light and grace to them; (v. 22.) 'The glory which Thou gavest Me, as the channel of conveyance, I have given them, to this intent that they may be one, as we are one; so that those gifts will be in vain, if they be not one.' These gifts are either,

(1.) Those conferred on the apostles, and first planters of the church. The glory of being God's ambassadors; of working miracles; of gathering a church; and erecting God's kingdom among men; this glory was given to Christ, and some of the honor He put upon them, when He sent them to disciple all nations.

Or, (2.) Those given in common to all believers. The glory of being in covenant with the Father, and designed for a place at his right hand, was the glory the Father gave the Redeemer, and He has confirmed it to the redeemed. This honor He hath given them, because He hath secured it to them. This was conveyed to Him in trust for them, and He was faithful. He gave it them, that they might be one. [1.]

To entitle them to the privilege of unity, that by virtue of their relation to one God the Father, and one Lord Jesus Christ, they might be dominated one. The gift of the Spirit, which the Father gave the Son, by Him to be given to all believers, makes them one, for He works all in all, 1 Cor. 12:4, &c. [2.] That, in consideration of their agreement in one creed and covenant, one Spirit and one Bible; in consideration of what they have in one God and one

V. 24-26. Father, I will that they may be with Me. Observe,

1. The connection of this request with the foregoing. He had prayed that God would preserve, sanctify, and unite them; now He prays that He would crown his gifts with their glorification. We must pray, first for grace, then for glory; (Ps. 84:11.) for in this method God gives. Far be it from the only wise God to come under the imputation, either of that foolish builder, who, without a foundation, build upon the sand, as He would, if He should glorify any whom He has not first sanctified; or of that foolish builder, who began to build, and was not able to finish, as He would, if He should sanctify any, and not glorify them.

Father, I will. Here, as before, He addresses Himself to God as a Father, and therein we must do likewise; but I will is a language peculiar to Himself, and does not become ordinary petitioners, but very well became Him who paid for what He prayed for, and speaks the authority of his intercession: his word was with power in heaven, as well as on earth. Entering with his own blood into the holy place, his intercession there has uncontrollable efficacy. He intercedes as a king, for He is a priest upon his throne, (like Melchizedek,) a king-priest. Pursuant to his power to give eternal life, (v. 2.) He says, Father, I will. Though now He took upon Him the form of a servant, yet that power being to be most illustriously exerted when He shall come the second time in the glory of a judge, to say, Come ye blessed, having that in his eye He might well say, Father, I will.

Three things make heaven:

1. It is to be where Christ is; where I am, am to be shortly, and eternally. In this world we are on our passage; there we truly are, where we are to be forever; so Christ reckoned, and so must we.

2. It is to be with Him where He is; this is no tautology, but intimates that we shall not only be in the same happy place where Christ is, but that the happiness of the place will consist in his presence; that is the fullness of its joy. The very heaven of heaven is to be with Christ, in company and communion with Him, Phil. 1:23.

3. It is to behold his glory. Observe, (1.) The glory of the Redeemer is the brightness of heaven: before it angels cover their faces, ch. 12:41. The Lamb is the light of the new Jerusalem, Rev. 21:23. Christ is the brightness of his Father's glory. God shows his glory there, as He does his grace here, through Christ. 'The Father has given Me this glory;' He was as yet in his low estate; but it was very sure, and near.

(2.) The felicity of the redeemed consists very much in beholding that glory; they will have the immediate view of his glorious person; I shall see God in my flesh, Joh 19:26, 27. They will have a clear insight into his glorious undertaking, as it will be then accomplished; they will see into those springs of love, from whence flow all the streams of grace; they shall have an appropriating sight of Christ's glory; The wife shines with the radiance of her husband; and an assimilating sight: they shall be changed into the same image, from glory to glory.

We are to hope for heaven, on no other ground than the mediation and intercession of Christ. Our sanctification is our evidence, for he that has this hope in Him, purifies himself; but the will of Christ is our title, by which we are sanctified, Heb. 10:10. Christ speaks here, as if He did not count his own happiness complete unless his elect share in it, for the bringing of many sons to glory makes the Captain of our salvation perfect, Heb. 2:10.

The argument of this request; Thou lovedst Me before the foundation of the world. This is a reason, 1. Why He expected this glory Himself; Thou wilt give it Me, for Thou lov-acting by authority, and as One with the Father.—It is not, however, certain, that more than a fervent, importunate desire was intended; and it is not advisable to adduce doubtful texts, in proof of a disputed point of doctrine. The language at least implies, that this concluding plea was peculiarly near the heart of the heavenly Advocate, and there can be no doubt it will infallibly be granted.

knowledge of Him; and also because of the difficulty of their work—they must bring light to those that rebelled against the light. 2. To show that they were qualified for further peculiar favors, for they had that knowledge of God, which the world had not.

The plea He insists upon for Himself; but I have known Thee. Christ knew the Father so as no one else ever did; knew on what grounds He went in his undertaking, knew his Father's mind in every thing, and therefore, in his prayer, came to Him with confidence, as we do to one we know. Christ is here suing out blessings for those that were his: when He had said The world has not known Thee, one would expect it should follow, but they have known Thee; no, their knowledge was not to be boasted of; but I have known Thee; which intimates that there is nothing in us to recommend us to God's favor, but all our interest in, and intercourse with Him, result from, and depend upon, Christ's interest and intercourse. We are unworthy, but He is worthy.

The plea He insists upon for his disciples; and they have known that Thou hast sent Me.

Hereby they are distinguished from the unbelieving world. Note, To know and believe in Christ, in the midst of a world that persists in ignorance and infidelity, is highly pleasing to God, and shall certainly be crowned with distinguishing glory. Singular faith qualifies for singular favors.

Hereby they are interested in the mediation of Christ, and partake the benefit of his acquaintance with the Father; 'I have known Thee, immediately and perfectly; and these, though they have not so known Thee, yet knowing Christ as sent of God, they have, in Him, known the Father, and are introduced to an acquaintance with Him; therefore, Father, look after them for my sake.'

I have declared unto them thy name. 1. This He had done for his immediate followers. All the time that He went in and out among them, He made it his business to declare his Father's name to them, and to beget in them a veneration for it. This was the tendency of all his sermons and miracles, ch. 1:18. 2. This He has done for all that believe on Him; for they had not been brought to believe, if Christ had not made known to them his Father's name. Note, (1.) We are indebted to Christ for the knowledge we have of the Father's name; He opens the understanding to receive it. (2.) Those whom Christ recommends to the favor of God He first leads into an acquaintance with God. He intended to give further instructions to the disciples after his resurrection, (Acts 1:3.) and a more intimate acquaintance with divine things, by the Spirit; and to all believers, into whose hearts He hath shined, He shines more and more. Where Christ has declared his Father's name, He will declare it; for to him that hath shall be given; and they that know God, both need and desire to know more of Him. This is fitly pleaded: 'Father, own and favor them, for they will own and honor Thee.'

The conclusion of the prayer, is designed to enforce all the petitions for the disciples, especially the last, that they may be glorified.

When Christ prays that they may be sanctified, He calls God holy Father; when He prays that they may be glorified, He calls Him righteous Father; for it is a crown of righteousness which the righteous Judge shall give. God's righteousness was engaged to give all the good the Father had promised, and the Son had purchased.

The world has not known Thee. Note, Ignorance of God overspreads the world of mankind; in this darkness they sit. This is urged here, 1. To show that these disciples needed the aids of special grace, both because they were to bring a world that knew not God to the knowledge of God, and also because of the difficulty of their work—they must bring light to those that rebelled against the light. 2. To show that they were qualified for further peculiar favors, for they had that knowledge of God, which the world had not.

He intended to give further instructions to the disciples after his resurrection, (Acts 1:3.) and a more intimate acquaintance with divine things, by the Spirit; and to all believers, into whose hearts He hath shined, He shines more and more. Where Christ has declared his Father's name, He will declare it; for to him that hath shall be given; and they that know God, both need and desire to know more of Him. This is fitly pleaded: 'Father, own and favor them, for they will own and honor Thee.'

He aimed in all this, not to fill their heads with curious speculations, and furnish them with something to talk of among the learned, but to advance their real happiness in two things:

1. Communion with God; 'I have given them the knowledge of all whereby Thou hast made Thyself known, that thy love, even that wherewith Thou hast loved Me, may be, not only toward them, but in them; that is, (1.) 'Let them have the fruits of that love for their sanctification; let the Spirit of love, with which Thou hast filled Me, be in them.' Christ declares his Father's name to believers, that with that divine light darted into their minds, a divine love may be shed abroad in their hearts, to be in them a constraining principle of holiness, that they may partake of a divine nature. When God's love to us comes to be in us, it is like the virtue which the loadstone gives the needle; it draws the soul toward God, in piety, and devout affections, which are as the spirits of the divine life in the soul. (2.) 'Let them have the relish of that love for their consolation; let them not only be interested in the love of God, but let them have the comfort of that interest; that they may not only know God, but know that they know Him,' 1 John 2:3. The love of God thus shed abroad in the heart, fills it with joy, Rom. 5:3, 5. This God has provided for, that we may not only be satisfied with his loving kindness, but be satisfied of it; and so may live a life of complacency in God, and communion with Him; this we must pray for, and press after; if we have it, we must thank Christ for it; if we want it, we may thank ourselves.

2. Union with Christ is in order hereto; and in them. There is no getting into the love of God but through Christ, nor can we keep ourselves in that love but by abiding in Christ, that is, having Him to abide in us; nor can we have the sense of that love but by our experience of the in-dwelling of Christ, that is, the Spirit of Christ in our hearts. Christ in us is the only hope of glory, that will not make us ashamed, Col. 1:27. All our communion with God, the reception of his love to us, and our return of love to Him again, passes

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 20-26. Blessed be God, that we, in these distant ages, are interested in this prayer of our Redeemer, if we truly believe in Him. Union and communion with the Father and the Son, by the in-dwelling of the Holy Spirit, and harmony with one another, formed the substance of our Redeemer's prayer for all his disciples, to the end of time. Let us then endeavor to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace; and pray, with fervor and without ceasing, for divine illumination, in behalf of ourselves and all our brethren, that we may all be united 'in one mind and judgment.' Let us also constantly beseech God to bestow on us holy love; that we may amicably differ in opinion, where we cannot see things exactly in the same light. Thus a spirit of candor, forbearance, and active, self-denying kindness, among 'all who love Christ in sincerity,' may convince the world, that we are of one heart and soul, though somewhat separated by external circumstances; and that we are all soldiers in one army, though not exactly marshalled and disciplined in the same manner; that we are indeed fighting against sin, the world, and the devil; and that we will not turn our arms against each other, as has too often been the case, to the joy and triumph of our enemies. Thus we shall best manifest the truth and excellency of our religion, and the divine authority of its Author. Thus we shall experience more intimate union of soul, and communion with the God of our salvation, and with his saints. Thus we shall have a measure of the Redeemer's glory conferred on us, by being conformed to his image, united with his people, and hated by those only, who 'hate Him and the Father that sent Him.' Thus at length we shall surely be with Him forever, to behold his glory, and enjoy, as one with Him, that love with which the Father 'loved Him before the foundation of the world;' and shall possess the most complete felicity, in the knowledge of that God, whom the world has not known; but in knowing whom angels find blessedness, of which in our present state we can frame no conception. (1 Cor. 2:6-9. 13:8-12. 1 John 3:1-3, v. 3.)

Verse 26.

'The prayer which concludes this sermon of Christ, if we had no other knowledge of Him than was furnished by it, would serve to show us the majestic dignity of his person, his exalted magnanimity, his ardent love to the human race, and the transcendent excellence of the work He was effecting.'

TITTMAN, in BLOOMFIELD.

'Christ's sermon on the mount shows men what they should do, so as to please God: this so, non (beginning at verse 13, of ch. 13.)

shows them how they are to do the things prescribed in the other. In the former, the reader sees a strict morality, which he fears he shall never be able to perform; in this, he sees all things are possible to him who believes, for that very God who made him, shall dwell in his heart, and enable him to do all that He pleases to employ him in. No man can properly understand the nature and design of the religion of Christ, who does not enter into the spirit of the pre-eding discourses.

CHAP. XVIII.

Jesus returns to a garden; and Judas leads a company together to apprehend Him, 1-3. At the word of Jesus, the officers, soldiers, and company fall to the ground, 4-6. Jesus, yielding up Himself, requires that his disciples should be dismissed, 7-9. Peter cuts off Malchus's ear, and Jesus reproves Him, 10, 11. Jesus is bound, and led away to Anna, and then to Caiaphas, 12-14. Peter is admitted into the palace, and then denies Christ, 15-18. Jesus is examined by the high priest, and struck by an officer, 19-24. Peter again denies Him, 25-27. Jesus is brought before Pilate, and declares that he is king of the Jews, 28-37. Pilate testifies to his innocence, and offers to release him; but the Jews prefer Barabbas the robber, 38-40.

WHEN Jesus had spoken these words, he went forth with his disciples over the brook Cedron, where was a garden, into the which he entered, and his disciples.

2 And Judas also, which betrayed him, knew the place; for Jesus oft-times resorted thither with his disciples.

3 Judas then, having received a band of men, and officers from the chief priests and Pharisees, cometh thither with lanterns, and torches, and weapons.

what house He was in, in the city, and He could have staid and met his sufferings there; but,

1. It was his custom when at Jerusalem, after He had spent the day in public work, to retire at night to the mount of Olives, in the skirts of the city, for they would not make room for Him in the palaces, in the heart of the town. He would not be put out of this his custom by the foresight of his sufferings, but, as Daniel, did then just as He did a foretime, Dan. 6: 10.

2. He was as unwilling as his enemies, that there should be an uproar among the people, for it was not his way to strive or cry; if He had been seized in the city, and a tumult raised, mischief might have been done. Note, When we find ourselves involved in trouble, we should be afraid of involving others. It is no disgrace to the followers of Christ to fall tamely. They who aim at honor from men, value themselves upon selling their lives as dear as they can; but they who know that their blood is precious to Christ, need not stand upon such terms.

3. He would set us an example in the beginning of his passion, as at the end of it, of retirement from the world. Let us go forth to Him without the camp, bearing his reproach, Heb. 13: 13. We must leave behind the crowds, and cares, and comforts of cities, even holy cities, if we would cheerfully take up our cross, and keep up our communion with God.

He went over the brook Cedron; running between Jerusalem and the mount of Olives; it points, 1. At David's prophecy concerning the Messiah, (Ps. 110: 7.) He shall drink of the brook in the way; the brook of suffering in the way to his glory and our salvation, signified by the brook of Cedron; the black brook, so called, either from the darkness of the valley it ran through the heart of the Lord Jesus, and the comfort of both is owing purely to Him. Christ had said but a little before, I in them; (v. 23.) and here it is repeated again, (though the sense was complete without it,) and the prayer closed with it, to show how much the heart of Christ was set upon it; all his petitions centre in this, and with this the prayers of Jesus, the Son of David, are ended; 'I in them; let Me have this, and I desire no more.' It is the glory of the Redeemer to dwell in the redeemed; it is his rest forever, and He has desired it. Let us therefore make sure our union with Christ, and then take the comfort of his intercession. This prayer had an end, but that, He ever lives to make.

CHAP. XVIII. v. "12. Hitherto this evangelist has recorded little of the history of Christ, only so far as was requisite to introduce his discourses; but now the time of Christ's death drew nigh, he is very particular in relating the circumstances of his sufferings, and some which the others had omitted, especially his sayings.

The hour was now come that the Captain of our salvation should engage the enemy. The day of recompense is in his heart, the year of his redeemed is come, his own arm works the salvation, for He has no second. Let us turn aside now, and see this great sight.

The office of the priest was to teach, and pray, and offer sacrifice; Christ, after teaching and praying, when He had spoken these words, (as Matt. 26: 1.) applies Himself to make atonement. Christ had said all He had to say as a prophet, and now He addresses Himself to the discharge of his office as a priest, to make his soul an offering for sin; and when He had gone through this, He entered upon his kingly office.

Having by his sermon prepared his disciples, and by his prayer, Himself, He went out. He entered not the lists, till He had put on his armor. Let those that suffer according to the will of God, in a good cause, with a good conscience, and a clear call to it, comfort themselves with this, that Christ will not engage those that are his in any conflict, but He will first prepare them for it; and if we receive Christ's instructions and comforts, and be interested in his intercession, we may, with unshaken resolution, venture through the greatest hardships in the way of duty.

He went forth with his disciples. Judas knew the place, and He could have staid and met his sufferings there; but, through, or the color of the water, tainted with the dirt of the city; such a brook Christ drank of, when it lay in the way of our redemption, and therefore shall He lift up the head, his own and ours. 2. In David's flight, from Absalom, particular notice is taken of his passing over the brook Cedron, and going up by the ascent of mount Olivet, weeping, and all that were with him in tears, 2 Sam. 15: 23, 30. The Son of David, being driven out by the rebellious Jews, who would not have Him to reign over them, (and Judas, like Ahithophel, being in the plot against Him,) passed over the brook in meanness and humiliation, attended by a company of true mourners. The godly kings of Judah had burnt and destroyed the idols they found at the brook Cedron; (Asa, 2 Chron. 15: 16. Hezekiah, 2 Chron. 30: 14. Josiah, 2 Kings 23: 4, 6,) into that brook the abominable things were cast. Christ, being now made sin for us, that He might abolish it, and take it away, began his passion by the same brook. Mount Olivet, where Christ began his sufferings, lay on the east of Jerusalem; mount Calvary, where He finished them, on the west.

He entered into a garden. This circumstance is noticed only by this evangelist. In the garden of Eden sin began; there the curse was pronounced, the Redeemer promised, and therefore in a garden that promised Seed entered the lists with the old serpent. Christ was buried also in a garden. 1. Let us, when we walk in our gardens, take occasion thence to meditate on Christ's sufferings in a garden, to which we owe all this pleasure, for by them the curse upon the ground for man's sake was removed. 2. In the midst of our possessions and enjoyments, we must keep up an expectation of troubles, for our gardens of delight are in a vale of tears.

He had his disciples with Him, 1. Because He used to take them with Him when He retired for prayer. 2. They must witness his sufferings, and patience, that they might with more assurance and affection preach them to the world, (Luke 24: 48.) and be prepared to suffer themselves. 3. He would take them into the danger, to show them their weakness, notwithstanding their promises of fidelity. Christ sometimes brings his people into difficulties, to magnify Himself in their deliverance.

Judas the traitor knew it to be the place of his usual retirement, and, probably, by some word Christ had dropped, knew He intended to be there that night. A solitary garden is a proper place for meditation and prayer, and, after a passover, a proper time to retire for devotion, that we may pray over the impressions made, and the vows renewed, and render them permanent.

Mention is made of Judas' knowing the place, 1. To aggravate the sin, that he would make use of his familiarity with Christ, as giving him an opportunity of betraying Him; a generous mind would have scorned so base a thing! Thus has Christ's holy religion been wounded in the house of its friends, so as it could not have been any where else. Many an apostate could not have been so profane as he is, if he had not been a professor; could not have ridiculed Scriptures and ordinances, if he had not known them.

2. To magnify the love of Christ, who went where He knew the traitor would seek Him, thus showing Himself willing to suffer and die for us. He went late in the night, (eight or nine o'clock;) it was not only his meal and drink, but his rest and sleep, to do the will of Him that sent Him. When others were going to bed, He was going to prayer, to suffer.

NOTES.

CHAP. XVIII. v. 1. Garden.] 'The original properly denotes a garden, or orchard; as in 19: 41, then a garden-house, or farm-house, as here. Hence it is called in Matt. 26: 36, and Mark 14: 32, by a word (translated place) which signifies both a farm and a farm-house. See John 4: 5 where it is translated parcel of ground, and Acts 28: 7, where it is translated possessions.' Tittman, in Bloomfield.

Verse 3.

Band.] 'Many ancient and most modern commentators understand by band, the Roman cohort, in garrison at the castle of Antonia, of from 1,000 to 600 men. If that were the whole garrison, we cannot imagine that the fortress would be abandoned: and therefore may suppose a synecdoche. What portion cannot be determined. Story and others conjecture, that it was a detachment of the soldiery which stood guard at the temple, on the nights of the festival. But such a number would scarcely be sufficient, considering the seditious spirit of the Jews, and how suddenly tumults broke out, especially at the festivals; and it can hardly be supposed that they would have been called off from so important a service. Michaelis, Kuinell, and others, understand the body of Levites, who stood guard over the temple by night. But the chief of this guard is here called chiliarch, which, with the term used for band, compels us to think only of Roman soldiers.' Bloomfield.

4 Jesus^a therefore, knowing all things that should come upon him, went forth, and said unto them, ¹ Whom seek ye?

5 They answered him, ¹ Jesus of Nazareth. Jesus saith unto them, I am he. And Judas also, which betrayed him, ¹ stood with them.

6 As soon then as he had said unto them, I am he, ² they went backward, and fell to the ground.

7 Then asked he them again, Whom seek ye? And they said, Jesus of Nazareth.

Judas received this band of men; probably he desired it, telling them how necessary it was to send a good force, and being as ambitious of the honor of commanding in chief in this expedition, as he was covetous of the wages of unrighteousness. He thought himself bravely preferred from the rear of the contemptible twelve, to the head of these hundreds; he never made such a figure before, and promised himself, perhaps, that this should not be the last time, if he succeeded in this enterprise.

They came with lanterns, and torches, and weapons.

If He should abscond, though they had moonlight, [the moon being at the full], they would have occasion for their lights; but they might have spared these; the second Adam was not driven, as the first was, to hide Himself, either for fear or shame, among the trees of the garden.

Our Lord repulsed the first onset of the enemy.

He received them with all mildness, and calmness. He met them with a very mild question; (v. 4.) Knowing all things that should come upon Him, and therefore not at all surprised, with wonderful intrepidity and presence of mind, He went forth to meet them, and, as if unconcerned, softly asked, Whom seek ye? What means this? See here, 1. Christ knew all that should come upon Him, for He had obliged Himself to suffer it; unless we had strength, as Christ had, to bear the discovery, we should not covet to know what shall come upon us; it would but anticipate our pain; sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof: yet it will do us good to expect sufferings in general, so that when they come we may say, 'It is but what we looked for, the cost we counted upon.' 2. When the people would have forced Christ to a crown, and offered to make Him king of Galilee, He hid Himself; (ch. 6: 15.) but when they came to force Him to a cross, He offered Himself; for He came to this world to suffer, and went to the other to reign. This will not warrant us needlessly to expose ourselves to trouble, for we know not when our hour is come; but we are called to suffering, when we have no way to avoid it, but by sin; and when it comes to that, let none of these things move us, for they cannot hurt us.

It would seem, their eyes were held, that they could not know Him. Probably many of the Roman band, at least the officers of the temple, had often seen Him; Judas, however, knew Him well enough, yet none of them could pretend to say, Thou art the man. Thus He showed them the folly of bringing lights to see Him, for He could make them not to know Him; and He has herein shewed us how easily He can infatuate his enemies, when they are speaking mischief.

In their inquiries for Him they called Him Jesus of Nazareth, the only title they knew Him by; probably, He was so called in their warrant. It was a name of reproach, to darken the evidence of his being the Messiah. By this it appears that they knew Him not, whence He was; for if they had known, surely they would not have persecuted Him.

Verse 4.

'The other evangelists relate that Judas went before and kissed Jesus; at what time, commentators are not agreed. I rather assent to those who think (as Kuinoel) it was before the words whom seek ye were pronounced; for there could be no need for the kiss after Jesus had told them that He was the person they sought.' BLOOMFIELD.

Verse 5

Judas stood with the company, so that he too was constrained to go 'backward, and fall to the ground;' yet he was not dismayed by that 1800:

The Captain of our salvation having taken the field, the enemy presently attacks Him; (v. 3.) Judas with his men comes thither, commissioned by the chief priests, especially those of them that were Pharisees, the most bitter enemies to Christ. This evangelist passes over Christ's agony, because the other three had fully related it, and presently introduces Judas and his company that came to seize Him.

The persons employed in this action—a band of men and officers from the chief priests, with Judas.

Here is a multitude engaged against Christ—a band of men, a Roman cohort, which some think was five hundred men, others a thousand. Christ's friends were few, his enemies many. Let us therefore not follow a multitude to do evil, nor fear a multitude designing evil to us, if God be for us.

It is a mixed multitude; the band of men were Roman soldiers; a detachment from the guards posted in the tower of Antonia, to be a curb upon the city; the officers of the chief priests, either their domestic servants, or the officers of their courts, were Jews; these had an enmity to each other, but were united against Christ, who came to reconcile both to God in one body.

It is a commissioned multitude; they have received orders from the chief priests, upon whose suggestions to the governor, that Jesus was a dangerous man, it is likely, they had a warrant to take Him up, for they feared the people. See what enemies Christ and his Gospel have, numerous, potent, and formidable; ecclesiastical and civil powers combined against them, Ps. 2: 1, 2. Christ said it would be so, Matt. 10: 18.

He fairly and mildly answers them, I am He. He did not improve the advantage He had against them by their blindness, as Elisha did against the Syrians, telling them, This is not the way, neither is this the city; but improves the opportunity of showing his willingness to suffer. Though they called Him Jesus of Nazareth, He answered to the name, for He despised the reproach: He might have said, I am not He, for He was Jesus of Bethlehem; but He would not allow equivocations. He has hereby taught us to own Him, whatever it cost us; not to be ashamed of Him or his words; but, even in difficult times, to confess Christ crucified, and manfully to fight under his banner. I am He, is the glorious name of the blessed God, (Exod. 3: 14.) and the honor of that name is justly challenged by the blessed Jesus.

Judas stood with them. He that used to stand with them that followed Christ, now stood with those that fought against Him. This describes an apostate; he is one that changes sides, herds himself with those with whom his heart always was, and with whom he shall have his lot in the judgment-day. This is mentioned, 1. To show the impudence of Judas, the confidence with which he now faced his master, and was not ashamed, neither could he blush. 2. To show that Judas was aimed at in that word, I am He; it was an arrow levelled at the traitor's conscience, and pierced him to the quick; for Christ's coming and his voice will be more terrible to apostates and betrayers, than to other sinners.

They went backward, and, like men thunder-struck, fell to the ground. Thus Christ was declared to be more than a man, even when He was trampled upon as a worm, and no man. This word, I am He, revived his disciples, and raised them up; (Matt. 14: 27.) but strikes his enemies down.

When He struck them down, He could have struck them dead; when He spake them to the ground, He could have spoken them to hell, like Korah's company; but He would not. The hour of his suffering was come, and He would not put it by; He would only show that his life was not forced from Him, but He laid it down of Himself. He would give an instance of his patience and forbearance with the worst of men, and his compassionate love to his very enemies. In striking them down, and no more, He gave them both a call, and a space to repent; but their hearts were hardened.

Thus, all his implacable enemies, that will not repent to give Him glory, shall flee, they shall fall before Him. Now the Scripture was accomplished, (Ps. 21: 15.) Thou shalt make them turn their back; and Ps. 20: 8. And it will be accomplished more and more; with the breath of his mouth He will slay the wicked, 2 Thes. 2: 8. Rev. 19: 21. What will He do when He shall come to judge, seeing He did this when He came to be judged? Augustin.

His enemies did not lie long where they fell, but, by divine permission, rose; it is only in the other world that God's judgments are everlasting. They are still eager to seize Him. They recover themselves, in some confusion, they cannot imagine why they could not keep their ground, but will impute it to any thing rather than Christ's power. Note, There are hearts so very hard in sin, that nothing will reduce and reclaim them. When they were fallen before Him, He did not insult over them, but repeats the question, and thus seems to come yet closer to their consciences; 'Do ye not know whom ye seek?' Are ye not aware that ye are in an error? Did ever any harden his heart against God and prosper? In repeating the same answer, they showed an obstinacy in their wicked way; they still called Him Jesus of Nazareth, with as display of power, but dared to proceed with his horrid purpose! It is wonderful, that the scribes, priests, and other Jews did not recollect the companies destroyed by fire from heaven, when they came to take Elijah; and that they should venture to renew their attempt after this unexpected repulse. SCOTT.

Verse 6.

Went backward.] "The phrase," says Lampe, "is appropriated to soldiers turning their backs on their enemies." So Ps. 58: 9. Jer. 46 9. &c. BLOOMFIELD

8 Jesus answered, I have told you that I am he. If therefore ye seek me, let these go their way:

9 That the saying might be fulfilled, which he spake, "Of them which thou gavest me have I lost none."

[Practical Observations.]

10 Then Simon Peter having a sword drew it, and smote the high priest's servant, and cut off his right ear. The servant's name was Malchus.

10-28. 13:1, 36. 16:32. Matt. 26:55. Mark 14:50-52. 1 Cor. 10:18. 2 Cor. 12:9. 1 Pet. 5:7. 17:12. p. 56. Mat. 26:51-54. Mark 14:30. 47. Luke 22:33, 49-51.

for though He has allotted us sufferings, yet He considers our frame, will wisely time the cross, and proportion it to our strength, and will deliver the godly either from, or through temptation. He gives us a good example of love to our brethren. We must not consult our own ease and safety only, but others', in some cases more than our own. There is a generous, heroic love, which will enable us to lay down our lives for the brethren, 1 John 3: 16.

2. He intended to give a specimen of his undertaking as Mediator. When He offered Himself to suffer and die, it was that we might escape.

Herein He confirmed the word He had spoken, Of them which Thou gavest Me, I have lost none. Christ, by fulfilling that word in this particular, gave an assurance that it should be accomplished in its full extent; not only for them that were now with Him, but for all that should believe on Him through their word. Though Christ's keeping them was meant especially of the preservation of their souls from sin, it is here applied to the preservation of their natural lives, and very fitly, for even the body was a part of Christ's care; He is to raise it up at the last day, and therefore to preserve that as well as the spirit and soul, 1 Thess. 5: 23. 2 Tim. 4: 17, 18. Christ will preserve the natural life for the service to which it is designed; it is to be used for Him, and He will not lose the service of it, but will be magnified in it, whether by life or death. Christ's witnesses shall not die till they have given in their evidence. But that is not all; this preservation of the disciples was, in the tendency of it, a spiritual preservation; they were now so weak that, in all probability, if they had been called out to suffer, they would have shamed themselves and their Master, and, at least the weaker of them, would have been lost; and therefore, that He might lose none, He would not expose them. The preservation of the saints is owing, not only to divine grace in proportioning the strength to the trial, but to divine providence in proportioning the trial to the strength.

Though his good intention excused Peter's act, (v. 10.) yet it would not justify it. 1. He had no warrant from his Master for it. Christ's soldiers must wait the word of command; before they expose themselves to sufferings, they must see not only that their cause be good, but their call clear. 2. He transgressed the duty of his place, and resisted the powers that were, which Christ had forbidden, (Matt. 5: 39.) resist not evil. 3. He opposed his Master's suffering, and, notwithstanding the rebuke he had for it once, is ready to repeat, Master, spare Thyself; though Christ had told him that He must and would suffer, and that his hour was now come: thus, while he seemed to fight for Christ, he fought against Him. 4. He broke the captivation his Master had lately made with the enemy: when He said, Let these go their way, He not only intended for their safety, but in effect passed his word for their good behavior; this Peter would not be bound by. As we may be guilty of a sinful cowardice when called to appear, so we may be of a sinful forwardness when called to retire. 5. He foolishly exposed himself much disdain as ever, and Judas as unrelenting as any of them. Let us therefore fear lest, by a few bold steps in a sinful way, our hearts be hardened.

When He shows his courage with reference to Himself, I have told you that I am He, He shows his care for his disciples, Let these go their way. He speaks this as a command, rather than a contract; for they lay at his mercy. 'Let these go their way'; it is at your peril if ye meddle with them.' This aggravated the sin of the disciples in forsaking Him, and particularly Peter's denying Him, that Christ had given them this warranty of protection. When Christ said, Let these go their way, He intended.

1. To manifest his concern for his disciples; when He exposed Himself, He excused them, because they were not as yet fit to suffer; their faith was weak, and their spirits low, and it would have been as much as their souls were worth, to bring them into sufferings now. New wine must not be put into old bottles. And they had other work to do; they are to go into all the world, to preach the Gospel; Destroy them not, for a blessing is in them. Herein, Christ gives us great encouragement to follow Him; and the disciples to the fury of the multitude. Thus many have been guilty of self-destruction, in their zeal for self-preservation. 6. Peter played the coward so soon after this that we have reason to think he would not have done this, but that he saw his Master cause them to fall on the ground; but when he saw Him surrender Himself notwithstanding, his courage failed him; whereas the true Christian who will appear in the cause of Christ, not only when it is prevailing, but when it seems to be declining.

We must acknowledge God's overruling providence in directing the stroke, (so that it only cut off his ear,) as also in giving opportunity to manifest Christ's power and goodness in healing the hurt, Luke 22: 51. Thus what was in danger of turning to Christ's reproach, redounded to his honor, even among his adversaries.

Put up thy sword into the sheath; it is a gentle reproof, because zeal carried him beyond the bounds of discretion; He did not aggravate the matter, only bid him do so no more. Many think, when they are in distress, it will excuse them if they be hasty: Christ has here set us an example of meekness in sufferings. Peter must put up his sword, for it was the sword of the Spirit that was to be committed to him; weapons of warfare not carnal, yet mighty. When Christ with a word felled the aggressors, He showed Peter how He should be armed, with a word, quick and powerful, and sharper than any two-edged sword, and with that, not long after this, he laid Ananias and Sapphira dead at his feet. Observe

The reason for this rebuke; The cup which my Father has given Me, shall I not drink it? Matthew relates another reason which Christ gave for this rebuke, but John preserves this, which he had omitted; in which Christ gives us,

1. A full proof of his submission to his Father's will. Of all that was amiss in what Peter did, He seems to resent nothing so much, as that He would have hindered his sufferings now that his hour was come. If Christ be determined to suffer and die, it is presumption for Peter to oppose it; Shall I not drink it? The manner of expression speaks a settled resolution. He was willing to drink of this cup, though bitter, an infusion of wormwood and gall, the cup of trembling, the dregs of the cup of the Lord's wrath, Isa. 51: 22. He drank it, that He might put into our hands the cup of salvation, of consolation, of blessing; He is willing to drink it, because his Father put it into his hand. If so, it is for the best.

2. A pattern of submission to God's will in every thing that concerns us. We must pledge Christ in the cup that He drank of, (Matt. 20: 23.) and must argue ourselves into a compliance. 1. It is but a cup; a small matter comparatively, he it what it will. It is not a sea, a red, or dead sea, for it is not hell; it is light, and but for a moment. 2. It is a cup that is given us; sufferings are gifts. 3. It is given us by a Father, who has a Father's authority, and does us no hurt; a Father's affection, and means us no wrong.

Having entirely reconciled Himself to the

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-9. Even the valence of our Lord's enemies did not render them more eager to crucify Him, than his love to sinners made him ready to meet those sufferings, which He knew were coming on Him, that He might effect their salvation! Yet 'the day of his wrath' will come, when all who oppose, yea, all who do not obey, his Gospel, shall be driven backward and perish forever. (2 Thes. 1: 6-10.) In the mean time He spares and warns his adversaries: yet neither his terror, nor his forbearance, will deter men in general from their purpose, in contempt of his salvation, and in defiance of his vengeance.—But He regards the temporal peace and safety, as well as the eternal interests, of his disciples: proportions their trials to their strength; nor will ever require them to bear such sufferings for Him, as He bore for them, or any that are comparable to them.

bonds, submitted to be bound for us, else we had been bound hand and foot, and reserved in chains of darkness. Thus the Son maketh us free. 3. The types and prophecies of the Old Testament were herein accomplished; Isaac was bound, to be sacrificed; Joseph was bound, and the irons entered into his soul, in order to his being brought from prison to reign, Ps. 105:18. Samson was bound, to slay more of the Philistines at his death than in his life. And the Messiah was prophesied of as a prisoner, Isa. 53:8. 4. Christ was bound, that He might bind us to obedience. His bonds for us are bonds upon us, by which we are forever obliged to love and serve Him. Paul's salutation to his friends, is Christ's to us all; 'Remember my bonds, (Col. 4:18.) remember them as bound with Him from all sin, and to all duty.' 5. Christ's bonds for us were designed to make our bonds for Him easy, if at any time we be so called out to suffer for Him; to sanctify, sweeten, and honor them; these enabled Paul and Silas to sing in the stocks, and Ignatius to call his bonds for Christ spiritual pearls.

V. 13-27. Some passages that occur here were omitted in the other gospels; Peter's denying Him, there given by itself, is interwoven with the other passages here. The crime laid to his charge, having relation to religion, the judges of the spiritual court took cognizance of it; both Jews and Gentiles seized Him, and so both tried and condemned Him, for He died for the sins of both.

They led Him away in triumph, as a trophy of their victory; as a lamb to the slaughter; and they hurried Him with violence through the sheep gate, (Neh. 3:1.) between the mount of Olives and Jerusalem. We had been led away of our own impetuous lusts, and led captive by Satan at his will, and, that we might be rescued, Christ was led away captive, by Satan's agents.

It was now midnight, and one would think they should have put Him in ward, (Lev. 24:12.) till a proper time to call a court; but He is hurried away, not to the justice, to be committed, but to the judges, to be condemned: partly because they feared a rescue, partly because they greedily thirsted after his blood, as the eagle that hasteth to the prey.

They led Him to Annas first; as some think, to be paid for their service. I suppose Annas was old and infirm, and could not be present in dispensation. He calmly surrendered Himself a prisoner. One would have thought the cure of Malchus' ear would have made them relent, but nothing could win upon them. Accused rage, which the grandeur of the miracle could not appease, nor the tenderness of the favor conciliate, Anselm.

They took Jesus. Only some few of them could lay hands on Him, but it is charged upon them all, for they were aiding and abetting; in treason there are no accessories; all are principals. Now the Scripture was fulfilled, Bulls have compassed me, (Ps. 22:12, 113:12.) The breath of our nostrils is taken in their pit, Lam. 4:20. Often frustrated in attempts to seize Him, they now flew upon Him with the more violence.

They bound Him. This particular is noticed only by this evangelist, that He was pinioned; tradition says, 'They bound Him with such cruelty, that the blood started out at his finger's ends; and having bound his hands behind Him, they put an iron chain about his neck, and with that dragged Him along.'

This speaks the spite of his persecutors. 1. That they might torment Him, as they bound Samson to afflict Him. 2. That they might put Him to shame; slaves were bound, so was Christ, though free-born. 3. That they might prevent his escape, Judas having hidden them hold Him fast. See their folly, that they should think to fetter that power which had but just now proved itself omnipotent! 4. They bound Him as one already condemned, for they were resolved to prosecute Him to death, and that He should die as a fool dieth, as a malefactor, with his hands bound, 2 Sam. 3:33, 34. Christ had bound the consciences of his persecutors with the power of his word, which galled them; and to be revenged, they laid these bonds on Him.

Christ's being bound was very significant; in this, as in other things, there was a mystery. 1. Before they bound Him, He had bound Himself to the office of Mediator; He was already bound to the horns of the altar with the cords of his own love to man, and duty to his Father, else their cords would not have held Him. 2. We were bound with the cords of our iniquities, (Prov. 5:22.) with the yoke of our transgressions, Lam. 1:14. Guilt is a bond on the soul, by which we are bound over to the judgment of God; by corruption we are bound under the power of Satan. Christ, to free us from those bonds, submitted to be bound for us, else we had been bound hand and foot, and reserved in chains of darkness. Thus the Son maketh us free. 3. The types and prophecies of the Old Testament were herein accomplished; Isaac was bound, to be sacrificed; Joseph was bound, and the irons entered into his soul, in order to his being brought from prison to reign, Ps. 105:18. Samson was bound, to slay more of the Philistines at his death than in his life. And the Messiah was prophesied of as a prisoner, Isa. 53:8. 4. Christ was bound, that He might bind us to obedience. V. 13-27. Some passages that occur here were omitted in the other gospels; Peter's denying Him, there given by itself, is interwoven with the other passages here. The crime laid to his charge, having relation to religion, the judges of the spiritual court took cognizance of it; both Jews and Gentiles seized Him, and so both tried and condemned Him, for He died for the sins of both.

They led Him away in triumph, as a trophy of their victory; as a lamb to the slaughter; and they hurried Him with violence through the sheep gate, (Neh. 3:1.) between the mount of Olives and Jerusalem. We had been led away of our own impetuous lusts, and led captive by Satan at his will, and, that we might be rescued, Christ was led away captive, by Satan's agents.

It was now midnight, and one would think they should have put Him in ward, (Lev. 24:12.) till a proper time to call a court; but He is hurried away, not to the justice, to be committed, but to the judges, to be condemned: partly because they feared a rescue, partly because they greedily thirsted after his blood, as the eagle that hasteth to the prey.

They led Him to Annas first; as some think, to be paid for their service. I suppose Annas was old and infirm, and could not be present in council at that time of night, yet earnestly desired to see the prey. To gratify him, therefore, and receive his blessing, they produce their prisoner before him. It is sad to see the old and sickly, when they cannot commit sin as formerly, taking pleasure in them that do. Light-foot thinks Annas was not present, because he was to attend early to examine the sacrifices whether they were without blemish; if so, there was a significance in it, that Christ, the great Sacrifice, was presented to him, and sent away bound, as approved and ready for the altar.

The kindred between Annas and Caiaphas, is a reason either why Caiaphas ordered that Annas should be favored with the first sight of the prisoner, or that Annas was willing to countenance Caiaphas in a matter so near his heart. Note, Alliance with wicked people greatly confirms many in wicked ways.

Annas was as willing as any to have the prosecution pushed on, and therefore sent Him bound to Caiaphas. His house was appointed for the rendezvous of the sanhedrim upon this occasion; or the usual place in the temple, where the high priest kept his court.

Caiaphas was high priest that same year. The high priest's commission was during life; but there were now such frequent changes by the artifices of aspiring men, that it was become almost an annual office, a presage of its approaching end; while they were undermining one another, God was overturning them all, that He might come, whose right it was. 1. When a bad thing was to be done by a high priest, according to the foreknowledge of God, Providence so ordered it, that a bad man should be in the chair to do it. 2. When God would make appear what corruption was in the heart of a bad man, He put him into a place of power, where he had temptation and opportunity to exert it. It was the ruin of Caiaphas, that he was high priest that year, and so became a ringleader in putting Christ to death. Many a man's advancement has lost him his reputation.

The malice of Caiaphas is intimated, (v. 14.) by the repeating of what he had said some time before, that, right or wrong, guilty or innocent, it was expedient one man should die for the people, ch. 11:50. This shows, 1. That this bad man governed himself and the church by rules of policy, in defiance of equity. 2. What ill usage Christ was likely to meet with in his court, when his case was adjudged before it was heard; so that his trial was a jest. Thus the enemies of Christ's Gospel are resolved, true or false, to run it down. 3. It attests our Lord's innocence; one of his worst enemies owned He fell a sacrifice to the public good, and that it was not just He should die, only expedient.

Annas made himself a partaker in guilt; for he approved it by continuing Him bound, when he should have loosed Him. He not being convicted, nor having attempted an escape. If we do not what we can, to undo what others have ill done, we are accessories after the fact. It was more excusable in the soldiers to bind Him, than in Annas to continue Him bound. The chief priest and council condemned Him to death. Annas was not present, yet thus wished them good speed.

With much ado Peter got into the hall where the court sat. His kindness to Christ appeared in two things. 1. He followed Jesus when He was led away; though at first he fled with the rest, yet afterward he took heart, and followed at some distance; calling to mind the promises he had made to adhere to Him, whatever it cost. They that followed Christ in the midst of his honors, and shared in them, ought to have followed Him now in his reproaches. They that truly love Christ, will follow Him all ways. 2. When he could not get in where Jesus was, he stood at the door without, willing to be as near Him as he could, and waiting for an opportunity to get nearer. When we meet with opposition in following Christ, we must (12.) Officers of the Jews.] See note, Luke 22:52.

(13.) To Annas.] It appears from Josephus, that Annas had been high priest before his son-in-law Caiaphas, so that though he had resigned that office himself, yet the people paid so much regard to his experience, that they brought Jesus first to him. We do not read of any thing remarkable which passed at the house of Annas, for which reason his being carried thither is omitted by the other evangelists.

16 But Peter stood at the door without. Then went out that other disciple, which was known unto the high priest, and spake unto her that kept the door, and brought in Peter.

17 Then saith the damsel that kept the door unto Peter, Art not thou also one of this man's disciples? He saith, I am not.

18 And the servants and officers stood there, who had made a fire of coals, (for it was cold,) and they warmed themselves: and Peter stood with them, and warmed himself.

Nero's,) as well as in crowds. We must not conclude a man to be no friend to Christ, merely because he has acquaintance and conversation with his known enemies.

This other disciple showed respect to Peter, in introducing him, not only to gratify his curiosity and affection, but to give him an opportunity of serving his Master on his trial. Those that have a real kindness for Christ, though their temper may be reserved, and their circumstances lead them to be cautious, yet, if their faith be sincere, will discover, when called to it, their inclination, by being ready to do a disciple a good turn.

But this kindness proved a great unkindness. Note, The courtesies of our friends often prove a snare to us, through a misguided affection. Peter was immediately assaulted with the temptation. Observe, How slight the attack. It was a maid, of so small account, that she was only set to keep the door; and she only asked him carelessly, Art not thou one of this man's disciples? suspecting it by his sheepish look. We should many a time better maintain a good cause, if we had a good heart on it, and could put a good face on it. He might without danger have answered, And what if I am? Suppose the servants had ridiculed him, those can bear but little for Christ, that cannot bear that: it is but running with the foolmen.

How speedy his surrender; without taking time to recollect himself, he answered, I am not. If he had had the boldness of the lion, he would have said, 'It is my honor that I am so;' or if he had had the wisdom of the serpent, he would have kept silence. But all his care being for his own safety, he thought he could not secure that but by a peremptory denial, I am not; he not only denies it, but even disdains it.

Yet he goes further into the temptation, v. 18. The servants made much of themselves; they made a fire in the hall, not for their masters' (they were so eager in prosecuting Christ, that they forgot cold,) but to refresh themselves. They cared not what became of Christ, all their care was to sit and warm themselves, Amos 6: 6.

Peter herded with them, v. 18. (1.) It was bad enough, that he did not attend his Master, at the upper end of the hall, where He was under examination. He might have been a witness for Him, and have confronted the false witnesses, if his Master had called Him; however, he might have been a witness to Him, might have taken an exact notice of what passed, that he might relate it to the other disciples; he might have learned by his Master's example how to suffer; yet neither conscience nor curiosity could bring him into the court, but he sits by, as if, like Gallio, he cared for none of these things. At the same time we have reason to think his heart was full of grief and concern, but he had not courage to own it. Lord, lead us not into temptation.

(2.) He joined with his Master's enemies; he warmed himself; that was a poor excuse for joining with them. A little thing will draw those into bad company, that will be drawn to it by the love of a good fire. Had Peter's zeal for his Master continued as warm as it seemed a few hours before, he had not had occasion to warm himself now. Peter was much to be blamed, show our good-will. Yet this kindness of Peter's was no kindness, because he had not courage enough to persevere, and so, as it proved, run himself into a snare: and even his following Christ, considering all things, was to be blamed; because Christ had expressly told him, (ch. 13: 36.) Whither I go, thou canst not follow. Me now; and had told him again, and again that he would deny Him; and he had lately had experience of his own weakness. Note, We must not tempt God, by running upon difficulties beyond our strength, and venturing too far in the way of suffering. If our call be clear to expose ourselves, we may hope that God will enable us to honor Him; if not, we may fear He will leave us to shame ourselves.

John several times in this gospel speaking of himself as another disciple, many interpreters have been led by that to fancy that this other disciple here was John; and many conjectures they have, how he should come to be known to the high priest;—being of superior birth, saith Jerom, as if he were better born than his brother James, when they were both the sons of Zebedee the fisherman: some will tell you that he had sold his estate to the high priest; others, that he supplied his family with fish. But I see no reason to think that this other disciple was John, or one of the twelve; other sheep Christ had, which were not of the fold; and this might be, as the Syriac reads it,—one of those other disciples that believed in Christ, but resided in Jerusalem; perhaps Joseph of Arimathea, or Nicodemus, known to the high priest, but not as disciples of Christ. Note, There are good people hid in courts, (even in

1. Because he associated himself with these wicked men. Doubtless, they were diverting themselves with this night's expedition, scoffing at Christ, at what He had said and done, and triumphing in their victory: what sort of entertainment would this give Peter? If he said as they said, or by silence gave consent, he involved himself in sin; if not, he exposed himself to danger. If Peter had not courage to appear for his Master, he might have had so much devotion as to retire, and weep in secret for his Master's sufferings, and his own sin in forsaking Him; if he could not have done good, he might have kept out of the way of doing hurt. It is better to abscond, than appear to no purpose, or bad purpose.

2. He desired to be thought one of them, that he might not be suspected to be a disciple of Christ. Gather not my soul among sinners. Hereafter, should dread the seat of the scornful now. It is ill warming ourselves with those, with whom we are in danger of burning, Ps. 141: 4.

Peter, Christ's friend, having begun to deny Him, the high priest, his enemy, begins to accuse Him, or rather urges Him to accuse Himself, v. 19—21. The first attempt was to prove Him a seducer, a teacher of false doctrine; and when they failed, they charged Him with blasphemy, which, being related by the other evangelists, is omitted here.

The process was against law and equity; they seize Him as a criminal, and now that He is their prisoner, they have nothing to lay to his charge; no libel, no prosecutor; but the judge must himself be the prosecutor, and the prisoner Himself the witness, and, against all reason and justice, his own accuser.

The high priest then, (or therefore, which seems to refer to v. 14.) because he had resolved that Christ must be sacrificed to private malice, under color of the public good, examined Him upon those interrogatories which would touch his life.

1. Concerning his disciples, that he might charge Him with sedition, and as being dangerous to the Roman government, as well as to the Jewish church. He asked Him who were his disciples—their number—of what country—their names and characters? insinuating that his scholars were designed for soldiers, and would in time become a formidable body. Some think his question concerning his disciples, was, 'What is now become of them? Why do they not appear?' Upbraiding Him with their cowardice; thus adding to his affliction. There was something significant in this, that Christ's calling and owning his disciples was the first thing laid to his charge, for it was for their sakes that He sanctified Himself and suffered.

2. Concerning his doctrine, that they might charge Him with heresy, and bring Him under the penalty of the law against false prophets, Deut. 13: 9, 10. This was a matter cognizable in that court, Deut. 17: 12. They could not prove any false doctrine upon Him; but hoped to extort something from Him, which they might distort to his prejudice, and to make Him an offender for some word, Isa. 29: 21. They said nothing concerning his miracles, by which He had done so much good, and proved his doctrine, because of these they could take no hold. Thus the adversaries of Christ, while industriously quarrelling with his truth, shut their eyes against the evidences of it.

In answer to these interrogatories, 1. As to his disciples, He said nothing; it was an impertinent question; if his doctrine were good, his having disciples to whom to communicate it, was no more than was allowed by their own doctors. If Caiaphas, in asking Him concealin Judea about the season of the passover. Biddulph, the English traveller, speaks of heavy, cold dews, which sometimes chilled the air at that season of the year, and it was now the middle of the night.'

The evangelist shows that he himself was in the inner court with his Master, and therefore saw and heard every thing; but Peter, being in the outer one knew nothing of what was going on.

10 ¶ The high priest then asked Jesus of his disciples and of his doctrine.

20 Jesus answered him, 'I spake openly to the world; I ever taught in the synagogue, and in the temple, whither the Jews always resort: and in secret have I said nothing.

21 Why askest thou me? ask them which heard me, what I have said unto them: behold, they know what I said.

22 And when he had thus spoken, one of the officers, which stood by, struck Jesus with the palm of his hand, saying, Answerest thou the high priest so?

23 Jesus answered him, ° If I have spoken evil, bear witness of the evil; but if well, why smitest thou me?

He appeals to those that had heard Him, and desires they might be examined what doctrine He had preached, and whether it had a dangerous tendency; Ask them that heard Me, what I said unto them. He means not his friends and followers, but any impartial hearer, your own officers. Some think He pointed to them, when He said, Behold, they know what I said, referring to their report, (ch. 7: 6.) Never man spake like this man. You may ask some upon the bench; for it is probable that some of them had heard Him. Note, The doctrine of Christ may safely appeal to all that know it, and has so much right and reason on its side, that they who will judge impartially, cannot but witness to it.

While the judges examined Him, the servants stood by, abusing Him; (v. 22, 23.) though He spake with so much calmness and evidence, this insolent fellow struck Him with the palm of his hand, probably on the side of his head or face, saying, Answerest Thou the high priest so? As if He had behaved Himself rudely to the court.

Some think it was a blow with a rod or wand, or with the staff, the badge of his office. Now the Scripture was fulfilled, (Isa. 50: 6.) I gave my cheeks to blows. The Seventy use the same Greek word as is here used. And Mic. 5: 1. They shall smite the Judge of Israel with a rod upon the cheek; and Job 16: 10. They have smitten me upon the cheek reproachfully. It was unjust to strike one that neither said nor did amiss; it was insolent for a servant to strike one that was confessedly a person of account; it was cowardly to strike one that had his hands tied; and barbarous to strike a prisoner at the bar. Here was a breach of the peace in the face of the court, [504]

ing his disciples, designed to bring them into trouble; it was in kindness to them that He had said, Let these go their way. If he meant to upbraid Him with their cowardice, no wonder He said nothing. He would say nothing to condemn, and could say nothing to justify them. 2. As to his doctrine, He said nothing in particular, but in general referred Himself to those that heard Him, being not only made manifest to God, but also in their consciences, v. 20, 21.

He tacitly charges his judges with illegal proceedings; He does not indeed speak evil of the rulers of the people, nor say to these princes, Ye are wicked; but appeals to the rules of their own court. Do ye indeed judge righteously? Ps. 58: 1. So here, Why ask ye Me? Which implies two absurdities in judgment: 1. Why ask ye Me now concerning my doctrine, when ye have already condemned it? They had made an order of court for excommunicating all that owned Him, (ch. 9: 22.) had issued a proclamation for apprehending Him; and now come to ask what his doctrine is. Thus was He condemned, as his doctrine and cause commonly are, unheard. 2. Why ask ye Me? Must I accuse Myself, when ye have no evidence against Me?

He insists upon his fair and open dealing with them in the publication of his doctrine. The crime which the sanhedrim by the law was to inquire after, was the clandestine spreading of dangerous doctrines, Deut. 13: 6. As to this, therefore, Christ clears Himself fully. He spake openly,—with freedom and plainness of speech; did not deliver things ambiguously, as Apollo his oracles. Those that would spread corrupt notions, do it by sly insinuations, queries, starting difficulties, and asserting nothing; but Christ explained Himself fully, with Verily, verily, I say unto you; his reproofs were free and bold, his testimonies express against the corruptions of the age. He spake to the world, to all that had ears to hear, and were willing to hear Him, high or low, learned or unlearned, Jew or Gentile, friend or foe; his doctrine feared not the censure of a mixed multitude; nor did He grudge the knowledge of it to any, (as the masters of some rare invention do,) but communicated it, as the sun his beams.

When in the country, He preached in the synagogues—the places of meeting for worship on the sabbath-day—the time of meeting; when He came to Jerusalem, He preached the same doctrine in the temple at the feasts, when the Jews from all parts assembled there; though He often preached in houses, on mountains, and by the sea-side, to show that his Word and worship were not to be confined to temples and synagogues; yet what He preached in private, was the same with what He delivered publicly. While the judges examined Him, the servants stood by, abusing Him; (v. 22, 23.) though He spake with so much calmness and evidence, this insolent fellow struck Him with the palm of his hand, probably on the side of his head or face, saying, Answerest Thou the high priest so? As if He had behaved Himself rudely to the court.

Some think it was a blow with a rod or wand, or with the staff, the badge of his office. Now the Scripture was fulfilled, (Isa. 50: 6.) I gave my cheeks to blows. The Seventy use the same Greek word as is here used. And Mic. 5: 1. They shall smite the Judge of Israel with a rod upon the cheek; and Job 16: 10. They have smitten me upon the cheek reproachfully. It was unjust to strike one that neither said nor did amiss; it was insolent for a servant to strike one that was confessedly a person of account; it was cowardly to strike one that had his hands tied; and barbarous to strike a prisoner at the bar. Here was a breach of the peace in the face of the court, [504] yet the judges countenanced it. Confusion of face was our due; but Christ here took it to Himself; 'Upon Me be the curse, the shame

He checked Him in a haughty, imperious manner; Answerest Thou the high priest so? As if the blessed Jesus were not good enough or wise enough to know how to speak, but, like a rude and ignorant prisoner, must be controlled by the jailer, and taught how to behave.

This was done to please the high priest; for what he said, speaks a jealousy for the dignity of the high priest. Wicked rulers will not want wicked servants, to help forward the affliction of those their masters persecute. A successor of this high priest commanded the by-standers to smite Paul on the mouth, Acts 23: 2. Some think this officer took himself to be affronted by Christ's appeal to those about Him, as if He would have vouched him to be a witness; and perhaps he was one of those officers that had spoken honorably of Him, (ch. 7: 46.) and lest he should now be thought a secret friend to Him, appears a bitter enemy.

Christ bore this affront with meekness; 'If I have spoken evil, in what I have now said, bear witness of the evil to the court; let them judge of it; but if well, why smitest thou Me?' Christ could have answered him with a miracle of wrath, could have struck him dumb or dead, or have withered the hand lifted against Him. But this was the day of his patience, and He answered him with the meekness of wisdom, to teach us not to avenge ourselves, nor to render railing for railing, but to bear injuries, even when with the wisdom of the serpent we show the injustice of them, and appeal to the magistracy concerning them. Christ did not here turn the other cheek, by which it appears that that rule, Matt. 5: 39. is not to be understood literally; a man may possibly turn the other cheek, and yet have his heart full of malice; but, comparing Christ's precept with his pattern, we learn, that in such cases we must not be our own avengers, or judges; we must rather receive than give the second blow; we are allowed to defend, but not to avenge ourselves; the magistrate (if necessary) is to be the avenger, Rom. 13: 4. Our resentment of injuries must always be rational, and never passionate; Christ, when He suffered, reasoned, but threatened not. He fairly expostulated with him that did Him the injury, and so may we. When called to suffer, we must accommodate ourselves to the inconveniences of a suffering state, with patience, and by one indignity done us be prepared to receive another, and make the best of it.

While the servants were thus abusing Him, Peter was proceeding to deny Him the second time, (v. 25-27.) hearing, perhaps, that Christ was examined about his disciples, and fearing to be seized if he should own it.

It was folly to continue in the company of those that were unsuitable for him, and with whom he had nothing to do. He said to warm himself; but they that warm themselves with evil-doers, grow cold toward good people and good things. Peter might have stood by his Master at the bar, and warmed himself better, at the fire of his Master's love, which many readers could not quench, Cant. 8: 6, 7. He might have warmed himself with zeal for his Master, and indignation at his persecutors; but chose rather to warm himself with them.

He was again assaulted by the temptation, and no other could be expected, for this was a place, this an hour, of temptation. When the judge asked Christ about his disciples, probably the servants took the hint, and challenged Peter for one of them. See, 1. The subtlety of the tempter in mustering a greater force against one whom he saw falling; not a maid now, but all the servants. Note, Yielding to one temptation invites another, and a stronger. Satan troubles his attacks when we give ground. 2. The danger of bad company. We commonly study to approve ourselves to those with whom we choose to associate ourselves; we value ourselves on their good word, and covet to stand right in their opinion. As we choose our people we choose our praise; we are therefore concerned 24 Now ^p Annas had sent him bound unto Caiaphas the high priest.

25 And Simon Peter stood and warmed himself. They said therefore unto him, Art not thou a so one of his disciples? He denied it, and said, I am not.

26 One of the servants of the high priest, being his kinsman whose ear Peter cut off, saith, Did not I see thee in the garden with him?

27 Peter then denied again; and immediately the cock crew.

28 ¶ Then led they Jesus from Caiaphas unto the hall of judgment; and it was early; and they themselves went not into the judgment-hall, lest they should be defiled; but that they might eat the passover.

29 Pilate then went out unto them, and said, What accusation bring ye against this man?

30 They answered and said unto him, If he were not a malefactor, we would not have delivered him up unto thee.

Roman court, and executed his death, they took this course, 1. That He might not be put to death in a popular tumult, as Stephen, but with the present formalities of justice. Many are less afraid of the sin, than of the scandal of it. See Acts 5:28.

It was early; so there would be less danger of opposition from the people that were for Christ; while, at the same time, they had their agents about, to call those together, whom they could influence against Him. How their heart was upon it, and how violent they were in the prosecution, even denouncing themselves their natural rots! See Mic. 2:1.

o make the first choice well, and not to mingle with those whom we cannot please without displeasing God.

It was his great weakness, nay, his wickedness, to yield to temptation, and say, I am not one of his disciples, as one ashamed of what was his honor. The fear of man brings a snare. When Christ was admired, and treated with respect, Peter pleased, and perhaps prided himself, that he was a disciple of Christ, and so shared in the honors of his Master; but many who seem fond of the reputation of religion when it is in fashion, are ashamed of the reproach of it; but we must take it for better and worse.

He repeated the sin the third time, v. 26, 27. He was attacked by one of the servants, a kinsman to Malchus, who gave him the lie with great assurance; Did not I see thee in the garden with Him? Witness my kinsman's ear. Peter denied again, as if he knew nothing of Christ, nothing of the garden, nothing of all this matter.

Before, his relation to Christ was only suspected, here, it is proved by one that saw him with Jesus. Note, They who by sin think to help themselves out of trouble, do but entangle themselves the more. Dare to be brave, for truth will out. A bird of the air may perhaps tell the matter which we seek to conceal with a lie. Notice is taken of this servant's being akin to Malchus, because it would make it the more a terror to Peter; 'Now,' thinks he, 'I am gone.' We should not, if we can help it, make any man our enemy, because either he or some of his relations may at some time have us at their mercy. He that may need a friend, should not make a foe. But though here was sufficient evidence against Peter, and sufficient provocation given by his denial, to have prosecuted him, no harm is done him. Note, We are often drawn into sin by groundless fears, which a small degree of wisdom and resolution would make nothing of.

He denied again. See here the nature of sin; the heart is hardened by the deceitfulness of it, Heb. 3:13. It was a strange degree of effrontery, that he could with such assurance stand in a lie against so clear a disproof; but the beginning of sin is as the letting forth of water. The sin of lying is a fruitful sin, and upon that account exceeding sinful; one lie needs another to support it, and that another. It is a rule in the devil's politics, To cover sin with sin, in order to escape detection.

The hint for awakening his conscience was seasonable and happy; Immediately the cock crew; and this is all that is said of his repentance, it being recorded by the other evangelists. This brought him to himself, by bringing to his mind the words of Christ. See here, 1. The care Christ has of those that are his, notwithstanding their follies; though they fall, they are not utterly cast down, nor utterly cast off. 2. The advantage of having faithful remembrancers near us, who, though they cannot tell us more than we know already, yet may remind us of what we have forgotten. The crowing of the cock to others had no significance; but to Peter it was the voice of God to his conscience.

V. 28-40. Here is Christ's arraignment before Pilate, the Roman governor, in the praetor's house, or hall of judgment; thither they hurried Him, to get Him condemned in the

by the Roman power. Being resolved on his death, they took this course, 1. That He might not be put to death in a popular tumult, as Stephen, but with the present formalities of justice. Thus He was treated as a malefactor, being made sin for us. 2. If they could engage the Roman government in the matter, which the people stood in awe of, there would be little danger of an uproar. 3. The death of the cross, which the Romans commonly used, being the most ignominious, they were desirous by it to put an indelible mark of infamy upon Him. Therefore they repeatedly cried, Crucify Him. 4. It was invidious to put one to death, that had done so much good in the world, and therefore they were willing to throw the odium upon the Roman government. Many are less afraid of the sin, than of the scandal of it. See Acts 5:28.

It was early; so there would be less danger of opposition from the people that were for Christ; while, at the same time, they had their agents about, to call those together, whom they could influence against Him. How their heart was upon it, and how violent they were in the prosecution, even denouncing themselves their natural rots! See Mic. 2:1.

Their superstition and hypocrisy; The chief priests and elders, though they came with the prisoner, that the thing might be done effectually, went not into the judgment-hall, because it was the house of an uncircumcised Gentile, lest they should be defiled, but kept out of doors, that they might eat the passover, not the paschal lamb, (that was eaten the night before,) but the passover-feast, upon the sacrifices which were offered on the fifteenth day, the passover-bullocks, spoken of, Deut. 16:2. 2 Chron. 30:24, 35:8, 9. They would not go into the court for fear of touching a Gentile, and thereby contracting, not a legal, but only a traditional pollution. This they scrupled, but made no scruple of breaking through all the laws of equity, to persecute Christ to death. They strained at a gnat, and swallowed a camel.

Pilate called the prosecutors first, who stated what they had to say against the prisoner, v. 29-32.

The judge calls for the indictment. Because they would not come into the hall, He went out to them. Looking upon Pilate as a magistrat, that we may give every one his due, here are three things commendable in him:

1. His diligent application to business. On a good occasion, it had been very well that he was willing to be called up early to the judgment-seat. Men in public trusts must not love their ease.

2. His condescension to the humor of the people, and receding from the honor of his place, to gratify their scruples. He might have said, 'If they be so nice as not to come in to me, let them go home as they came;' but Pilate insists not upon it, and goes out to them; when it is for good, we should become all things to all men.

3. His adherence to the rule of justice, in demanding the accusation, suspecting the prosecution to be malicious, v. 29. It was a law of nature, before Valerius Publicola made it a Roman law, That no man should be condemned unheard. See Acts 25:16, 17. It is unreasonable to commit a man, without alleging some cause in the warrant, and much more to arraign a man, when there is no bill of indictment against him.

The prosecutors demand judgment against Him, on a general surmise that He was a criminal; not alleging any thing in particular worthy of death or of bonds; v. 30. This was,

1. Very rude and uncivil to Pilate, when he was so complaisant to them. His question was most reasonable, but had it been the most absurd, they could not have answered with more disdain. It was,

2. Very spiteful towards Jesus; right or wrong, they will have Him to be a malefactor. We are to presume a man innocent till he is proved guilty; not so they. They cannot say, 'He is a traitor, a murderer, a breaker of the peace,' but say, 'He is an evil-doer.' He, who went about doing good! Let those he asked whom He had cured, and fed, and taught, rescued from devils, and raised from death, whether He were an evil-doer.

3. They were very conceited of themselves, and of their own judgment and justice, as if their delivering a man up, under the general character of a malefactor, were sufficient to ground a judicial sentence upon.

The judge remanded Him to their own court; v. 31. Some think Pilate here complimented them, acknowledging the remains of their power. Corporal punishment they might inflict, as scourging in their synagogues; whether capital or no, is uncertain; 'But,' saith Pilate, 'as far as your law will allow you, and if you go further, it shall be connived at.' This he said, willing to do the Jews a pleasure.

Others think he bantered them, upon their present state of subjection. They would be the sole judges of the guilt. 'If you will be so, go on as you have begun; you have found Him guilty by your own law, condemn Him by your own law.' Nothing is more absurd, than for those to pretend to dictate, who are weak and in subordinate stations. Some think Pilate reflects upon the law of Moses, as if that allowed the judging of a man unheard; 'It may be,

31 Then said Pilate unto them, 'Take ye him, and judge him according to your law.' The Jews therefore said unto him, 'It is not lawful for us to put any man to death.'

32 That 'the saying of Jesus might be fulfilled, which he spake, signifying 'what death he should die.

(Practical Observations.)

33 Then Pilate entered into the judgment-hall again, and called Jesus, and said unto him, Art thou 'the King of the Jews?'

34 Jesus answered him, 'Sayest thou this thing of thyself, or did others tell it thee of me?'

35 Pilate answered, 'Am I a Jew? 'Thine own nation, and the chief priests have delivered thee unto me. What hast thou done?'

Jews, but never crucifying. It was therefore necessary that Christ should be put to death by the Romans, that, being hanged upon a tree, He might be made a curse for us, (Gal. 3:13.) and his hands and feet might be pierced. As the Roman power had brought Him to be born at Bethlehem, so now to die upon a cross, and both according to the Scriptures. It is likewise determined concerning us, though not discovered to us, what death we shall die, which should your law will suffer such a thing, but ours will not.' Thus, through their corruptions, the law of God was blasphemed; so is his Gospel.

They disowned any authority as judges, and growing less insolent and more submissive, are content to be prosecutors. 'It is not lawful for us to put any man to death, whatever less punishment we may inflict, and this is a malefactor whose blood we would have.'

Some think they had lost their power to give judgment in matters of life and death, by their own carelessness, and cowardly yielding to the iniquities of the age. It is not in our power to pass sentence of death upon any; if we do, we shall have the mob about us.

Others think their power was taken from them by the Romans, because they had not used it well, or because it was thought too great a trust for a conquered and yet an unsubdued people. Their acknowledgment of this they designed for a compliment to Pilate, and to atone for their rudeness; (p. 30.) but it is full evidence that the sceptre was departed from Judah, and therefore that now the Messiah was to come, Gen. 49: 10. If the Jews have no power to put any man to death, where is the sceptre? Yet they ask not, Where is the Shiloh?

However, there was a providence in it, that either they should have no power to put any man to death, or should decline the exercise but upon this occasion, v. 32.

Even they who designed to defeat Christ's sayings, were made servicable to the fulfilling of them beyond their intention, by an overruling hand of God. No word of Christ shall fall to the ground; He can never deceive or be deceived. Even the chief priests, while they persecuted Him as a deceiver, were so directed as to help to prove Him true, when we should think, by taking other measures, they might have defeated his predictions. However, they meant not so, Isa. 40: 7.

Those sayings of Christ in particular were fulfilled, which He had spoken concerning his death. 1. He had said He should be delivered to the Gentiles, and that they should put Him to death; Matt. 20: 19. Mark 10: 33. Luke 18: 32. 2. He had said He should be crucified, (Matt. 20: 19. 26: 2.) lifted up, ch. 3: 14. 12: 32. Now if they had judged Him by their law, He had been stoned; burning, strangling, and beheading, were in some cases used among the Jews, but never crucifying. It was therefore necessary that Christ should be put to death by the Romans, that, being hanged upon a tree, He might be made a curse for us, (Gal. 3:13.) and his hands and feet might be pierced. As the Roman power had brought Him to be born at Bethlehem, so now to die upon a cross, and both according to the Scriptures. It is likewise determined concerning us, though not discovered to us, what death we shall die, which should free us from all disquieting cares about that matter.

The prisoner is set to the bar. Pilate, after he had conferred with the chief priests at his door, entered into the hall, and called for Jesus. He would not examine Him in the crowd, where he might be disturbed by the noise, but ordered Him to be brought into the hall; for He made no difficulty of going in among the Gentiles. We, by sin were become liable to the judgment of God, and were to be brought before his bar; therefore, Christ being made sin, and a curse for us, was arraigned as a criminal. Pilate entered into judgment with Him, that God might not enter into judgment with us.

The other evangelists tell us that his accusers had laid it to his charge, that He perverted the nation, forbidding to give tribute to Caesar, and upon this He is examined.

A question is put to Him, with a design to insnare Him, and to find out something, upon which to ground an accusation: 'Art Thou the King of the Jews—that King so much talked of, and so long expected? Wouldst Thou be thought so?' He was far from imagining that really He was so. Some think Pilate asked this with an air of scorn; 'What! Thou a King, so mean a figure! The King of the Jews, by whom Thou art thus hated and persecuted?' Since it could not be proved He ever said it, he would constrain Him to say it now, that he might proceed upon his own confession.

Christ answers this question with another; not for evasion, but as an intimation to Pilate to consider on what grounds he went; v. 34.

'It is plain Thou hast no reason to say this of Thyself.' Pilate was obliged by office to take care of the interests of the Roman government, but he could not say that was in any danger, from any thing Jesus had ever said or done. He never appeared in worldly pomp, never assumed secular power, never acted as a judge or divider; never was any thing traitorous objected to Him, nor any thing that might give the least umbrage or suspicion.

If others tell it thee of Me, to in-sense thee, against Me, consider who they are, their principles, and whether they who represent Me as an enemy to Caesar, are not really such themselves, and use this only as a cover to their malice. Had Pilate been as inquisitive as he ought, he would have found that the reason why the chief priests were outrageous against Jesus, was, because He did not set up a temporal kingdom in opposition to the Roman power; if He would have done that, and have wrought miracles to bring them out of bondage, as Moses did, so far from siding with the Romans against Him, they

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 10—32. We should learn to receive our lighter afflictions, as 'a cup given us to drink,' and to resist every temptation to escape suffering by sin, or to despond under it, by asking ourselves, whether we ought thus to oppose our Father's will, or to distrust his love.—Self-confident rashness differs from steady courage and patience of faith: and they, who most readily venture into temptation, are often most easily overcome by it.—The company of profane and wicked men either corrupts or disarms those who are seduced into it; they soon forget their purposes and resolution, and conform to the humor, or try to shun the reproach, of their companions. We should therefore watch and pray against temptation, and get as far out of the way of them as we can: but humiliating experience of our weakness is necessary, to teach us caution and attention to the words of Christ. As He suffered every insult for the sake of Peter, even when Peter was denying Him; so He foresaw all our unfaithfulness and ingratitude, at the time when He shed his blood for our sins! This consideration should not only encourage our hope in his mercy, but also shame us out of our base requitals of such a Benefactor.—The meekness, patience, and wisdom, of the Son of God, only served to increase the enmity of his persecutors; and their base usage illustrated his consummate excellency. This should teach us what to expect from the wicked, and how to behave towards them. (P. O. 1 Pet. 2: 18—25.)—So blind are men in things pertaining to the worship of God, that they often expect to please Him by exactness in externals, while deliberately perpetrating the basest iniquities! They hope to atone for murders and oppressions, by hypocritical forms!—Those who are scandalously unjust, frequently expect credit for their regard to justice; and are greatly affronted to be suspected of the least crime, while actually committing the greatest. (2 Sam. 20: 8—10, 20—22.)

Verse 31.

It is hard to say how far the power of life and death was at this time taken from the Jews, considering the proceedings of the high priest and council in stoning Stephen to death. (Acts 6: 11—15, and 7: 1, &c.) and what power Saul received from them, for persecuting the Christians unto death. (Acts 22: 4, 5.) and how they would have judged Paul, according to their law, had not Lysias prevented them, Acts 23: 6. But it is evident this power was under some limitations from the Roman government. (See Lightfoot.)

GUYSE.

'Some maintain that a distinction must be made between sacred and civil causes, and that in the former, the Jews had at that time the power of capital punishing, subject, however, to the confirmation of the procurator.—Ed.] But in civil causes and crimes, including sedition, tumult, and treason, that was not conceded to them, the cognizance of these resting solely with the president or procurator. Now our Lord's cause, at the beginning, did not seem to be civil; at least the Jewish rulers had pronounced Him worthy of death, because He had professed Himself the Messiah and the Son of God: (yet they lead Him to Pilate, that they may cast on Him the blame, if such there would be,) of shedding innocent blood. Afterwards, however, when Pilate had declared he found no fault in Him, and seemed to wish to remove the case from himself, they ventured (Luke 23: 2.) to bring forward a two-fold political charge, namely, that of exciting the populace to rebellion, and of discountenancing the payment of tribute; offences falling under Pilate's jurisdiction as president of Judea.

His followers did not offer to fight, there was no attempt to rescue Him, though the town was now full of Galileans, his countrymen, and generally armed; but the peaceable behavior of his disciples was enough to put to silence the ignorance of foolish men.

would have made Him their king, and fought under Him against the Romans; but He not answering his expectation, they charged that upon Him, of which they were themselves notoriously guilty—disaffection to, and design against, the government; and was such information fit to be countenanced?

Pilate resents Christ's reply, in a direct answer to his question, whether He spake of himself? 'No,' says he; 'Am I a Jew, that Thou suspectest me to be in a plot against Thee? I know nothing of the Messiah, and the dispute who is the Messiah, and who not, is alike to me.' With what disdain Pilate asks, Am I a Jew? The Jews were, on many accounts, an honorable people; but, having corrupted the covenant of their God, He made them contemptible and base before all the people, (Mal. 2: 8, 9,) so that a man of sense and honor reckoned it a scandal to be counted a Jew. Good names often suffer for the sake of the bad men that wear them. It is sad, that when a Turk is suspected of dishonesty, he should ask, 'What! do you take me for a Christian?'

Christ had asked him, whether others told him? 'Yes,' says he, 'thine own people, who, one would think, should be in favor of Thee, and the priests, whose testimony ought to be regarded; and therefore I have but to proceed upon their information.' Christ still suffers by those 'His own nation, even the priests that do not lie up to their profession.'

Christ had declined answering that question, Art Thou the King of the Jews? Therefore Pilate puts one more general, 'What hast Thou done?' What provocation hast Thou given thy own nation, and particularly the priests, to be so violent against Thee?

Christ gives a more direct answer to Pilate's former question, Art Thou a king? Explaining in what sense He was a king, not such a king as was dangerous to the government, for his interest was not supported by secular methods, v. 36.

Christ's kingdom is not of this world; it is expressed negatively what it is not, to rectify mistakes concerning it; its rise is not from this world; the kingdoms of men arise out of the sea and the earth, (Dan. 7: 3. Rev. 13: 1, 11,) but the holy city comes down from God out of heaven, Rev. 21: 2. It is not by succession, election, or conquest, but by the special designation of the divine will. Its nature is not worldly; it is a kingdom within men, (Luke 17: 21,) in their hearts and consciences, (Rom. 14: 17,) its riches spiritual, powers spiritual. The ministers of state in Christ's kingdom have not the spirit of the world, 1 Cor. 2: 12. Its guards and supports are not worldly; its weapons are spiritual; it needed not, nor used, secular force, nor was it hurtful to kings or provinces; it did not in the least interfere with the prerogatives of princes, or the property of their subjects; it tended not to alter national establishments in secular things, nor opposed any kingdom but that of sin and Satan. Its tendency and design are not worldly. Christ aimed not, nor would allow his disciples to aim at the pomp and power of the great men of the earth. Its subjects, though in the world, are not of the world; they are chosen out of the world, are born from, and bound for, another world; are neither the world's pupils, nor governed by its wisdom, nor enriched with its wealth.

An evidence of the spiritual nature of Christ's kingdom. Had He designed opposition to government, He would have fought them at their own weapons; but He did not take this course; v. 36. For, 1. His followers did not offer to fight, there was no attempt to rescue Him, though the town was now full of Galileans, his countrymen, and generally armed; but the peaceable behavior of his disciples was enough to put to silence the ignorance of foolish men.

Verses 37.

Bear witness. 'The original phrase, when used of persons, signifies to bear testimony in favor of, to recommend, praise; but used of things, as here, means to enjoin, teach. The sentence then means, to recommend and teach the truth, [see note, 17: 3.] and authoritatively enjoin the observance of it on men.'

'Our Lord means to say, that He came to recommend, establish, and confirm religion. For He does not sustain the character of teacher, or master, but of King, as He asserts. Tritmax, in Bloomfield.

It is not easy to give the character of Pilate. From the manner of his conduct we scarcely can tell when he is in jest or when in earnest. He appears to have been convinced of the innocence of Christ, and that the Jews, through envy and malice, desired his destruction. And for fear of the clamors of this bad people, he permitted all the forms and requisitions of justice to be outraged, and abandoned Jesus to their

2. He did not order them to fight; nay, He forbade them; which was an evidence, both that He did not depend upon worldly aids, (for He could have summoned legions of angels, which showed that his kingdom was from above,) as also that He did not dread worldly opposition for He was willing to be delivered to the Jews, knowing that that which would destroy a worldly kingdom, would advance and establish his; justly therefore He concludes, Now ye may see my kingdom is in the world, but not of it.

Pilate asks plainly; 'Art Thou a king then? Thou speakest of a kingdom; art Thou, in any sense, a king?'

Our Lord witnessed a good confession, (1 Tim. 6: 13.) Thou sayest I am a king; that is, it is as thou sayest, I am a king; for I came to bear witness of the truth.

The Messiah was expected under the character of a king; and therefore having owned to Caiaphas that He was the Christ, He would not disown to Pilate that He was a king, lest He should seem inconsistent. Note. Even when Christ took on Him the form of a servant, He justly claimed the honor and authority of a king.

He shows how He is a king; as He came to bear witness of the truth, He rules in the minds of men by the power of truth. If He had meant Himself a temporal prince, He would have said, For this end was I born, and for this cause came I into the world, to rule the nations, to conquer kings; no, He came to be a witness for the God that made the world, and against sin that ruins the world, and by this word of His testimony, He sets up his kingdom. It was foretold that He should be a witness to the people, and as such, a leader and commander to the people, Isa. 55: 4. Christ's kingdom was not of this world, in which truth faileth, (Isa. 59, 15.—He that cannot dissemble, knows not how to reign,) but of that world in which truth reigns eternally. Christ's errand into the world was, to bear witness to the truth. 1. To reveal to the world that which otherwise could not have been known concerning God and his will, and goodwill to men, ch. 1: 18. 17: 26. 2. To confirm it, Rom. 15: 8. By his miracles He bore witness to the truth of divine revelation, of God's perfections and providence, and the truth of his covenant, that all men through Him might believe. By doing this He is a king, and sets up a kingdom.

The foundation and power, the spirit and genius of Christ's kingdom, is divine truth. When He said, I am the truth, He said, in effect, I am a king. He conquers by the convincing evidence of truth, rules by its commanding power, and in his majesty rides prosperously, because of truth, Ps 45: 4. With his truth He shall judge the people, Ps. 96: 13. It is the sceptre of his kingdom. He came a light into the world, and rules as the sun by day.

The subjects of this kingdom are of the truth. All that by the grace of God are rescued from the power of the father of lies, and are disposed to receive the truth, and submit to its influence, will hear Christ's voice, become his subjects, and bear true allegiance to Him. Every one that has a real sense of true religion, will entertain the Christian religion, and they belong to his kingdom; by the power of truth He makes them willing; Ps. 110: 3. All that are in love with truth, will hear the voice of Christ, for greater, surer, sweeter truths can no where be found, than in Christ, by whom grace and truth came; so that rage and malice. He seemed disposed to pity—the Jews were full of malice and cruelty. The most that we can say for Pilate, is, that he was disposed to justice, but was not inclined to hazard his comfort or safety in doing it. He was an easy, pliable man, who had no objection to do a right thing, if it should cost him no trouble. But he felt no disposition to make any sacrifice, even in behalf of innocence, righteousness, and truth. In all the business, Pilate showed that he was not a good man, and the Jews proved that they were of their father the devil.

CHAP. XIX.

Jesus is scourged, crowned with thorns, and mocked by the soldiers, 1-9. Pilate, declaring his innocence, the Jews charge him with calling him self the 'Son of God,' 4-7. Pilate, after further examination, desires to release him; but craves with the clamors of the Jews, delivers him to be crucified, 8-10. He is led to Golgotha, and crucified between two robbers, 17, 18. The title placed over his cross, which Pilate refuses to alter, 19-22. Jesus and a part his garments, 23, 24. Jesus affectionately commends his mother to the care of John, 25-27; and, receiving vinegar to drink, He expires, 28-30. The legs of the robbers are broken to hasten their death; but Jesus being previously dead, his side is pierced by a soldier, and thus the Scriptures are fulfilled, 31-34. Joseph of Arimathea, assisted by Nicodemus, buries him, 39-42.

THEN Pilate therefore took Jesus, and b scourged him.

a Matt. 27:26. Mark 15:15. Luke 23:16, 23.
b Ps. 129:3. Is. 50:5. 53:5. Matt. 26:29. 28:34. Luke 22:20. 22:24. 22:25. 2 Cor. 11:24, 25. Heb. 11:36. 1 Pet. 2:24.

man at his gate, obliged Him abruptly to drop the discourse.

Some think he speaks it as a judge, inquiring further into the cause before him; 'Let me into this mystery, and tell me what is the truth of this matter.'

Others think He speaks it as a scoffer; 'Thou talkest of truth; canst thou tell what truth is?' Thus he makes a jest of the everlasting gospel, that great truth which the chief priests hated and persecuted, and for which Christ was now witnessing, and suffering; and, like men who take pleasure in bantering all religions, he ridicules both sides; therefore Christ made him no reply, Answer not a fool according to his folly; cast not pearls before swine. Though Christ would not tell Pilate what is truth, He has told his disciples, and by them has told us, ch. 14: 6.

The result of both these conferences, with the prosecutors and the prisoner, appears in two things:

1. The judge appeared his friend; (1.) He publicly declared Him innocent; (c. 38.) I find in Him no fault at all. He supposes there might be some controversy in judgment between Him and them, wherein He was as likely to be in the right as they; but nothing criminal appears against Him. This solemn declaration of Christ's innocency, was, [1.] For the justification and honor of Jesus. [2.] To explain the design of his death; not for any sin of his own, even in the judgment of the judge himself, therefore as a sacrifice for our sins, and that, even in the judgment of the prosecutors, that one man should die for the people, ch. 11: 50. This is He that did no violence, neither was any deceit in his mouth, (Isa. 53: 9.) who was to be cut off, but not for himself, Dan 9: 26 [3.] To aggravate the sin of the prosecutors. If a prisoner has had a fair trial, and has been acquitted by proper judges of the crime, especially if there be no cause to suspect them partial in his favor, he must be believed innocent, and his accusers are bound to acquiesce. But Jesus, though brought in not guilty, is still run down as a malefactor, and his blood thirsted for.

(2.) He proposed an expedient for his discharge; (v. 39.) not to the chief priests, (he knew they would never agree to it,) but to the people, Matt. 27: 15. Probably, he had heard how this Jesus had been attended but the other day with the hosannas of the common people; He therefore thought Him the darling of the multitude, and the envy only of the rulers, and therefore made no doubt but they would demand the release of Jesus.

[1.] Their custom was in honor of the passover, a memorial of their release. But it was adding to God's words, as if He had not instituted enough for the due commemoration of that deliverance; and, though an act of mercy, it might be injustice to the public, Prov. 17: 15.

[2.] If Pilate had had the honesty and courage that became a judge, he would not have named an innocent person to be competitor with a notorious criminal for this favor; if he found no fault in Him, he was bound in conscience by hearing Christ's voice, we know that we are of the truth, 1 John 3: 19.

Pilate hereupon puts a good question to Him, but does not stay for an answer, v. 38. He said, What is truth? and immediately went out again.

This question could not be put to one better able to answer it. Truth is that pearl of great price, which the human understanding desires, and is in quest of; for it cannot rest but in that which is, or at least is apprehended to be, truth. When we search the Scriptures, and attend the ministry of the Word, it must be with this inquiry, What is truth? and with this prayer, Lead me into all truth. But many put this question, that have not patience and constancy enough to persevere; nor humility and sincerity enough to receive it when they have found it, 2 Tim. 3: 7. Thus many ask those needful questions, 'What am I?' 'What have I done?' but will not take time for an answer.

It is uncertain with what design Pilate asked this question. Perhaps, as one that began to think well of Christ, and desired to be informed what new notions He advanced, and what improvements He pretended to in religion and learning. But while he desired to hear some new truth from Him, as Herod to see some miracle, the clamor and outrage of the priests' men at his gate, obliged Him abruptly to drop the discourse.

to discharge Him. But he was willing to trim, and please all sides; and was governed more by worldly wisdom than the rules of equity.

2. The people appeared implacable against Him, v. 40. See how fierce and outrageous they were. Pilate proposed the thing calmly, but they gave in their resolution with clamor. Note, The enemies of Christ's religion cry it down, and so hope to run it down; witness the outcry at Ephesus, Acts 19: 34. But those who think the word of things or persons, merely for their being thus exclaimed against, have a very small share of constancy and consideration. There is cause to suspect a deficiency of reason and justice, on that side which calls in the assistance of popular tumult.

How foolish and absurd they were, is intimated in the short account given of the other candidate; Now Barabbas was a robber; (1.) A breaker of the law of God; yet he shall be spared, rather than one who reproved the pride, avarice, and tyranny of the priests and elders. Though Barabbas be a robber, he will not rob them of Moses' seat, nor of their traditions, and then no matter. (2.) He was an enemy to the public safety, and personal property. The clamor of the town is wont to be against robbers, (Job 30: 5.) yet here it is for one. Thus they do who prefer their sins before Christ. Sin is a robber; so is every base lust, yet foolishly chosen rather than Christ.

CHAP. XIX. v. 1-15. Here is a further account of the unfair trial of our Lord. Between the great confusion among the people, and the great confusion in the breast of the judge, the narrative is not easily reduced to method.

He took Jesus, and appointed the lictors to scourge Him. Bede is of opinion, that Pilate scourged Jesus with his own hands, because it is said, He took Him, and scourged Him, that might be done favorably. Matthew and Mark mention his scourging after his condemnation, but here it appears to have been before. St. Luke speaks of Pilate's offering to chastise Him, and let Him go; which must be before sentence. This scourging was designed only to pacify the Jews, and Pilate showed that he would take their word against his own sentiments so far.

1. That the Scripture might be fulfilled, which speaks of his being stricken, smitten, and afflicted, and the chastisement of our peace being inflicted upon Him; Isa. 53: 5. Compare Isa. 50: 6. Ps. 129: 3. He Himself likewise had foretold it, Matt. 20: 19. Mark 10: 34. Luke 18: 33.

2. That by his stripes we might be healed, 1 Pet. 2: 24. We deserved to have been chastised with whips and scorpions, and with many stripes, having known our Lord's will and not done it; but Christ underwent the stripes for us, bearing the rod of his Father's wrath. Lam. 3: 1. Pilate's design in scourging Him, was, that He might not be condemned, which did not take effect, but intimated what was God's design, that his being scourged might prevent our being condemned, and that did take effect.

3. That stripes, for his sake, might be sanctified to his followers; and they might, as they did, rejoice in that shame, (Acts 5: 41. 16: 22, 25.) as Paul, who was in stripes above measure, 2 Cor. 11: 23. Christ's stripes take out the

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 33-40. The kingdom of Christ cannot then be promoted by carnal weapons or means, or by party; nor accommodated to temporal interests; and every attempt of this kind is inconsistent, unscriptural, and unholy. Our King reigns in the heart and conscience of his subjects: the princes of this world have nothing to fear from the obedience of Christians to his authority; nor does He need the countenance of theirs, though He may sometimes make use of it. His subjects are commanded to 'render tribute to whom tribute is due, and honor to whom honor;' to 'submit to the powers that be;' to 'fear God and the king, and not to meddle with those who are given to change;' though at the same time, they must 'obey God rather than man, when man interferes out of his province. It would promote the credit of the Gospel, if the professed subjects of Christ, while they stand up for liberty of conscience, would render obedience to these plain precepts. They would more resemble Him, who before Pontius Pilate witnessed a good conscience; and prove themselves to be 'of the truth, by hearing and obeying his voice.—But many profess to inquire after truth, who are not disposed to wait for an answer, or to welcome that which is given by those who speak as the oracles of God.' Numbers give Jesus and his people a good word, who will not join them, or venture any thing in his cause: numbers commit injustice for fear of their dependents, and from a desire of popularity; and the majority of all ranks, even of nominal Christians, prefer Barabbas to Christ; so that it requires more constancy, than unregenerate men possess, to stem the torrent of impetuous wickedness. Let us, however, look to 'the Lamb of God,' in whom the Roman governor could 'find no fault at all;' let us endeavor in the same manner to make all our accusers ashamed; let us never indulge prejudices against persons or doctrines, because multitudes decry them; and let us beware of deliberately sparing our lusts, (those robbers of God, and murderers of the soul,) thus crucifying Christ afresh, and putting Him to open shame.

conceit only; so is his religion regarded as a conceit, and God and the soul, sin and duty, heaven and hell, are with them all chimeras. They crown Him with thorns, as if it were a penance, and the greatest pain and hardship in the world: as if to submit to God and conscience were to thrust one's head into thorns; but this is an unjust imputation: thorns and snares are in the way of the forehead, but roses and laurels in religion's ways.

See the condescension of our Lord. Great and generous minds can bear any thing better than ignominy; any toil, pain, loss, rather than reproach: yet this the great and holy Jesus submitted to for us. See and admire, 1. The invincible patience of a sufferer, leaving us an example of contentment, courage, and evenness of spirit, under the greatest hardships. 2. The invincible love and kindness of a Savior, who not only cheerfully and resolutely went through all this, but voluntarily undertook it for us. Herein He commended his love, that He would not only die for us, but die as a fool dies. He endured the pain; not the pangs of death only, though these were most exquisite; but, as if those were too little, He submitted to previous pains. Shall we complain of a thorn in the flesh, and of being buffeted, because we need it to hide pride from us, when Christ humbled Himself to bear those thorns in the head, and those buffets, to save and teach us; 2 Cor. 12:7. He despised the shame, the shame of a fool's coat, and the mock respect. If at any time ridiculed for well-doing, let us not be ashamed, but glorify God, for thus we are partakers of Christ's sufferings. He that bore this was recompensed with real honors, and so shall we, if we patiently suffer shame for Him.

Pilate, having thus abused the prisoner, presents Him to the prosecutors, in hope that they would now be satisfied. His intention, if indeed good, by no means justified his proceedings. He proposes two things to their consideration:

1. That he had not found any thing which made Him obnoxious to the Roman government; (v. 4.) I do not find in Him the least fault, or cause of accusation. Hereby he condemns himself. None ought to suffer ill but those that do ill; yet many banter religion, who still, if they be serious, cannot but own they find no fault in it. Pilate, thinking to please the people by scourging Christ, and save his conscience by not crucifying Him, behold he does both; whereas, if he had at first resolved to crucify Him, he needed not have scourged Him. Those who think to keep themselves from greater sins by venturing upon less, commonly run into both.

2. He had done that to Him, which would make Him less dangerous to them and their government. He brought Him out, wearing the crown of thorns, his head and face bloody, and said, 'Behold the man whom you are so jealous of;' intimating, that though He might have given them cause to fear that his interest in the country would lessen theirs, yet the people would never look on Him with respect, after He had been thus treated as a slave, and exposed to contempt. Little did Pilate think with what veneration even 'hate' sufferings of Christ would in after-ages be commemorated by the best and greatest, of men, who would glory in that cross and those stripes, which he thought would have been to Him and his followers a perpetual reproach.

sting of theirs. We are chastened of the Lord, that we may not be condemned with the world, 1 Cor. 11:32.

He turned Him over to his soldiers, to be made sport with; (v. 2. 3.) The soldiers, the governor's life-guard, put a crown of thorns upon his head; they put on Him a purple robe, some threadbare coat of that color, to be the badge of his royalty; and complimented Him with, Hail, King of the Jews. (like people like king), and smote Him with their hands.

See the base injustice of Pilate, that he would suffer one whom he believed innocent, and if so, an excellent person, to be thus trampled on by his servants. They who are under the arrest of the law, ought to be under the protection of it; and their being secured is to be their security. But Pilate did this, 1. To oblige his soldiers' merry humor, and perhaps his own too, notwithstanding the gravity one might have expected in a judge. Herod, as well as his men of war, had just before done the same. Luke 23:11. It was a play to them, now that it was a festival time; as the Philistines made sport with Samson. 2. To oblige the Jews' malicious humor, who desired that all possible disgrace might be done to Christ.

See the rude insolence of the soldiers, how perfectly lost to justice and humanity, to triumph over a man in misery, one that had been in reputation for wisdom and honor, and never did anything to forfeit it. But thus hath Christ's religion been misrepresented, dressed up by bad men at their pleasure, and exposed to contempt and ridicule. They clothe Him with a mock robe, in jest. As Christ is here represented a king in

Our Lord came forth, willing to be made a spectacle, and to be hated at, as no doubt He was, knowing that He was set for a sign that should be spoken against, Luke 2:34. Did He go forth thus bearing our reproach? Let us go forth to Him bearing his reproach. Heb. 13:13.

Pilate saith, Behold the man! He saith: so the original is; and the immediate antecedent being Jesus, I see no inconvenience in supposing these to be Christ's own words; He said, 'Behold the man you are so exasperated against.' But some of the Greek copies, and the generally of the translators, supply it as we do. Pilate said this with a design to affect them: not so much to move their pity, as to silence their jealousy. Behold a man not worthy your suspicion; from whom you can henceforth fear no danger; his crown is profaned and cast to the ground, and all mankind will make a jest of Him.

The word however is very affecting: Behold the man. It is good for every one of us, with an eye of faith, to behold the man Christ Jesus in his sufferings. Behold this king with the crown; the crown of thorns, Cant. 3:11. Behold Him, and mourn because of Him. Behold and love Him; be still looking unto Jesus.

The prosecutors were but the more exasperated, v. 6, 7. The chief priests, who headed the mob, cried out with fury, and their officers, or servants, joined with them, crying, Crucify Him, crucify Him. The common people perhaps would have acquiesced in Pilate's declaration of his innocence, but their leaders, the priests, caused them to err. By this it appears that their malice against Christ was, 1. Unreasonable and most absurd; they offer not to make good their charge against Him, or to object against the judgment of Pilate, but, though innocent, He must be crucified. 2. Insatiably cruel. Neither his scourging, nor his patience under it, nor the expostulations of the judge, could mollify them: nor could the jest into which Pilate turned the cause, put them into a pleasant humor. 3. Violent, and exceeding resolute; they will have their own way, and hazard the governor's favor, the peace of the city, their own safety, rather than abate the utmost of their demands. Were they so violent in running down our Lord, and in crying, Crucify Him, crucify Him; and shall not we be vigorous and zealous in advancing his name, and in crying, Crown Him, crown Him? Did their hatred sharpen their endeavors, and shall not our love quicken ours for Him and his kingdom?

Pilate still insisted on the prisoner's innocence; 'Take ye Him, and crucify Him, if He must be crucified.' This is ironical: he knew they could not, durst not, crucify Him; but, 'You shall not make me a drudge to your malice; I cannot with a safe conscience crucify Him.' A good resolve, had he kept it. He found no fault in Him, and therefore should not have continued to parley with the prosecutors. They that would be safe from sin, should be deaf to temptation. He should have secured the prisoner from their insults. Why was He armed with power, but to protect the injured? The guards of governors ought to be the guards of justice. But Pilate had not courage to act according to his conscience; and his cowardice betrayed him into a snare. See

The further color the prosecutors gave their demand; (v. 7.) We hate a law, and by our law, if it were in our power to execute it, He ought to die, because He made Himself the Son of God. 1. They boast of the law, even when through breaking the law they dishonored God, Rom. 2:23. They had indeed an excellent law, far exceeding that of other nations; but in vain did they boast of it, when they abused it to such cille them to a pretended God. If this be at the bottom of the tumult, thinks Pilate, it will not be turned off with a jest. 2. There was more danger of offending his own conscience, if he should condemn Him. Is He one that makes Himself the Son of God; what if it should prove that He is so? What will become of me then? Even natural conscience makes men afraid of being found fighting against God. The heathen had some fabulous traditions of incarnate deities appearing in mean circumstances, and treated ill by some that paid dear for so doing. Pilate fears this for himself.

To give the prosecutors all they could desire, he resumed the trial. 1. He went into the judgment-hall, that he might be out of the noise and clamor of the crowd, and might examine the thing more closely. They that would find out the truth as it is in Jesus, must retire from the noise of prejudice, as it were, into the judgment-hall, to converse with Christ alone.

2. The question he put; Whence art Thou? From men or heaven? From beneath or from above? He had before asked directly, Art Thou a king? But here he does not directly ask, Art Thou the Son of God? Lest he should seem to meddle with divine things too boldly; but in general, Whence art Thou? Where wast Thou, and in what world hadst Thou a being?

3. Jesus gave him no answer. This was not because He knew not what to say, nor was it a sullen silence, in contempt of court; but, (1.) A patient silence, as a sheep before the shearers is dumb, so He opened not his mouth, Isa. 53:7. It loudly spake submission to his Father's will, which He thus composed Himself to bear. He was silent, because He would say nothing to hinder his sufferings. Had Christ avowed Himself a God as plainly as He avowed Himself a king, probably he would not have condemned Him; (for he was afraid, at the mention of it by the prosecutors;) and the Romans, though they triumphed over the kings of the nations they conquered, yet stood in awe of their gods. See 1 Cor. 2:8. If they had known Him to be the Lord of glory, they would not have crucified Him; how then could we have been saved? (2.) It was a prudent silence. When the chief priests asked Him Art Thou the Son of the Blessed? He answered, I am, for He knew they went upon the Old Testament, which spoke of the Messiah; but when Pilate asked Him, He knew he did not understand his own question, having no notion of the Messiah, and of his being the Son of God, and therefore to what purpose should He reply to him, whose head was filled with the pagan theology? The haughty check Pilate gave Him for his silence; 'Speakest Thou not unto me? Dost Thou affront me so as to stand mute? Knowest Thou not, then, as president of the province, I have power, if I think fit, to crucify, or to release Thee?'

purposes. 2. They discover a restless, inveterate malice. When they could not incense Pilate, by alleging that He pretended Himself a king, they urged that He pretended Himself a God. 3. They pervert the law to an instrument of their malice. Some think they refer to a law made particularly against Christ, which must be executed, right or wrong; whereas there is a woe to them that decree unrighteous decrees, and that write the grievousness which they have prescribed, Isa. 10:1. See Mic. 6:16. But it would rather seem they refer to the law of Moses; if so, (1.) It was true that blasphemers, idolaters, and false prophets, were to be put to death. Whoever falsely pretended to be the Son of God, was guilty of blasphemy, Lev. 24:16. But then, (2.) It was false that He pretended to be Son of God, for He really was so; and they ought to have inquired into the proofs. If He said that He was the Son of God, and the tendency of his doctrine was not to draw people from God, but to bring them to Him, and He confirmed his mission by miracles, by their law they ought to hearken to Him, (Deut. 18:18, 19,) and if they did not, they were to be cut off. His honor, and their happiness, (if they had not stood in their own light,) they impute to Him as a crime, for which He ought to die; yet if He ought to die, He ought not to be crucified, for that was not inflicted by their law.

Pilate, when he heard that his prisoner pretended not to royalty only, but to deity, was the more afraid. This made the case more embarrassing both ways; 1. There was more danger of offending the people, if he should acquit Him, for he knew how jealous that people were for the unity of the Godhead; and what aversion they had to other gods; and therefore, though he might hope to pacify their rage against a pretended king, he could never reconcile them to a pretended God.

If this be at the bottom of the tumult, thinks Pilate, it will not be turned off with a jest. 2. There was more danger of offending his own conscience, if he should condemn Him. Is He one that makes Himself the Son of God; what if it should prove that He is so? What will become of me then? Even natural conscience makes men afraid of being found fighting against God. Verse 9.

Whence. That is, what is your origin; what are your parents, [610]

1. Pilate magnifies himself, in his authority, as not inferior to that of Nebuchadnezzar, of whom it is said, that whom he would he slew and whom he would he kept alive, Dan. 5:16. Men in power are apt to be puffed up, and the more absolute and arbitrary their power is, the more it gratifies their pride. But he magnifies his power to an exorbitant degree, when he boasts that he had power to crucify one whom he had declared innocent, for no prince or potentate has authority to do wrong.

2. He tramples on our blessed Savior; reflects upon Him, as disrespectful to those in authority; ungrateful to one that had been tender of Him; and unwise for Himself. If Christ had indeed sought to save his life, now had been his time to have spoken; but that which He had to do, was, to lay down his life.

Christ boldly rebukes his arrogance, and rectifies his mistake, v. 11. Though Christ did not answer him when he was impertinent, yet He thought fit to when he was imperious; then answer a fool according to his folly, lest he be wise in his own conceit, Prov. 26:4, 5. When Pilate used his power, Christ silently submitted to it; but when he grew proud of it, He made him know himself; reminding him that his power in general, as a magistrate, was limited. God is the fountain of power; and the powers that are, as they are ordained by, and derived from Him, are subject to Him. They ought to go no further than his law directs, they can go no further than his providence permits. They are God's hand, and his sword, Ps. 17:13. Though the axe may boast itself against him that handleth therein, still it is but a tool, Isa. 10:5, 15. Let the oppressors know that there is a higher than they, Eccl. 5:8. Let this silence the murmurings of the oppressed, It is the Lord; (God has bid Shimei curse David,) and let it comfort them, that their persecutors can do no more than God will let them. See Isa. 51:12, 13.

His power against Him in particular, and all the efforts of it, were by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God, Acts 2:23. Pilate never fancied himself to look so great as now, when he sat in judgment upon a prisoner who was looked upon by many as the Son of God and King of Israel; but Christ lets him know that he was herein but an instrument in God's hand, Acts 4:27, 28.

He mildly extenuates his sin, in comparison with the sin of the ringleaders; 'Therefore he that delivered Me unto thee, lies under greater guilt; for thou as a magistrate hast power from above, art in thy place, thy sin is less than theirs, who, from malice, urge thee to abuse thy power.'

It is plainly intimated that what Pilate did, was a great sin, and that the force which the Jews put upon him, would not justify him, Christ hereby intended to awake his conscience, and to increase his fear. The guilt of others will not acquit us, nor will it avail in the great day to say, that others were worse than we; we are not to be judged by comparison, but must bear our own burden.

Yet theirs that delivered Him to Pilate, was the greater sin; all sins are not equal; some are more heinous than others; some comparatively, as goats, others as camels; some as moles in the eye, others as beams; some as pence, others as pounds. He that delivered Christ to Pilate, was either,

1. The people of the Jews; they had seen Christ's miracles, Pilate had not: to them the Messiah was first sent, and to them who were enslaved, a Redeemer should have been most welcome; therefore it was much worse in them to appear against Him than in Pilate.

2. Or He means Caiaphas in particular, who terrestrial, or celestial; merely human, or divine; or mixed? Kypke, Rosenm., Kuinoel, &c. For Pilate was thinking of the heathen superstition, that the gods and goddesses descended upon earth, had connection with mortals, and from thence sprung demi-gods, or heresies. See Acts 14:11. 28:16. Matt. 27:54. Pilate, it seems, calling to mind the wonderful works of Jesus, struck with the divine iniquity of his countenance, (stamped with innocence,) and perhaps somewhat influenced by the message of his wife, feared (v. 8.) to draw upon himself the anger of some god, by slaying his son. So the most judicious commentators. BLOOMFIELD

10 Then saith Pilate unto him, Speakest thou not unto me? knowest thou not that I have power to crucify thee, and have power to release thee?

11 Jesus answered, Thou couldest have no power at all against me, except it were given thee from above: therefore he that delivered me unto thee hath the greater sin.

12 And from thenceforth Pilate sought to release him: but the Jews cried out, saying, If thou let this man go, thou art not Cæsar's friend: whosoever maketh himself a king speaketh against Cæsar.

13 When Pilate therefore heard that saying, he brought Jesus forth, and sat down in the judgment-seat, in a place that is called the Pavement, but in the Hebrew, Gabbatha.

vote of the Jews, that He should be crucified. In this outcry they endeavored two things:

1. To blacken the prisoner as an enemy to Cæsar. He had refused the kingdoms of this world and the glory of them, yet they will have it that He speaks against Cæsar—He opposes Cæsar; invades his dignity and sovereignty. The enemies of religion represent it as hurtful to kings and provinces, when it would be highly beneficial to both.

2. 'If thou let this man go unpunished, thou art not Cæsar's friend, and therefore false to the trust, and obnoxious to the emperor's displeasure.' They intimate a threat that they would inform against him; and here they touched him in a tender part. But of all people those Jews should not have pretended a concern for Cæsar, who were themselves so ill affected to him and his government. A pretended zeal for that which is good, often covers a real malice against that which is better.

When he heard that saying, that he could not be true to Cæsar's honor, nor sure of Cæsar's favor, then he thought it time to look about him. All that he had said to prove Christ a malefactor, did not move him, he still kept to his conviction of Christ's innocence; but when they urged that it was his interest to condemn Him, then he began to yield. Note, That they bind up their happiness in the favor of men, make themselves an easy prey to Satan.

Pilate brought Jesus forth, and in great state took the chair; we may suppose that he called for his robes, and then sat down in the judgment-seat. He was condemned with all ceremony. 1. That all believers, through Christ's being judged here, might be acquitted in the court of heaven. 2. To take off the terror of pompous trials, which his followers would be brought to for his sake. Paul might the better stand at Cæsar's judgment-seat, when his Master had stood there before him.

Christ was condemned in a place called the Pavement, but in Hebrew, Gabbatha, probably the place used to try causes or criminals. Some make Gabbatha was at the head of the conspiracy, and first advised his death, ch. 11:49,50. Caiaphas prosecuted Christ deliberately from enmity to Him and his doctrine. Pilate condemned Him for fear of the people, by a hasty resolution.

3. Some think Christ means Judas; for though he did not immediately deliver Him into the hands of Pilate, he betrayed Him to those that did. The sin of Judas was, on many accounts, greater than the sin of Pilate. Pilate was a stranger to Christ, Judas his friend and follower. Pilate found no fault in Him, but Judas knew a deal of good by Him. Pilate, though biassed, was not bribed; but Judas took a reward against the innocent; the sin of Judas let in all that followed. He was a guide to them that took Jesus. So great was the sin of Judas, that vengeance suffered Him not to live; but when Christ said this, or soon after, he was gone to his own place.

Pilate struggles with the Jews to deliver Jesus out of their hands, but in vain. From thenceforth: from this time, and for this reason, because Christ had given Him that answer; (v. 11.) which he took kindly, though it had a rebuke in it, and though Christ found fault with him, he still continued to find no fault in Christ, but sought to release Him; he contrived how to do it, so as not to disoblige the priests. It never does well, when our resolutions to do our duty are swallowed up in projects how to do it plausibly and conveniently. If Pilate's policy had not prevailed above his justice, he would not have been long seeking to release Him.

The Jews were more furious than ever, and more violent to get Jesus crucified. They carry on their design with noise and clamor as before; they cried out: labored to get Him cried down by a multitude, and it is no hard matter to pack a mob; whereas if a fair poll had been granted, it would have been carried by a great majority to release Him. A few madmen may out-shout many wise men, and fancy themselves to speak the sense (when it is but the nonsense) of a nation, or of all mankind; but it is not so easy a thing to change the sense of the people as it is to misrepresent it, and change their cry. Now that Christ was in the hands of his enemies, his friends were shy and silent; and those that were against Him, were forward to show themselves so, and this gave the chief priests an opportunity to represent it as the concurring vote to signify an inclosed place placed against the insults of the people, whom therefore He did the less need to fear; others, an elevated place, that all might see Him.

The day was the preparation of the passover, that is, for the passover-sabbath, and the rest of the days of the feast of unleavened bread. This is plain from Luke 23:54. It was the preparation, and the Sabbath drew on. So that this preparation was for the Sabbath. Note, Before the passover there ought to be preparation. This is mentioned as an aggravation of their sin in persecuting Christ: it was when they should have been purging out the old leaven; but the better the day the worse the deed.

It was about the sixth hour. Some ancient Greek and Latin manuscripts read it about the third hour, which agrees with Mark 15:25. And it appears by Matt. 27:45, that He was upon the cross before the sixth hour. But it comes in here, not as a precise determination of the time, but as an additional aggravation of the sin, that they were pushing on the prosecution, not only on a solemn day, but from the third to the sixth hour, which was, as we call it, church-time; they dropped the temple-service, for they did not leave Christ till the sixth hour, when the darkness began. Some think that the sixth hour, with this evangelist, is, according to the Roman reckoning and ours, six of the clock in the morning, answering to the Jews' first hour of the day; this is very probable, that Christ's trial before Pilate was at the height about six in the morning, a little after sun-rising.

Pilate saith unto the Jews, 'Behold your King, Him whom you accuse as a pretender to the crown. Is this a man likely to be dangerous to the government? I am satisfied He is not: let Him alone.' Some think he upbraids them with secret disaffection to Cæsar; 'You would have this man to be your king, if He would but have headed a rebellion against Cæsar.' But Pilate, though far from meaning so, seems as if he were the voice of God to them. Christ, now crowned with thorns here, is, as a king at his coronation, offered to the people; 'Behold your King, which God hath set upon his holy hill of Zion'; but they, instead of entering into it with acclamations of consent, protest against Him; they will not have a king of God's choosing.

They cried out with the greatest indignation, Away with Him, away with Him, which speaks disdain as well as malice. 'Take Him. He is none of ours; we disown Him for our kinsman, much more for our king; away with Him out of sight'; for so it was written of Him, He is one whom the nation abhors, (Isa. 49:7.) and they hid as if were their faces from Him, Isa. 53:2,3. Away with Him from the earth, Acts 22:22. This shows, 1. How we deserved to have been treated at God's tribunal; we were by sin odious to God's holiness, which cried, Away with them, away with them, for God is of purer eyes than to behold iniquity; we were also obnoxious to God's justice, which cried against us, 'Crucify them, crucify them.' Had not Christ interposed, and been thus rejected of men, we had been forever rejected of God. 2. We are often in Scripture said to crucify sin, in conformity to Christ's death; now they that crucified Christ, did it with detestation. With a pious indignation we should run down sin in us, as they with an impious indignation ran Him down, who was made sin for us. The true penitent casts away from him his transgressions, Away with them, away with them, (Isa. 2:20. 30:22.) crucify them, crucify them; is not fit that they should live in my soul, Hos. 14:8.

Verse 12.
Thou art not Cæsar's friend.] The jealous tyranny and cruelty of Tiberius Cæsar, who was then emperor, [see note Luke 23:2.] are well known [from Suetonius and Tacitus:] and Pilate, [no longer reticent] fearing lest spies should carry an accusation against him to Rome.

Verse 13.
The most probable etymology derives Gabbatha from a word which signifies raised on high. It is perhaps a kind of [raised] stage, or scaffold, in the midst of a space, or area, (belonging to the palace,) its floor ornamented with a variegated pavement of little square pieces of marble, or of stones of various colors, arranged [in tessellated or Mosaic work] with great art and elegance, to form a hequered and pleasing appearance. In this the governor might place himself on public, and especially on judicial occasions. It appears from the connection, that it was some where without his house, probably in some open place.

14 And it was the preparation of the passover, and about the sixth hour: and he saith unto the Jews, Behold your King!

15 But they cried out, Away with him, away with him, crucify him. Pilate saith unto them, Shall I crucify your King? The chief priests answered, We have no king but Cæsar.

prevailed; the fear of man had greater power over him than the fear of God. See,

1. He sinned against his conscience; he had again and again pronounced Him innocent, yet at last condemned Him. He had in many instances disobliterated the Jewish nation, for he was a man of a haughty, implacable spirit. He had seized on the corban, and spent it on a water-work; he had brought in shields stamped with Cæsar's image, which was very provoking to the Jews; he had sacrificed the lives of many to his resolutions herein; fearing to be complained of, for those and other insolencies, he was willing to gratify the Jews. This makes the matter much worse. If he had been of an easy disposition, his yielding thus had been more excusable; but for a man so wilful in other things, and of so fierce a resolution, to be overcome in a thing of this nature, shows that he could better bear the wronging of his conscience, than the crossing of his humor.

V. 1-16. The conflict between convictions and corrupt affections, is often strong: but where faith is wanting, the world will get the victory; and the dread of reproach or loss, or the hope of advantage, will induce men to venture the wrath of God, and its tremendous consequences. (P. O. Matt. 27: 19-25. Acts 24: 24-27. 26: 24-29.)—Every one is inexcusable, who acts contrary to his conscience; but the greater opportunities men possess of knowing the truth, the more aggravated will their guilt be found, in rebelling against the light. (Matt.

Pilate, willing to have Jesus released, and yet that it should be their doing, asks them, Shall I crucify your king? In saying this, he designed either, 1. To show them how absurd it was for them to reject one who offered to be their king, when they needed one more than ever. Have they no sense of slavery? No desire of liberty? No value for a deliverer? Though he saw no cause to fear Him, they might see cause to hope for something from Him; since crushed and sinking interests are ready to catch at anything. Or, 2. To stop the mouth of his own conscience; 'If this Jesus be a king, he is only king of the Jews, therefore I have nothing to do but to make a fair tender of Him to them; if they refuse Him, and will have their king crucified, what is that to me?' He banters them for their folly in expecting a Messiah, and yet running down one that did so fair to be He.

The chief priests, that they might effectually renounce Christ, and engage Pilate to crucify Him, cried out, We have no king but Cæsar. This they knew would please Pilate, and so they hoped to carry their point, though they hated Cæsar and his government. What a plain indication this is, that the time for the Messiah to appear, was now come; for if the Jews have no king but Cæsar, then is the scepter departed from Judah, and the lawgiver from between his feet. What a righteous thing it was with God, to bring upon them that ruin by the Romans, which followed not long after. They adhere to Cæsar, and to Cæsar they shall go. God gave them enough of their Cæsars, and, according to Jotham's parable, the trees choose the bramble for their king, rather than the vine and the olive, Judg. 9: 12-19. Thenceforward they were rebels to the Cæsars, and the Cæsars tyrants to them, and it ended in their overthrow. It is just with God to make that a scourge and plague to us, which we prefer before Christ. They would have no other king than Cæsar, and never have they had any other to this day, but have now abode many days without a king, and without a prince, (Hos. 3: 4.) of their own; the kings of the nations have ruled over them; since they will have no king but Cæsar, so shall their doom be; themselves have decided it.

V. 16-18. Here sentence of death is passed upon our Lord, and execution done soon after. Pilate's convictions yielded, and his corruptions

2. He endeavored to transfer the guilt upon the Jews. He delivered Him, not to his officers, (as usual,) but to the prosecutors; excusing the wrong to his own conscience with this, that it was but a permissive condemnation, and that he did not put Christ to death, but only connived at it.

3. Christ was made sin for us. We deserved to have been condemned, but Christ was condemned for us, that to us there might be no condemnation.

Judgment was no sooner given, than the prosecutors, having gained their point, resolved to lose no time, 1. Let Pilate should change his mind, and order a reprieve. Those are the worst enemies to our souls, that hurry us to sin, and then leave us no room to undo what we have done amiss. 2. Let there should be an uproar among the people, and a greater number against them, than they had with so much artifice got to be for them.

It were well if we would be thus expeditious in good, and not stay for more difficulties.

They immediately hurried away the prisoner. The chief priests greedily flew upon the prey which they had been long waiting for. Or they, that is, the soldiers who were to attend the execution, took Him, and led Him away, not to the place whence He came, and thence to the place of execution, as is usual with us, but directly to the place of execution. Both the priests and the soldiers joined in leading Him away. Now was the Son of man delivered into the hands of wicked and unreasonable men. By the law of Moses (and in appeals by our law) the prosecutors were to be the executioners, Deut. 17: 7. The priests here were proud of the office. His being led away does not suppose Him to have made opposition, but the Scripture must be fulfilled, He was led as a sheep to the slaughter, Acts 8: 32. We deserved to have been led forth with the workers of iniquity, as criminals to execution, Ps. 125: 5. But He was led forth for us, that we might escape.

To add to his misery, they obliged Him to carry his cross, according to the custom among the Romans. The cross was removed when the execution was over, and commonly buried with the body; so that every one that was crucified had a cross. Christ's carrying his cross may be considered, 1. As a part of his sufferings; He endured the cross literally. It was a long and thick piece of timber, and some think neither seasoned nor hewn. The body of Jesus was tender, and unaccustomed to such burdens; it had now lately been harassed and tired out. His shoulders were sore with the stripes they had given Him; every jog of the cross would renew his smart, and he apt to strike the thorns He was crowned with into his head; yet all this He patiently underwent, and it was but the beginning of sorrows. 2. It was very significant to his undertaking, the Father having laid upon Him the iniquity of us all, (Isa. 53: 6.) and He being to take away sin, by bearing it in his own body on the tree, 1 Pet. 2: 24. 3. Our Master hereby taught all his disci-

Yet persons thus distinguished, have often been most desperate in opposing the power of godliness, and prosecuting those, whose doctrine and example tended to detect their hypocrisy and usurpations.—Those rulers of every description, who have sat in judgment on Christ and his servants, will soon stand before his tribunal; where they will 'know the power of his wrath,' and be constrained to confess with terror and anguish, 'Truly this was the Son of God.' About the sixth hour.] As there is no reason to think that John computed time in a different manner from the other evangelists; as six o'clock, (according to the Roman computation,) or soon after sunrise, must have been much too early for all the events which preceded our Lord's crucifixion to have occurred that morning; as Mark (15: 25.) has expressly mentioned the third hour, or nine o'clock, for the time of that event, to which the accounts of the other evangelists accord; and as the sixth hour, or noon, (according to the Jewish computation,) would be too late to agree with the parallel Scriptures; so it seems the most easy way of solving the difficulty, to suppose that sixth, instead of third, was inserted by some of the early transcribers of this gospel. The mistake would be very trivial, and very easily fallen into; and in a few places it is necessary to allow that something [812] of this kind has happened. Indeed some manuscripts read 'the third hour.'

Verse 15.

'Josephus expressly assures us, that Pilate, having slain a considerable number of seditious Samaritans, was deposed from his government by Vitellius, and sent to Tiberius at Rome, who died before he arrived there. And Eusebius tells us, that quickly after, (having as others say, been banished to Vienne, in Gaul,) he laid violent hands on himself, falling on his own sword. Agrippa, who was an eye-witness to many of his enormities, speaks of him in his oration to Caligula Cæsar, as one who had been a man of a most inhuman character. Probably, the accusations of other Jews, following him, had borne that proved his destruction.' Doddridge.

19 ¶ And Pilate wrote a title, and put it on the cross. And the writing was, JESUS OF NAZARETH THE KING OF THE JEWS.

20 This title then read many of the Jews; for the place where Jesus was crucified was nigh to the city; and it was written in Hebrew, and Greek, and Latin.

21 Then said the chief priests of the Jews to Pilate, Write not, The King of the Jews: but that he said, I am King of the Jews.

22 Pilate answered, What I have written, I have written.

hanging upon the tree some hours, dying gradually in the full use of reason and speech, that He might actually resign Himself a Sacrifice. 2. In what company He died; two other with Him. Probably, those had not been executed at that time, but at the request of the chief priests, to add to the disgrace of our Lord; which might be the reason why one of them reviled Him, because their death was hastened for his sake. It was ordered that his fellow-sufferers should be the worst of sinners, that He might bear our reproach, and the latter appear to be his only. This exposed Him to the people's contempt, who would conclude Him not only a malefactor, because He was yoked with malefactors, but the worst of the three, because put in the midst. But thus the Scripture was fulfilled; He was numbered among the transgressors. He did not die at the altar among the sacrifices, nor mingle his blood with that of bulls and goats; but among the criminals, and mingled his blood with theirs who were sacrificed to public justice.

Let us pause, and with an eye of faith look upon Jesus. Was ever sorrow like his? See Him, who was clothed with glory, stripped, and clothed with shame; Him, who was the praise of angels, made a reproach of men; Him, who had been with eternal delight and joy in the bosom of his Father, now in the extremities of pain and agony. See Him bleeding, struggling, dying; see Him and love Him, love Him and live to Him, and [let us] study what we shall render.

V. 19-30. Some remarkable circumstances of Christ's dying, ere here more fully related than before, which they will take special notice of, who covet to know Christ, and Him crucified.

1. The inscription which Pilate wrote, and ordered to be fixed to the top of the cross, declaring the cause for which He was crucified, Matthew called the accusation; Mark and Luke, the inscription; John calls it by the proper Latin name, the title; and it was this, Jesus of Nazareth, the King of the Jews. Pilate intended this for his reproach, that He, being Jesus of Nazareth, should pretend to be King of the Jews, in competition with Cæsar, to whom Pilate would thus recommend himself, as very jealous for his honor and interest; but God overruled this matter, 1. That it might be a further testimony to the innocency of our Lord; for here was an accusation, which, as it was worded, contained no crime. If this be all they have to lay to his charge, surely He has done nothing worthy of death or bonds. 2. That it might show forth his dignity and honor. This is Jesus a Savior, the blessed Nazarene, sanctified to God; the King of the Jews, Messiah the Prince, the Sceptre shall rise out of Israel, as Balaam had foretold; dying for the good of his people, as Caiaphas had foretold. Thus three bad men witnessed to Christ, though they meant not so.

2. The notice taken of this inscription; Many of the Jews read it, not only those of Jerusalem, but those out of the country, and from other countries, that came up to the feast. Multitudes read it, and it occasioned a great variety of objections and speculations. Christ Himself was set for a sign. The title was so much read,

(1.) Because the place where Jesus was crucified, though without the gate, was nigh to the city; which intimates that if it had been any great distance ples to take up their cross, and follow Him. Whatever cross He calls us to bear, we must remember that He bore the cross first, and by bearing it for us, bears it off from us in a great measure, for thus He hath made his yoke easy, and his burden light. He bore that end of the cross that had the curse upon it; and thence all that are his, are enabled to call their afflictions for Him light, and but for a moment.

They brought Him to the place of execution; He went forth, voluntarily; out of the city, for He was crucified without the gate, Heb. 13: 12. And to put the greater infamy on his sufferings, He was brought to the common place of execution, as numbered among the transgressors; a place called Golgotha, the place of a skull, where they threw skulls and bones; a place ceremonially unclean; there Christ suffered, because He was made sin for us, that He might purge our consciences from dead works, and the pollution of them. There is a tradition of the elders, that Adam was buried here, and that this was the place of his skull, and they observed that where death triumphed over the first Adam, there the second Adam triumphed over him. Gerhard quotes for this tradition, Origen, Cyprian, Epiphanius, Austin, Jerome, and others.

There they crucified Him. Observe, 1. What death Christ died; the death of the cross, a bloody, painful, shameful, cursed death. He was nailed to the cross, a sacrifice bound to the altar, a Savior fixed for his undertaking. He was lifted up, as the brazen serpent, between heaven and earth, because we were unworthy of either, and abandoned by both. He off, they would not have been led to go and see it. It is an advantage to have the means of knowing Christ brought to our doors.

(2.) It was written in Hebrew and Greek, and Latin, which made it legible by all; they all understood one or other of these languages, and none were more careful to bring up their children to read than the Jews. It likewise made it the more considerable - every one would be curious to inquire what it was, which was so industriously published in the three most known languages. In the Hebrew, the oracles of God were recorded; in Greek, the learning of the philosophers; and in Latin, the laws of the empire. In each of these Christ is proclaimed King, in whom are hid all the treasures of revelation, wisdom, and power: it was intimated thereby, that Christ should be a Savior to all nations; and also that every nation should hear in their own tongue the wonderful works of the Redeemer. Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, were the common languages at that time in this part of the world; so that this, so far from what the Papists would have, teaches us the knowledge of Christ ought to be diffused throughout every nation in their own tongue, that people may converse as freely with the Scriptures as with their neighbors.

The offence the prosecutors took at it. They would not have it written, the King of the Jews; but that He said of Himself, I am the King of the Jews. Here they show themselves, 1. Very spiteful against Christ. It was not enough to have Him crucified, but they must have his name crucified too; to justify themselves they thought themselves concerned to represent Him as an usurper of honors and powers. 2. Foolishly jealous of the honor of their nation, though a conquered and enslaved people, yet they stood so much upon their reputation, that they scorned to have it said, this was their king. 3. They show themselves very impertinent to Pilate; they could not but be sensible that they had forced him, against his mind, to condemn Christ, and yet, in such a trivial thing as this, they continue to tease Him. It was so much the worse, that, though they had charged Him with pretending to be the King of the Jews, they had not proved it, nor had He ever said so.

The judge's resolution to adhere to it; 'What I have written I have written, and will not alter it to humor them.'

Herbly an affront was put upon the chief priests. By Pilate's manner of speaking, he was uneasy in himself for yielding to them, and vexed at them for forcing him to it; and therefore was resolved to be cross with them; and by this inscription insinuates, 1. That they were not sincere in their affections to Cæsar and his government; but were willing to have a king of the Jews, if they could have one to their mind. 2. That a king mean and despicable, was good enough to be the king of the Jews; and this would be the fate of all that should dare oppose the Roman power. 3. That they had been unjust in prosecuting Jesus, when there was no fault to be found in Him.

Herbly honor was done to Jesus. Pilate adhered to it with resolution, that He was the King of the Jews; what he had written, was what God had first written, and therefore he could not alter; for thus it was written, the Messiah the Prince shall be cut off; Dan 9: 26. This therefore is the true cause of his death; He dies, because the King of Israel must die thus. When the Jews reject Christ, and will not have Him for their king, Pilate, a Gentile, insists that He is a king; an earnest of what came to pass soon after, when the Gentiles submitted to the kingdom of Messiah, against which the unbelieving Jews had rebelled.

Four soldiers were employed, who, when they

Title.] 'A white board with an inscription in black letters. This inscription is detailed at length by John; but abridged by the other evangelists. It was written in a dubious manner, some suppose in derision; which seems probable from Pilate's refusing to alter it, saying, What I have written, I have written.'

Dr. Townson, to reconcile the evangelists here, supposes that as the title was written in Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, it might have slightly varied in each language. Luke and John, writing for the Gentiles, would prefer the Greek inscription; Matthew, addressing the Jews, would use the Hebrew; Mark, writing to the Romans, would naturally give the Latin.'

long before, and which came to pass according to the prediction. (2.) That Jesus is the true Messiah; for in Him all the Old-Testament prophecies concerning the Messiah had, and have, their accomplishment. These things therefore the soldiers did. Observe

The care He took of his mother.

His mother attends Him to his death; there stood by the cross, as near as they could get, his mother, and some of his relations, and friends. At first, they stood near, as it is said here; but, it is probable, afterward the soldiers forced them to stand far off, as it is said in Matthew and Mark: or they themselves removed out of the ground.

See here the tender affection of these pious women to Jesus in his sufferings. When all his disciples, except John, had forsaken Him, they continued their attendance. Thus the feeble were as David, (Zech. 12:8.) they were not deterred by the fury of the enemy, or the horror of the sight; they could not rescue, or relieve Him, yet they attended Him, to show their good-will. It is an impious and blasphemous construction which some popish writers put upon the virgin Mary's standing by the cross, that thereby she contributed to the satisfaction He made for sin, no less than He did.

We must easily suppose what an affliction it was to them to see Him thus used. Now was fulfilled Simeon's word, Luke 2:35. His torments were her tortures; she was upon the rack, while He was upon the cross; and her heart bled with his wounds; and the reproaches wherewith they reproached Him, fell on them that attended Him.

We may justly admire the power of divine grace in supporting these women, especially the mother, under this trial. We do not find her wringing her hands, or tearing her hair, or making an outcry; but, with wonderful composure, standing by the cross, and her friends with her. Surely she and they were strengthened by a divine power; and surely Mary had a fuller expectation of his resurrection than the rest, which supported her thus. We know not what we can bear till we are tried, and then we know who has said, My grace is sufficient for thee.

had nailed Him to the cross, and lifted it up, and nothing more was to be done than to wait his expiring through the extremity of pain, went to divide his clothes; and so made four parts, as near of the same value as they could; but his coat, or upper garment, being a curiosity, without seam, woven from the top throughout, they agreed to cast lots for that. Observe,

1. The shame they put upon our Lord, in stripping Him of his garments before they crucified Him. The shame of nakedness came in with sin. He, who was made sin for us, bare that shame, to roll away our reproach. He was stripped, that we might be clothed with white raiment, (Rev. 3:13.) and that when we are unclothed, we may not be found naked.

2. The wages with which these soldiers paid themselves for crucifying Christ. They were willing to do it for his clothes. Nothing is to be done so bad, but there will be found men bad enough to do it for a trifle. Probably, they hoped to make more than ordinary advantage of his clothes, having heard of cures wrought by the touch of the hem of his garment; or expecting that his admirers would give any money for them.

3. The sport they made about his seamless coat; we read not of any thing about Him valuable or remarkable but that, and that not for its richness, but only its variety; for it was woven from the top throughout. The soldiers thought it pity to rend it, for then it would unravel, and a piece of it would be good for nothing; they therefore cast lots for it. While Christ was in his dying agonies, they were merrily dividing his spoils.

The preserving of Christ's seamless coat is commonly alluded to, to show the care all Christians ought to take, that they rend not the church of Christ with strifes and divisions; yet some have observed, that the reason why the soldiers would not rend Christ's coat, was not out of respect to Christ, but because each hoped to have it entire for himself. So, many cry out against schism, only that they may engross all the wealth and power to themselves. Those who opposed Luther's separation from the church of Rome, urged much the seamless coat; and some of them laid so much stress upon it, that they were called The seamless.

David, in spirit, foretold this circumstance of Christ's sufferings, Ps. 22:18. The event so exactly answering the prediction, proves, (1.) That the Scripture is the Word of God, which foretold contingent events concerning Christ so

He tenderly provides for his mother at his death. It is probable that Joseph, her husband, was long since dead, and that her Son, Jesus, had supported her, and her relation to Him had been her maintenance; and now that He was dying, what would become of her? He saw her standing by, knew her cares and griefs, and saw John standing not far off, and so settled a new relation between his beloved mother, and his beloved disciple; for He said to her, 'Woman, behold thy son; for whom be beforehand thou must have a motherly affection;' and to him, 'Behold thy mother; to whose thou must pay a filial duty.' And from that hour, never to be forgotten, that disciple took her to his own home.

Christ was not so much taken up with his sufferings, as to forget his friends. His dear mother, perhaps, was so taken up with his sufferings, that she thought not what would become of her; but He admitted that thought. Silver and gold He had none to leave, no estate real or personal, his clothes the soldiers had seized, and we hear no more of the bag since Judas hanged himself. He had, therefore, no other way to provide for his mother, than by his interest in a friend.

He calls her woman, not mother, not out of any disrespect to her, but because mother would have been a cutting word to her; like Isaac saying to Abraham, My father. He speaks as one now no more in this world, but already dead to those in it that were dearest to Him.

He directs her to look upon John as her son. See here, An instance of divine goodness, for our encouragement. When God removes one comfort from us, He raises up another, perhaps where we looked not for it. We read of childer which the church shall have, after she has lost the other, Isa. 49:20. Let none therefore reckon all gone with one cistern dried up, for from the same fountain another may be filled. Christ has here taught children, to the utmost of their power, to provide for the comfort of their aged parents. When David was in distress, he took care of his parents, and found out a shelter for them; (1 Sam. 22:3.) so the Son of David here.

Observe his confidence in the beloved disciple. Be thou as a son to guide her, (Isa. 51:18.) and forsake her not when she is old. Prov. 23:22. This was an honor to John, and a testimony to his prudence and fidelity. If He, who knows all things, had not known that John loved Him, He would not have made him his mother's guardian. It is a great honor to be employed for Christ, and to be trusted with any of his interest in the world. It would be a care and some charge to John; but he cheerfully accepted it, and took her to his own home, not objecting the trouble or expense, or his obligations to his own family, or the ill-will he might contract by it. Note, Those that truly love Christ, and are loved of Him, will be glad of an opportunity to serve Him, or his. Some say that Mary lived with John at Jerusalem eleven years, and then died. Others, that she removed with him to Ephesus.

Christ, knowing that all things hitherto were accomplished, that the Scripture might be fulfilled, which spake of his drinking in his sufferings, saith, I thirst, that is, He called for drink.

Well might He thirst, after all the toil He had undergone; and being now in the agonies of death, ready to expire by the loss of blood and extremity of pain. The torments of hell are represented by a violent thirst in the complaint of the rich man. To that everlasting thirst we had been condemned, had not Christ suffered for us.

This is the only word He spake, that looked like complaint of his outward sufferings. When they scourged Him, and crowned Him with thorns, He did not cry out. But now He cried, I thirst. For, 1. He would thus express the travail of his soul, Isa. 53:11. He thirsted to glorify God, and accomplish the work of our 27 Then saith he to the disciple, 'Behold thy mother! And from that hour that disciple took her unto his own home.'

28 ¶ After this, Jesus knowing that all things were now accomplished, that the Scripture might be fulfilled, saith, I thirst.

29 Now there was set a vessel full of vinegar: and they filled a sponge with vinegar, and put it upon hyssop, and put it to his mouth.

30 When Jesus therefore had received the vinegar, he said, 'It is finished: and he bowed his head, and gave up the ghost.'

redemption. 2. He would thus see the Scripture fulfilled. Hitherto, all had been accomplished, and He knew it; for this He had carefully observed all along; now He called to mind one thing more, of which this was the proper season for the performance. By this it appears that He was the Messiah, in that not only the Scripture was punctually fulfilled in Him, but strictly eyed by Him. By this it appears that God was with Him of a truth—that He went exactly according to the Word of God, taking care not to destroy, but to fulfil, the law and the prophets.

The Scripture had foretold his thirst, and He Himself related it, because it could not otherwise be known; it was foretold that his tongue should cleave to his jaws, Ps. 22: 15. Samson, a type of Christ, when laying the Philistines heaps upon heaps, was himself sore athirst; (Judg. 15, 18.) so was Christ, when spoiling principalities and powers.

The Scripture had foretold, that in his thirst He should have vinegar given Him to drink, Ps. 69: 21. They had given Him vinegar to drink before they crucified Him, (Matt. 27: 34,) but the prophecy was not exactly fulfilled in that, because that was not in his thirst; therefore now He said, I thirst; then He would not drink, but now He received it. Christ would rather court an affront than see any prophecy unfulfilled. This should satisfy us under all our trials, that the will and Word of God is accomplished.

How little respect his persecutors showed Him; (v. 29.) There was set a vessel full of vinegar, probably, according to the custom at all executions of this nature; or, as others think, now set designedly for an abuse to Christ, instead of the cup of wine, which they used to give to them that were ready to perish; with that they filled a sponge, for they would not allow Him a cup, and put it upon a hyssop stalk, and with that heaved it to his mouth; they stuck it round with hyssop; so it may be taken; or, as others, they mingled it with hyssop. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 17-36. We cannot pass over this narrative, without again reflecting on the complicated cruelties and indignities, to which Christ was exposed, not for any fault of his own, nay, directly contrary to his deservings. But He was wounded and scourged, that we might be healed; He was arrayed with scorn in the purple robe, that He might procure for us 'the robe of righteousness;' He was crowned with thorns, that we might be 'crowned with honor and immortality;' He stood speechless, that we might have an all-prevailing plea; He endured torture, that we might have 'a strong consolation;' He thirsted, that we might drink of the waters of life; He bore the wrath of the Father, that we might enjoy his favor; He was numbered with transgressors, that we might be made 'equal to angels;' He died, that we might live forever!—Let us then often survey this scene, and admire his immeasurable love; that we may learn to mourn for sin, and rejoice in our obligations to the Redeemer; and be 'constrained to live no longer to ourselves, but to Him who died for us and rose again.' (2 Cor. 5: 13-15.)—As we ought to hear with thankful exultation, that the ransom of our souls was perfected, when Jesus said, 'It is finished;' so we should be excited to redouble our diligence, that the work of sanctifying grace may be carried on towards perfection in our hearts. For we should look to Him as our King, as well as our High Priest.—In every way, it has been decidedly written, and the writing shall never be reversed, 'that Jesus of Nazareth is King;' and all, who profess his religion, and 'will not have Him to reign over them,' will be deemed guilty of 'crucifying their King.'—We may be encouraged by our Lord's attention to his mother, to hope for his pity in all our sorrows, now He is exalted to the throne: but we may also learn, that the surest interest in his love will not secure our exemption from the sharpest temporal sufferings. His example likewise teaches all to honor their parents, in every circumstance of life and death; to provide for their wants; to promote their comfort; and we ought also to show our love to Jesus, by behaving with courteous respect, affection, and kindness, to the poorest and meanest of those whom He loves, and who love Him. We ought indeed to act towards them as though they were our most honored relatives, and we heard Jesus say to us, from his cross, and from his throne of glory, concerning this and the other believer, 'Behold my mother,' 'my brother,' 'my sister;' and, 'Whatsoever ye do unto the least of these, ye do it unto Me.' (P. O. Matt. 12: 38-50, 25: 31-40. Mark 3: 20-35.)

SCOTT.

Verse 29.

The hyssop, (see cut,) is termed a reed by Matthew and Mark; and it appears that a species of hyssop, with a reedy stalk about two feet long, grew about Jerusalem. Greenfield. 'Such a stalk might have been long enough to enable a man to reach the mouth of the crucified person, who was raised about three feet from the ground.' Bloomfield.

To the Notes, Matt. 27: 34, Mark 15: 23, Luke 23: 36, the following is added from a source accessible to but few. 'To give vinegar to dying malefactors, was diametrically contrary to the common and courteous custom of the Jews. For, whereas that sharp liquor awakens the sense of pain, and recovers out of swoons, the Jews did use to give such persons a stupefying and narcotic potion, so to ruffle their minds, that they might not attend unto their an-guishes, namely, frankincense in a cup of wine. To countenance this practice, they quote the words of Solomon, Prov. 31: 6, 7. There is a tradition among them, that the ladies of the city of Jerusalem were at this charge, of their own good will towards the poor sufferers. But for all this practice, the cruelty of the Jews fulfilled what the Spirit of prophecy had foretold, (Ps. 69: 21.) In my thirst, they gave Me vinegar to drink. Some tell us, the vinegar, with the sponge was set ready at executions, to stop the violent flux of blood, that the death of the malefactors might be prolonged. It seems in scorn exhibited to the dying Savior. The mingling of gall with it made it a nauseous and horrid potion. C. MATHER'S MS. 'Illustrations of the Scriptures.'

There was set a vessel, &c.] This and the other things can hardly be thought prepared to linger out the lives of the sufferers, at least now, when the Jews' Sabbath drew nigh, and they were in haste to have the executions over. The Jews themselves say, that Jesus asked for water, and they gave Him sharp vinegar confirming so far the evangelic history.

31 The Jews therefore, because it was the preparation, that the bodies should not remain upon the cross on the sabbath-day, (for that sabbath-day was an high day,) besought Pilate that their legs might be broken, and that they might be taken away.

32 Then came the soldiers, and brake the legs of the first, and of the other which was crucified with him.

33 But when they came to Jesus, and saw that he was dead already, they brake not his legs.

34 But one of the soldiers with a spear pierced his side, and forthwith came thereout blood and water.

35 And he that saw it bare record, and his record is true; and he knoweth that he saith true, that ye might believe.

36 For these things were done, that the scripture should be fulfilled, A bone of him shall not be broken.

strangling or beheading, which would have been a compassionate hastening out of misery, but by the breaking of their legs, which would carry them off in the most exquisite pain.

Note. 1. The tender mercies of the wicked are cruel. 2. The pretended sanctity of hypocrites is abominable. These Jews would be thought to bear a great regard to the Sabbath, and yet had no regard to justice; they made no conscience of bringing an innocent and excellent person to the cross, and yet scrupled letting a dead body hang upon the cross.

Pilate was still gratifying the Jews, and gave orders as they desired; and the soldiers came, hardened against pity, and broke the legs of the two thieves. One of these thieves was a penitent, and had received from Christ an assurance that he should shortly be with Him in paradise, and yet died in the same misery with the other thief; for all things come alike to all; many go to heaven, that have bands in their death, and die in the bitterness of their soul. The extremity of dying agonies is no obstruction to the comforts that wait for holy souls. This is the order of going to heaven—Christ, the first-fruits and forerunner, afterward they that are Christ's.

pinness laid, that shall never fail. As for God, his work is perfect; when I begin, (saith He,) I will also make an end, as in the purchase, so in the application, of the redemption.

He bowed his head, and gave up the ghost. He was voluntary in dying; for He was not only the Sacrifice, but the Priest and the Offerer; and the mind of the offerer was all in all in the sacrifice. Christ showed his will in his sufferings; by the which will we are sanctified.

He gave up the ghost. He had said, Father, into thy hands I commit my spirit; thereby expressing the intention of this act. I give up Myself as a ransom for many; and, accordingly, He did give up his spirit, paid down the price of pardon and life at his Father's hands. Father, glorify thy name.

He bowed his head. God had laid upon Him the iniquity of us all; putting them upon the head of this great sacrifice; and some think that by this bowing of his head He would intimate his sense of the weight upon Him. See Ps. 38: 4. 40: 12. The bowing of his head shows his submission to his Father's will, and his obedience to death. He accommodated Himself to his dying work, as Jacob, who gathered up his feet into the bed, and then yielded up the ghost.

V. 31—37. This passage concerning the piercing of Christ's side after his death, is recorded only by this evangelist.

The superstition of the Jews occasioned it; Because it was the preparation for the Sabbath, and that Sabbath, falling in the passover-week, was a high day, one of the days of unleavened bread, and (some reckon) the day of the offering of the first-fruits; to show a veneration for it, they would not have the dead bodies remain on the cross, but besought that their legs might be broken, (a certain, but cruel dispatch,) and that then they might be buried out of sight. Passover-sabbaths are high days; sacrament-days are high-days, and there ought to be more than ordinary preparation for them, that these may be to us as the days of heaven.

They reckoned it a reproach to that day, if the dead bodies should be left upon the cross. Dead bodies were not to be left at any time; (Deut. 21: 23.) yet, in this case, the Jews would have let the Roman custom, [which frequently left the bodies to be consumed or devoured by birds,] take place, had it not been an extraordinary day; and many strangers being then at Jerusalem, it would have offended them; nor could they well bear the sight of Christ's body; for, unless their consciences were quite seared, when the heat of their rage was a little over, they would upbraid them.

They petition Pilate, that their bodies, now as good as dead, might be dispatched; not by what would have been a compassionate hastening out of misery, but by the breaking of their legs, which would carry them off in the most exquisite pain.

Note. 1. The tender mercies of the wicked are cruel. 2. The pretended sanctity of hypocrites is abominable. These Jews would be thought to bear a great regard to the Sabbath, and yet had no regard to justice; they made no conscience of bringing an innocent and excellent person to the cross, and yet scrupled letting a dead body hang upon the cross.

Pilate was still gratifying the Jews, and gave orders as they desired; and the soldiers came, hardened against pity, and broke the legs of the two thieves. One of these thieves was a penitent, and had received from Christ an assurance that he should shortly be with Him in paradise, and yet died in the same misery with the other thief; for all things come alike to all; many go to heaven, that have bands in their death, and die in the bitterness of their soul. The extremity of dying agonies is no obstruction to the comforts that wait for holy souls. This is the order of going to heaven—Christ, the first-fruits and forerunner, afterward they that are Christ's.

They supposed Christ to be dead, and therefore did not break his legs, p. 33. Jesus died in less time than persons crucified ordinarily did; [which sometimes was not till the next day, or later.] The structure of his body, perhaps, being extraordinarily fine, was the sooner broken by pain; or, rather, it was to show that He laid down his life of Himself, and could die when He pleased. Though He yielded to death, He was not conquered. His enemies were satisfied He was really dead. The Jews, who stood by to see the execution effectually done, would not have omitted this piece of cruelty, if they had not been sure He was out of the reach of it. Whatever devices are in men's hearts, the counsel of the Lord shall stand. It was fully designed to break his legs, but, God's counsel being otherwise, see how it was prevented.

Because they would be sure He was dead they made such an experiment as would put it past dispute. God designed herein,

1. To evidence the truth of his death, in order to the proof of his resurrection. If He was only in a trance or swoon, his resurrection was a sham; but, this spear broke up the very fountains of life, and it was impossible a human body should survive such a wound in the vitals.

2. To illustrate the design of his death. There was much mystery in it, and this same apostle refers to it as a very considerable thing, 1 John 5: 6, 8.

The blood and water were significant:

1. They signified the two great benefits which all believers partake of through Christ—justification, and sanctification; blood for remission, water for regeneration; blood for atonement, water for purification. Blood and water were used very much under the law. Guilt contracted must be expiated by blood; stains contracted must be done away by the water of purification. These two must always go together. Ye are sanctified, ye are justified, 1 Cor. 6: 11. Christ has joined them together, and we must not think to put them asunder. They both flow from the pierced side of our Redeemer. To Christ crucified we owe merit for our justification, and Spirit and grace for our sanctification, 1 Cor. 1: 30.

2. They signify the two great ordinances of baptism, and the Lord's supper; they both owe their efficacy to Christ. It is not the water employed that will be to us the washing of regeneration, but the water out of the side of Christ; not the blood of the grape that will pacify the conscience and refresh the soul, but the blood of Christ. Now was the rock smitten, (1 Cor. 10: 4,) now the fountain opened, (Zech. 13: 1.) the wells of salvation digged, Isa. 12: 3. Here is the river, the streams whereof make glad the city of our God. See here

The attestation of the truth of this by an eyewitness, the evangelist himself.

What a competent witness he was of the matter of fact. What he bore record of he saw; it is what we have seen and looked upon, (1 John 1: 1. 2 Pet. 1: 16.) and had perfect understanding of, Luke 1: 3. What he saw he faithfully bare record of; as a faithful witness, he told not only the truth, but the whole truth. His record is undoubtedly true; for he wrote not only from personal knowledge and observation, but from the dictates of the Spirit of truth, that leads into all truth. He had himself a full assurance of what he wrote, and did not persuade others to believe that which he did not believe himself; he knows that he saith true. He therefore witnessed these things, that we might believe; did not record them merely for his own satisfaction, or the private use of his friends, but made them public to the world; not to please the curious, or entertain the ingenious, but to draw men to believe.

What care he showed in this particular instance. That we may be well assured, both of the truth of Christ's death, he saw his heart's blood let out; and also of the benefits that flow

Verses 33—36.

Lactantius says, that it was a common custom to break the legs of criminals on the cross, which we are told was done at the instigation of an iron mallet, as a kind of coup de grace, the sooner to put them out of pain. It appears that the spear went through the pericardium and pierced the heart, and that the water proceeded from the former, and the blood from the latter.

(36.) (Marg. Ref. — Ex. 12: 46. Ps. 34: 19, 20. Zech. 12: 9—14.) Perhaps this may intimate, that as the natural body of Christ, after all his tortures, was so preserved by a special providence, that no bone was broken, but the whole was found entire at his resurrection; so the members of the mystical body of Christ, whatever sufferings and temptations they pass through, shall be preserved by divine grace from essential detriment, none shall be wanting, but all shall be forth-coming, complete and entire, at 'the resurrection of the just.' (6: 36—40.) SCOT.

Verses 37—37.

'It would seem that a candid attention to the facts narrated in this chapter, collated with those passages in the law and the prophets which the Jews acknowledge to speak of the Messiah, would be sufficient to give them the fullest conviction that He is the Christ. But where people once make a covenant with unbelief, argument, reason, demonstration, and miracles themselves, fail to convince them.' Dr A. CLARKE.

37 And again another scripture saith, 'They shall look on him whom they pierced.'

38 ¶ And after this, 'Joseph of Arimathea, being a disciple of Jesus, but secretly for fear of the Jews, besought Pilate that he might take away the body of Jesus: and Pilate gave him leave. He came therefore and took the body of Jesus.'

39 And there came also * Nicodemus, which at the first came to Jesus by night, and brought a mixture of myrrh and aloes, about an hundred pound weight.

40 Then took they the body of Jesus, and wound it in linen clothes with the spices, as the manner of the Jews is to bury.

41 Now in the place where he was crucified there was a garden; and in the garden a new sepulchre, wherein was never man yet laid.

42 There ^blaid they Jesus therefore, * because of the Jews' preparation-day, for the sepulchre was nigh at hand.

Come and see a burial that conquered the grave, and buried it; a burial that beautified the grave, and softened it for all believers!

No mention is made in all the New-Testament story of Joseph, except in the narrative of Christ's funeral. He was a disciple of Christ in secret, a better friend to Christ than he would willingly be known to be. It was his honor to be a disciple of Christ; and some such there are, that are great men, and unavoidably jinked with bad men; but it was his weakness that to us from his death, signified by the blood and water. Let this silence the fears of weak Christians; iniquity shall not be their ruin, for there came both water and blood out of Christ's pierced side, both to justify and sanctify them; and if you ask, how can we be sure of this? He that saw it bare record.

The accomplishment of the Scripture in all this; that the Scripture should be fulfilled, and so both the honor of the Old Testament preserved, and the truth of the New Testament confirmed.

The Scripture was fulfilled. A bone of Him shall not be broken. There was a promise of this made indeed to all the righteous, but principally pointing at Christ; (Ps. 34:20.) He keepeth all his bones, not one of them is broken.

There was a type of this in the paschal lamb; (Exod. 12:46.) Neither shall ye break a bone thereof: and it is repeated, (Num. 9:12.) Ye shall not break any bone of it; for which law the will of the law-maker is the reason, but the antitype must answer the type. Christ our passover is sacrificed for us, (1 Cor. 5:7.) He is the Lamb of God, (ch. 1:29.) and, as the true passover, his bones were kept unbroken. This commandment was given concerning his bones, when dead, as of Joseph's, Heb. 11:22.

There was a significance in it; the strength of the body is in the bones. The Hebrew word for the bones signifies the strength, and therefore not a bone of Christ must be broken, to show that though He be crucified in weakness, his strength to save is not at all broken. Sin breaks our bones, it broke David's, (Ps. 51:8.) but it did not break Christ's bones; He stood firm under the burthen, mighty to save.

The Scripture was fulfilled in the piercing of his side; v. 37. Zech. 12:10. And there the same that pours out the Spirit of grace, and can be no less than the God of the holy prophets, says, They shall look upon Me, which is here applied to Christ, They shall look upon Him. (1.) It is here implied that the Messiah shall be pierced; and here it had a more full accomplishment than in the piercing of his hands and feet; He was pierced by the house of David, and the inhabitants of Jerusalem, wounded in the house of his friends, Zech. 13:6. It is promised that when the Spirit is poured out, they shall look on Him and mourn. This was in part fulfilled, when many of his betrayers and murderers were pricked to the heart, and brought to believe in Him; it will be further fulfilled, when all Israel shall be saved; and when they who persist in infidelity, shall see Him whom they have pierced, and wail because of Him, Rev. 1:7. But it is applicable to us all; we have all been guilty of piercing the Lord, and are all concerned with suitable affections to look on Him.

V. 38-42. The solemn funerals of great men are looked at with curiosity; the mournful funerals of friends are attended with concern.

(Marg. Ref.—Matt. 27:57-61. Mark 15:42-47. Luke 23:50-56.) (39.) An hundred pound. 'This was an indication, not only of the wealth, but also of the great affection of Nicodemus to Jesus. Hence also, they not only anoint Him, as they commonly used to do others; but bury Him with so great a mixture of spices, as was done at the funerals of great men. So Jacob was embalmed after the Egyptian manner, (Gen. 50:2.) and Asa with spices and sweet odors. [The Egyptians, says Herodotus, embalmed the body, and filled it with spices; but the manner of the Jews was to sprinkle it with pulverized spices, and wrap it up in linen. CHAP. XX.

Mary Magdalene goes to the sepulchre, and, discovering that the stone was taken away, runs to tell Peter and John; who hasten thither, and find not the body, but only the grave-clothes in exact order. 1-10. Mary as she weeps sees two angels, and afterwards Jesus, who sends her to inform the apostles. 11-18. Jesus meets them, as assembled in the evening, and speaks peace to them. 19-23. Thomas, who was absent, remains resolutely incredulous. 24, 25. Jesus again meets the assembled disciples, and satisfies Thomas, who confesses Him as his Lord, and his God. 26-28. These things were written, that we might believe, and have life through his name. 29, 31.

THE first day of the week cometh Mary Magdalene early, when it was yet dark, unto the sepulchre, and seeth the stone taken away from the sepulchre.

them easy to us. They wound the body with the spices, for all his garments smell of myrrour and aloes, (the spices here mentioned,) out of the ivory palaces; (Ps. 45: 8.) and the sepulchre hewn out of a rock, was an ivory palace to Christ. Dead bodies and graves are offensive; hence sin is compared to a body of death and an open sepulchre; but Christ's sacrifice, being to God as a sweet-smelling savor, hath taken away our pollution. No ointment or perfume can rejoice the heart so as the grave of our Redeemer does, where there is faith to perceive the fragrance of it.

We ought to regard the dead bodies of Christians; not to enshrine and adore their relics, (nothing like that was done to Christ Himself,) but carefully to deposit them, the dust in the dust, as those who believe the bodies of the saints are still united to Christ, and designed for glory and immortality. The resurrection of the saints will be in virtue of Christ's resurrection, and therefore in burying them we should have an eye to Christ's burial, for He, being dead, thus speaketh, They dead men shall live, Isa. 26: 19. In burying our dead, it is not necessary, that in all circumstances we imitate the burial of Christ, as if we must be buried in linen, in a garden, and be embalmed: but He being buried after the manner of the Jews, it teaches us, that in things of this nature we should conform to the usages of the country where we live, except those that are superstitious.

The grave pitched upon, was in a garden which belonged to Joseph of Arimathea, very near the place where He was crucified.

Christ was buried without the city, for thus the manner of the Jews was to bury; there was then a peculiar reason for it, which does not hold now; the touching of a grave contracted a ceremonial pollution; but now that the resurrection of Christ has altered the property of the grave, we need not keep at such a distance from it; nor is it incapable of a good improvement, to have the congregation of the dead in the church yard, encompassing the congregation of the living in the church, since they also are dying, and in the midst of life we are in death. Those that would not superstitiously, but by faith, visit the holy sepulchre, must go forth out of the noise of this world.

Joseph had his sepulchre in his garden, that it might be a memorandum, 1. To himself while living; when taking the pleasure of his garden, let him think of dying, and be quickened to prepare for it. The garden is a proper place for meditation, and a sepulchre there may furnish a proper subject, and such a one as we are loath to admit in the midst of our pleasure. 2. To his heirs and successors when he was gone. It is good to acquaint ourselves with the place of our father's sepulchres; and perhaps we might make our own less formidable, if we made theirs more familiar.

2. In a sepulchre, in a garden Christ was laid. In the garden of Eden, death and the grave first received their power, and now in a garden they are triumphed over. In a garden Christ began his passion, and from a garden He would begin his exaltation. Christ fell to the ground as a corn of wheat, (ch. 12: 24.) and therefore was sown in a garden among the seeds, for his dew is as the dew of herbs, Isa. 26: 19. He is the fountain of gardens, Cant. 4: 15.

3. He was buried in a new sepulchre. This was so ordered, (1.) To honor Christ; He was not a common person, and therefore must not mix with common dust. (2.) To confirm the truth of his resurrection; that it might not be cost. Those bodies to which the grave is a long home, need to be clad accordingly; but what need of such furniture of the grave for one that, like a way-faring man, did but turn aside to lay for a night or two?

However, we may plainly see in it the strength of their love. They showed the value they had for his person and doctrine, and that it was not lessened by the reproach of the cross. They that had profaned his crown, and laid his honor in the dust, may already see that they imagine a vain thing; for as God had done Him honor in his sufferings, so did men too, even great men. They snowed not only the charitable respect of committing his body to the earth, but the honorable respect showed to great men. This they might do, and yet believe and look for his resurrection; nay, this they might do in the belief and expectation of it. Since God designed honor for this body, they would honor it. We must do our duty according as the present day and opportunity are, and leave it to God to fulfil his promises, in his own way and time.

They took the body into a house adjoining, and, having washed it from blood and dust, wound it in linen clothes, with the spices melted down, it is likely, into an ointment, as the manner of the Jews is to bury, or to embalm.

Among other clothing that belongs to us, Christ put on even the grave-clothes, to make suggested that it was not He, but some other that rose, when many bodies of saints rose: or, that He rose by the power of some other, as the man that was raised by the touch of Elisha's bones, and not by his own power. He that has made all things new, has new-made the grave for us.

Observe the deference the Jews paid to the Sabbath, and to the day of preparation. Before the passover-sabbath they had a day of preparation. This day had been ill kept by the chief priests, who called themselves the church, but was well kept by the disciples of Christ, who were branded as dangerous to the church; and it is often so. They would not put off the funeral till the Sabbath, because the Sabbath is to be a day of rest and joy, with which the business and sorrow of a funeral do not agree. They would not drive it too late on the day of preparation for the Sabbath. What is to be done on the evening before the Sabbath, should be so contrived, that it may neither intrench upon sabbath-time, nor indispose us for sabbath-work.

The sepulchre they made use of, was nigh at hand. Perhaps, if they had had time, they would have carried Him to Bethany, among his friends. And I am sure He had more right to have been buried in the chief of the sepulchres of the sons of David, than any of the kings of Judah; but it was so ordered, that He should be laid in a sepulchre nigh at hand. They that prepared it, little thought who should handle it; but the wisdom of God has reaches infinitely beyond ours, and makes what use He pleases of us and all we have. We are hereby taught not to be over-curious in the place of our burial. Faith in the promise of Canaan, directed the Patriarchs' desires to be carried thither for a burying-place; but now that promise is superseded by a better, such care is over.

Thus, without pomp or solemnity, is the body of Jesus laid in the grave? Here lies our surety under arrest for our debts, so that if He be released, his discharge will be ours. Here is the Sun of righteousness set for a while, to rise again in greater glory, and set no more. Here lies a seeming captive to death, but a real conqueror over death; here lies death itself slain, and the grave conquered. Thanks be to God who giveth us the victory.

CHAP. XX. v. 1-10. There was nothing of which the apostles were more concerned to produce substantial proof, than the resurrection of their Master. 1. He Himself had appealed to this as the last and most cogent proof of his being the Messiah. They that would not believe other signs, were referred to the sign of the prophet Jonas. Therefore his enemies were most solicitous to stifle this, because if He be risen, they are not only murderers, but murderers of the Messiah. 2. Our redemption depended on this. If He give his life a ransom, and do not resume it, it does not appear that his giving of it was accepted as a satisfaction. If He be imprisoned for our debt, and lie by it, we are undone, 1 Cor. 15: 17. 3. He never showed Himself alive after his resurrection to all the people, Acts 10: 40, 41. We should have said, 'Let his ignominious veil be private, and his glorious resurrection public.' But God's thoughts are not as ours; and He ordered it that his death should be public. But the demonstrations of his resurrection should be reserved as a favor for particular friends, and by them be published, that they might be blessed, who have not seen, and yet have believed. The method of proof gives abundant satisfaction to those who are piously disposed to receive the doctrine of

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 31-42. The preparation of hypocrites for religious ordinances, by the commission of horrible crimes, is the most detestable of abominations. Yet believers, if called to witness such scenes, should peculiarly observe, how God overrules every thing to fulfil his Word. Thus, comparing the sacred oracles with the events which occur in the church and in the world, our faith will be increased even by the most discouraging transactions. May we then continually look to Him, whom by our sins we also have, ignorantly and heedlessly, nay, [890] sometimes against convictions and mercies, pierced. Thus our hearts will be habitually affected with sorrow and humiliation for sin, believing hope, and gratitude; and prepared for every service. Thus feeble and timorous believers will grow in grace, in knowledge, in stability; and so be prepared to avow their relation to Jesus, in the time of danger: though they perhaps have formerly hesitated to confess Him before men, when it might have been done with comparative safety. Score.

2 Then she runneth, and cometh to Simon Peter, and to the other disciple whom Jesus loved, and saith unto them, "They have taken away the Lord out of the sepulchre, and we know not where they have laid him.

3 Peter therefore went forth, and that other disciple, and came to the sepulchre.

4 So they ran both together: and the other disciple did out-run Peter, and came first to the sepulchre.

5 And he, stooping down, and looking in, saw the linen clothes lying; yet went he not in.

6 Then cometh Simon Peter following him, and went into the sepulchre, and seeth the linen clothes lie, and what real service could she do Him by it? But her love answers these and a thousand such objections. Note, 1. We must study to honor Christ in those things wherein yet we cannot be profitable to Him. 2. Love to Christ will take off the terror of death and the grave. If we cannot come to Christ but through that darksome valley, even in that, if we love Him, we will fear no evil.

She came as soon as she could. 1. On the first day of the week, as soon as the Sabbath was gone, longing, not to sell corn and to set forth wheat, (as Ananias 8: 5,) but to be at the sepulchre. They that love Christ, will take the first opportunity of testifying their respect to Him. The first Christian Sabbath she begins with inquiries after Christ.

2. She came while it was yet dark; so early did she set out. Note, Those who would seek Christ so as to find Him, must seek Him early. (1.) Solicitously, with such a care as even breaks the sleep. (2.) Industiously; we must deny ourselves repose in pursuit of Christ. (3.) Seek Him belimely, early in our days, early every day. My voice shall thou hear in the morning. That day is in a fair way to be well ended, that is thus begun. They that diligently inquire after Christ while it is yet dark, shall have such light given them concerning Him as shall shine more and more.

It surprised her to find the stone away. Christ crucified is the fountain of life, his grave one of the wells of salvation, if we come to it in faith, though to a carnal heart it be a spring shut up; we shall find the stone rolled away, as Gen. 29: 10. Surprising comforts are the encouragements of early seekers.

It was a discovery that the Lord was risen, though she did not at first apprehend it. Note, 1. Persons most constant to Christ, and diligent in inquiries after Him, have the first and sweetest notices of divine grace. Mary Magdalene, who followed Christ to the last of his humiliation, met Him the first in his exaltation. 2. God reveals himself and his comforts to us by degrees; to raise expectation and quicken our inquiry.

Finding the stone taken away, she hastens back to Peter and John; and acquaints them with it; "They have taken the Lord out of the sepulchre, envying Him the honor of such a burying place, and we know not where they have laid Him, nor where to find Him, that we may pay Him our last respects."

Mary found the stone gone, looked into the grave, and saw it empty. One would expect that her first thought would have been, Surely the Lord is risen; for whenever He had told them that He should be crucified, He subjoined that the third day He should rise again. Could she feel the great earthquake that happened as she was coming to the sepulchre, and see the grave empty, and yet have no thought of the resurrection? no conjecture, no suspicion of it? The construction she puts upon the removing of the stone, was very far-fetched. Note, When we come to reflect upon our conduct in a cloudy and dark day, we shall stand amazed at our dulness and forgetfulness, that we could miss of such thoughts, when we had occasion for them, as afterward appear obvious. They have taken away the Lord; either the chief priests, to put Him in a worse place; or Joseph and Nicodemus, to avoid the ill-will of the Jews. Whatever was her suspicion, it was a great vexation to her; whereas, if she had understood it rightly, nothing could be more happy. Note, Weak believers often make it the matter of their complaint, which is really just Christ, and yet leaves room for those to object, who are willingly ignorant and obstinate in unbelief. This is a fair trial, suited to probationers.

1. Mary Magdalene comes to the sepulchre, and finds the stone taken away. This evangelist does not mention the other women that went with Mary Magdalene, because she was the most active; and, 1. Her affection was kindled by what Christ had done for her. Much was forgiven her, therefore she loved much. 2. She had showed her affection to Him, while He lived, attended his doctrine, ministered to Him of her substance, Luke 8: 2, 3. It does not appear that she had any business at Jerusalem, but to wait upon Him, for the women were not bound to go up to the feast, and, probably, she and others followed Him the closer, as Elisha did Elijah, now that they knew their Master would shortly be taken from their head, 2 Kings 2: 1, 2. 3. The continued instances of her respect to Him at and after his death, proved the sincerity of her love. Note, Love to Christ, if cordial, will be constant. Her love to Christ was strong as the death of the cross, for it stood by that; cruel as the grave, for it was not deterred by its terrors.

She came to the sepulchre, to weep there, and to anoint the body with the ointment she had prepared. The grave is a house that people do not care to visit. They that are free among the dead, are separated from the living; and it must be an extraordinary affection to the person, which will endear his grave to us. It is especially frightful to the weaker sex. Could she, that had not strength to roll away the stone, pretend to such presence of mind as to enter the grave? The Jews' religion forbade them to meddle any more than needful with graves and dead bodies. In visiting Christ's sepulchre she exposed herself, and perhaps the disciples, to the suspicion of a design to steal Him away; matter of joy. We cry out that this and the other comfort are taken away, when the removal of temporal comforts, is in order to the resurrection of spiritual comforts.

She did not pore upon her grief, but acquainted her friends with it. Note, The communication of sorrows is one improvement of the communion of saints. Peter, though he had denied his Master, had not deserted his Master's friends; by this appears the sincerity of his repentance, that he associated with the disciple whom Jesus loved. And the disciples keeping up their intimacy with him as formerly, teaches us to restore those with a spirit of meekness, that have been faulty. If God has received them upon their repentance, why should not we?

Peter and John go with all speed to the sepulchre, to satisfy themselves of the truth. Some think that the other disciples were with Peter and John when the news came; for they told these things to the eleven, Luke 24: 9. Others think that Mary told only Peter and John, and the other women the other disciples; yet none of them went to the sepulchre but Peter and John, two of the first three of Christ's disciples, often distinguished by special favors. Note, It is well when those that are more honored with the privileges, are more active in the duty of disciples, more willing to take pains, and run hazards in a good work.

See what use we should make of the experience of others. They would not in this sense take her word, but would go and see with their own eyes. Do others tell us of the comfort and benefit of ordinances? Let us be engaged thereby to make trial of them. Come and see how good it is to draw near to God.

We should be ready to share with our friends in their cares and fears. Peter and John hasten to the sepulchre, to give Mary a satisfactory answer to her jealousy. We should not grudge any pains we take to succor and comfort the weak and timorous followers of Christ.

We should make haste in a good work, and when we are going on a good errand. Peter and John consulted neither their ease nor their gravity, but ran to the sepulchre, to show the strength of their zeal and affection, and lose no time. If in the way of God's commandments, we should run that way.

What a good thing it is to have good company in a good work. Perhaps neither of these disciples would have ventured to the sepulchre alone; but, together, they made no difficulty of it, Eccl. 4: 9.

What a laudable emulation it is among disciples to strive which shall excel in that which is good. It was no breach of good manners for John, though the younger, to outrun Peter. We must do our best, and neither envy those that can do better, nor despise those that do as they can, though behind.

The foremost in this race, was the disciple whom Jesus loved in a special manner, and who therefore in a special manner loved Jesus. Note, Sense of Christ's love to us, will make us excel in virtue. His love will constrain us more than any thing to abound in duty.

Peter had denied his Master, and was in sorrow and shame for it, and this clogged him as a weight; sense of guilt cramps us in the service of God. When conscience is offended, we lose ground.

John went no further than Mary Magdalene. He had the curiosity to look into the sepulchre, and saw it empty. He stooped down, and looked in. Those that would find the knowledge of Christ, must stoop down, look in, and veil to the authority of divine revelation.

He had not courage to go into the sepulchre. The warmest affections are not always accompanied with the boldest resolutions; many are swift to run religion's race, that are not stout to fight her battles.

Peter, though he came last, went in first. Though John outran him, he did not turn back, or stand still; and while John was with caution looking in, he came, and with courage went into the sepulchre.

Observe the boldness of Peter, and how God dispenses his gifts. John could outrun Peter, [621]

7 And the napkin that was about his head, not lying with the linen clothes, but wrapped together in a place by itself.

8 Then went in also that other disciple, which came first to the sepulchre, and he saw, and believed.

9 For as yet they knew not the scripture, that he must rise again from the dead.

10 Then the disciples went away again unto their own home. (Practical Observations.)

dropt his mantle. 3. When we rise from the death of sin to the life of righteousness, we must leave our grave-clothes behind us, put off all our corruptions.

The grave-clothes were found in good order, an evidence that his body was not stolen away while men slept; nor can it be supposed that robbers of tombs should find leisure to fold up the linen.

Peter's boldness encouraged John; now he took heart and ventured in; and he saw and believed; not barely believed what Mary said, that the body was gone; but he began to believe that Jesus was risen, though his faith, as yet, was weak and wavering.

John durst not have gone into the sepulchre if Peter had not gone in first. Note. It is good to be imboldened in a good work by others. The dread of difficulty and danger will be taken off by observing the resolution and courage of others. Perhaps John's quickness had made Peter run faster, and now Peter's boldness makes John venture further. Though Peter had lately fallen under disgrace, and John had been advanced to honor, (Christ having committed his mother to him,) yet John not only associated with Peter, but thought it no disparagement to follow him.

Yet John got the start of Peter in believing. Peter saw and wondered, (Luke 24:12,) but John saw and believed. A mind disposed to contemplation, may perhaps sooner receive evidence of divine truth than a mind disposed to action.

But why were they so slow to believe? The evangelist tells us, they knew not the Scripture, did not consider and apply what they knew of it, that He must rise again from the dead. The Old Testament spake of the resurrection of the Messiah; they believe Him to be the Messiah; He Himself had often told them that, according to the Scriptures of the Old Testament, He should rise again; but they had not presence of mind sufficient to explain present appearances.

How unapt the disciples themselves were, at first, to believe the resurrection of Christ, which confirms the testimony they afterward gave concerning it; by their backwardness to believe it, it appears that they were not credulous. If they had had any design to advance their own interest, they would greedily have caught at the first spark of evidence; would have prepared the minds of those that followed them to receive it; but, on the contrary, it was to them as a strange thing, and the furthest in their thoughts. Peter and John were so shy of believing it at first, that nothing less than the most convincing proof could bring them to testify it with so much assurance. Hereby it appears that they were not only honest, but cautious men.

The reason of their slowness to believe was, they knew not the Scripture.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—10. They who love the Lord will seek Him early and diligently; and, notwithstanding all sorrows, delays, misapprehensions, and discouragements, they will find Him.—External forms and notions will no more satisfy the inquirer after salvation, than the sepulchre and the grave-clothes did Mary and the apostles, who sought the Lord in faith and love.—Under a large proportion of preaching, by men called Christian ministers, we are ready to say, 'They have taken away

This seems to be the evangelist's acknowledgment of his own fault among the rest; he does not say, 'For as yet Jesus had not appeared to them, he' not showed them his hands and his side;' but, 'As yet He had not opened their understandings to understand the Scriptures;' Luke 24:44, 45.

Peter and John pursued their inquiry no further, but desisted, between faith and unbelief; (v. 10.) The disciples went away to their own friends, the rest of the disciples; to their own lodgings, for homes they had none at Jerusalem. They went away,

1. For fear of being taken up on suspicion of a design to steal the body; instead of improving their faith, their care is to secure themselves. In difficult, dangerous times, it is hard even for good men to go on in their work with becoming resolution.

2. They were at a loss what to do next, and what to make of what they had seen; and therefore, not having courage to stay at the grave, they resolve to go home, and wait till God shall reveal even this unto them; an instance of their weakness as yet.

3. Probably the rest of the disciples were together; to them they return, to report to, and consult with them; and, perhaps, now they appointed their meeting in the evening, when Christ came to them.

Before Peter and John came to the sepulchre, an angel had appeared there, rolled away the stone, frightened the guard, and comforted the women; as soon as they were gone from the sepulchre, Mary Magdalene sees two angels in the sepulchre, yet Peter and John go into it, and see none; what shall we make of this? Where were the angels when Peter and John were at the sepulchre. 1. Angels appear and disappear at pleasure, according to the orders given them. They may be, and are really, where they are not visibly; they may be visible to one, and not to another, at the same time 2 Kings 6:17. Num. 22:23. How they make themselves visible, then invisible, it is presumption for us to inquire; but that they do so is plain from this story. 2. This favor was showed to those who were early and constant in their inquiries after Christ, and was the reward of them that came first, and staid last, but denied to them that made a transient visit. 3. The apostles were not to receive their instructions from the angels, but from the Spirit of grace. See Heb. 2:5.

V. 11—18. Mark tells us, (16:9.) that Christ appeared first to Mary Magdalene; that appearance is here largely related.

1. The constancy and fervency of Mary's affection to Jesus, v. 11.

1. She staid at the sepulchre, when Peter and John were gone, because there her Master had lain; and there she was likely to hear some tidings of Him. Note, (1.) Where there is love to Christ, there will be a constant adherence to Him, and a resolution to cleave to Him. This good woman, though she has lost Him, yet, rather than seem to desert Him, will abide by his grave, and continue in his love, even when she wants the comfort of it. (2.) Where there is a true desire of acquaintance with Christ, there will be a constant attendance on the means of knowledge. See Hos. 6:2, 3. The third day He will raise us up; and then shall we know the meaning of that resurrection, if we follow on to know, as Mary did.

2. She staid there weeping; these tears spake her affection to her Master. They that have the Lord, and we know not where they have laid Him; but the broken-hearted disciple cannot be thus contented, though others be filled with admiration of the preacher's eloquence, genius, or learning.—Those who are equally in earnest do not always make equal progress: some men take things more quickly, others investigate more deeply; and they may be mutually helpful, in bringing each other to understand the Scripture, and to establishment in the faith. heavenly host, to sing praise, only two, to bear witness; for out of the mouth of two witnesses this word would be established.

3. Their array; they were in white; denoting, their purity and holiness. The best of men, standing before the angels, and compared with them, are clothed in filthy garments; (Zech. 3:3.) but angels are spotless; and glorified saints, when they come to be as the angels, shall walk with Christ in white.

4. Their posture and place. These angels went into the grave, to teach us not to fear it, nor to think that our resting in it awhile, will prejudice our immortality; matters are so ordered, that the grave is not out of our way to heaven. It intimates likewise that angels are to be employed about the saints, not only at their death, to carry their souls into Abraham's bosom, but at the great day, to raise their bodies, Matt. 24:31. These angelic guards (and angels are called watchers, Dan. 4:23.) keeping possession of the sepulchre, when they had frightened away the guards, represents Christ's victory over the powers of darkness. Thus Michael and his angels are more than conquerors. Their sitting to face one another, one at his bed's head, the other at his bed's feet, denotes their care of the entire body of Christ, his mystical as well as his natural body; it may also remind us of the two cherubim placed one at either end of the mercy-seat, looking one at another, Exod. 25:18. Christ crucified was the great propitiator, at the head and feet of which were these two cherubim, not with flaming swords, but welcome messengers, to direct us to the way of life.

They inquire into the cause of Mary Magdalene's grief; (v. 13.) Woman, why weepest thou? This question was, 1. A rebuke to her weeping; 'Why weepest thou, when thou hast cause to rejoice?' Many floods of tears would dry away, before such a search into the fountain of them. Why art thou cast down? 2. It was designed to show how much angels are concerned at the griefs of the saints. Christians should thus sympathize with one another. 3. It was to make an occasion of informing her of what would turn her mourning into rejoicing.

The account she gives them of her distress; Because they have taken away the body I came to embalm, and I know not where they have laid it. See,

1. The weakness of her faith. If she had had faith as a grain of mustard-seed, this mountain would have been removed; but we often perplex ourselves with imaginary difficulties, which faith would discover to us as real advantages. Many good people complain of clouds and darkness, which are the necessary methods of grace for humbling their souls, mortifying their sins, and endearing Christ to them.

Verses 11-18.

It is supposed, that several women agreed to meet at the sepulchre, to embalm the body of Jesus; and that Joanna and some others with her, having undertaken to prepare the spices, purposed being there about sun-rising; (Luke 23:55, 24:1-10.) but Mary Magdalene, the other Mary, and Salome, came to view the sepulchre, as the day began to dawn. (Matt. 28:1.) Mary Magdalene seems to have arrived some short time before her companions (1); and observing that the stone had been removed, left them to wait for Joanna and her company, and returned back to inform Peter and John. In the mean time the other Mary and Salome came to the sepulchre, and saw the angel as recorded by Matthew and Mark. While these women returned to the city, Peter and John went to the sepulchre, passing them at some distance, or going another way; but the angel did not appear to them. After their return Mary Magdalene saw a vision of two angels, and then Jesus Himself, as here related; (Mark 16:9-11.) and immediately after, Jesus appeared to the other women as they returned to the city. (Matt. 28:9, 10.) In the mean while Joanna and her company

2. The strength of her love. They that have true affection for Christ, cannot but be in great affliction when they have lost either the tokens of his love, or the opportunities of converse with Him. Mary is not diverted from her inquiries by the surprise of the vision, nor satisfied with the honor. A sight of angels and their smiles, will not suffice without a sight of Christ. Nay, the sight of angels is but an opportunity of pursuing her inquiries after Christ. All creatures, the most excellent, should be used as means, and but as means, to bring us into acquaintance with God in Christ. The angels ask her, Why weepest thou? I have cause enough to weep; they have taken away my Lord, and, like Micah, What have I more? My Beloved has withdrawn Himself, and is gone. Note, None know, but they that have experienced, the sorrows of a deserted soul, that has had evidences of the love of God in Christ, and hopes of heaven, but now walks in darkness; such a wounded spirit who can bear?

III. Christ appeared to her while talking with the angels; before they had given her an answer, Christ steps in to satisfy her inquiries, for God now speaketh to us by his Son. Mary would fain know where her Lord is, and behold, He is at her right hand. Note, 1. Those that will be content with nothing short of Christ, shall be put off with nothing less. He never said to the soul that sought Him, Seek in vain. 2. Christ, in manifesting Himself to those that seek Him, often outdoes their expectations. Mary longs to see the body of Christ, and complains of the loss of it, and behold, she sees Him alive. Thus He does for his praying people more than they ask or think.

She stood expecting an answer from the angels; and either seeing the shadow, or hearing the tread of some person behind her, turned herself back from talking with the angels, and sees Jesus Himself, the very person she was looking for, and yet knew not that it was Jesus. Note, 1. The Lord is nigh to them that are of a broken heart, (Ps. 34:18.) never than they are aware. They that seek Christ, though they do not see Him, may yet be sure He is not far from them. 2. Those that diligently seek the Lord, will turn every way in their inquiry after Him. Mary turned herself back, in hopes of some discoveries. Several of the ancients suggest, that Mary was directed to look behind her, by the angels' rising up, and doing obeisance to the Lord Jesus, whom they saw before Mary did; and that she looked back to see to whom they paid such profound reverence. But if so, it is not likely that she would have taken Him for the gardener; rather, therefore, it was her earnest desire in seeking, that made her turn every way. 3. Christ is often near his people, and they are not aware of Him. She knew not that it was Jesus; not that He appeared in any other likeness, but either it was a transient look she cast upon Him, and, her eyes being full of care, she could not well distinguish; or they were holden that she should not know Him; Luke 24:16.

His question was natural; 'Woman, why weepest thou? Whom seekest thou? What business hast thou in the garden so early?' Perhaps, it was spoken with some roughness, as Joseph spake to his brethren when he made himself strange, before he made himself known to them. It would seem, this was the first word arrived at the sepulchre, and, entering it, at first saw nothing, only observed that the body was not there; but two angels appeared and addressed them, as the one angel had done the other women. (Lk. 24:1-10.) They therefore returned immediately to the city, and found the apostles, before the other women arrived, and informed them of what they had seen; upon which Peter went a second time to the sepulchre, but saw no angels, only the clothes lying. (Luke 24:12.) About this time the two disciples set off for Emmaus, having only heard the report of these women, and neither that of Mary Magdalene, nor yet that of the other Mary and Salome. (Luke 24:22-24, 33, 34.) These at length arrived, and informed the apostles, that they had seen Jesus Himself, and that two of them had been permitted to touch Him; and some time after, on the same day, He appeared to Peter. There are other ways of reconciling the apparent differences between the evangelists; but this seems to answer every purpose, as will readily appear to the attentive reader. (See West, on the Resurrection.) [So Doddridge.]

I conceive that Mary Magdalene was a considerable time before

15 Jesus saith unto her, 'Woman, why weepest thou? whom seekest thou? She, supposing him to be the gardener, saith unto him, Sir, if thou have borne him hence, tell me where thou hast laid him, and I will take him away.

16 Jesus saith unto her, 'Mary. She turned herself, and saith unto him, 'Rabboni'; as he is to say, Master.

17 Jesus saith unto her, 'Touch me not; for I am not yet ascended to my Father: but go to my brethren, and say unto them, 'I ascend unto my Father, and your Father; and to my God, and your God.

counsels of his love, (Exod. 33: 12.) are called by name in the efficacy of his grace, then He reveals his Son in them, as in Paul, (Gal. 1: 16.) when Christ called to him by name, Saul, Saul. Christ's sheep know his voice, ch. 10: 4. This one word Mary, was like that to the disciples in the storm, It is I. The Word of Christ does us good, when we put our names into the precepts and promises. 'In this Christ calls to me, and speaks to me.'

How readily she received this discovery. 'Mary, dost thou not know me?' She turned herself, and said, Rabboni, My master. It might properly be read with an interrogation, 'Rabboni? Is it my master?'

The Jews called their doctors Rabbies, great men. Their critics tell us, that Rabbon was with them a more honorable title than Rabbi; and therefore Mary chooses that, and adds a note of appropriation, My great Master. Note, Notwithstanding the freedom of communion with Himself Christ is pleased to admit, we must remember that He is our Master, and to be approached with godly fear.

hand with the rest of the women, with whom she had agreed to go and embalm the body. Hence Matthew and Mark, putting together this successive visitation of the sepulchre by the women, constantly place Mary Magdalene first. She, however, finding the sepulchre empty, immediately retraces her steps, and meeting Peter and John, persuades them to run to the sepulchre and back: she, in the mean time, waiting in expectation of coming at some important knowledge on the subject. The second message is that of the other women to all the eleven apostles, (Luke 24: 9.) intimating that they had seen two angels, who had announced our Lord's resurrection. While Mary Magdalene awaits in the city the return of Peter and John, the rest of the women go to the sepulchre, and bring immediately back to the disciples an account of what they had seen and heard. Now that Mary Magdalene had no participation in this, is plain, from its being conjoined with the appearing of our Lord. There are besides, some other discrepancies; namely, that according to Mark, the angels were seen by the women, when they had entered the sepulchre, but by Mary, standing outside; that she converses with them, sola cum solis; (alone, with them only;) that she does not receive an answer from them on the resurrection of Christ, who just after appears unexpectedly. Moreover, by this second message, Peter is induced to repair to the sepulchre, as is related by Luke, 24: 12, whose narrative is also to be distinguished from this of John 17. The third message is that which was afterwards brought by Mary Magdalene and the other women, namely, that they had seen the Lord. Mary Magdalene had, meanwhile, herself returned to the sepulchre and, as is clear, from John 20: 13, thus Christ spake after his resurrection; 'Why weepest thou? I am risen.' The resurrection of Christ has enough in it to allay all our sorrows, and dry up the fountains of our tears. Christ takes cognizance, 1 Of his people's griefs. 2 Of his people's cars; Whom seek ye, and what would ye have? When He knows they are seeking Him, yet He will know it from them; they must tell Him whom they seek.

Her reply is natural: she does not give Him a direct answer, but, as if she should say, 'Why do you upbraid me with my tears? You know why I weep, and whom I seek;' and therefore supposing Him to be the gardener, employed by Joseph, come thither thus early to his work, she said, Sir, if thou hast carried Him hence, pray tell me where thou hast laid Him, and I will take Him away.

1. The error of her understanding; she supposed Jesus to be the gardener, perhaps, because He asked what authority she had to be there. Note, Troubled spirits, in a cloudy and dark day, are apt to misrepresent Christ to themselves, and to put wrong constructions upon the methods of his providence and grace.

2. The truth of her affection. How her heart was engaged to find Christ! She questions every one she meets, like the careful spouse, Saw ye Him whom my soul loveth? When she speaks of Christ, she does not name Him; but, If thou have borne Him hence, taking it for granted that this gardener was as full as herself of thoughts concerning this Jesus, and therefore could not but know whom she meant. Another evidence of the strength of her affection was, that, wherever He was laid, she would undertake to remove Him. Such a body, with such a weight of spices about it, was much more than she could carry; but true love makes nothing of difficulties. She supposed this gardener grudged that the body of one crucified, should be laid in his master's new tomb, and that therefore he had removed it to some sorry place.

Jesus saith unto her, Mary. It was said with an emphasis, and that air of kindness with which He was wont to speak to her. Now He changed his voice, and spake like Himself. Christ's way of making Himself known to his people is by his Word, applied to their souls, speaking to them in particular.

When those, whom God knew by name in the 33: 12.) are called by name in the efficacy of his grace, then He reveals his Son in them, as in Paul, (Gal. 1: 16.) when Christ called to him by name, Saul, Saul. Christ's sheep know his voice, ch. 10: 4. This one word Mary, was like that to the disciples in the storm, It is I. The Word of Christ does us good, when we put our names into the precepts and promises. 'In this Christ calls to me, and speaks to me.'

How readily she received this discovery. 'Mary, dost thou not know me?' She turned herself, and said, Rabboni, My master. It might properly be read with an interrogation, 'Rabboni? Is it my master?'

The Jews called their doctors Rabbies, great men. Their critics tell us, that Rabbon was with them a more honorable title than Rabbi; and therefore Mary chooses that, and adds a note of appropriation, My great Master. Note, Notwithstanding the freedom of communion with Himself Christ is pleased to admit, we must remember that He is our Master, and to be approached with godly fear.

With what lively affection she gives this title to Christ. She turned herself from the angels to look to Jesus. We must take off our regard from all creatures, even the highest and best, to fix them upon Christ, from whom nothing must divert us, and with whom nothing must interfere. The soul that hears Christ's voice, and is turned to Him, calls Him, with joy and triumph, My Master. With what pleasure those who love Christ, speak of his authority over them! My Master, my great Master.

He diverts her from the expectation of familiar conversation with Him at this time.

Touch Me not thus at all, for I am to ascend to heaven. He bid the disciples touch Him, for the confirmation of their faith: He allowed the women to take hold of his feet, and worship Him; (Matt. 28: 9.) but Mary, supposing that He was risen, as Lazarus, to live among them as He had done, in her transport at seeing Him, and forgetting his exalted state, was about to take his hand with her usual freedom; this mistake Christ rectified; she must believe and adore Him, as exalted, but must not expect to be familiar with Him as formerly. See 2 Cor. 5: 16 He forbids her to do to upon his bodily presence, or expect the continuance of it, and leads her to the spiritual communion which she should have after He was ascended to his Father; for the greatest joy of his resurrection was, that it was a step toward his ascension. Mary thought, now that her Master was risen. He would set up a temporal kingdom. 'Touch Me not, think not to lay hold on Me, so as to detain Me here; for though I am not yet ascended, go to my brethren, and tell them, I am to ascend.' As before his death, so now after his resurrection, He repeats again and again that He was no more in the world; and therefore they must look higher than his bodily presence, and further than the present state of things.

'Touch Me not, do not stay to touch Me now or to make any further inquiries, or give any further expressions of joy; for I am not yet ascended, I shall not presently depart, it may as well be done another time; the best service thou canst do, is, to carry the tidings to the disciples; lose no time, go away with all speed.' Note, Public service ought to be preferred before private satisfaction. It is more blessed to give than to receive. Jacob must let an angel go, when the day breaks, and it is time for Him to look after his family. Mary must not stay, to talk with her Master, but must carry his message; for it was a day of good tidings, of which she must not engross the comfort. See 2 Kings 7: 9.

Go to my brethren; for He is not ashamed to call them so. 1. Though He was now entering upon his glory, and was declared to be the Son of God with greater power than ever, He owns his disciples as his brethren, and expresses Himself with more tender affection to them than before; He had called them friends, but never brethren till now. Notwithstanding his elevation, He disdains not to own his poor relatives, far had understood or believed nothing of what had happened to the other women. There she also converses with the angel, and meets our Lord Himself. Then she relates what she had heard, (v. 18.) and that by herself, as is manifest from Mark 16: 9 and 10, although she is not believed, (v. 11.) especially, since Peter had lost his labor; and thus the testimony of one woman would seem very suspicious. A little after, the other women, incited by the example of Mary Magdalene, retrace their steps, and obtain their wish. (See Matt. 28: 9, 10.) And Peter, (Luke 24: 34.) meeting with Jesus, confirms the testimony of the women, and paves the way for the belief of the other disciples. Now this mole (which, if probable or very possible, is enough for the purpose) of reconciling the evangelists, by multiplied journeys backwards and forwards, is not only adapted to the nature of the thing itself, (since the sepulchre was very near the city,) but also suitable to the vehement agitation of mind, which must have been felt by these affectionate votaries of Christ. It is agreeable, also, to divine wisdom, which, it seems, so disposed all these things, that it might appear there was no collusion: that the particulars were in succession examined; that the disciples were brought by very slow degrees to a belief in the resurrection. Finally, this hypothesis is supported by the opinions of several of the ancient fathers, as Jerome, Dionysius Alexandrinus, &c. [So Markland]

(17.) Touch Me not. The original signifies to embrace, & lay the knees, all at the feet of any one. For I am not yet ascended, &c.) 'For I am not yet immediately going to ascend.' BLOOMFIELD.

18 Mary Magdalene came and told the disciples that she had seen the Lord, and that he had spoken these things unto her.

19 ¶ Then the same day at evening, being the first day of the week, when the doors were shut, where the disciples were assembled, for fear of the Jews, came Jesus, and stood in the midst, and saith unto them, Peace be unto you.

ditions of the relation; He is Christ's Father by eternal generation, ours by adoption; yet even that warrants us to call Him, Abba, Father. This is a reason why Christ called them brethren. Christ was now ascending to appear as an Advocate with his Father; we may hope He will prevail for any thing with our Father, and therefore for us.

It is the great condescension of Christ, that He is pleased to own the believer's God for his God; my God, and your God; mine, that He may be yours; the God of the Redeemer, (Ps. 89:26.) that He might be the God of the redeemed. The summary of the new covenant is, God will be to us a God; and therefore Christ being the Head of the covenant, who is primarily dealt with, and believers only through Him, this covenant relation fastens first upon Him, God becomes his God, and so ours; Christ's Father is our Father; and He partaking of the human nature, our God is his God.

2. Christ's ascension into heaven in prosecution of his undertaking, is likewise an unsearchable comfort; 'Tell them I must shortly ascend.' This was intended to be,

(1.) A word of caution to these disciples, not to expect his continuance on earth, nor the setting up of his temporal kingdom among men. Thus they who are raised to a spiritual life, must reckon that they rise, to ascend; they are quickened with Christ, that they may sit with Him in heavenly places, Eph. 2:5, 6. Let them not think that this earth is to be their home; being born from heaven, they are bound for heaven; their eye must be upon another world, and this ever upon their hearts, I ascend.

(2.) A word of comfort to them, and to all that shall believe in Him, through their word; He is now ascended to his Father, and our Father. This was his advancement, to receive those honors and powers which were to recompense his humiliation; He says it with triumph, that they who love Him may rejoice. This is our advantage; for He ascended as a Conqueror, leading captivity captive for us; (Ps. 68:18.) as our Forerunner, to prepare a place for us, and to be ready to receive us.

Some make these words, I ascend to my God, and your God, to include a promise of our resurrection, for Christ had proved the resurrection of the dead from these words, I am the God of Abraham, Matt. 22:32. So that Christ here insinuates, 'As He is my God, and hath therefore raised Me, so He is your God, and will therefore raise you'; Rev. 21:3. Because I live, e shall live also. I now ascend, to honor my God, and ye shall ascend to Him as your God.

Mary Magdalene came and told the disciples, whom she found together, that she had seen the Lord. Peter and John had left her seeking Him carefully, with tears; she comes to tell them she had found what she sought; and, what was infinitely better, she had joy in her sight of the Master herself, and was willing to communicate her joy, for she knew it would be good news to them. When God comforts us, it is that we may comfort others.

As she told them what she had seen, so also what she had heard; she had seen the Lord alive, of which this was a token, that He had spoken these things to her, to be delivered to them. Those who are acquainted with the Word of Christ themselves, should communicate their knowledge for the good at others, and not grudge that others should know as much as they.

V. 19-25. The infallible proof of Christ's resurrection, was, his showing Himself alive, Acts 1:3. In these verses, we have an account of his first appearance to the disciples, on the day He rose. He had sent them the tidings of his resurrection; but, to show his love to them, and confirm their faith in Him, He came Himself, that they might be eye-witnesses of his being alive, because they must attest it to the world, and build the church upon that testimony.

Verse 19.

Though it be an ancient opinion, that Christ made his body penetrate the doors; it is both groundless and absurd, and contrary to the design of Christ in coming to them. It is groundless: for why might not He, by his power, secretly open the doors; as the angel opened the prison doors and gates to let out Peter? (Acts 12:10.) It is absurd: for since Christ rose in that natural body, which was cruci-

2. Though his disciples had lately carried themselves disingenuously toward Him; He had never seen them together since they forsook Him, and fled; justly might He now have sent them an angry message. He forgives, forgets, and does not upbraid.

Mary Magdalene, out of whom had been cast seven devils, is now thus favored. This was her reward for her constancy in adhering to Christ, and inquiring after Him; and a rebuke to the apostles, who had not been so close as she in attending on the dying Jesus, nor so early in meeting the rising Jesus.

I ascend to my Father. Two consolations are in these words:

1. Our joint relation to God, resulting from union with Christ. Speaking of that inexhaustible spring of light, life, and bliss, He says, He is my Father, and your Father; my God, and your God. This expresses the relation between Christ and believers; He that sanctifieth, and they that are sanctified, are both one; for they agree in one, Heb. 2:11. Here are, such an advancement of Christians, and such a condescension of Christ, as bring them near togetherness.

It is the dignity of believers, that the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ is their Father. A vast difference indeed there is between the foun-

This appearance was the same day that He rose, being the first day of the week, the day after the Jewish Sabbath, at a private meeting of the disciples, ten of them, and some of their friends with them, Luke 24:33.

There are three secondary ordinances (as may call them) instituted by our Lord to continue in his church, for its support, and for the administration of the principal ordinances—the Word, sacraments, and prayer: these are, the Lord's day, solemn assemblies, and a standing ministry; the mind of Christ concerning each of these is plainly intimated to us in these verses, and of the first two, in the circumstances of this appearance, the other, v. 21. Christ's kingdom was to be set up among men, immediately upon his resurrection; and, accordingly, we find the very day He rose, though but a day of small things, graced with those solemnities which should help to keep up religion throughout all ages of the church.

Here is a Christian Sabbath observed by the disciples, and owned by our Lord. The visit Christ made to his disciples, was, on the first day of the week. And the first day of the week is the only day of the week, or month, or year, that is ever mentioned by number in all the New Testament; and that is several times spoken of as a day religiously observed. Though it was said here expressly, (v. 1.) that Christ rose the first day of the week, and it might have been sufficient to say here, (v. 19.) He appeared the same day at evening; yet, to put an honor upon the day, it is repeated, being the first day of the week; not that the apostles designed to put honor upon the day, (they were yet in doubt concerning the occasion of it,) but God designed to put honor upon it, by ordering it that they should be together, to receive Christ's first visit on that day. Thus, He blessed and sanctified that day, because in it the Redeemer rested.

Here is a Christian assembly solemnized by the disciples, and owned by the Lord Jesus. Probably, the disciples met here to pray together; or, perhaps, to compare notes, and consider whether they had sufficient evidence of their Master's resurrection, and to consult whether they should keep together, or scatter: they met, to strengthen one another's hands, and concert proper measures.

This meeting was private, because they durst not appear publicly, in a body; they met in a house, but kept the doors shut, that they might not be seen, and that none might come among them but such as they knew; for they feared the Jews, who would prosecute the disciples as criminals, that they might seem to believe the lie they would deceive the world with, that they came by night, and stole Him away. Note, 1. Disciples of Christ, even in difficult times, must not forsake the assembling of themselves together, Heb. 10:25. Those sheep of the flock were scattered in the storm; but sheep are sociable, and will come together again. It is no new thing for the assemblies of Christ's disciples to be driven into corners, and forced into the wilderness, Rev. 12:14. Prov. 28:12. 2. God's people have been often obliged to enter into their chambers, and shut their doors. Persecution is allotted them, and retirement from persecution is allowed them; and then where shall we look for them but in dens and caves of the earth? It is a grief, but no reproach, to Christ's disciples, thus to ascend.

When they were assembled, Jesus came, yet drawing a veil over the brightness of his body now begun to be glorified, else it would have dazzled their eyes, as in his transfiguration. Christ came, to give them a specimen of the performance of his promise, that, where two or three are gathered together in his name, He will be in the midst of them.

He came, though the doors were shut. This does not weaken the evidence of his having a 'fied and laid in the grave, such a body could not penetrate through another more solid body. This fancy destroys not only the end of Christ's coming among them, but of all that He had said and done to convince them it was the same body that was crucified, in which He appeared to them. It being as certain, that flesh and bones cannot penetrate through a door, as that 'a spirit hath not flesh and bones.'—Whitby.

20 And when he had so said, he shewed unto them his hands and his side. Then were the disciples glad when they saw the Lord.

21 Then said Jesus to them again, Peace be unto you: As my Father hath sent me, even so send I you.

22 And when he had said this, he breathed on them, and saith unto them, Receive ye the Holy Ghost.

23 Whose soever sins ye remit, they are remitted unto them; and whose soever sins ye retain, they are retained.

were to speak on earth, that it was He Himself, and therefore He rose with them; they were to speak in the intercession He must ever live to make, and therefore He ascended with them, and appeared in the midst of the throne, a Lamb as it had been slain, Rev. 5: 6. He will come again with his scars, that they may look on Him whom they have pierced.

These marks He showed his disciples, for their conviction. They had not only the satisfaction of seeing Him look with the same countenance, and hearing Him speak with the same voice, they had been so long accustomed to, but they had the further evidence of those marks; He opened his hands to them; He opened his breast, to show them the wounds there. Note, When Christ manifests his love to believers by his Spirit, assures them that because He lives, they shall live also, then He shows them his hands and his side.

real body after his resurrection; though the doors were shut, He knew how to open them without noise; as formerly He had walked on the water, and yet had a true body. When our solemn assemblies are reduced to privacy, no doors can shut out Christ's presence.

Peace be unto you. This was not a word of course, though commonly used at the meeting of friends, but a solemn, uncommon benediction, conferring upon them all the fruits of his death and resurrection. The phrase was common, but the sense peculiar. Peace, is as much as, All good. Christ had left them his peace for their legacy, ch. 14: 27. By the death of the testator the testament was become of force, and He was now risen from the dead, to prove the will, and be Himself the executor; He here makes payment of the legacy. His speaking peace, crea's the fruit of the lips, peace; peace with God; in your own consciences; peace with one another; peace in Christ. His sudden appearing, when they were full of doubts concerning Him, of fears concerning themselves, could not but put them into some disorder, the noise of which waves He stills with this word, Peace be unto you. See

The method He took to convince them of his resurrection. They now saw Him alive, whom multitudes had seen dead two or three days before. The only doubt was, whether this that they saw alive, was the same body that had been seen dead; and none could desire a further proof that it was so, than the scars or marks of the wounds.

The marks of the wounds, (though without pain or soreness,) remained in the body of Jesus even after his resurrection, that they might demonstrate the truth of it. Conquerors glory in the marks of their wounds. Christ's wounds

They were convinced that they saw the Lord so was their faith confirmed. At first, they thought they saw an apparition only; but now they knew it was the Lord Himself. Many true believers, who, while they were weak, feared their comforts were but imaginary, afterward find them, through grace, real. They ask not, Is it the Lord? but are assured, it is He

Then they were glad; and that which strengthened their faith, raised their joy; believing, they rejoice. The evangelist seems to write it with something of transport and triumph. Then! then! were the disciples glad, when they saw the Lord. Now that word of Christ was fulfilled, (ch. 16: 22.) I will see you again, and your hearts shall rejoice. This wiped away all tears from their eyes. Note, A sight of Christ will gladden the heart of a disciple at any time; the more we see of Christ, the more we shall rejoice in Him; and our joy will never be perfect, till we come there where we shall see Him as He is. Observe

The honorable and ample commission He gave them to be his agents in planting his church.

The preface was the repetition of the salutation before; Peace be unto you. This was intended, either, 1. To raise their attention. The former salutation was to still their fear, that they might attend to the proofs of his resurrection; this was to reduce the transport of their joy, that they might sedately hear what He had further to say; or, 2. To encourage them to accept the commission. Though it would involve them in much trouble, yet He designed their honor and comfort in it, and, in the issue, it would be peace. Gideon received his commission with this word, Peace be unto thee, Judg. 6: 22, 23. Christ is our Peace; if He be with us, peace is to us. Christ was sending the disciples to publish peace to the world; (Isa. 52: 7.) and here not only confers it on them for their satisfaction, but commits it to them, to be by them transmitted to all the sons of peace, Luke 10: 5, 6.

The commission itself sounds very great; As my Father hath sent me, even so send I you.

Christ sent them; He appointed them to go on with his work, and spread his Gospel, and set up his kingdom among men. He sent them authorized with a divine warrant, armed with divine power; sent them as ambassadors of

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 11-23. Great love is manifested by proportionable sorrow, when the beloved object is removed: thus the believer mourns, when he seeks in vain for the comfort of the Redeemer's presence, or the opportunity of honoring Him. At such times, he is apt to imagine that others, as well as himself, must be thinking of his Beloved: and the same state of mind often incapacitates him from perceiving the evidences of the Lord's love to him, or the grounds of his own consolation. Thus he is led to weep, when he should rejoice: but mourners of this character shall be comforted; angels rejoice over them, and are ready to minister to their comfort; Jesus will 'manifest Himself to them, as He doth not unto the world;' and in this manner the most disconsolate penitents, and the chief of sinners, become the messengers of peace and comfort to others.—

Our Redeemer, in his exaltation, deigns to call his disciples brethren, notwithstanding their falls and ingratitude! and when we consider how low He stooped, how much He suffered, in order to form the relation and to fulfil the part of a Brother to sinful worms; we shall not hesitate to expect the greatest honor from Him. He has 'ascended to his Father and our Father, to his God and our God;' and there He continually manages our concerns, with perfect love and faithfulness: yet when we assemble in his name, especially on his holy day, He will meet with us and speak peace to us; (Matt. 18: 19, 20. 28: 19, 20.) He will assure us of his forgiveness; counterbalance our sorrows and alarms from foes; and communicate his Spirit, according as our services or difficulties require his special assistance and support. SCOTT.

Verse 22.

Receive ye the Holy Ghost. It does not appear, that the apostles, on any occasion, used these words. Peter and John prayed for the disciples in Samaria, that they might receive the Holy Ghost. 'Then laid they their hands upon them, and they received the Holy Ghost.' (Acts 8: 15, 17.) The language of authority, used by our Lord on this occasion, seems exclusively appropriate to the great Head of the church, and marks the immense disparity between Him and his most eminent servants.

Breathed. 'All the best commentators are agreed in considering this as no other than a symbolical action. 'Of this mode of teaching by actions, we have examples both in the Old and New Testament. Verse 23.

Most theologians recognise in these words a concession, not only to the disciples and apostles, but to all succeeding teachers of the church, as a power to remit sins. They are not, however, agreed, whether this remission of sins be declarative only, or also exhibitive. But remission of sins, properly so called, does not seem to be the subject here. The word 'remit' is to be explained declaratively, as many other verbs of that kind. 2dly. In the formula 'to remit sins,' the part is put for the whole, i. e. remission of sins for the whole of the salvation obtained by Christ, which is frequently done in Scripture, especially in the discourses of Christ, and in those sayings in which He expresses any thing only negatively, where the offence is also to be understood. Therefore to remit sins, here, denotes to declare that pardon of sins, and salvation in general, will be granted to all those who seek it by the appointed means, and observe the stipulated conditions. This interpretation is confirmed by the parallel passage in Luke 24: 47. wee, I ratify the promise of my Father made to you. For our Lord promised, on the Father's part, the Holy Spirit and his gifts. These gifts He, in the subsequent passage, calls the power from on high, for which they were to wait at Jerusalem. Moreover, what in John our Lord has said in the words, as the Father hath sent me, so I send you, He has expressed in Luke by, Ye are witnesses of these things. Finally, what in John is signified by whose soever sins ye remit, they are remitted unto them, is in Luke thus expressed: Thus it is written, and thus it behooved Christ to suffer, and to rise from the dead the third day: and that repentance and remission of sins should be preached in his name among all nations, beginning at Jerusalem. For in these words our Lord laid open the divine counsels concerning the Messiah. The present passage may also be illustrated by a remarkable one in Matt. 16: 18 and 19, where Peter is promised the power and authority of bringing others to the Christian society: and this power bestowed here, and in Matt. 18: 18, on the other disciples, namely, that of preaching, or remission of sins by his authy, is in this passage called the power of remitting or not remitting sin.

on his throne; nay, equal with that given to the Mediator Himself for his work. He had an incontestable authority, and an irresistible ability, for his work; so had they for theirs. Or thus, As the Father hath sent Me, is, as it were, the recital of his power; by virtue of the authority given Him as Mediator, He gave authority to them, to act in his name, with the children of men; so that they who received them, or rejected them, received or rejected Him, and Him that sent Him, ch. 13: 20.

He breathed on them; (p. 22.) not only to show them by this breath of life, that He Himself was alive, but to signify the spiritual life and power they should receive from Him. Probably, He breathed on them all together, not on each severally; and though Thomas was not with them, the Spirit of the Lord knew where to find him, Numb. 11: 26. Christ here seems to refer to the creation of man, by the breathing of the breath of life into him, (Gen. 2: 7.) and to intimate that He was the Author of that work, and that the spiritual life and strength of ministers and Christians are derived from and depend upon Him, as much as the natural life of Adam and his seed. As the breath of the Almighty gave life to man and began the old world, so the breath of the Savior gave life to his ministers, and began a new world, Job 33: 4. This intimates, that the Spirit is the breath of Christ, proceeding from the Son. The Spirit, in the Old Testament, is compared to breath; (Ezek. 37: 9.) Come, O breath; but the New Testament tells us, it is Christ's breath. The breath of God is put for the power of his wrath, (Isa. 11: 4. 30: 33.) but the breath of Christ signifies the power of his grace; the breathing of threatenings is changed into the breathings of love by Christ. Our words are uttered by our breath, so the Word of Christ is spirit and life. The Word comes from the Spirit, and the Spirit comes with the Word. The Spirit is the gift of Christ. The apostles communicated the Holy Ghost by the laying on of hands, those hands being first lifted up in prayer, for they must beg his blessing; but Christ conferred the Holy Ghost by breathing, for He is the Author of the gift; Moses could not give his Spirit, (God did it; Numb. 11: 17.) but Christ did it Himself.

'Receive ye the Holy Ghost, in part, as an earnest of what you shall further receive not many days hence.' They now received more of the Holy Ghost than they had yet received. Spiritual blessings are given gradually; to him that has shall be given. Now that Jesus began to be glorified, more of the Spirit began to be given; see ch. 7: 39.

Christ hereby gives them assurance of the Spirit's aid in their work; in the execution of the commission given them; 'I send you, and you shall have the Spirit to go with you.' The Spirit of the Lord rested upon them, to qualify them for the services that lay before them. Whom Christ employs, He will furnish with all needful powers.

He gives them experience of the Spirit's influences. He had showed them his hands and his side, to convince them of his resurrection; but the plainest evidences will not work faith; witness the infidelity of the soldiers, the only eye-witnesses of the resurrection. 'Receive the Holy Ghost to work faith in you, and to open your understandings.' They were now in danger of the Jews; 'Receive ye the Holy Ghost, to work courage in you.' What Christ said to them, He says to all believers, Eph. 1: 13. What Christ gives we must receive; submit our whole souls to the influences of the Spirit; receive his powers, and use them; they who obey his Word as a precept, shall have the benefit of it as a promise; they shall receive the Holy Ghost, as the guide of their way, and the earnest of their inheritance. See

One particular branch of the power given them by their commission; 'Whosoever sins ye remit, in the execution of the powers intrusted, they are remitted to them. And whosoever sins ye pronounce unpardoned, they are retained.' This follows their receiving the Holy Ghost; for if they had not a spirit of discerning, they had not been fit to be intrusted with such authority; for this is a special commission to the apostles, and the first preachers of the Gospel, who could distinguish who were in the gall of bitterness and bond of iniquity, and who were not. By virtue of this power, Peter struck Ananias and Sapphira dead, and Paul struck Elymas blind. It must be understood as a general charter to the church and her ministers, not securing infallibility to any man, or men, but encouraging the stewards of the mysteries of God to stand to the Gospel they were sent to preach, for that God Himself will vindicate it. The apostles, in preaching remission, must begin at Jerusalem though she had lately brought upon herself the guilt of Christ's blood. Peter did so, Acts 2: 38, 3: 19. Christ, being risen for our justification, sends his heralds to proclaim the jubilee, the act of indemnity; and by this rule men shall be judged, ch. 12: 48. Rom. 2: 16, James 2: 12. God will never alter this rule of judgment, nor vary from it; those whom the Gospel acquits, shall be acquitted, and those whom that condemns, shall be condemned; which puts immense honor on the ministry, and should give immense courage to ministers.

Two ways the apostles and ministers of Christ remit and retain sin. 1. By sound doctrine. They are commissioned to tell the world, that salvation is to be had upon gospel-terms, and no other; and they will find God will say Amen to it. 2. By a strict discipline, applying the general rule of the Gospel to particular persons. 'Whom you admit into communion, according to the rules of the Gospel, God will admit into communion with Himself; and whom you cast out, as impenitent and obstinate in scandalous and infectious sins, shall be bound over to the judgment of God.'

Thomas is said to be one of the twelve apostles, who, though now eleven, had been twelve, and were to be so again. They were but eleven; one was missing; Christ's disciples will never be all together till the great day. Perhaps it was Thomas' unhappiness that he was absent; he was not well, or had not notice; or perhaps it was his sin; either he was diverted by business or company, which he preferred before this opportunity, or he durst not come for fear of the Jews; and called that prudence and caution, which was his cowardice. However, he missed the satisfaction of seeing his Master risen, and of sharing the disciples' joy. Note, Those know not what they lose, who carelessly absent themselves from solemn assemblies.

The other disciples, the next time they saw him, no doubt, related with joy all that had passed. Though Thomas was then from them, he was not long from them; absenters must not be condemned as apostates; Thomas is not Judas.

With what exultation and triumph they speak it: 'We have seen the Lord.' This they said to upbraid him with his absence; or rather, to inform him; 'We have seen the Lord, and wish thou hadst seen Him too, to satisfy thee.' Note, Disciples should endeavor to build up one another in their most holy faith, both by repeating what they have heard, to those that were absent; as also by communicating what they have experienced. They that by faith have seen the Lord, should tell others what God hath done for their souls; only let boasting be excluded.

Thomas objects; 'Tell me not you have seen the Lord alive, you are too credulous; except I shall not only see in his hand the print of the nails, but put my finger into it, and thrust my hand into the wound in his side, I am resolved I will not believe.' Some, by comparing this with what he said, (ch. 11: 16, 14: 5.) conjecture him to have been of a rough, morose temper, apt to speak peevishly; for all good people are not alike happy in their temper; however, there was certainly much amiss in this.

He had either not heeded, or not duly regarded, what Christ had often said, according to the Old Testament, that He would rise again the third day; he ought to have said, He is risen, though he had not seen Him, nor spoken with any that had.

He did not pay just deference to the testimony of his fellow-disciples, who were men of wisdom and integrity, and ought to be credited. He knew them to be honest men; they all concurred in the testimony with great assurance; yet he cannot persuade himself that their record is true. Christ had chosen them to be his witnesses of this thing to all nations; yet Thomas will not allow them to be competent witnesses

26 And after eight days, again his disciples were within, and Thomas with them. Then came Jesus, the doors being shut, and stood in the midst, and said, ^bPeace be unto you.

27 Then saith he to Thomas, ^cReach hither thy finger, and behold my hands; and reach hither thy hand, and thrust it into my side: ^dand be not faithless, but believing.

nor trust them further than he can see them. He did not, however, question their veracity, but their prudence; he feared they were too credulous.

He tempted Christ, and limited the Holy One of Israel, when he would be convinced by his own method. He could not be sure that the print of the nails would admit his finger, or the wound in his side his hand; nor was it fit to deal so roughly with a living body; yet Thomas ties up his faith to this evidence; he will be humored, or he will not believe; see Matt. 16:1. 27:42.

The open avowal of this in the presence of the disciples, was an offence and discouragement; not only a sin, but a scandal. As one coward makes many, so does one unbeliever, one sceptic, making his brethren's heart to faint like his heart, Deut. 20:8. Had he only thought this evil, and then laid his hand upon his mouth, to suppress it, his error had remained with himself; but his proclaiming his infidelity so prominently might be of ill consequence to the rest, who were as yet but weak and wavering.

V. 26-31. Christ repeated his visit to his disciples, after eight days; which must therefore be, as that was, the first day of the week.

He deferred his next appearance, to show his disciples that He was not risen to such a life as He had formerly lived, to converse constantly with them but belonged to another world. Where Christ was during these eight days, is folly to inquire, and presumption to determine. In the beginning of his ministry He had been forty days unseen, tempted by the evil spirit, Matt. 4:1, 2. Now, in the beginning of his glory, He was forty days, for the most part unseen, attended, no doubt, by good spirits.

He deferred it seven days, 1. To rebuke Thomas for his incredulity; he had neglected the former meeting; and to teach him to prize those seasons better, he cannot have such another opportunity for several days. A melancholy week, we have reason to think, he had, while the other disciples were full of joy.

2. To try the faith and patience of the rest. Thus He would gradually wean them from his bodily presence.

3. To honor the first day of the week, and plainly intimate his will, that it should be observed as the Christian Sabbath. That one day in seven should be religiously observed, from the beginning, was an appointment as at first; and that in the kingdom of the Messiah, the first day of the week should be the day; this was indication enough, that Christ once and again met his disciples in religious assembly on that day; and it is highly probable, that in his former appearance He appointed them that day seven-night to be together again, and also appeared to them every first day of the week, beside other times, during the forty days. The religious observance of that day has been from thence transmitted through every age of the church. It is the day the Lord has made.

Christ made them this visit at Jerusalem for the doors were shut now, as before, for fear of the Jews. There they staid, to keep the feast of unleavened bread seven days, which expired the day before; yet they would not set out on their journey to Galilee on the first day of the week, because it was the Christ's Sabbath.

Thomas was with them this time. When we have lost one opportunity, we should lay hold on the next. It is a good sign if such a loss whet our desires, and a bad sign if it cool them. The disciples did not insist on his believing the resurrection of Christ, as they did, because as yet it was but darkly revealed; they did not receive him to doubtful disputation, but bid him welcome to come and see. Observe, Christ did not appear to Thomas, for his satisfaction, till He found him in society with the disciples, because He would countenance the meetings of Christians and ministers. Besides, He would have all the disciples witness the rebuke He gave Thomas, and yet, withal, his tender care of him.

Christ stood in the midst, and they all knew Him, for He showed Himself as before. See the condescension of our Lord! The gates of heaven were open, and there He might have been in the midst of the adoration of a world of angels; yet, for the benefit of his church, He lingered on earth, and visited the little private meeting of his poor disciples, and is in the midst of them.

He saluted them in a friendly manner, as before, Peace be unto you. This was no vain repetition, but significant of abundant and assured peace; and of the continuance of his blessings

Verses 27-30.

Be not faithless, but believing. 'Become not an unbeliever, but a believer.' 'Renounce not thy former professed faith in Me: but be established in faith.' 'Not seeing, yet believing.' The indefinite tenses are used; and all, in every age, who have believed, do, or shall believe, in an unseen Savior, are blessed. Our version seems to limit it to the past; 'have believed.' It may here be proper to add

A COMPREHENSIVE VIEW of the evidence, which we, after so many ages, possess of our Lord's resurrection; for this is the grand external demonstration of the truth of Christianity. — Almost all human affairs are conducted in man's testimony; in the great concerns of life and death, the concurring evidence of two or three persons of good character, and competent information, is deemed sufficient proof of any fact, in its own nature credible; especially if it be clear, that they derive no advantage from their testimony. The resurrection of Christ, as connected with the authority of Revelation, and the glory of God in the salvation of multitudes of immortal souls, was an event in itself perfectly credible; as sufficient reasons may be assigned, for the interposition of almighty power to effect it. (Acts 26: 4-8.) To prepare the way for the testimony to be given of this event, it was expressly foretold by the prophets (Ps. 16: 8-11. 22: 22-31. Is. 53: 9-12. Luke 24: 44-49. Acts 2: 25-32. 13: 24-27.) and even the enemies of our Lord knew, that He had clearly predicted it, and the very time when it would take place. (Matt. 27: 62-66.) Accordingly, on the day prefixed, the body was gone, after all the precautions taken to secure it: and, though their authority and reputation were at stake; though they could give no rational account what was become of it; and though they had the whole authority in their hands; they never ventured to bring, either the soldiers who guarded the sepulchre, or the apostles who were said to have stolen the body, to trial; — rather to sit down under the imputation of murder, perjury, and wickedness, than excite further inquiry. The eleven apostles were a sufficient number of witnesses; they were men of plain sense and irreproachable character; had been constant attendants on Jesus during some years; and unanimously testified, that they repeatedly saw Him, conversed, ate, and drank with Him, after his resurrection; that they examined the wounds in his hands and side; and at length they beheld Him ascend towards heaven, till a cloud intercepted their view. In this testimony they persisted with one voice; and nothing induced one of them to vary from it. In the smallest particular. They had evidently no previous expectation of the resurrection of their Lord; and notwithstanding the miracles they had witnessed, were remarkably incredulous. They were also exceedingly intimidated by his crucifixion; and could have no possible temporal motive, to invent and propagate a report of his resurrection; for labor, poverty, reproach, imprisonment, and death alone could be expected, as their recompense, for embracing the cause of one who had been crucified as a deceiver. In every thing else, they appeared to be most simple, upright, pious men; and if in this they falsified, they must have been the most wicked and artful persons who ever existed, and that without any prospect of advantage. For they spent all the rest of their lives in propagating the religion of Jesus as risen from the dead; renouncing worldly interest; facing opposition and persecution; enduring all hardship; prepared at all times to seal their testimony with their blood; and most of them actually suffering martyrdom, confirming their testimony with their latest breath, and leaving it in their writings to posterity. Moreover, there were other competent witnesses, to the number of five hundred persons, who saw Jesus after his resurrection. (1 Cor. 15: 3-11. v. 6.) These also concurred in the testimony to their latest breath; and neither terror, hope, nor any other motive, ever induced one of them to contradict or dissent from the testimony of the others. Were we to suppose, we could scarcely conceive of a more complete human testimony to any matter of fact. Yet perhaps some may think, that if Jesus had openly appeared, after his resurrection, to the Jewish nation and rulers, it might have put the matter beyond all doubt; but it should be considered, that if this measure had been adopted, and the rulers had persisted in rejecting Him, as they certainly would, if their hearts had remained unchanged; (Luke 16: 27-31.) the Gospel would have had still greater disadvantages to encounter, both among the other Jews, and the Gentiles. On the other hand, if the whole Jewish nation and their rulers had received Jesus as the Messiah, when the Gospel had been sent among the Gentiles, it would have appeared as a plan formed for aggrandizing that nation, and as such would probably have been disregarded; and after all, they who lived in after ages could have no further proof of this public appearance, than the testimony of those individuals who recorded it. In short, if our Lord was not to give ocular demonstration of this resurrection to every man, in every age; (which would have been impossible) the number of competent witnesses was sufficient, and even preferable to a greater multitude. — But God Himself was pleased to bear witness with the apostles, conferring on them the gifts of tongues, and of working miracles, by the Holy Spirit; and enabling them to impart the truth to others, by laying on of the hands. (15: 26, 27. Acts 13: 24. Heb. 2: 1-4. v. 4.) Thus the number of unexceptionable witnesses was increased, the testimony to our Lord's resurrection diffused on every side, and his enemies could not deny, that most extraordinary miracles were performed by those who attested that event. (Acts 4: 13-22. v. 16.) In this manner, the number of the disciples of Jesus was speedily multiplied, by tens of thousands, from among those who had demanded his crucifixion; and Christianity got ground rapidly on every side, in opposition to wealth, power, learning, superstition, and philosophy; and by unarmed, unlearned, poor, and despised instruments; till at length whole nations embraced the religion of the crucified Nazarene, as the prophets had expressly foretold. (Jer. 16: 19-21. Ezr. 9: 11, 12. Zech. 8: 20-23.) This effect, which could be ascribed to no power but that of God, and the continuance of so humbling and holy a religion to this day, form a demonstration even to us of this important fact: nor has any event since the beginning of the world ever been proved, with such complicated and abundant evidence. St. Paul's conversion, and the prophecies contained in the writings of those who testified our Lord's resurrection, and which have been accomplishing for almost eighteen hundred years, may be considered as additional, complete, divine attestations. 30 And many other signs truly did Jesus in the presence of his disciples, which are not written in this book.

31 But these are written, that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God; and that believing ye might have life through his name.

for, if we are faithless, we are Christless and graceless, hopeless and joyless; as we therefore say, Lord, I believe, help Thou mine unbelief.

Thomas, now ashamed of his incredulity, cries out, My Lord and my God. It would seem, he did not put his finger into the print of the nails; for Christ says, (v. 29.) Thou hast seen and believed; seeing sufficed. Faith comes off conqueror, after a struggle with unbelief.

Thomas is now fully satisfied of the truth of Christ's resurrection. His willingness to believe may help to strengthen our faith; for hereby it appears that the witnesses of Christ's resurrection, who pawned their lives upon it, were not credulous men, but cautious, suspending their belief till they saw the utmost evidence they could desire.

He believed Him to be Lord and God, and we are to believe Him so. 1. We must believe his Deity—that He is God; not a man made God, but God made man, as this evangelist had laid down at first, ch. 1: 1. The Author and Head of our religion has the wisdom, power, sovereignty, and unchangeableness of God; because He was to be not only the Founder, but the Foundation of it, and the Fountain of life for its supply. 2. His mediation—He is Lord, the one Lord, 1 Cor. 8: 6. 1 Tim. 2: 5. He is sufficiently authorized, as Plenipotentiary, to settle the great concerns between God and man; see Acts 2: 36. Rom. 14: 9.

He consented to Him as his Lord and his God. In faith there must be the consent of the will to gospel-terms, as well as the assent of the understanding to gospel-truths. We must accept of Christ to be that to us, which the Father hath appointed Him. My Lord refers to Adonai—my foundation and stay; My God, to Elohim—my prince and judge. God having constituted Him the Umpire, we must approve the choice, and entirely refer ourselves to Him. This is the vital act of faith, Cant. 2: 16.

He made profession of this, before the witnesses of his unbelief. He says to Christ, and, to complete the sense, we must read it, Thou art my Lord and my God; or, speaking to his brethren, This is my Lord and my God. Do we accept of Christ as our Lord God? We must tell Him so, as David, (Ps. 16: 2.) tell others so, as those that triumph in our relation to Christ; This upon his people, for they fail not, but are new every morning; new, every meeting.

Only that which passed between Christ and Thomas at this meeting is recorded.

Christ singled him out from the rest; 'Reach hither thy finger, and behold my hands, and satisfy thy curiosity about the print of the nails; reach hither thy hand, and if nothing less will convince thee, thrust it into my side.'

An implicit rebuke of his incredulity, is in the plain reference to what Thomas had said, answering it word for word, for he had heard it, though unseen. Note, There is not an unbelieving word in our tongues, nor thought in our minds, at any time, but it is known to the Lord Jesus, Ps. 78: 21.

An express condescension to his weakness, appears in two things. 1. That He suffers his wisdom to be prescribed to. Great spirits will not be dictated to by their inferiors, especially in acts of grace; Christ is pleased to accommodate Himself even to Thomas' fancy in a needless thing, rather than leave him in his unbelief. He will not break the bruised reed, but, as a good shepherd, gathers that which was driven away, Ezek. 34: 16. We ought thus to bear the infirmities of the weak, Rom. 15: 1, 2. 2. He allows Thomas even to thrust his hand into his side, if then he would believe. Thus, for the confirmation of our faith, He hath instituted an ordinance to keep his death in remembrance, though an ignominious death; yet, because such an evidence of his love would encourage our faith, He appoints the memorial of it. Reach hither thy hand to Him, who reacheth forth his helping, inviting, giving hand to thee.

It is an affecting word with which Christ closes what He had to say to Thomas, Be not faithless but believing; do not thou become an unbeliever; as if he should have been sealed up under unbelief, had he not yielded now. This warning is given to us all, Be not faithless; we are Christless and graceless, hopeless and joyless; as we therefore say, Lord, I believe, help Thou mine unbelief.

Thomas, now ashamed of his incredulity, cries out, My Lord and my God. It would seem, he did not put his finger into the print of the nails; for Christ says, (v. 29.) Thou hast seen and believed; seeing sufficed. Faith comes off conqueror, after a struggle with unbelief.

Thomas is now fully satisfied of the truth of Christ's resurrection. His willingness to believe may help to strengthen our faith; for hereby it appears that the witnesses of Christ's resurrection, who pawned their lives upon it, were not credulous men, but cautious, suspending their belief till they saw the utmost evidence they could desire.

He believed Him to be Lord and God, and we are to believe Him so. 1. We must believe his Deity—that He is God; not a man made God, but God made man, as this evangelist had laid down at first, ch. 1: 1. The Author and Head of our religion has the wisdom, power, sovereignty, and unchangeableness of God; because He was to be not only the Founder, but the Foundation of it, and the Fountain of life for its supply. 2. His mediation—He is Lord, the one Lord, 1 Cor. 8: 6. 1 Tim. 2: 5. He is sufficiently authorized, as Plenipotentiary, to settle the great concerns between God and man; see Acts 2: 36. Rom. 14: 9.

He consented to Him as his Lord and his God. In faith there must be the consent of the will to gospel-terms, as well as the assent of the understanding to gospel-truths. We must accept of Christ to be that to us, which the Father hath appointed Him. My Lord refers to Adonai—my foundation and stay; My God, to Elohim—my prince and judge. God having constituted Him the Umpire, we must approve the choice, and entirely refer ourselves to Him. This is the vital act of faith, Cant. 2: 16.

He made profession of this, before the witnesses of his unbelief. He says to Christ, and, to complete the sense, we must read it, Thou art my Lord and my God; or, speaking to his brethren, This is my Lord and my God. Do we accept of Christ as our Lord God? We must tell Him so, as David, (Ps. 16: 2.) tell others so, as those that triumph in our relation to Christ; This is my Beloved. Thomas speaks with ardent affection, as one that took hold of Christ with all his might. See

The judgment of Christ on the whole; 'Thomas, because thou hast seen Me, thou hast believed, and it is well thou art brought to it at last on any terms; but blessed are they that have not seen, and yet have believed.'

1. Christ owns Thomas a believer. Sound and sincere believers, though slow and weak, shall be graciously accepted. They who have long resisted, if at last they yield, shall find Him ready to forgive. No sooner does He consent to Christ, than Christ gives Him the comfort of it, and lets him know that he believes.

2. He upbraids him with his former incredulity. He might well be ashamed to think, (1.) That he had been so backward to believe. They that in sincerity have closed with Christ, see great reason to lament that they did not do it sooner. (2.) That it was not without much pains, that he was brought to believe at last; 'If thou hadst not seen Me alive, thou wouldest not have believed;' but if no evidence must be admitted, but that of our own senses, and we must believe nothing but what we ourselves are eye-witnesses of, farewell commerce and conversation. If this must be the only method of proof, how must the world be converted to the faith of Christ? He is therefore justly blamed for laying so much stress upon this.

3. He commends the faith of those who believe on easier terms. Thomas, as a believer, was blessed; but rather blessed are they that have not seen. It is not meant of not seeing the objects of faith, (for those are invisible Heb. 11: 1. 2 Cor. 4: 18.) but the motives of faith—Christ's miracles, and especially his resurrection. This may look, either backward, upon the Old-Testament saints, who had not seen the things which they saw, and yet believed the promise; or forward, upon the Gentiles, who had never seen Christ in the flesh, as the Jews had. This faith, (1.) Evidences a better temper of mind in those that believe. Not to see, and yet to believe, argues greater industry in searching after truth, greater ingenuousness in embracing it. He that believes upon that sight, has his resistance conquered by a sort of violence; but he that believes without that, like the Bereans, is more noble. (2.) It is a greater instance of the power of grace. The less sensible the evidence, the more the work of faith appears to be the Lord's doing. Peter is blessed in his faith, because flesh and blood have not revealed it to him, Matt. 16: 17. Flesh and blood contribute more to their faith that see and believe, than to theirs who see not, and yet believe. Lightfoot quotes one of the rabbins, 'One proselyte is more acceptable to God than all the thousands of Israel that stood before Sinai; for they saw, and received the law, but a proselyte sees not, and yet receives it.'

The evangelist assures us that many other things worthy to be recorded occurred, but are not written in the book: many signs. Some refer this to all Jesus did during his whole life, the words He spake, and the wondrous works He did. But it seems rather to be confined to the signs He did after his resurrection, for these were in the presence of the disciples only, which are here spoken of, Acts 10: 41. Divers of his appearances are not recorded, as appears, 1 Cor. 15: 5-7. See Acts 1: 3.

(23.) 'The commendation bestowed on Thomas defends the meaning I attach to this verse. The evidence that he believed was contained in the expression under examination; for, before uttering this expression, he is represented as doubting. On the supposition, then, that the expression was a mere exclamation, what evidence was to the mind of Jesus, or could it be to the minds of others, that he admitted the claims of the Savior of men to the character connected with that office? If it be but an exclamation, what more proof of belief is it, than that men are Christians, when they repeat (from surprise or delight) the name of Christ, by way of exclamation? (Besides, that idiom, if countenanced by some moderns, has no place in the ancient languages, and the words preceding are a sort of form, never introducing exclamation. Bloomfield.) Admitting that the words of Thomas were the proper evidence and expression of the belief the Savior commended, we must admit that He will commend us, for believing that He is both Lord and God.'

(29.) 'Divine Wisdom saw it expedient to suffer the apostles to doubt, for the greater confirmation of the faith. And those doubts were so managed, that no circumstance should be wanting at last to prove his resurrection. Though let into those proofs by degrees, as they were able to bear them, yet it was so artificially, that every fresh instance confirmed, and added something, to those that went before. The empty sepulchre confirmed the women's report; Christ's appearance to Mary Magdalene showed He was alive; that to the disciples at Emmaus proved that it was at least the spirit of Christ, by expounding the prophecies and breaking of bread; that to the eleven showed the reality of his body; the conviction given to Thomas, proved it the self-same body that had been crucified; and that miracle of the fishes, (John 21: 6.) argued the divine nature, still united to the human body. So that though there were many proofs, yet none of them were superfluous. Every one hath something new and peculiarly its own; and all together are a demonstration so full and satisfactory of the same Christ, the same God and man in one person, returned from the dead, that we have great reason to praise God for suffering the disciples to doubt so much and so long.'

CHAP. XXI.

Jesus appears to some of his disciples, at the sea of Tiberias; makes Himself known by a miraculous draught of fishes; and eats with them, 1-13. He thrice demands of Peter, whether he loves Him; and thrice requires him to show his love, by feeding his lambs and sheep, 15-17. He foretells Peter's martyrdom, commanding him to follow Him, 18, 19; and reproves his curiosity concerning John, who showed his readiness in the same way to follow Him, 20-23. The rash of John's testimony affirmed; and it is stated that Jesus did many miracles besides, even too numerous to be all recorded, 24, 25.

AFTER these things Jesus shewed himself again to the disciples at the sea of Tiberias; and on this wise shewed he himself.

2 There were together Simon Peter, and Thomas called Didymus, and Nathanael of Cana in Galilee, and the sons of Zebedee, and two other of his disciples.

He instructs us in the design of recording what we find here; (v. 31.) 'These accounts are given, in this and the following chapter, that ye might believe, upon these evidences, that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God.' Some write books for their diversion, and publish them for profit or applause, others to oblige the Athenian humor, others to instruct the world in arts and sciences, for their secular advantage; but the evangelists wrote to bring men to Christ and heaven, and, in order to that, to persuade men to believe; and for this they took the most fitting methods, they brought to the world a divine revelation, supported with due evidences. It is the duty of those that read and hear the Gospel, to embrace the doctrine of Christ, 1 John 5: 11.

We are here told what the great gospel-truth is—that Jesus is that Christ, that Son of God. 1. He is the Christ; promised and expected by the Old-Testament saints; and who, according to the signification of the name, is anointed of God to be a Prince and a Savior. 2. He is the Son of God; not only as Mediator, (for then He had not been greater than Moses, the prophet, intercessor and lawgiver,) but antecedent to his being the Mediator; for if He had not been a divine person, endued with the power, and entitled to the glory, of God, He had not been qualified for the undertaking; either to do the Redeemer's work, or wear the Redeemer's crown.

The great gospel-blessedness which we are to hope for, is, That believing we shall have life through his name. This is, 1. To direct our faith to the life, the crown of life, the tree of life, set before us. Life through Christ's name, proposed in the covenant made with us in Christ, we must propose to ourselves as the fullness of our joy, and the abundant recompense of our services and sufferings. 2. To encourage our faith. Men will venture far on the prospect of great advantage; and greater advantage cannot be then is offered by the words of this life, as the Gospel is called, Acts 5: 20. It includes spiritual life, in conformity to God and communion with Him, and eternal life, in the vision and fruition of Him. Both are through Christ's name, by his merit and power, and sure to all believers.

CHAP. XXI. v. 1-14. Let us compare this appearance with those before. In those Christ showed Himself to his disciples when met in a solemn assembly, on a Lord's day, and perhaps expecting his appearing; but in this He showed Himself to some of them on a week-day, when they were fishing, and little thought of it. Christ has many ways of making Himself known to his people, usually in his ordinances, but sometimes by his Spirit He visits them when employed in common business, as the shepherds who were keeping their flock by night, (Luke 2: 8,) even so here also, Gen. 16: 13. This appearance was while they were waiting for that at the mountain of Galilee, (Matt. 28: 16,) that they might not be weary of waiting.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 24-31. Unbelief is the source of almost all our sins and disquietudes. We all have too much copied the example of Thomas' incredulity, by refusing to believe the Word of God, and rely on his help, even when our experience of his care has been abundant; and we are often apt to demand such proof of his truths, and of his will, as we have no right to expect. But He does not deal with us after our iniquities, and therefore 'we are not consumed.' He knows all our difficulties and temptations; He rebukes and obviates the unbelief of those, whose hearts are upright before Him; He will convince them who He is, and what He has done for them; that they Christ now showed Himself, not to all the twelve, but to seven of them. Nathanael we have not met with since ch. 1. But some think he was the same with Bartholomew, one of the twelve. The two not named, are supposed to be Philip of Bethsaida, and Andrew of Capernaum. Observe here,

1. It is good for disciples to be much together; not only in religious assemblies, but in common conversation, and common business. Thus they testify and increase their affection to, and delight in, each other, and edify one another by discourse and example.

2. Christ chose to manifest Himself to them when together; not only to countenance Christian society, but that they might, as joint witnesses, corroborate one another's testimony. On which occasion some observe, that the Roman law required seven witnesses to a testimony.

3. Thomas is named next to Peter, as if he now kept closer to their meetings than ever.

They knew not well what to do with themselves. For my part, says Peter, I will go a-fishing; We will go with thee then, say they, for we will keep together. Some think they did amiss in returning to the boats and nets they had left; but then Christ would not have countenanced them in it with a visit. It was rather commendable; for they did it, 1. To redeem time, and not be idle. They were not yet appointed to preach the resurrection. Their commission was drawing, but not perfected. The hour for action was not come. Probably their Master had directed them to say nothing of his resurrection till after his ascension, not till after the pouring out of the Spirit, and then they were to begin at Jerusalem. It is an instance of humility; though advanced to be sent of Christ, as He was of the Father, they did not take state upon them, but remembered the rock out of which they were hewn. It is an instance of their industry. While waiting, they would not be idling. Those who would give an account of their time with joy, should contrive to gather up the fragments of it. 2. To help maintain themselves. While their master was with them, those who ministered to Him were kind to them; but now that the Bridegroom was taken from them they must fast in those days, and therefore their own hands must minister to their necessities. This teaches us with quietness to work, and eat our own bread. Observe

Their disappointment in fishing. That night they caught nothing, though they toiled all night, as Luke 5: 5. See the vanity of this world; the band of the diligent often returns empty. Even good men may come short of desired success. We may be in the way of duty, and yet not prosper. Providence ordered that they should catch nothing, that the miraculous draught in the morning might be more wonderful and acceptable. In very grievous disappointments God has often very gracious designs.

Christ's body, though a true and real body was raised, as ours will be, a spiritual body, and so was visible only when He Himself was pleased to make it so; or, rather, came and removed so quickly, that it was here or there in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye.

Christ's time of making Himself known to his people, is, when they are most at a loss, v. 4. When they think they have lost themselves, He will let them know they have not lost Him. Weeping may endure for a night; but joy comes, if Christ comes, in the morning. Some of the ancients put this significance upon it, that Christ, having finished his work, was got through a stormy sea to a safe shore, where He may trust, love, and obey Him as 'their Lord and their God.' We have not indeed that kind of ocular proof, with which Thomas was favored, and which infidels still demand; yet we are equally within the reach of the blessing. We have abundant evidence of the Redeemer's resurrection and glory: some of us, like Thomas, have withheld our credence, till we could no longer 'be faithless,' but were constrained to believe; and these things were written for the benefit of every reaver, 'that he may believe that Jesus is the Christ, and that believing he may have life through his name.'

The draught of fishes may be considered, 1. As a miracle designed to prove that Christ was raised in power, though seen in weakness; and that all things were put under his feet, the fishes of the sea not excepted. Christ manifests Himself to his people by doing that for them which none else can do, and things which they looked not for.

2. As a mercy for the reasonable supply of their necessities. When ingenuity and industry failed them, the power of Christ came for their relief; for He would take care that they, who had left all for Him, should not want any good thing.

3. As the memorial of a former mercy, with which Christ had recompensed Peter for the loan of his boat, Luke 5: 4, &c. This miracle nearly resembled, and could not but remind Peter of that, which helped him to improve this; for both affected him much, as meeting him in his own element. Latter favors are designed to bring to mind former, that eaten bread may not be forgotten.

stood in triumph; but the disciples, having their work before them, were yet at sea. It is a comfort, when our passage is rough and stormy, that our Master is at shore, and we are hastening to Him.

He shewed Himself gradually. Little expecting to see Him there, and not looking intently upon Him, they took Him for some common person waiting the arrival of their boat. Note, Christ is often nearer us than we think He is, as we find afterward, to our comfort.

He showed Himself to them by an instance of pity. He called to them, Children; Lads, have ye any meat? Have ye caught any fish? The compellation is very familiar; He speaks with the care and tenderness of a father. Though now entered on his exalted state, He spake with as much affection as ever. They were not children in age, but his children, which God had given Him. The question is very kind; Have ye any meat? That, if not, He may take care for their supply. Note, The Lord is for the body, 1 Cor. 6: 13. Christ takes cognizance of the temporal wants of his people, and has promised not only grace sufficient, but food convenient, Verily they shall be fed, Ps. 37: 3. Christ looks into the cottages of the poor, and asks, Children, have ye any meat? Thereby inviting them to open their case before Him, and by the prayer of faith to make their requests known; and then let them be careful for nothing; for Christ takes care of them, and for them. Christ here sets us an example of concern for our brethren; there are many poor householders disabled for labor, or disappointed in it, whom the rich should inquire after thus, Have ye any meat? For the most necessitous are commonly the least clamorous.

To this the disciples gave a short answer, and, some think, with an air of discontent and peevishness. They said, No; not giving Him such a friendly and respectful title as He had given them. So short do the best come in their returns of love to Jesus. Christ puts the question to them, not because He did not know their wants; but He would know them from them. They that would have supplies from Christ, must own themselves empty and needy.

He showed Himself to them by an instance of his power; this perfected the discovery. Cast the net, and you shall find. He from whom nothing is hid, not the inhabitants under the waters, (Job 26: 5.) knew on what side of the ship the shoal of fishes was. Note, Divine Providence extends itself to things minute and contingent; and they are happy that know how to take hints thence in their affairs, and acknowledge it in all their ways.

They are willing to be advised by any but y, and did not bid this supposed stranger n to meddle, but took his counsel; in being thus observant of strangers, they were obedient to their Master unawares. It sped wonderfully well. Note, The humble, diligent and patient, sometimes live to see their affairs take a happy turn, after many struggles and fruitless attempts. There is nothing lost by observing Christ's orders; the rule of the Word, the guidance of the Spirit, and the intimations of Providence; for that is casting the net on the right side of the ship.

4. As a mystery significant of that work in which Christ was now sending them forth. The prophets had been fishing for souls, and caught very little; but the apostles, who let down the net at Christ's word, had wonderful success. Many were the children of the desolate, Gal. 4: 27. They themselves, in pursuance of their mission, when first made fishers of men, had comparatively small success. When, soon after this, three thousand were converted in one day, then the net was cast on the right side of the ship. It encourages Christ's ministers to continue their diligence in their work. One happy draught, at length, may repay many years' toil at the gospel-net.

John was the most intelligent and quick-sighted. He whom Jesus loved, first said, It is the Lord; for those whom Christ loves He will in a special manner manifest Himself to; his secret is with his favorites. John had adhered more closely to his Master in his sufferings; and therefore has a clearer eye and a more discerning judgment. John communicated his knowledge to those with him; for this dispensation of the Spirit is given to every one, to profit withal. They that know Christ themselves should endeavor to bring others acquainted with Him. John tells Peter particularly knowing he would be glad to see Him above any of them.

Peter was the most zealous and warm-hearted; for as soon as he heard it was the Lord, the ship could not hold him, nor could he stay the bringing of it to shore, but into the sea he throws himself, that he might come first to Christ.

He showed his respect to Christ by girding his fisher's coat about him, that he might appear before his Master in the best clothes he had, and not rudely rush into his presence, stripped as he was, because the work he was about was toilsome. Perhaps this fisher's coat was of leather, or oil-cloth, and would keep out wet.

When Peter walked upon the water to Christ, (Matt. 14: 23, 29.) it was said, He came down out of the ship deliberately; but here it is said, He cast himself into the sea; sink or swim, he would show his aim to be with Jesus. 'If Christ suffer me to drown, and come short of Him, it is but what I deserve for denying Him.' Peter had had much forgiven, and made it appear he loved much, by his willingness to run hazards, and undergo hardships. They that have been with Jesus, will be willing to swim through a stormy sea, a sea of blood, to come to Him. And it is a laudable contention among Christ's disciples, to strive who shall be first with Him.

The rest of the disciples were careful and honest-hearted. Though not so zealous as to throw themselves into the sea, they made the best of their way in the boat to the shore; came slowly, yet they came to Christ.

How variously God dispenses his gifts. Some excel, as Peter and John; are very eminent in gifts and graces, and thereby distinguished; others are but ordinary disciples, mind their duty, and are faithful to Him, but do nothing to make themselves remarkable; yet both, the eminent and the obscure, shall sit together with Christ in glory; and perhaps the last shall be first. Of those that excel, some, like John, are eminently contemplative, have great gifts of knowledge, and serve the church with that; others, like Peter, eminently active and courageous, do exploits, and are thus very serviceable to their generation. Some are useful as the church's eyes, others as the church's hands, and all for the good of the body.

What a great difference there may be between good people in the way of honoring Christ, and yet both accepted of Him. Some serve Christ more in acts of devotion, and extraordinary expressions of religious zeal; and they do well, to

He called for some of that which they had caught; not as if He needed it, but He would have them eat the labor of their hands, Ps. 128: 2. What is got by God's blessing on our industry and labor, if without God give us power to eat of it, and enjoy good in our labor, hath a peculiar sweetness. It is said of the slothful man, he cannot find in his heart to dress what he has been at the pains to take, Prov. 12: 27. Christ would hereby teach us to use what we have.—He would have them taste the gifts of his bounty, that they might be witnesses both of his power and of his goodness. He would give a specimen of the spiritual entertainment He has for all believers, which, in this respect, is most free and familiar—that He sups with them, and they with Him; their graces are pleasing to Him, and his comforts are so to them; what He works in them He accepts from them, Ministers, who are fishers of men, must bring all they catch to their Master, for on Him their success depends.

They were not able to draw the net to shore, for the multitude of fishes; that is, they found it difficult, it was more than they could well do; but He that bade them bring it to shore, made it easy. If He that helped us catch them, when, without his help, we should have caught nothing, do not help us to draw them to land, by building them up in their most holy faith, we shall lose them at last, 1 Cor. 3: 7.

Peter, in the former instance, (v. 7.) had shown a more zealous affection to his Master than any, so in this He showed a more ready obedience; but all that are faithful, are not alike forward.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-14. O Lord is often near us, as to his providential care and spiritual consolations, when we are ready to conclude that he is far off. He does not allow his ministers to 'entangle' themselves with the affairs of this life, or his people to perplex themselves with worldly cares; but He approves of honest industry, and vouchsafes his special presence and blessing to those, who conscientiously attend to present duty.—Our Dine, i. e. ancients used to make two principal meals; the first of which is generally called dinner, and the latter supper, in translating the Greek and Latin writers into English; and I believe, the same method prevails in rendering them into most other modern languages. The first meal was indeed commonly taken much earlier than the dining hours at present. Thus our forefathers used to dine at eleven and sup at five: yet that has not altered the name of the meals.

the Lord they do it. Peter ought not to be censured for casting himself into the sea, but commended for his zeal and the strength of his affection; and so must they be, who, in love to Christ, quit the world, with Mary, to sit at his feet. But others serve Christ more in the affairs of the world: they continue in the ship, drag the net, and bring the fish to shore; and such ought not to be censured as worldly, for they, in their place, are as truly serving Christ as the other. If all the disciples had done as Peter did, what had become of their fish and their nets? And yet had Peter done as they did, we had wanted this instance of holy zeal. Christ was well pleased with both, and so must we be.

There are several ways of bringing Christ's disciples to shore to Him, from off the sea of this world. Some are brought to Him by a violent death, as the martyrs, who threw themselves into the sea for Christ; others are brought to Him by a natural death, dragging the net, which is less terrible; but both meet at length on the safe and quiet shore with Christ.

When they came ashore, He had provision ready for them. When they came to land, wet and cold, weary and hungry, they found a good fire to warm and dry them, and fish and bread.

We need not curiously inquire whence this fire, and fish, and bread came, any more than whence the meal came, which the ravens brought Elijah. He that could multiply the loaves and fishes that were, could make new ones if He pleased, or turn stones into bread, or send his angels to fetch it.

We may be comforted in this instance of Christ's care of his disciples; He knows, and has wherewith to supply, all our needs. He kindly provided for those fishermen, when they came weary from their work; for verily they shall be fed, who trust in the Lord, and do good. It is encouraging to Christ's ministers, whom He hath made fishers of men, that they may depend upon Him to provide for them; and if they should miss of encouragement in this world, should be reduced, as Paul was, to hunger and thirst and fastings oft, let them content themselves with what they have here; they have better things in reserve, and shall eat and drink with Christ at his table in his kingdom, Luke 22: 30.

They had the curiosity to count the fishes caught, and perhaps to make a dividend.

Yet was not the net broken. It was said, (Luke 5: 6.) Their net brake. Perhaps this was a borrowed net, for they had long since left their own; and if so, Christ would teach us to take as much care of what is borrowed, as of our own. The gospel-net has inclosed multitudes, three thousand in one day, and yet is not broken; it is still as mighty as ever to bring souls to God.

How free Christ was with his disciples; observing them to keep their distance, and that they were afraid to ask Him, Who art Thou? He treated them as friends; He did not say, Come, and wait, come, and attend Me, nor, Go dine by yourselves, as servants, but familiarly, Come, and dine with Me. This kind invitation may be alluded to, to illustrate, 1. The call Christ gives his disciples into communion with Him here. All things are now ready; Come, and dine. Christ is a feast; his flesh is meat indeed, his blood drink indeed. Christ is a friend; come, dine with Him. He will bid you welcome, Cant. 5: 1. 2. The call He will give them hereafter; Come, ye blessed of my Father; sit down with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob.

How reverent the disciples were before Christ; they were somewhat shy of using this freedom, and by his courting them to their meat, it would seem that they stood pausing. Being to eat with such a ruler, they consider diligently what is before them. None of them durst ask Him, Who art Thou? Either, 1. Because they would not be so bold with Him. Though perhaps He appeared in something of a disguise at first, as to the two disciples, when their eyes were holden, that they should not know Him, yet they had good reason to think it was He. Or, 2. Because they would not so far betray their own folly. When He had given them this instance of his power and goodness, they must be stupid indeed if they questioned whether it was He or no. When God, in his providence, has given us sensible proofs of his care for our bodies, and of his good-will to our souls, we should be ashamed of our distrusts, and not dare to question that which He has left us no room to question.

The entertainment was but ordinary; it was but a fish, coarsely dressed; nothing pompous, nothing curious; plentiful indeed, but plain and homely. Christ, though He entered upon his exalted state, shewed Himself alive by eating, not a prince by feasting. Those that cannot content themselves with bread and fish, would scarcely have found in their hearts to dine with Christ Himself here.

Christ began, Though, perhaps, having a glorified body, He needed not to eat, yet He would show that He had a true body capable of eating. The apostles produced this as one proof of his resurrection, that they had eaten and drank with Him, Acts 10: 41.

He gave the meat to all his guests. He not only provided it for them, and invited them to it, but Himself divided it among them, and put it into their hands. To Him we owe the application, as well as the purchase of the benefits of redemption.

The evangelist remarks, (v. 14.) This is now the third time that Jesus shewed Himself alive to his disciples, or the greater part of them. This is the third day; so some. On the day He dependence on Him is peculiarly to be recognised in the work of the ministry; and He often permits his servants to labor for a time without visible success, to prove their faith and patience, to render them more observant of his directions, or more simply dependent on his assistance; and that their usefulness, when vouchsafed, may more evidently appear to be his work.

Scott.

'The word (dine) is literal. But it was early in the morning, and Kypke has largely shown that the original word is used by Homer, Xenophon, &c. to signify breakfast, or an early meal, as well as what we call dinner.'

Durst.] 'Rather, presumed, ventured; for the word implies not austerity in our Lord, but a backwardness, proceeding from no other fear than may be the consequence of the most perfect esteem and veneration.'

Campbell.

15 ¶ So when they had dined, Jesus saith to Simon Peter, Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou me more than these? He saith unto him, Yea, Lord; thou knowest that I love thee. He saith unto him, Feed my lambs. 16 He saith to him again the second time, Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou me? He saith unto him, Yea, Lord; thou knowest that I love thee. He saith unto him, Feed my sheep.

rose, He appeared five times; the second day was that day seven-night; and this was the third. Or, though He had appeared to Mary, to the women, to the two disciples, to Cephas, yet He had but twice before this appeared to a company of the disciples together. This is noticed, 1. To confirm the truth of his resurrection; the vision was doubled, was tripled, for the thing was certain. They who believed not the first sign, would be brought to believe the voice of the latter signs. 2. As an instance of Christ's continued kindness, once, and again, and a third time, He visited them. It is good to keep account of Christ's visits; for He keeps account of them, and they will be remembered against us if we walk unworthily of them, as they were against Solomon, when he was reminded that the Lord God of Israel had appeared unto him twice. This is now the third; have we made a due improvement of the first and second? See 2 Cor. 12: 14. This is the third, perhaps it may be the last. Observe

V. 15—19. When Christ entered into this discourse with Peter, after they had dined; and it is probable, were entertained with such edifying discourse as our Lord used to make at his table. Christ, foreseeing that what He had to say to Peter would give him uneasiness, would not say it till they had dined. Peter was conscious to himself that he had incurred his Master's displeasure, and could expect no other than to be upbraided with treachery and ingratitude, or struck out of the roll of the disciples, and expelled. Twice, if not thrice, he had seen his Master since his resurrection, and He said not a word to him of it. We may suppose Peter full of doubt on what terms he stood with his Master; sometimes hoping, because he had received favors in common with the rest; yet not without fears, lest the chiding would come at last. At length, his Master put him out of pain, and confirmed him in his place as an apostle. He did not tell him of his fault hastily, nor unseasonably, to disturb the company, but when they had dined together in token of reconciliation, He discoursed with him about it, as with a friend. Peter had reproached himself for it, and therefore Christ did not tell him of it directly, but by a tacit intimation; and being satisfied in his sincerity, the offence was not only forgiven, but forgotten; and Christ let him know that he was as dear to Him as ever. An encouraging instance of his tenderness toward penitents, teaching us, in like manner, to restore such as are fallen, with a spirit of meekness.

The same question is three times asked, the same answer three times made, and the same reply three times given, and yet no vain repetition. It was repeated by our Savior the more to affect Peter, and the other disciples present; by the evangelist, the more to affect us, and all that read it.

The first time the question is, Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou Me more than these?

He speaks to him by name, the more to affect him, as Luke 22: 31. He does not call him Cephas, or Peter, the name He had given him, for he had lost the credit of his strength and stability, which those names signified. Yet He gives him no hard language; but as He had called him when He pronounced him blessed, Simon Bar-jona, (Matt. 16: 15.) He calls him son of Jonas, (or John, or Johanan,) to remind him of his mean extraction, unworthy the honor to which he was advanced.

Lovest thou Me? If we would try whether we are Christ's disciples indeed, this must be the inquiry, Do we love Him? But there was a special reason why Christ put it to Peter.

His fall had given occasion to doubt his love; 'Peter, I have cause to suspect thy love.' Note, We must not reckon it an affront to have our sincerity questioned, when we ourselves have done that which makes it questionable; after a shaking fall, we must take heed of settling too soon, lest we settle upon a wrong bottom. The question is affecting; He does not ask, 'Dost thou fear Me? Dost thou honor Me?' but, 'Dost thou love Me? Give but proof of that, and the affront shall be passed by.' Peter had professed himself a penitent, witness his tears, and his return to the society of the disciples; He was now on probation as a penitent; but the question is not, 'Simon, how much hast thou wept? How often hast thou fasted, and afflicted thy soul?' but, 'Dost thou love Me? That will make the other expressions of repentance acceptable. The great thing Christ eyes in penitents, is, their eyeing Him in their repentance. Much is forgiven her, not because she wept much, but because she loved much.

Verſes 15—17.

The arguments of the papists for the supremacy of the pope, from this passage, only prove their cause to be desperate, as to scriptural argument. To do more a laborious in feeding the weakest of Christ's flock, with the wholesome food of his pure doctrine, from love to Him and his cause; to submit to any abasement or hardship, and to face any peril or persecution, in this work of compassion and tender care to the poor, the tempted, and afflicted;—this is a pre-eminence, which excites the ambition of very few, compared with the number of those who aspire after ecclesiastical authority and distinction. (Matt. 18: 1—4. P. O. 1—6. Mark 9: 33—37, v. 35.) It is indeed true, that one of the words here translated feed, may be rendered rule; but then it is the rule of a careful shepherd over his valued flock; and very different from that of those who, both in opposition to Peter's example and exhortation, have pretended to derive authority from him, 'to lord it over God's heritage.' (1 Pet. 5: 1—4.)

Sooner. Bellarmine's distinction between lambs and sheep, as signifying the laity and clergy, is very trifling, nor can any example of the like distinction be produced. This argument for the pope's supremacy seems almost as contemptible as that, which some writers of that communion have drawn from these words, to prove that heretics, though princes, are to be put to death by authority derived from Peter; because feeding the flock implies a power of killing wolves.

17 He saith unto him, 'the third time, Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou me? Peter was grieved, because he said unto him the third time, Lovest thou me? And he said unto him, 'Lord, thou knowest all things; thou knowest that I love thee. Jesus saith unto him, 'Feed my sheep.

[Practical Observations.]

18 Verily, verily, I say unto thee, When thou wast young, thou girdedst thyself, and walkedst whither thou wouldest: but when thou shalt be old, thou shalt stretch forth thy hands, and another shall gird thee, and carry thee whither thou wouldest not.

sheep likewise with food convenient. The lost sheep of the house of Israel, seek and feed, and the other sheep which are not of this fold.' Note, It is the duty of all Christ's ministers, to feed his lambs and sheep: that is, teach them; for the doctrine of the Gospel is spiritual food. 'Lead them to the green pastures, presiding in their religious assemblies, and ministering all the ordinances to them. Feed them by personal application to their respective state and case; not only lay meat before them, but feed them with it, that are wilful and will not, or weak and cannot, feed themselves.' When Christ ascended on high, He gave pastors; left his flock with them that loved Him, and would take care of them for his sake.

knowest that I love thee. He does not vouch his fellow-disciples to witness for him; they might be deceived: nor does he think his own word might be taken; the credit of that was destroyed; but he calls Christ Himself to witness. Peter was sure that Christ knew all things, and particularly that He was a discernor of the thoughts and intents of the heart, ch. 16:30. He was satisfied that Christ knew the sincerity of his love, and would attest it in his favor. It is a terror to a hypocrite, to think that Christ knows all things; for the divine omniscience will be a witness against him. But it is a comfort to a sincere Christian, My witness is in heaven, my record is on high. Christ knows us better than we know ourselves. Though we know not our own uprightness, He does.

He was grieved, when Christ asked him the third time. It put him in mind of his threefold denial of Christ, and was plainly designed to do so. Every remembrance of past sins, even pardoned sins, renews the sorrow of a true penitent. Thou shalt be ashamed, when I am pacified toward thee. It put him in fear, lest his Master foresaw some further miscarriage; which would be as great a contradiction to his profession of love. 'Surely, my Master would not thus put me upon the rack, if He did not see cause. What would become of me, if I should be again tempted!' Godly sorrow works carefulness and fear, 2 Cor. 7:11.

Three times Christ committed the care of his flock to Peter; his lambs and his sheep. The church of Christ is his flock, purchased with his own blood, (Acts 20:28.) and He is the Chief Shepherd: in this flock some are lambs, young, tender and weak, others are sheep, grown to some strength and maturity. The Shepherd takes care of both, of the lambs first, for upon all occasions He showed a particular tenderness for them; Isa. 40:11.

The charge is, to feed them. The word used, (v. 15, 17.) strictly signifies, give them food; but the word used, (v. 16.) signifies more largely, to do all the offices of a shepherd. 'Feed the lambs with what is proper for them, and the

But why did He give this charge particularly to Peter? The advocates for the pope's supremacy, will tell you, that Christ hereby designed to give Peter, and therefore his successors, and therefore the bishops of Rome, an absolute nomination over the whole church; as if a charge to serve the sheep, gave a power to lord it over all the shepherds; whereas, Peter himself never claimed such power, nor did the other disciples ever own it in him. This charge to Peter to preach the Gospel, is by a strange fetch made to support the usurpation of his pretended successors, that fleece the sheep, and, instead of feeding them, feed upon them. But the particular application to Peter here, was designed, 1. To restore him to his apostleship, now that He repented of his abjuration of it, and to renew his commission, both for his own satisfaction, and that of his brethren. A commission to one convicted of a crime, amounts to a pardon; no doubt, this commission to Peter, evinced that Christ was reconciled to Him, else He would never have reposed such confidence in him. Of some that have deceived us we say, 'Though we forgive them, we will never trust them;' but Christ trusted him with the most valuable treasure on earth. 2. It was designed to quicken him to a diligent discharge of his office as an apostle. Peter was a man of a bold and zealous spirit, always forward to speak and act, and, lest he should be tempted to take upon him the directing of the shepherds, he is charged to feed the sheep, as he himself charges all the presbyters to do, and not to lord it over God's heritage, 1 Pet. 5:2,3. 3. What Christ said to him, He said to all his disciples; He charged them all, not only to be fishers of men, (though that was said to Peter, Luke 5:10.) by the conversion of sinners, but feeders of the flock, by the edification of saints.

Christ, having confirmed to him the honor of an apostle, now tells him of further premerit designed him—the honor of a martyr. Thou shalt stretch forth thy hands, being compelled to it, and another shall gird thee, (as a prisoner that is pinioned,) and carry thee whither naturally thou wouldest not. He prefaces the notice of his sufferings, with a solemn asseveration, Verily, verily, I say unto thee. It was not spoken of as a thing probable, but certain. As Christ foresaw his own sufferings, so those of his followers, and foretold them, though not in particular, as to Peter, yet in general, that they must take up their cross. Having charged him to feed his sheep, He bids him not to expect

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 15—17. It is a blessed effect, when our falls and mistakes render us more humble, watchful, and zealous. [This conduct of our Lord, shows that He receives us into favor only when we confess our sins, make reparation for them, and return to duty.] OSTERVOLD.—Our Lord will readily pardon the sins of his believing servants: but He will rebuke them, in one way or other; that they may be more sensible how greatly He abhors their offences, notwithstanding his mercy to their souls. 'The sincerity of our love' must at length be brought to the test; and it behooves us to inquire seriously, and with earnest and persevering prayer, whether we be able to stand this test: for He says to us, in his Word, as certainly as to Peter, 'Lovest thou Me?' and the same will be the grand subject of inquiry at the solemn day of judgment. (Matt. 25:31—46. 1 Cor. 16:21—24. Eph. 6:21—24.) If we indeed love Him, his perfections, truths, precepts, and ordinances will be cordially approved, and observed by us; we shall love those most, who appear most to love and resemble Him, shall render Him our thankful returns for his mercies, and endeavor to recommend Him to those around us; we shall take pleasure in speaking of Him or to Him, in hearing Him praised, and in promoting his glory; we shall be ready to labor, venture, or suffer for his sake; yet after all we shall be grieved and ashamed, that we love Him no more, and serve Him no better. We shall imitate his example, and be gradually conformed to his image: yet it will be humiliating and afflicting to us, that we so little resemble Him. Those who thus 'love the Lord Jesus in sincerity,' have a consciousness of it, notwithstanding all their defects; and, as they believe and are assured that 'He knoweth all things,' and especially that He knows whether they love Him or not, they will apply to Him to determine the question for them, and to enable them to love Him, when they cannot confidently aver that they do.—As obedience is the general evidence of our love to Jesus, so the love of his afflicted people for his sake, and an endeavor to be useful to the meanest of his flock, is that particular expression which He requires of every one. No man, therefore, can be qualified to 'feed the lambs and sheep' of Christ, who do not love the good Shepherd more than all secular emolument, and all those professed ministers, without distinction of rank and station, who are too ambitious, haughty, slothful, delicate, studious of human learning, or occupied in worldly pursuits, to apply themselves to feed the souls of the people, even the weakest, and poorest of them, will be left under an awful condemnation, as utterly destitute of the love of Christ.—Those who have been greatly tempted, and have had humiliating experience of their frailty and sinfulness, and who have had much forgiven them, generally prove the most tender and attentive pastors, and the best guides of young converts: and the Lord often leaves those whom He loves to pass through painful conflicts, as well as much experience of his compassion, in order to render them more gentle to their weak brethren, and the lambs of his flock. Thus, when they feel their unworthiness for the least and meanest employment in his service, they become far abler ministers, than when they had a much higher opinion of themselves, and of their qualifications for the ministry; and were disposed to look down on those, whom they now 'in honor prefer.'

otherwise; and to fret the more at grievances, because we have known the sweets of liberty, health and plenty, Job 29: 2. Ps. 42: 4. But we may turn it, and reason thus, 'How many years of prosperity have I enjoyed more than I deserved and improved? And, having received good, shall not I receive evil also?'

What a change may possibly be made with us, as to our condition in this world! See 1 Sam. 2: 5.

What a change is presently made with those that leave all to follow Christ! They must no longer gird themselves, but He must gird them; and must no longer talk whither they will, but whither He will.

Christ tells Peter he should suffer thus in his old age. Though he should be old, and, in the course of nature, not likely to live long, his enemies would put out his candle when it was almost burned to the socket. See 2 Chron. 36: 17. God would shelter him from the rage of enemies till he should come to be old, that he might be made the fitter for sufferings, and the church might the longer enjoy his services.

It is not only appointed to all once to die, but it is appointed to each what death he shall die, v. 19. When Paul speaks of so great a death, he intimates that there are degrees of death: there is one way into the world, but many ways out, and God has determined which way we should go.

It is the great concern of every good man, whatever death he dies, to glorify God in it; for what is our chief end but this? To die to the Lord? When we die patiently, submitting to the will of God; cheerfully, rejoicing in hope of the glory of God; and usefully, witnessing to the truth and goodness of religion, and encouraging others, we glorify God; and this is the earnest expectation and hope of all good Christians, as it was Paul's, that Christ may be magnified in them living and dying, Phil. 1: 20.

The death of the martyrs was in a special manner the glorifying of God. The truths of God are hereby confirmed. The grace of God, which carried them with so much constancy through their sufferings, is magnified. And the consolations of God, which have abounded toward them in their sufferings, and his promises, the springs of their consolations, have hereby been recommended to all the saints. The blood of the martyrs has been the seed of the church, and the conversion and establishment of thousands. Precious therefore in the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints, as that which honors Him; and those who at such an expense honor Him, He will honor.

When He had spoken thus, observing Peter, perhaps, to look blank upon it, He saith unto him, Follow Me. Probably, He rose from the place where He sat at dinner, walked off a little, and bid Peter attend Him. This word further confirms his restoration to his Master's favor, and to his apostleship; for, Follow Me, was the first call. It explained the prediction of his sufferings, which perhaps Peter at first did not fully understand, till Christ gave him that key to it, Follow Me; 'Expect to be treated as I have been, and to tread the bloody path I have trod before thee; for the disciple is not greater than his Lord.' It excited him, and encouraged him in, faithfulness and diligence in his work. He had bid him feed his sheep, and let him set his Master before him as an example of pastoral care. Let the under-shepherds study to imitate the Chief Shepherd. They had followed Christ while here upon earth; and now He was leaving them, He still preaches the same duty, still they must follow his rules and his example. What greater encouragement could they have, both in services and sufferings? Herein they followed Him, and it was their present honor; who would be ashamed to follow such a leader? Hereafter they should follow Him, and that would be their future happiness.

Verse 20.

'And Peter did so, but turning about, and seeing John also following, and thereby showing his comprehension of the meaning of Jesus, he feels a curiosity to know if John will also accompany him in death, &c. There is a spirit of tenderness here, which I can never read without the most sensible emotion. John etats not for Christ's call; but ease and honor in it, but trouble and persecution, and to suffer ill for doing well.

The stretching out his hands, some think, points at the manner of his death by crucifying; and the tradition of the ancients informs us that Peter was crucified at Rome under Nero, A. D. 68, or as others say, 79. Others think, it points at the bonds and imprisonments of such as are sentenced to death. The pomp and solemnity of an execution add much to the terror of death. Death, in these horrid shapes, has often been the lot of Christ's faithful ones, who yet have overcome it by the blood of the Lamb. This prediction, though pointing chiefly at his death, was to have its accomplishment in his previous sufferings. It began to be fulfilled when he was imprisoned, Acts 4: 3, 5: 18. 12: 4. No more is implied in his being carried whither he would not, than a violent death; such as even innocent nature could not think of without dread, nor approach without reluctance. He that puts on the Christian, does not put off the man; Christ Himself prayed against the bitter cup. A natural aversion to pain and death is reconcilable with holy submission to the will of God in both. Paul, though longing to be unloosed, owns he cannot desire to be unloosed, 2 Cor. 5: 4.

He compares this with his former liberty. Time was, when thou knewest not any of these hardships, v. 18. Where trouble comes, we are apt to aggravate it with this, that it has been ness; and so it is a repetition of the promise Christ had given Peter, (ch. 13: 36.) Thou shalt follow Me afterward. They that faithfully follow Christ in grace, shall certainly follow Him to glory.

V. 20-25. Peter, in obedience to his Master's orders, followed Him, and, turning about, pleased with the honor his Master now did him, he sees the disciple whom Jesus loved following likewise.

John does not name himself, thinking his own name not worthy to be preserved in these records; but his description sufficiently informs us whom he meant, and gives us a reason why he followed Christ; he was the disciple whom Jesus loved, whom He had a particular kindness for above the rest; and therefore you cannot blame him for coveting to be as much as possible within hearing of Christ, during those few minutes with which He favored his disciples. John's having leaned on Jesus's breast, and his inquiring concerning the traitor, at the instigation of Peter, (ch. 13: 24.) is a reason why Peter made the following inquiry concerning him, to repay his kindness. Note, As we have interest at the throne of grace, we should improve it for the benefit of one another. They that help us by their prayers, should be helped by us with ours. This is the communion of saints.

John also followed Jesus. When Christ called Peter to follow Him, it looked as if He designed to have some private talk with him; but such an affection John had to his Master, that he would rather do a thing that seemed rude, than lose the benefit of Christ's discourse. What Christ said to Peter, he took as said to himself; for the word Follow Me, was given to all the disciples. He desired to have fellowship with those that had fellowship with Christ, and to accompany those that attended Him. The bringing of one to follow Christ, should engage others. Draw me, and we will run after thee, Cant. 1: 4. Peter should have been wholly intent upon Christ, and have waited to hear what He had further to say to him; but he looked about to see who followed. Note, The best men find it hard to attend upon the Lord without distraction; and a needless and unseasonable regard to our brethren often diverts us from communion with God. Or, it was a laudable concern for his fellow-disciples. He was not so elevated with the honor his Master did him, as to deny a kind look to one that followed. Acts of love to our brethren must go along with faith in Christ.

'Lord, and what shall this man do? Thou hast told me my work, and my lot. What shall be his work, and his lot? This may be, 1. Concern for John: 'Lord, Thou showest me great favor; here comes thy beloved disciple, who never forfeited thy favor, as I have done; hast Thou nothing to say to him? Wilt Thou not tell how he must be employed, and how he must be honored? Or, 2. Uneasiness at what Christ had said to him. 'Lord, must I alone be carried whither I would not? Must this man have no share of the cross? It is hard to reconcile ourselves to distinguishing sufferings, and the troubles in which we think we stand alone. Or, 3. Curiosity. It seems, by Christ's answer, there was something amiss in the question; when Christ had given him the charge of such a treasure, and the notice of such a trial, it had become him to have said, 'Lord, what shall I do then to approve myself faithful to such a trust, in such a trial? Lord, increase my faith. As my day is, let my strength be.' But,

He seems more concerned for another than for himself. So apt are we to be busy in other men's matters, but negligent in the concerns of our own souls; quick-sighted abroad, but dull-sighted at home; judging others, when we have enough to do to prove our own work, and under stand our own way.

rites and follows too; he says not one word of his love and zeal. He chose that the action should speak that; therefore with great simplicity relates the fact only, not telling us what the action meant. If here, and there a generous heart that, like his own, glows with love to Christ, sees and emulates it, be it as, but let it be not solicitous man Understood.

22 Jesus saith unto him, 'If I will that he tarry till I come, what is that to thee? follow thou me.'

23 Then went this saying abroad among the brethren, that that disciple should not die: yet Jesus said not unto him, He shall not die; but, If I will that he tarry till I come, 'what is that to thee?'

24 ¶ This is the disciple which testifieth of these things, and wrote these things; and we know that his testimony is true.

coming to destroy Jerusalem: so some. All the apostles but John died before that destruction. God wisely so ordered it, that one of them should live so long, as to close up the canon of the New Testament, Rev. 22: 18. And, to obviate the design of the enemy that sowed tares even before the servants fell asleep, John lived to confront Ebion, and Cerinthus, and other heretics, who rose betimes, speaking perverse things.

Others think that it is only a rebuke to Peter's curiosity, and that his tarrying till Christ's second coming, is only the supposition of an absurdity. Note, We are apt to be solicitous about many things, that are nothing to us. Other people's characters are nothing to us; it is out of our line to judge them: Rom. 14: 4. Whatsoever they are, saith Paul, it makes no matter to me. Other people's affairs are nothing to us to intermeddle in; we must quietly work, and mind our own business. Many nice and curious questions are put by the scribes and disputers of this world concerning the counsels of God, and the invisible world, of which we may say, What is this to us? What do you think will become of such and such? is a common question, which may easily be answered with another; What is that to me? To his own Master he stands or falls. What is it to us to know the times and the seasons? Secret things belong not to us. The great thing that is all in all to us, is duty, and not event; for duty is ours, events are God's: our own duty, and not another's; for every one shall bear his own burthen: our present duty, and not the duty of the time to come; for sufficient to the day shall be the directions thereof: a good man's steps are ordered by the Lord; (Ps. 37: 23.) he is guided step by step. Our duty is summed up in this, of following Christ; we must attend his motions, and accommodate ourselves to them, follow Him to do Him honor; we must walk in the way He walked in, and aim to be where He is. If we will closely attend to the duty of following Christ, we shall find neither heart nor time to meddle with what does not belong to us.

See the easy rise of a mistake in the church, by misconstruing the sayings of Christ, and turning a supposition to a position. Because John must not die a martyr, they conclude he must not die at all, v. 23.

Desiring it, they expect it. We easily believe what we wish to be true. For John to abide in the flesh when the rest were gone, till Christ's second coming, they think, will be a great blessing to the church, which in every age might have recourse to him as an oracle; when they must lose Christ's bodily presence, they hope to have that of his beloved disciple; as if that must supply the want of his; forgetting that the Comforter was to do that. Note, We are apt to dote too much on men and means, and to think we are happy, if we may but have them always with us; whereas God will change his workmen, and yet carry on his work, that the excellency of the power may be of God, and not of men. There is no need of immortal ministers to guide the church, while it is under the conduct of an eternal Spirit.

Perhaps they were confirmed in their expectations, finding that John survived the rest of the apostles; because he lived long, they were ready to think he should live always: whereas that which waxeth old, is ready to vanish away, Heb. 8: 13.

Hence learn, 1. The uncertainty of human tradition, and the folly of building our faith upon it. Here was a tradition, an apostolical tradition, that went abroad among the brethren; it was early, common, public, and yet false. How little we are those unwritten traditions to be relied on, which the council of Trent decreed to be received, with a veneration and pious affection equal to that which is owing to the holy Scripture. Here was a traditional exposition of Scripture; no new saying of Christ's advanced, but only a construction put by the brethren upon what He did really say, yet it was a misconstruction. Let the Scripture be its own interpreter; as it is in a great measure its own evidence, and proves itself for it is light.

2. The aptness of men to misinterpret Christ's sayings. The grossest errors have sometimes shrouded themselves under the umbrage of incontestable truths; and the Scriptures themselves have been wrested by the unlearned and unsable. We must not think it strange, if we hear the sayings of Christ misinterpreted, to patronize the errors of antichrist and the impudent doctrine of transubstantiation pretending to build upon that word of Christ This is my body.

Such mistakes are easily rectified by adhering to the Word of Christ. So the evangelists here corrects that saying among the brethren, by repeating the very words of Christ. Add thou not unto his words. Note, The best end of controversies, would be to keep to the express words of Scripture, and speak, as well as think, according to that word, Isa. 8: 20. Scripture-language is the safest and most proper vehicle of scripture-truth: the words which the Holy Ghost teacheth, 1 Cor. 2: 13. As the Scripture, itself, is the best weapon wherewith to wound all dangerous errors, (and therefore Deists, Socinians, Papists, and Enthusiasts, do all they can to derogate from the authority of the Scripture,) so it is the best weapon-sword to heal the wounds made by different modes of expression concerning the same truths. Those that cannot agree in the same logics, metaphysics, or terms of art, may yet agree in the same scripture-terms, and then may agree to love one another.

The conclusion of this Gospel, and of the evangelical story, (v. 24, 25,) is not so abrupt as the others, but ends with a sort of cadence. An account of the penman of it, This is the disciple which testifies of these things to the present age, and wrote these things for the benefit of posterity, this same that Peter and his Master had that conference about in the foregoing verses—John the apostle.

Those who wrote the history of Christ, were not ashamed to put their names to it. John in effect subscribes his name. As we are sure who was the author of the first five books of the Old Testament, the foundation of that revelation, so we are sure who were the penmen of the four Gospels and the Acts, the pentateuch of the New Testament. The record of Christ's life and death is not the report of see know not who, but was drawn up by men of known integrity, ready not only to depose it upon oath, but, to seal it with their blood.

Those who wrote the history of Christ, wrote on their own knowledge; they themselves were eye and ear witnesses. The penman of this history was a beloved disciple, that had leaned on Christ's breast, had himself heard his sermons and conferences, seen his miracles, and the proofs of his resurrection. This is he who testifies.

Those who wrote the history of Christ, as they testified what they had seen, so they wrote what they had first testified. It was published by word of mouth, before it was committed to writing. They testified it in the pulpit, at the bar, steadfastly avowed it, not as travellers give account of their travels, to entertain the company, but as witnesses, on oath, of what they know in a matter of consequence, with caution and exactness to found a verdict upon. Their writings are testimonies to the world of the truth of Christ's doctrine, and will be testimonies either for or against us, according as we do or do not receive it. It was appointed for the support and benefit of the church, that the history of Christ should be put into writing, that it might with the greater fulness and certainty spread to every place, and last through every age.

It concludes with an attestation of the truth of what had been related; We know it at his testimony is true.

The common sense of mankind is, that a testimony of an eye-witness, of unspotted reputation, who solemnly deposes what he had seen, and puts it into writing for greater certainty, is an unexceptionable evidence. We know, that is, all the world knows, that such testimony is valid, and the common faith of mankind requires us to credit it; and in other cases verdict and judgment are given on such testimonies. The truth of the Gospel comes confirmed by all the evidence we can rationally desire or expect. The fact, that Jesus did preach such doctrines, work such miracles, and rise from the dead, is proved beyond contradiction.

25 And there are also many other things which Jesus did, the which if they should be written every one, I suppose that even the world itself could not contain the books that should be written. Amen.

20:30, 31. 16:28-14. Ps. 40:5, 71:15. Ec. 12:12. Matt. 11:5. Acts 13:28. 20:35. Heb. 11:32. Am. 7:10. Matt. 19:24.

wrote, like ch. 19: 35. He knows that He saith true. He speaks of himself in the plural number, not for majesty-sake, but for modesty-sake; as 1 John 1: 1. That which we have seen; and 2 Pet. 1: 16. Note, The evangelists do not require us to believe what they did not believe themselves; they knew their testimony was true, for they ventured both this life and the other upon it; threw away this life, and depended upon another, on the credit of what they spoke and wrote.

It concludes with an et cætera; a reference to many other very memorable things said and done by our Lord, well known by many then living, but not thought fit to be recorded for posterity; (p. 25.) and which, if written at large, with the circumstances of them, even the world itself, that is, all the libraries in it, could not contain the books that might be written. Thus he concludes like an orator, as Paul, (Heb. 11: 32.) What shall I more say? For the time would fail me.

If it be asked why the Gospels are not larger, why the New-Testament history is not as copious and as long as the old; it may be answered,

It was not because they had nothing more to write, that was worth writing. Every thing that Christ said and did, was worth our notice, and capable of being improved. He never spake an idle word, nor did an idle thing; He never spake or did any thing mean, or little, or trifling, which is more than can be said of the wisest or best of men. His miracles were very many, of many kinds, and the same often repeated. Though one true miracle might perhaps suffice to prove a divine commission, yet the repetition of the miracles on a great variety of persons, in a great variety of cases, and before a great variety of witnesses, helped very much to prove them true. Every new miracle rendered the report of the former the more credible; and the multitude of them render the whole report incontestable. The evangelists, on several occasions, give general accounts of Christ's preaching and miracles, inclusive of many particulars, as Matt. 4: 23, 24. 9: 35. 11: 1. 14: 14, 36. 15: 30. 19: 2 &c. When we speak of Christ, we have a copious subject before us, and, after all, the one half is not told. St. Paul quotes one of Christ's sayings, which is not recorded by any of the evangelists; (Acts 20: 35.) and doubtless there were many more.

But it was for these three reasons:

1. It was not needful to write more. This is implied here. What is written, is a sufficient revelation of the doctrine of Christ, and the proof of it, and the rest was but to the same purpose. They that hence argue against the sufficiency of the Scripture, as the rule of our faith and practice, and for the necessity of unwritten traditions, ought to show what there is in the traditions they pretend to, perfective of the written Word; we are sure there is that which is contrary to it, and therefore reject them. By these therefore let us be admonished, for of writing many books there is no end, Eccl. 12: 12. If we do not believe and improve what is written, neither would we if there had been much more.

2. It was not possible to write all. It was possible for the Spirit to indite all, but morally impossible for the penmen to pen all. The world could not contain the books. It is an hyperbole common enough, [especially in the East,] and justifiable, when no more is intended than that it would fill an incredible number of volumes. It would be such a large and overgrown history as never was; such as would justify all other writings, and leave us no room for them. What volumes would be filled with Christ's prayers, had we the record of all those He made, when He continued all night in prayer to God, without vain repetitions? Much more if all his sermons and conferences were particularly related, his miracles, cures, labors, sufferings; it would have been an endless thing.

3. It was not advisable to write much; for the world, in a moral sense, could not contain the books that should be written. Christ said not what He might have said to his disciples, because they were not able to bear it; and for the same reason the evangelists wrote not what they might have written: This word contain, is the word used, ch. 8: 37. My Word has no place in you; they would have been so many, that they would have found no room. People's time would have been spent in reading, and other duties would thereby have been crowded out. Much is overlooked of what is written, much forgotten, and much made matter of doubtful dispute; this would have been the case much more, if there had been such a world of books of equal authority and necessity; especially since it was requisite, that what was written should be meditated upon, and expounded, which God wisely thought fit to leave room for. Parents and ministers, in giving instruction, must consider the capacities of those they teach, and, like Jacob, must take heed of overdriving. Let us be thankful for the books that are written, and not prize them the less for their plainness and brevity, but diligently improve what God has thought fit to reveal, and long to be where our capacities shall be so elevated and enlarged, that there will be no danger of their being overloaded.

The evangelist concluding with Amen, the ehy sets to his seal; and let us set to ours, an Amen of faith, subscribing to the Gospel; and an Amen of satisfaction in what is written, as able to make us wise to salvation. AMEN.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 18—25. The resolutions which upright young converts rashly form and break, are sometimes at length performed, when in a course of years they have been humbled and proved. They must first learn, that 'without Christ they can do nothing;' and then they will be shown, that they 'can do all things through Him who strengtheneth them.' (2 Cor. 2: 14—17. 3: 4—6. 12: 7—10.) Yet sufferings, pain, and death will appear formidable to the most experienced Christian: nor wot, did he be willing to meet them, did he not hope to glorify God by so doing; and were he not desirous of being present with his Lord. (2 Cor. 5: 1—8.) But with these objects presented to faith, he obeys the Redeemer's call, and follows Him through death to glory; and the more love he had experienced, the readier will he be to tread in his steps.—Curiosity is too apt to interrupt us in our course: a thousand questions are started and discussed, about which Jesus says to us, 'What is that to thee? Follow thou Me.' If we attend to this voice, even 'death itself will be gain to us,' and we shall be ready for his coming. (Phil. 1: 19—26.) While here, we must live by faith in the sure testimony of his Word.—We ought to bless God for all that is written in the Scriptures; but we may also be thankful that they are so compendious. We may, however, anticipate joy in heaven from a far more complete knowledge of all that Jesus did and said; as well as from the conduct of his providence and grace, in his dealing with each of us. May this be the happiness of the writer and of every reader! Amen.

Verse 25.

The concluding words are generally understood to be hyperbolic; but perhaps they also intimate, that if every one of the actions and words of Jesus had been written, the books would have been so voluminous, as to counteract their intention; for men, in the present state of the world, would neither be able to purchase, peruse, or remember them; and the men of the world, would have made the multiplicity of them an additional reason for not receiving them. SCOTT.

ADDITIONAL NOTES. With reference to the closing scene of our Lord's life, upon the cross, the Rev. Mr. Townsend, in his 'New Testament arranged in chronological order,' judiciously remarks: 'It is singular that our translators have not observed the three modes of expression adopted by the evangelists; [in describing the death of Christ:] Mark and Luke say "He expired," John 19: 30. "He yielded up his spirit." Matthew 27: 50, "He dismissed his spirit." The spirits of mere men are in general violently separated from the body in a way over which they can have no control: it was for our Lord only to die as the Prince of Life, by an act of supernatural power, and to separate at his own pleasure, and at his own command, the spirit from the body.' See note on Matt. 27: 50. from Doddridge and Scott. Ed.

Though simplicity of manner is common to all our Lord's historians, yet the simplicity of one differs from that of another. The style of John is thought to be more idiomatic, and less conformable to syntactic order than that of any other writer in the New Testament; his manner of speaking an author destitute of the advantages of education. His mode of expression are also, in many instances, peculiar. Yet, though he appears, more than any of the evangelists, to excel in that artless simplicity, which is scarcely compatible with the subtlety of disputation, we have, in his work, a fuller display of the evidences of our religion, as it then stood, than in all the rest. Not without design, he mostly passes over the passages of our Lord's history and teaching, which the other evangelists had treated at large, or touches them but slightly; while he records miracles overlooked by the rest, and expatiates on the sublime doctrines of the pre-existence, the divinity, and the incarnation of the Word, the great ends of his mission, and the blessings of his purchase.
